Robert Weiner '74, will be giving a speech, "Media Handling of High Profile Issues," in the Campus Center at 4:30 p.m. Weiner, a member of the public affairs senior staff in the Clinton White House, will use his wide government experience to critique the media's handling of important national issues in the College of Humanities and Fine Arts Dean's Seminar Series Lecture.

The 3rd UMass Korean Film Festival will begin at the Campus Center, starting at 6:30 p.m. This film festival will last until Friday. Visit umass.edu for more information.

Yungchen Lhamo will be performing in Bowker Auditorium at 8 p.m. The power and purity of Yungchen's voice gives heart to her spiritual devotion and performance. For more information call FAC at 545-2511.

Three New Orleans radio broadcasters will speak about the role radio played as the vital link to the outside world for people stranded in New Orleans during Hurricane Katrina in "After Katrina: How Radio Saved the City of New Orleans" at 4 p.m. in the Du Bois Library Learning Commons.

Democracy Matters is hosting the first "Where's Your Democracy?" event at the UMASS Graduate Lounge. There will be live music, live speakers, lots of information on current and relevant issues and refreshments. Join Democracy Matters to celebrate our current democracy and learn how you can make an impact on the future of our democracy. For more information contact: Shawn Robinson at srobinson174@hotmail.com

Thursday November 17

Sand Mandala Closing Ceremony will be in the Fine Arts Center at 4:30 p.m. In a colorful ceremony with gongs, trumpets and chanted prayers the sands are swept up and placed in an urn to carry to a body of water where they are poured into the waters to fulfill the act of healing. For more information call the FAC at 545-2511.

"Hollywood: An Empire of Their Own," part of the Blacks & Jews in America film series, will be held in Herter starting at 7 p.m. "Hollywood: An Empire of Their Own" is the story of how Jewish immigrants from Eastern Europe created Hollywood. For more information visit umass.edu

Real Talk II: Speak Up, Speak Out, and Speak Your Mind! will be held in the Malcolm X Cultural Center starting at 7 p.m. "Real Talk" is a series of monthly brother/sister dialogues that will be set to discuss some of the most difficult and controversial issues facing the black community. For more information visit umass.edu

O.A.R. will be performing at the Mullins Center. The show begins at 8 p.m.

Friday November 18

"Resilient Communication Networks for Disater Management" will be held at Isenberg School of Management starting at 11 a.m. Professor Aura Ganz will deliver the fifth lecture in the Fall Operations Research/Management Science Seminar series.

"The Bodhisattva Tara: Compassion in Action" lecture will be in Memorial Hall starting at 7:30 p.m. This public talk by Za Choeye Rinpoche will highlight the special role that Tara plays in the Buddhist practice and her place in the history and culture of the Tibetan people.

American Stroke Association White Out Fundraiser will be at The Pub starting at 9 p.m. Go to the pub you know and love to help raise money and awareness for the American Stroke Association.

Saturday November 19

311 will be performing at the Mullins Center starting at 8 p.m. Fresh off their new album "Don't Tread On Me," 311 will rock the way into the Mullins Center.

African Student Association's 36th Annual Harvest Night will begin at 7 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium. A night to learn and share our cultures and its influences on the ways of the world and its cultures.

Native American Social will be celebrating in the Student Union starting at 12 p.m. Join the Native American Student Association (NASA) for their annual celebration of the change of seasons. For more information visit umass.edu

Sunday November 20

"Sangam: An Evening of Indian Music and Dance" will be performing at the Campus Center Auditorium starting at 4 p.m. Artists from the Western Massachusetts area including students and faculty from the Five Colleges will showcase various Indian Classical performances. For more information visit umass.edu

University Orchestra will perform at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall beginning at 8 p.m. The University Orchestra performs works by Grieg, Barber and Tchaikovsky. For more information call the FAC at 545-2511.

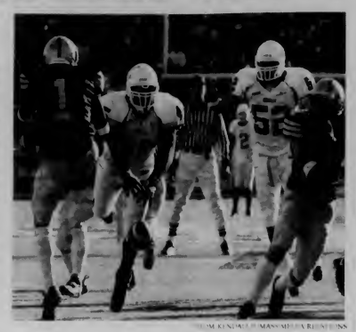
Chamber Choir and Friends will be held at the First Congregational Church starting at 4 p.m. A choral concert by UMass Amherst Chamber Choir and guests will be directed by E. Wayne Abercrombie.

UMass falls short

FOOTBALL from page 8

returned for a score.

With the Black Knights leading 34-27 following a 61-yard touchdown drive, the Minutemen took over at their own 20-yard line with 3:02 left to play in the fourth quarter, and Coen led the team down to the Army 33-yard line by going 4-of-5 for 45 yards and six rushing yards.



But two incompletions and a false start later, the offense was faced with a third-and-five at the Army 38. While Coen was directing tailback RJ. Cobbs to pick up the middle linebacker, who was beginning to show blitz, center Alex Miller snapped the ball with one second remaining on the game clock way into the backfield. Cobbs dove on the ball 20 yards behind the line of scrimmage, giving UMass a fourth-and-35 at the UMass 42-yard line.

Coen's fourth-down pass to Steve Haylark with 1:12 left on the clock fell to the ground, effectively ending the game.

"We take it for what it is," Brown said. "It's a non-league game against a I-A opponent and we gave them as much as they probably wanted. Our goal was to get our eighth win and we fell short of that today. We've got a big week in front of us."

"A win like this is a mark of something significant in the way of your character within your football team," Army coach Bobby Ross said. "You have to have wins like that to continue to win. We weren't playing well offensively. But you come in there and continue to find ways to come back and compete, that says volumes about the character within your program. That was indicative of our offense because they did keep coming back. Our last drive was a significant drive."

With just over six minutes remaining in the third quarter and the Black Knights leading 19-10, Army was set to punt on fourth-and-two from their own 28-yard line. A big defensive rush up the middle opened up a hole between the center and left guard for George Byrd, who reached punter Owen Tolson and swatted the kick into the endzone, where Bryan Haynes recovered the ball for the touchdown to cut the deficit to 19-17.

FROM CONDUIT-UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Freshman George Byrd blocks a punt in the third quarter of the Minutemen's 34-27 loss to Army on Saturday.

A 35-yard Armando Cuko field goal gave UMass the 20-19 lead with 2:21 showing on the clock in the third quarter.

But on the Maroon and White's next possession, Coen was picked off by Rob Davis at the UMass 43-yard line, and he returned it 37 yards to give Army a first-and-goal from the six-yard line. After a false start backed the ball up to the 11-yard line, halfback Carlton Jones took a handoff up the middle before bouncing out to the right side and scampering 11 yards for the go-ahead score.

Quarterback Zac Dahman's complete pass to Walter Hill in the left side of the endzone gave Army the two-point conversion and 27-20 lead with 13:46 to play in the final quarter.

On Army's following possession, Ross decided to go for it on fourth-and-one from its own 37-yard line.

Dahman dropped the snap but recovered in time to hand off to Scott Wesley, who appeared to get enough yardage on his second effort for the first down. But as he was still trying to move forward, UMass defensive tackle Justin Schweighardt stuck his helmet into the ball to force it out. Shannon James got his hands on it and returned the fumble 36 yards for the game-tying touchdown with 10:16 to play.

"I thought that play was a momentum changer," James said. "It took the wind out of the crowd. It was so unexpected, and it tied the ballgame up. I felt like that was the play we needed, but it didn't happen that way."

After a short kickoff, the Black Knights took possession at their own 39-yard line. The offense was successful on four third-down conversions, and Dahman was able to hit wideout Walter Hill streaking across the middle of the endzone for a 10-yard scoring strike, capping off the 12-play, 61-yard drive that ate up 7:14 of the clock, and gave the Black Knights the lead for good.

"They made a couple of good calls, and we didn't execute as well as we needed to," Brown said. "They did a good job executing on their last drive. We tried to counteract that in a number of ways and nothing was successful."

"Obviously, they executed," James said. "They did what they needed to do to get into the end zone. We messed up a couple of times, but you have to give Army credit, too."

FROM CONDUIT-UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Freshman Bryan Haynes recovers the blocked punt in the Black Knights' endzone, which proved to not be enough as UMass fell.

Penalties prove costly

PENALTIES from page 8

game towards the end of the fourth quarter. After senior free safety Shannon James evened the score at 27 as he returned a fumble 36 yards for a touchdown, a personal foul penalty pushed UMass back 15 yards on the ensuing kick-off.

The loss of yardage gave the Black Knight offense a desirable starting point at their own 39-yard line, and allowed them to drive 61 yards and kill 7:14 off the clock. The drive was ended with a touchdown pass from quarterback Zac Dahman to Walter Hill, which cut the deadlock and eventually gave Army the victory.

Regardless of the 106 yards of penalties — a length that equals more than the distance of the entire field — UMass kept the contest against Army close before falling as time expired.

Prior to the start of Saturday's decision, UMass had been back and forth when it came to drawing flags this season. The Minutemen only had three penalties for 25 yards in a win against James Madison on Oct. 15 and drew four penalties for 20 yards during their 35-14 win over Maine.

On the other end of the spectrum, the Minutemen had 14 penalties for 133 yards combined in the two games leading up to Army (A 34-28 loss to New Hampshire on Oct. 29 and a 35-7 victory against Delaware on Nov. 5).

UM grabs first conference win

HOCKEY from page 8

their chances to tie the game but could not capitalize. In the last ten minutes of the play the Maroon and White had two 5-on-3 man advantages.

"At the end of the game we had every opportunity to get the goal back," Cahoon said.

With 5,126 fans packing the Mullins Center on Saturday night, history was against the Minutemen. The boys from Amherst had only beaten the Terriers four times before Saturday's 4-2 victory.

For first time this season Quick started back-to-back games for UMass. He made a good case for himself making saves in his previous two games. Again on Saturday the rookie didn't disappoint as he turned away 39 of BU's 41 shots on net.

At 5:32 of the first, with BU defensemen Dan McGoff in the box for interference, UMass junior Chris Capraro netted his first goal of the season and just the fifth UMass power play goal of 2005.

On the play freshman Chris Davis had control of the puck and dished to the left side over to Topher Bevis. The Freshman then rocketed a shot on net that missed wide and ricocheted off the boards to Capraro to the right of BU goalie John Curry. Capraro gained control of the puck and stuffed it home for the 1-0 UMass lead.

Making his return from illness, Werner was the man who doubled the Minutemen advantage and put BU in what looked to be a deep hole.

Playing down a man, Werner intercepted a BU pass at the blue line and raced up the ice towards Curry where he was one-on-one with the goalie. He then got Curry off balance with a deke and shot the puck into the net for the 2-0 lead. Werner also netted an empty-net goal with just over thirty seconds to play to bury the Terriers for good.

"I was just trying to put pressure on, I think it was Schaeffer who was on the point, I knew that they were trying to work over to his left," Werner said of the play he intercepted. "I just kind of put my stick out there in the passing lane and thankfully he tried to make the play there and I just took off."

The Terriers' two goals came both on power play opportunities. At 11:51 of the second it was Brian McGuirk, who cut the advantage to one with his second goal of the season. Then midway through the third it looked as if BU's pressure would finally get to the Minutemen as they pulled within one.

John Laliberte scored the goal on a beautiful one-timer from Sean Sullivan. From the right side of Quick, Sullivan dished a centering pass across the ice to Laliberte who didn't hesitate to redirect the puck towards the net and past Quick.

After the game, however, BU coach Jack Parker said it was Scott Crowder's goal to make it 3-1 in the second that broke the Terrier's back.

"We absolutely stunk the house up," Parker said after the loss. "And we especially stunk the house up in our defensive zone coverage."

Minutemen overwhelm Dowling

BASKETBALL from page 8

picked up where they left off, as their full-court press was too much for Dowling to handle.

"I thought we played hard," Ford said. "We didn't execute as well as I'd like. Our hard work and our style of play really made us succeed. I thought we executed the way we want to play as far as 94-feet for 40 minutes."

UMass wore the smaller Dowling team down, as juniors Rashaun Freeman and Stephane Lasme each had their way in the post.

Freeman finished with 15 points and nine rebounds, and Lasme chipped in 11 points and nine boards.

NOTES: The point guard spot has not been solidified, as Maxwell, Bowers, and freshman Chris Lowe all saw time at the position. Maxwell is still getting acclimated to the position, but looked the most comfortable dishing out seven assists, while only turning the ball over three times.

"I know I still have a lot to learn," Maxwell said. "Once I learn the offense a lot more I'll know how to get my teammates better shots and I'll know when to get myself involved offensively."

Ford described Lowe's performance as "up-and-down, like a typical freshman." Lowe had five turnovers to go with six assists.

Maroon and White victorious

SWIMMING from page 8

some records as they also defeated Boston University 141-100.

The Minutewomen ended the day with a splash as they recorded a new school best time of 3:02.39 in the 400-yard freestyle relay. The team of junior Laura Whelton, sophomore Leighanne Kevil and freshmen Emma Putney and Cecelia Jenkins beat the old school record (3:30.47) by almost 30 seconds.

"It was a good day overall," UMass coach Bob Newcomb said. "It was a really exciting experience."

The Minutewomen will also travel to Army Friday for their next meet.

Recording the third best time in school history in the three-meter diving event was freshman Karen Upperco. She also took first place in the one-meter diving event with a score of 260.92, which is good enough for the sixth best mark in UMass history.

Another freshman that led the way for the Maroon and White was Christa Narus, who Newcomb said, "swam very, very well." Narus swam her best time of the short season in the 200-yard butterfly event with a time of 2:09.25, which is good enough for fifth all time in UMass history.

Freshman Taryn Prout also had an impressive showing as she won the 200-yard backstroke and placed second in the 1000-yard freestyle event. She was also on the squad that "set the pace for the rest of the day" in the 400-yard medley relay.

"I'm pretty happy with this class right now, they fit in well with the program," Newcomb said. "They're a huge part of our success right now."

LABRAT By Richard Martelly

ELSIE HOOPER By Robert D. Kryzkowski

VALLEY OF THE SQUIRRELS By Comrade X

JACK DOGG By Xavier Rhodes

THE ZOO By Gabe Strine

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"If you look for it, I've got a sneaky feeling you'll find that love is actually all around."

—Love Actually

ACROSS
1 Liquid weather
5 From
9 Make happy
14 Polister Roper
15 Italian river
16 Current events sources
17 King or Suez
18 "The Avengers" star
19 Fall beverage
20 Parasol enclosures
22 Diagonal lines
24 Serengeti predator
25 Art house film
26 Flagged vehicle
29 Fetid
31 Broadcasts
32 "Ben-"
33 Rerun payments
37 Radames' love
38 Shabbery
39 Cape Cod town
42 Undersized
43 Police officers
45 Fruit beverage
46 Miami or Lima location
48 Brooch
49 Landscaping shrub
50 Kind of rocket
52 Poet Thomas
56 Conan or Pat
57 Struck forcefully
58 Puppeteer Lewis
61 Italian eight
63 Maali scraps
64 Capital near Casablanca
65 Western state
66 ICU element
67 Portents
68 Scorn targets
69 Min. parts

DOWN
1 Arrive at
2 Set to rest
3 Likeness
4 Forgettable someone
5 Distend
6 Small antelope
7 Of a painful spasmodic attack
8 Capital of Somalia
9 Roast hosts
10 Kauai souvenirs
11 Use a calculator
12 Even score
13 Jug handle
21 ___ Arabia
23 Guy's address
26 Porcelain plates
27 Financial review
28 Word with band or ring
30 Commuter's ride
33 Return in kind
34 Give the slip to 35 Tendon
36 Status-seeking 37 Unnamed
40 Informal affirmative
41 Corrosive stuff
44 Actress Swit
46 Satellites' paths
47 That girl
51 Standing by
53 SNL producer Michaels
54 Room at the top
55 Hornet homes
56 Algerian port
58 B'way posting
59 Cured pork
60 Homer's dad
62 Cries of surprise

Find today's answers online

www.dailycollegian.com

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Your favorite movie is playing on HBO right now. Go find a TV.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
That paper you wrote over the weekend is exceptionally good.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Your goal is to find and purchase a tomigatchi on ebay.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Everyone knows you haven't showered in days.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Send grandma a fruit basket for Thanksgiving.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
You will lose your keys sometime this week.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You are terrible at keeping pets alive. Stop buying them.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You will pass that test you have today with flying colors.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
You are in serious need of a trip to the grocery store.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You have many long-lost relatives who will only surface if you win the lottery.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Buy a magazine and read it cover-to-cover in your next class.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You might sleep better if you started using a night light.

New in Town?
Amherst Hairstylists
Caren's Place
You can trust us with your hair.
40 Main St.
Downtown Amherst
(Next to Newbury Comics)
413 253 1200
Mon-Fri 10-6
Sat 10-4
Visa/MC/$
This Ad Will Run Mon & Thurs
•Haircuts & Styling
•Hair Coloring (Free Highlighting Consultation)
•Multi Color Highlighting
•Body & Facial Waxing
•For Both Men & Women
•Walk-Ins Welcome!
Get it done right the first time!
Fall Semester Coupon Specials!
1/2 price facial waxing on Wed through December.
$1 off any service with this ad until 12/05
Only with this coupon
www.carensplace.com

Monday-Friday 7:30-6
Thursday 7:30-8
Saturday 7:30-4
Saturn of Hadley
40 Russell St, Route 9
Hadley, MA 01035
(413) 584-6066
SATURN
Our service center repairs all kinds of cars...not just Saturns.
Oil & Filter Change Only $19.99
Includes topping off all fluids, adjusting tire pressures, Check antifreeze for winter protection. FREE wash & vacuum. FREE 27 point inspection.
• Mass State Inspection Station
• Free shuttle service to & from UMASS
• Located directly on bike path & PVTA stop.
No Appointment Needed
10% off mechanical repairs
Late hours on Thursdays

BOSTON BARTENDERS SCHOOL of AMERICA
WANT A HOT JOB?
Learn to be a Professional Bartender!
Classes Starting Now!
Boston Bartenders School
218 Memorial Avenue • West Springfield
1-800-357-3210
www.bostonbartender.com

ROADHOUSE CAFE
"WHERE BAY ROAD MEETS ROUTE 9"
The Roadhouse Cafe features
Organic fruits and vegetables
Healthy and nutritious homemade meals
Custom-baked cakes
A Healthy Place To Eat!
Mention this ad and receive $1.00 off a breakfast special!
Sit by our cozy fire, enjoy great food, relax, and catch up on some reading. We are happy to serve you. The sky's the limit!
OPEN: Monday-Friday 6 to noon; Sat.-Sun. 7 to 2 p.m.
BELCHERTOWN, MA • 323-6175

If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!
Insurance Replacement Rates
FREE PICK-UP
POTTERS AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL
• Direct Billing to Insurance Company
• Locally Owned & Operated
• 7 & 15 Passenger Vans
• UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates
North Amherst Motors
Collision Repairs & Glass Replacement
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
(413) 549-RENT (7368)
www.northamherstmotors.com
(One mile North of UMass - on bus route)

COMIC BOOKS
MAIN VEIN COMICS
COLLECTIBLES & CREEPY STUFF
74 FEDERAL ST, GREENFIELD, MA
(413) 773-7775
MAINVEINCOMICS@AOL.COM
NEW & BACK ISSUES, TRADES, TOYS, & MORE
THROUGH THE MAIL SUBSCRIPTIONS AVAILABLE FOR COLLEGE STUDENTS!

break from the ordinary Acapulco
7 nights at El Presidente
$899
Cancun
7 nights at Dos Playas
$749
Negril
7 nights at Fun Holiday Beach Resort
$769
U of M Campus Center, Rm 224
(413) 256.1261
STA TRAVEL
www.statravel.com
STUDENT TRAVEL & BEYOND

STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE
UMASS, AMHERST
HELPING STUDENTS PROTECT THEIR RIGHTS FOR 30 YEARS
Free Legal Advice, Referrals, Representation and Counseling for UMASS Students
Student & Workers Rights, Family & Criminal Law, Landlord/Tenant & Consumer Disputes
CALL 545-1995
or stop in at 922 Campus Center

Regency Hair Stylists
"Get a new look for fall"
$ 5.00 OFF a haircut
Monday - Thursday
Bring this ad
and your Student ID.
Call for an appointment or stop by the salon
253 - 9526
189 N. Pleasant St
Amherst, MA 01002

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ANNOUNCEMENTS

White Out Night at The Pub! Friday November 18 at The Pub HTM students are hosting an event to support the American Stroke Association. Wear White Clothing! Buy raffles for a chance to win great prizes! Come out and support the ASA while having fun with your friends!

Montreal Weekend
New Years Party $129
Complete cocktail age 18
781-979-9001 Call now
montrealexpress.net

APARTMENT FOR RENT

1, 2, 3 & 4 Bedroom spacious apartments, Great location, Bus Route, All utilities included No Fee Call 413-253-3000

EMPLOYMENT

PART-TIME POSITIONS Ideal for students or 2nd job $8.00 Hr. 20+ hrs/wk; Conduct surveys over the phone Hadley location – NO SALES! Night & wknd; shifts PVTA accessible. RSW Recruiting Office 1-888-423-5381 or email: dhayes@retail-solutions.us

November 18th is the last day to apply to become a Legal Assistant with the Student Legal Services Office. Earn 12 undergraduate credits while gaining valuable experience. Contact us at 545-1995 or stop by at 922 Campus Center to pick up an application.

EMPLOYMENT

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience nees. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

Part-Time Workers Needed We are looking for part-time assistance with a variety of office and clerical tasks. Preferred candidates will work quickly and accurately and be able to work from 5pm-9pm on days that they work. Pay is $8.00/hour. For consideration, please call (413) 256-0444 for an application or mail resume to: National Evaluation Systems, Inc., Personnel Department, P.O. Box 226, Amherst, MA 01004-0226. Resumes may also be emailed to: personnel@nesinc.com.

EMPLOYMENT

Rent us your ears! Listening experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu Voicemail: 545-6837.

Mystery Shoppers get paid to shop! Up to $150 a day. Training provided Call 1-800-690-1273

LOST

Green & Black USB Storage Device left in open access computers in the library on Tuesday Morning 9:30 $20 Reward Contact dmurphy@student.umass.edu

SERVICES

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance. 549-1906

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

TRAVEL

ACT NOW – SPRING BREAKERS Book early & Save! Free meals parties by 11/7. Lowest prices. Be a rep & TRAVEL FREE! Get the ultimate hookups with STA TRAVEL 413-256-1261.

TRAVEL

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

WANTED

Wanted: Your ads! Whether you are selling something, looking to hire new employees, or hoping to increase your customer base, The Massachusetts Daily Collegian can help! Call 413-545-3500 to speak with an experienced ad rep or to place a classified ad. Business hours are M-F 8:30am-3:30pm.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTSMONDAY

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

A battle to the finish

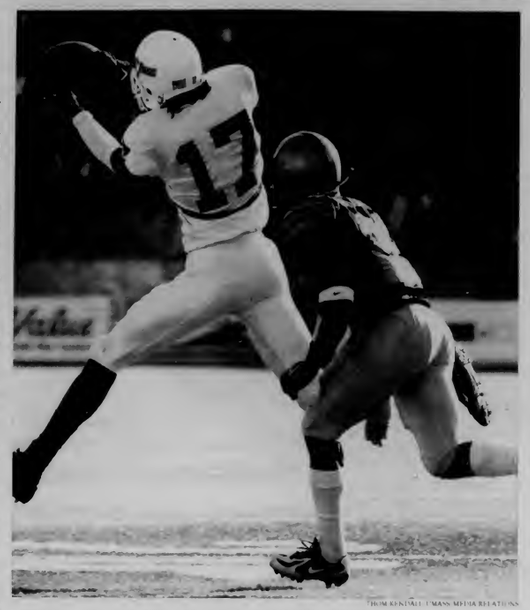
Army sneaks by with a victory

By JEFF HOWE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

WEST POINT, N.Y. – Earning a spot in the Division I-AA playoffs isn't supposed to be easy, especially in terms of percentages as only 16 of the 118 programs in the country receive a postseason bid.

The No. 5 Massachusetts football team [7-3 6-1 Atlantic 10] could have all but locked up a berth in the second season on Saturday, but Division I-A opponent Army [3-6] proved to be too tough for the Minutemen and held on for a 34-27 win in front of 34,055 fans at Michie Stadium along the banks of the Hudson River.

UMass will travel to Hempstead, N.Y. on Saturday for its regular season finale to take on Hofstra with a playoff spot likely on the line. If New Hampshire can defeat Maine, the Wildcats will take the automatic Atlantic 10 bid, leaving the Minutemen only open to an at-large bid, which has never been given to a team with four losses.



Army	34
UMass	27

"There is no playoff situation right now," UMass coach Don Brown said. "We're not in the playoffs. We have a job to do. I don't know that any team is going to get in the playoffs with seven wins, so we need to try to win a share of the Atlantic 10 championship. Hopefully eight wins and a share [of the Atlantic 10 title] will be good enough. That's what is in front of us right now. We're just trying to go week to week. Unfortunately, for us, everything is going to come down to one week."

"This is basically like our playoff," UMass freshman quarterback Liam Coen said. "It all comes down to the Hofstra game. I'm obviously disappointed in the outcome of today's game because we had a good shot to win. We kept putting ourselves in a hole and that was frustrating. We have to look to Hofstra; that's the bottom line. We have to win."

On the grounds where the United States army once staved off Great Britain during the American Revolution, the Minutemen weren't able to cause a similar uprising even after scoring 24 points off three Army turnovers, including a blocked punt recovered for a touchdown and a fumble

See FOOTBALL on page 6

TOM KENDALL/UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Sophomore receiver Rasheed Rancher grabs a pass from quarterback Liam Coen during Army's defeat of UMass on Saturday. Rancher finished the day with four catches for 38 yards.

Penalties made the difference

By ERIC ATHAS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

WEST POINT, N.Y. — Although the Massachusetts football team (7-3 6-1 Atlantic 10) fought a battle against Division I Army (3-6) on Saturday, there was another opponent on the field that impaired the play of the Minutemen: penalties.

During its 34-27 loss against the Black Knights at Michie Stadium, UMass posted its highest penalty showing of the season with 15 penalties for a total of 106 yards — a number which totals more than the Minutemen's 62 rushing yards on the day.

"It was a war out there," UMass coach Don Brown said. "It was very physical on both sides, so usually when that occurs and there's a lot of emotion out there, sometimes guys get overzealous and we had a couple of bad ones."

The flag-throwing has been a negative factor at certain points this season and the number of penalties that UMass has earned during its losses is substantially higher than throughout its victories.

During the Minutemen's seven wins, they were penalized only 42 times for 332 yards, and during its three losses, they were penalized 33 times for 261 yards. That comes out to an average of 11 penalties for 87 yards when UMass has lost and just six penalties for 47.4 yards when it has come out on top.

Against Army, penalties on third down put UMass in difficult positions.

"Penalties killed us on drives and we ended up with so many third and longs," UMass quarterback Liam Coen said. "It's tough play calling on that."

The 34,055 people in attendance at Michie Stadium is one component that added to the noise level, as six of the 15 penalties on Saturday were false starts.

One penalty that proved to be deadly for UMass

See PENALTIES on page 6

UMass splits weekend

By JON PELLAND
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It was an emotionally up and down weekend for the Massachusetts hockey team. Despite dropping their game Friday night at Northeastern (1-6-1 1-3-1 Hockey East) by a score of 2-0, the Minutemen (2-7 1-5 HEA) were finally able to get a win in the HEA by defeating Boston University (3-4 3-3 HEA) 4-2 at the Mullins Center on Saturday.

Entering the game in Boston on Friday night, only UMass and Merrimack had failed to gain a point in conference play. The Huskies' lone point came in a 1-1 tie with Boston College.

From the start the Minutemen were already down a man as captain Stephen Werner stayed back in Amherst with a stomach virus. Of all the Minutemen, Werner has had the best success against NU with 10 career points against the Huskies (four goals and six assists in nine games) For a team that was already struggling to score goals, losing one of its main scoring threats severely hampered their chances in the game.

NorthEastern	2
UMass	0
UMass	4
BU	2

"Stephen's a key player on our team and in our program and one of the better forwards in Hockey East," UMass coach Don Cahoon said after the game. "We're not scoring goals, flat out, and there's a guy that's potentially a point producer and he's out of the lineup."

Also during the game, UMass freshman Alex Berry had to be carried off the ice by teammates and is expected to miss substantial time with an undisclosed leg injury.

The two sides played to a scoreless tie through the first 39:57 of the game until NU's Jimmy Russo broke the tie with just 2.9 seconds remaining in the third period.

With UMass freshman Scott

KAREN WINGER/COLLEGIAN

Senior Stephen Werner proved to be a force in UMass' win over Boston University on Saturday, scoring two goals throughout the contest.

Crowder in the penalty box for holding, the Huskies took advantage of the power play opportunity. With traffic in front of the net the Huskies were able to get a few shots off but Minutemen goalie Jon Quick turned away all but one. Russo scooped up a loose puck and buried in past Quick for what was the game-winner.

The power play goal at 19:57 was assisted by Matti Uusivirta and Joe Vitale. It was just the seventh power play goal the Minutemen had given up all season.

"To give up the goal at the end of the second period, a frivolous type of play, not paying attention to detail, the puck ends up in the net and puts a team who is having trouble trying to score goals behind the eight ball," Cahoon said.

Russo added an empty-netter at the 19:54 mark to seal the game, and the Huskies' first win of the young season.

Before that however, UMass had

See HOCKEY on page 6

Minutemen thrash Dowling

By DAN DUGGAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Thursday night marked the beginning of the Travis Ford era at the Mullins Center, and the Massachusetts men's basketball team came out ready to play right from the opening tip – literally.

UMass controlled the tip-off, and junior Brandon Thomas immediately took a pass from junior Rashaun Freeman and raced down the court for a dunk. The play was a sign of things to come, as the Minutemen completely overmatched Division II Dowling, rolling to a 96-55 win in front of 2,415 fans.

UMass	96
Dowling	55

The game was dominated by the new faces to the program, as the fiery Ford paced the sidelines the entire game, and his signature full-court press forced 36 turnovers, which UMass converted into 43 points.

Thomas, a transfer playing in his first game on the Mullins hardwood, led the Minutemen in scoring with 19 points, and junior James Life, another transfer, displayed a shooting touch that UMass was sorely lacking last year, netting 15 of his 17 points from beyond the arc.

And while everything went UMass' way on Thursday, Ford was well aware that his team will face much stiffer competition in the regular season, beginning on Friday night at 7 p.m. when the Minutemen host Hartford in the season-opener.

"There will be no more of these games," Ford stressed after the game. "My whole postgame talk was basically that play time is over. We did what we were supposed to do — we were supposed to beat them by 40-plus. We didn't do anything outstanding other than play hard."

While there were a lot of positives for the Maroon and White, most notably shooting (51 percent from the field, 40 percent on three-pointers) and defense, there were also a few red flags raised.

The biggest concern for the Minutemen was on the glass, as they only out-rebounded the Golden Lions by one, despite having a considerable size advantage. UMass allowed Dowling 24 offensive boards, a result of some of the players not recovering from the press to get in position to rebound.

Life, in particular, was guilty of not getting back in position on two consecutive possessions late in the first half, and caught the ire of Ford, who ripped off his suit jacket during a timeout to express his displeasure with Life's rebounding efforts.

"James needs to be more than just a shooter," Ford said. "I know he can shoot the basketball, and that's a great strength, but we need him to play defense and get in there and mix it up and rebound a little bit."

Ford was happy with Life's response after the reprimand, as he played a better all-around game the rest of the way. Life showed his value in a 30-second span late in the half, hitting an NBA three, then spotting up in transition and taking a feed from junior Maurice Maxwell to can another trey on the next trip.

UMass took a 48-22 lead into the break, punctuated by a steal and dunk by junior Art Bowers to end the half.

In the second half, the Minutemen

See BASKETBALL on page 6

Rams continue postseason streak

By ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

This was the ninth time the Massachusetts men's soccer team (8-10-2) has made the Atlantic 10 tournament in the 15 years UMass coach Sam Koch has held the reigns. In the four times the Minute-men have played the Rhode Island Rams (12-7-1) in the A-10 tournament, they have gone 0-for-4.

This time it was in the first round on Friday on Hermann Field at Saint Louis University. They were on the short end of a 2-0 score, and the Rams tallied both goals in the second half to stay perfect in the career postseason series with the Minutemen.

URI	2
UMass	0

This loss will be hard to take for the Minutemen, considering they had been waiting for another opportunity since Oct. 9, when the Rams devastated the Minutemen in the first conference game of the season: the game was scoreless until the 83rd minute, when sophomore Matty Lemire put the Minutemen ahead with a goal off of a corner kick; the burden was lifted temporarily, but the Rams took advantage of the Minutemen's momentary loss of intensity, scoring two goals in the last seven minutes of the game to seal the victory.

The Tuesday loss put the Minutemen in an unenviable position going into the weekend, facing Duquesne and Saint Louis, the two top teams in the conference. UMass lost both of those games (1-0 to Duquesne and 5-0 to Saint Louis), beginning the conference season on a three-game losing streak.

It was a stretch of the season that put UMass in a deep hole that it almost couldn't climb out of. It took a six-game unbeaten streak at the end of the season to grab the sixth and final playoff spot.

That left them with a rematch against the Rams on Friday, the team that nearly ended the Minutemen's season with a single blow. It was an opportunity that senior captains Oral Bullen and Ernie Billittier – along with the rest of the team – had been waiting for.

The first half was evenly matched until the 20th minute, when URI began to take control of the game. It led UMass 4-1 in corner kicks going into the half, but redshirt freshman keeper Zach Simmons and the defense were able to keep the ball out of the net.

"We played well for the most part of the game and were able to create chances," Koch said. "We just could not finish. Defensively, we played well against Rhode Island, but when we let down, they took advantage."

The second half began much like the first, with both teams playing well and neither one cracking the scoreboard. At the 71:58 mark, URI made its first strike on a crossing pass from Jeffrey Gonsalves (who scored the game-winning goal against UMass in the regular season match up.) The shot from outside the 18-yard box got by Simmons, and URI added another goal to end any chance for a Minuteman comeback.

"I am proud of our seniors [Bullen and Billittier] for getting the team back to the tournament and back in the right direction," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "I feel badly that we could not get them a win today, but I think we can continue to build upon next season what they started."

It was a tough season for Bullen, who didn't produce the big numbers that most thought he would. His season has been plagued by an ankle injury (from which he missed three games) and it seemed like he was not back to full strength for the rest of the year.

But he and Billittier led UMass back to the A-10 tournament for the first time in three years, and Koch insists that without their leadership in the last legs of the season, getting to the playoffs would have been a much loftier goal – one that UMass might not have been able to accomplish without them.

Swim teams down Terriers

By JOEY WHITE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It is time now to change the record board in the Joseph R. Rogers, Jr. Pool as the Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team remains undefeated as they beat down on the Terriers of Boston University 141-97.

Junior Jeremy Dam, sophomore Zack Priest and freshmen Mike Silvia and Chris Chambers started the meet off on the right foot with a school record time of 3:16.18 in the 400-yard medley relay event.

The Maroon and White will return to action Friday as they travel to West Point, N.Y. to challenge Army.

"I kicked their butts this week in practice, they're pretty tired," UMass coach Russ Yarworth said. "They stepped it up."

Sophomore Reuben Rappe qualified for the NCAA Division 1 Zone A Diving Qualifying Meet with his score of 315.68 in the three-meter diving event. This "next step" for Rappe will take place at the end of the season after the Atlantic 10 Championships.

Other leaders for the Minutemen in this dominant performance were sophomore A.J. Vozella, who won the 500-yard freestyle and the 50-yard freestyle events. Junior Jake Hogue won the 200-yard individual medley and the 200-yard backstroke.

The "swimmer of the meet" in UMass coach Russ Yarworth's eyes was freshman Tristan Partridge.

"It won't really show up in the results," Yarworth said. "But he really showed us that he can swim the distance events, which we've been looking for."

Partridge, with a time of 10:08.03, earned a second-place showing in the 1000-yard freestyle event.

The Massachusetts women's swimming and diving team also set

See SWIMMING on page 6

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY · EST. 1890

The Daily Collegian

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 2005 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM VOLUME CXVI ISSUE 47

UMass professor discusses Katrina reaction time

By SARAH FREDDIE
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Six weeks had gone by after Hurricane Katrina ravaged a portion of the Gulf Coast and the president and Congress had failed to establish any credible expert review process to guide the recovery of the region, says University of Massachusetts Geography Professor Rutherford H. Platt.

Platt, who is an expert on disaster recovery, spoke on "Learning from Disasters: The Synergy of Law and Geography," at the Disasters Roundtable, a forum in Washington D.C., on Oct. 18.

"A commission such as the one created by President Clinton after the 1993 Midwest Floods is essential to document what went wrong (and right) in the emergency response phase and to define options and guidelines for the rebuilding of New Orleans and the region," Platt stated.

"The commission would not directly oversee rebuilding but would be a credible source of technical and policy advice with high public visibility," Platt states.

Platt theorizes that the president and Congress did not create a commission shortly after Katrina, or at all, because "they don't have a great deal of respect for science or experts who might criticize their responses to disaster, such as global warming or the Iraq War."

Six weeks after Katrina touched down upon the Gulf Coast, it is too late to start a commission, according to Platt, who believes a commission should have been started within a week or two after the disaster first began. The disaster is still continuing and a commission would have needed to have been started right away in order to have preserved critical data and photographic evidence. The commission needed to have been done in time to have had influence on the recovery process.

JEFF KRUIT/UMASS-DARTMOUTH PHOTOGRAPHER

Professor Rutherford H. Platt has criticized the response time to Katrina.

Police escort a tour bus, named 'Discovery,' along the west side of the upper portion of the Lower 9th Ward. The tour gave residents of these homes their first glimpse of the damage.

In the absence of a commission, it becomes "more likely that the region's recovery will be more chaotic, more politically driven, and more likely to set the stage for future disasters," says Platt. Platt thinks that the French Quarter and Casinos in New Orleans will be rebuilt and back in business shortly, but the lower-income areas might be rebuilt a lot less quickly and thoroughly than they should once public attention shifts elsewhere.

The recovery process will continue, according to Platt. There will be "state and local reviews and several investigations of levee failures, but it is hard to focus on Katrina since so many other disasters have been happening such as the recent earthquake in Pakistan."

See KATRINA on page 3

Leak lingers in student dormitory

By KATIE HUSTON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

When freshmen Phil Brown and Mike Silver first moved into their dorm room, something wasn't right.

Their second-floor room in Brooks, located in Lower Central Residential Area, had two large cracks in the ceiling.

"We were like, 'You've got to be kidding me, do we seriously have a leak in here?'" said Brown, an economics major.

About three weeks ago, after putrid shower runoff dripped into their room for nearly two months and emergency maintenance repeatedly failed to fix the problem, Brown and Silver were moved into Brett dormitory, across the street from their original room.

Nothing had happened for the first two weeks of the semester, but soon water began dripping into their room, which was located almost underneath a third-floor bathroom.

At first, Brown and Silver just tried to catch the water. "We had buckets out and everything," Brown said.

But when the drip began to smell bad, Brown called emergency maintenance. "Our room started to reek," he said. "It wasn't like sewage … I guess it was mildewey. But

See HOUSING on page 2

Alito talks about stance on abortion

By JESSE J. HOLLAND
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito boasted about his work arguing that "the Constitution does not protect a right to an abortion" while trying to become a deputy assistant attorney general in the Reagan administration, according to documents released Monday.

Alito, a federal appellate judge nominated by President Bush to the nation's highest court, was a young lawyer working for the solicitor general's office in 1985 when he applied for the position under Attorney General Edwin Meese.

As part of his application, Alito sent a document saying his work in the solicitor general's office had included helping "to advance legal positions in which I personally believe very strongly."

"I am particularly proud of my contributions in recent cases in which the government argued that racial and ethnic quotas should not be allowed and that the Constitution does not protect a right to an abortion," he wrote.

That sentence provides one of the first clear-cut statements attributed to Alito about abortion, which will be one of the main topics of his January confirmation hearing as retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's replacement.

"I think that it is more reason to question him closely at the hearing," said Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., who will run Alito's Jan. 9 hearings as chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Specter, an abortion rights moderate, said a lot of people have shifted their views about abortion over the years and that he has found Alito to have "a very heavy commitment to legal interpretation which might differ from his own personal views."

Bush picked Alito after White House counsel Harriet Miers withdrew her Supreme Court nomination when confronted by withering criticism by some conservatives.

"This may explain why the right wing expressed such enthusiastic support for Judge Alito after campaigning against Harriet Miers," said Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., one of several senators who will meet with Alito privately on Tuesday. "When he comes before the Senate, Judge Alito faces a heavy burden of demonstrating that he no longer holds these extremely troubling views and would bring an open mind and a real commitment to fundamental rights and freedoms."

O'Connor has been a crucial swing vote on abortion on the Supreme Court, and Alito's opponents fear that he and recently confirmed Chief Justice John Roberts would swing the Supreme Court to the right and lead to the overturning of the 1973 landmark Roe v. Wade decision establishing abortion rights.

Alito, 55, has told senators in his two weeks of private meetings that he has "great respect" for Roe v. Wade as a precedent, but he did not commit to upholding it.

Bush criticizes those opposed to war in Iraq

By TERENCE HUNT
ASSOCIATED PRESS

ABOARD AIR FORCE ONE — President Bush hurled new criticism at Iraq war critics on Monday as he headed for Asia, accusing some Democrats of "sending mixed signals to our troops and the enemy."

"That is irresponsible," Bush said in prepared remarks he planned to deliver to U.S. forces during a refueling stop in Alaska. Excerpts were released by the White House as Bush flew to Elemendorf Air Force Base on the initial leg of an eight-day journey to Japan, South Korea, China and Mongolia. Bush had hopes of improving his image on the world stage.

"Reasonable people can disagree about the conduct of the war, but it is irresponsible for Democrats to now claim that we misled them and the American people," Bush said in his prepared remarks.

"Only one person manipulated evidence and misled the world — and that person was Saddam Hussein," Bush added.

The president sought to defend himself against criticism by Democrats that he manipulated intelligence and misled the American people about Iraq's alleged weapons of mass destruction as he sought grounds to go to war against Saddam's regime in 2003.

Meanwhile, National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley told reporters aboard the presidential aircraft that two agenda items on Bush's Asia trip were the huge Chinese trade surplus with the United States and a U.S.-Japanese dispute over U.S. beef imports.

Neither dispute was expected to be resolved on the president's trip, Hadley said.

"I don't think you're going to see headline-breakers" from the president's trip, Hadley said.

On Sunday, Hadley acknowledged "we were wrong" about Iraq's weapons of mass destruction, but he insisted in a CNN interview that the president did not manipulate intelligence or mislead the American people.

Iraq and other problems — from the bungled response to Hurricane Katrina to the indictment of a senior White House official in the CIA leak investigation — have taken a heavy toll on the president's standing. Nearing the end of his fifth year in office, Bush has the lowest approval rating of his presidency and a majority of Americans say Bush is not honest and they disapprove of his handling of foreign policy and the war on terrorism.

In his prepared Alaska remarks, Bush noted that some elected Democrats in Congress "have opposed this war all along.

"I disagree with them, but I respect their willingness to take a consistent stand," he said. "Yet some Democrats who voted to authorize the use of force are now rewrit-

See IRAQ on page 2

President George W. Bush smiles as he recieves a salute from military personnel before he delivers his "War on Terror" speech on Veteran's Day.

Funding bill stalls in the House of Representatives

By ERIKA CERVANTES
THE GUARDIAN (UCSAN DIEGO)

LA JOLLA, Calif. — A bill passed by the U.S. Senate on Nov. 1 that calls for dramatic budget cuts to higher education stalled in the House of Representatives last week as Republican supporters admitted they lacked the votes to pass the "budget reconciliation" bill in the face of strong opposition from college groups. The bill's authors also said they plan to return the bill to a vote this week.

The legislation, sponsored by Rep. Michael B. Enzi (R-Wyo.), chairman of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, would cut $36 billion from mandatory spending. That would include $17 billion from student financial aid, the largest cut in the student aid program's history.

The legislation, nicknamed the "Raid on Student Aid" by Democratic opponents, follows a recent parallel measure approved by the House Budget Committee. The previous bill cut $50 billion in inandatory spending, including $14 billion from student loan programs.

"To make up for Republican mismanagement of the federal budget, the [legislation] forces students to give up $11 billion worth of financial aid to help reduce the massive federal budget deficit," Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), the senior Democrat on the House Education and the Workforce Committee, stated in a press release. "This bill treats students as if they are responsible for Republican fiscal mismanagement."

Senate Republicans have downplayed the bill's impact on students, saying that it will create more aid for students through grants.

"No student will receive any less aid because of reconciliation," said Ryan J. Taylor, a spokesman for the H.E.L.P. Committee. "In fact, the Senate bill would spend more than $12 billion on new aid for students. The Senate reconciliation bill would provide most of that aid in the form of grants to students."

UCSD Chancellor Marye Anne Fox has been one of the few university chancellors nationally to be vocal in her protest of the legislation, sharing the Democrats' sentiment that students should not have to pay for the budget deficit.

"[Chancellor Fox] doesn't believe that students should bear a disproportionate share of the sacrifice called for by this bill," university spokeswoman Stacie Spector said.

However, Fox donated $500 to the National Republican Senatorial Committee last February, as well as $1,000 to the Republican National Committee in 2000.

The UC system has also worked on behalf of students to assure that grants make up for the financial aid money that students will lose from the bill, according to UCSD Director of Financial Aid Vincent De Anda.

"We have worked hard at the federal and state level to be sure that there are appropriate increases in grant funding to deal with increases in costs," De Anda said. "We would like to reduce the amount a needy student has to borrow as a percentage of total costs."

The fight to alleviate students' financial burdens has been hard, according to De Anda.

"UC has been lobbying hard to affect legislation, both in the reauthorization bill and the reconciliation bill, that is detrimental to our students," he said. "This has been an uphill battle, given the present budget situation. Also, the effect of Katrina and other disasters have increased the cuts to the educational programs."

The H.E.L.P. Committee also emphasized the bill's benefits to taxpayers, the health of the economy and the well-being of Hurricane Katrina victims, Taylor said.

"[Reduced] federal spending … will benefit taxpayers and their children, who won't have to finance the debt," he said. "In addition to the savings, spending was included to help students affected by Hurricane Katrina."

According to a Nov. 1 H.E.L.P. Committee press release, the largest portion of the Hurricane Katrina funding under the amendment will aid the transition of students into new schools, both public and private, through one-time emergency aid.

The funds will also finance the costs of enrolling displaced students in new schools, supporting basic instruction, purchasing educational materials and supplies and helping schools temporarily expand facilities to relieve overcrowding.

"Through the savings in this reconciliation bill, we have the opportunity not only to authorize programs that will serve the thousands of children affected by Hurricane Katrina, but to defer the costs required to meet their education needs," Enzi stated in the press release.

Central to the H.E.L.P. Committee's support of the amendment is their interest in reducing the nation's overwhelming debt, which they argue will foster higher education opportunities in the future.

"This amendment will improve the economy in a number of significant ways. It will help provide access to future generations of college students, who will help keep the country competitive," Taylor said. "It also reduces the deficit, so the country will not be financing as much debt through foreign investment."

Democratic opponents of the legislation remain vocal in their assertion that students should not have to sacrifice the majority of the funds necessary to even out the deficit and provide relief to victims of Hurricane Katrina.

"It is wrong to make low- and moderate-income college students and their families bear the burden of misguided policies and misplaced priorities that have run up the budget deficit," Miller stated. "But that's what the Republican 'Raid on Student Aid' does."

As the bill moves through the House of Representatives this week, Democrat opponents hope to muster the support of a few Republican representatives to block the legislation.

"It represents a significant step backwards when it comes to creating college opportunities for all qualified students," Miller stated. "And it presents a false choice between fiscal responsibility and college affordability."

ARTS & LIVING
JEFF TWEEDY OWNED NOHO
Jeff Tweedy and his band Wilco released their new album, 'Kicking Television.'
PAGE 5

EDITORIAL/OPINION
INTERNET OWNERSHIP
With the competitiveness of the global market, who has claim to the World Wide Web?
PAGE 4

WEATHER
TODAY Showers, 114°/
TONIGHT Showers, 144
TOMORROW Rain, 166°/ 133°

SPORTS
UM FINISHING STRONG
The UMass cross-country teams performed well in one of their final meets.
PAGE 8

Students find leaks in dorm

HOUSING from page 1

it was really bad. You'd gag. You'd walk into the room and actually gag. You could smell it from the hallway. It was awful."

The first time emergency maintenance responded, Brown and Silver were told, "We've got to get someone on that in the morning," according to Brown. No one ever came.

Brown called again a week later, with similar result. "I probably called them five times over a month-and-a-half span," he said. His R.A. also called, and he thinks even the cluster office called once.

Maintenance workers assessed the drip as runoff from a shower in the third-floor bathroom. Efforts to work on the tile within the bathroom stopped the leak for a few weeks, but then it started up again, said senior operations manager Ed Mone, who works in the Orchard Hill Central Management and Operations office of the UMass Housing Services.

"The leak was difficult because it's coming through a wall in a ceiling, and it's hard to identify what the exact cause was," said Mone. He was first made aware of the problem a couple of weeks into the semester.

"[Maintenance] kept coming, but they would just kind of assess the problem and wouldn't fix it," Brown said. "I think they tried to put some caulking in [the shower] to stop the leak, but it never stopped."

Mone said that repairs done outside the room are often not seen by students. When the drip increased to what Brown described as "almost a flow," Brown and Silver's parents got involved.

"We were just fed up," Brown said. "My parents didn't want us living in there, because it's kind of a health hazard, between the potential for mold and the dirty water and everything."

Their parents called Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Michael Gargano, and Brown and Silver were transferred to a converted office in Brett. They began moving at 10 p.m.

"It took so long—3 hours maybe? I don't think we stopped until one in the morning," Brown said. "We were carrying refrigerators and huge bags a pretty significant distance. It was pretty exhausting."

Although Brown didn't like leaving the dorm just as he was starting to feel comfortable with his friends, he said his room in Brett is nicer than the room in Brooks.

"I don't have any problem with the accommodations they gave us, or with Mike Gargano. They did everything really swiftly," he said. "It was just the whole emergency maintenance system that took seriously – no joke – two months to do something."

Mone said that when the leak began again after stopping for two weeks, "that was the time we decided to make them move."

He also said that Housing Services has dealt with similar situations in different dorms and in different areas of the same building. "We're dealing with buildings that are anywhere from 60 years old," Mone said. "A lot of times when a building's built, the bathrooms are what I would call an isolated section. They're not directly next to a student room. These happened to be next to a student room."

Several other students experienced leaks after the heavy rains in October, Mone said. One or two of those students were given the option of moving into the Howard Johnson hotel, where several dozen UMass students are still being housed.

"We try to identify the worst roofs and replace them on an ongoing basis," Mone said. "It's hard with 41 buildings and the budget to get those all in at one time." In Central Residential Area, Wheeler and Brett received new roofs last summer.

Democrats urge president to plan withdrawal from Iraq

IRAQ from page 1

ing the past. They are playing politics with this issue and sending mixed signals to our troops and the enemy."

In the Senate, 29 Democrats voted with 48 Republicans for the war authorization measure in late 2002, including 2004 Democratic presidential nominee Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, and his running mate, John Edwards of North Carolina. Both have recently been harshly critical of Bush's conduct of the war and its aftermath.

On Capitol Hill, top Democrats stood their ground in claiming Bush misled Congress and the country. "The war in Iraq was and remains one of the great acts of misleading and deception in American history," Kerry told a news conference.

Democrats offered a proposal urging the president to outline an estimate for a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops. The Senate was expected to vote on it on Tuesday, as well as on a rival GOP Iraq policy proposal that does not include a withdrawal provision.

Bush is expected to get a warmer welcome in Asia than he did earlier this month in Argentina at the Summit of the Americas, where Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez led a protest against U.S. policies and Bush failed to gain support from the 34 nations attending for a hemisphere-wide free trade zone.

Japan, the first stop on Bush's trip, and Mongolia, the last, are likely to give him the most enthusiastic response, while China and South Korea probably will be cooler but respectful.

In South Korea, Bush also will attend the Asia-Pacific Economic Conference summit in Busan, where 21 member states are expected to agree to support global free-trade talks. The summit also is expected to agree to put early warning and information-sharing systems in place in case of bird flu outbreaks.

"It is good for the president to show up in Asia and say, 'We care about Asia,' because that is in doubt in the region," said Ed Lincoln, senior fellow in Asia and economic studies at the Council on Foreign Relations.

At his first stop, in Kyoto, Japan, the president will deliver what aides bill as the speech of the trip on the power of democracy — not only to better individual lives but contribute to the long-term prosperity of nations.

The remarks — aimed at China — will hold up such nations as Japan, Australia and South Korea as models because of their strong democratic traditions and willingness to help establish democracy in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Bush also is expected to press China to reduce its trade surplus, revalue its currency and curb the piracy of American movies, software and other copyright material.

China's leadership in six-party talks aimed at ending North Korea's nuclear ambitions also will be a key topic when Bush meets Chinese President Hu Jintao in Beijing.

Bush will also be working the issue when he sits down with Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi in Kyoto and spends a day with South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun ahead of the APEC meetings. Japan and South Korea are part of the six-way talks.

Schools push for more class on Friday

By Laurie Au
The Diamondback (U. Maryland)

COLLEGE PARK, Md. — As the days pass to register for next semester, the most coveted classes are filling up quickly. Students left at the bottom of the list and with no other options may have to take classes on the most avoided day: Friday.

Some students at this university will do almost anything to avoid Friday classes, reserving the day to catch up on sleep or for internships. But with students all vying for classes from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. Monday through Thursday, administrators say there need to be more classes on Friday to keep options open.

At schools nationwide, there have been similar pushes for more Friday classes. With this fifth day of classes, peer institutions' administrators say they feel students will be able to graduate quicker. Some faculty and administrators say it's inevitable that the push will come to this university as well.

Duke University, much to the dismay of many faculty and students, increased their number of Friday classes by 20 percent and nearly doubled their number of evening courses, said Vice-Provost for Academic and Administrative Services Judith Ruderman.

"We were hardly using classrooms on Friday at all," Ruderman said. "It was difficult because students were complaining that courses were bunched up against each other."

Similarly, California State University Chico has increased Friday classes by 6 percent over the last two years. Clark University in Worcester, Mass., has more than doubled its Friday classes. Syracuse University has nearly 200 more classes on Friday than it did two years ago, according to The New York Times.

Administrators at this university have said they could better use resources by holding more Friday classes since they must pay for fuel and utility bills Fridays anyway. With a looming $50 million natural gas bill to operate the university this year, it's more important than before to better use its resources.

The university's five peer institutions have acknowledged they could have more Friday classes. However, they fall in the same boat as this university with no heavy emphasis to do so at this time.

"We have the same kind of anecdotal urban myth that nobody goes to class on Fridays. There's some truth to that," said Keith Marshall, associate provost of the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign. "We have these great facilities that lay empty and unused during significant chunks of time. There has not been any effort in our campus to force or even encourage faculty to move their classroom times to Fridays."

At the University of California-Los Angeles, most of the lower division courses in the social sciences and humanities are held Monday through Thursday, leaving Fridays practically wide open, said John Sandbrook, special assistant to the executive dean of UCLA's College of Letters and Science.

As a way to get more students to take Friday classes, some universities have put their popular courses on that day. Professors at this university said this might be a good tactic for administrators to consider.

Robin Sawyer, a health professor, teaches HLTH 377: "Human Sexuality," a class with an average wait-list of 100 students for a class of 200.

The positive effect of beginning your career with Ernst & Young is too great to measure.

A great start can take you further. At Ernst & Young we've created an environment that's conducive to personal and professional growth and success. And what we're offering is an opportunity to learn from some of the best talent in the industry. Become a benchmark for success. Visit us on the Web at ey.com/us/careers, or look for us on campus.

FORTUNE 100 BEST COMPANIES TO WORK FOR 2005

Audit • Tax • Transaction Advisory Services

ERNST & YOUNG
Quality In Everything We Do

Students with ADHD offered alternative treatments

By Laura Orr
Arizona Daily Wildcat (U. Arizona)

TUCSON, Ariz. — Students concerned about the side effects of their attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder medications may want to explore alternative treatments like changing their diets, a pediatrician said Thursday.

Dr. Sandy Newmark, a pediatric integrative medicine specialist, presented information about alternative methods to dealing with ADHD as part of the SALT Center Speaker Series.

Newmark said there is a lot of "hysteria" surrounding the use and misuse of ADHD medications, including Ritalin.

"They're not as good or as bad as people say," Newmark said.

Although ADHD medications may cause a decrease in appetite, they are not damaging to the liver, kidneys or brain as some may claim, and they are not addictive, Newmark said.

Complaints about ADHD medications causing a loss in creativity or a change in a patient's attitude are worrisome, Newmark said, and therefore said drugs should not be the first and only treatment for attention-deficit patients.

Other treatments include removing food coloring, preservatives, processed sugars and flour from the diet and replacing them with more protein, Newmark said.

These methods, along with adding omega-3, an essential fatty acid, and zinc to the diet, have had a profound impact on reducing ADHD symptoms, Newmark said.

Patty Zeigler, a systems and industrial engineering business manager at the UA, said she decided to remove all preservatives, food coloring and processed foods from her son's diet when he was diagnosed as "hyperactive" about 30 years ago.

Zeigler said her son's kindergarten teacher recommended he take medication but she decided to try changing his diet first.

"Three months later the teacher raved about what a difference the medication made," Zeigler said. "I didn't tell her he wasn't on it."

Homeopathy, which is based on taking smaller doses of a drug rather than the suggested amount, and cranio-sacral therapy, which uses touch to improve the functioning of the central nervous system, are other alternative methods for treating ADHD, Newmark said.

Ashley Klein, a learning specialist at the SALT Center, said she wasn't diagnosed with ADHD until she was a sophomore in college.

ADHD medications have helped Klein, but she believes that her diet and exercise habits still have an effect on her symptoms.

"Something that works for one person may not work for others," said Klein, who works with students with ADHD and learning disabilities. "I do recommend that they try different approaches, but they should also talk to their doctor."

KKT

Terry Matlen uses Post-it Notes as reminders to help her cope with Attention-Deficit Disorder. She also runs and online clinic that offers ADHD/ADD counseling.

Police log: Suspects called to court

On Thursday, a 19-year-old from Somerville and a 20-year-old from Worcester were summoned to court on charges of assault and battery against a former University of Massachusetts student. The attack, which left the student unconscious, occurred in September outside of Bar on Pleasant Street.

On Friday, there was vandalism report at 50 Meadow St. The police arrived at 3:05 p.m. The vandalism victim had been throwing a party but had asked people to leave. When the party-goers left, some of them slashed a tire on the victim's car, a white 2000 Hyundai Sonata. The tire-slashers volunteered to pay for the damages.

On Friday evening, the police discovered someone driving under the influence at the corner of Montague Rd. and Plumtree's St. The police arrived at 50 Montague Rd. at 8:58 p.m. The vehicle was a grey 1995 Toyota Tacoma. Peter Warren Glazier, 54, of Leverett, was arrested and charged with operating under the influence, a marked lane violation and a number plate violation.

On Friday night, there was a domestic disturbance at Mill Valley 700L. The police arrived at 700 Riverglade Dr. L at 10:28 p.m. Benjamin R. Rios, 26, of Belchertown was arrested and charged with breaking and entering.

On Saturday afternoon, there was a noise complaint outside Judie's Restaurant. The police arrived at 51 North Pleasant St. at 2:45 p.m. The noise was coming from a drummer outside of the restaurant. The drummer was then moved to another location down the street.

On Saturday afternoon, an alarm went off at the Bank of America. The police arrived at 75 East Pleasant St. at 4:27 p.m. The area was secure and the police found that the alarm had been false.

On Saturday night, vandalism was reported. The police arrived at 59 Stanley St. at 9:11 p.m. A vehicle's tail light had been broken and was scratched with a knife. The vehicle was a 2005 red Toyota.

Early Sunday morning, there was a liquor law violation. The police arrived at 31 Phillips St. at 1:21 a.m. Nicholas Lenhardt, 18, of Manchester, CT was arrested. He was charged with underage possession of liquor and having an open container of alcohol.

On Sunday afternoon, an act of vandalism was discovered at 86 Bridge St. The police arrived at 1:07 p.m. Unknown parties damaged a fence at the location during the night before.

—Arka Sen

Professor looks at disaster responses

KATRINA from page 1

In his talk at The Disasters Roundtable, Platt stated that "with vast sums of federal money and insurance proceeds at stake, it would compound the tragedy of Katrina and Rita if the political process fails to spend available resources wisely to create a safer and more habitable city and region." The federal resources that Platt is referring to are "federal dollars, how much money we have and where it comes from because of the deficit, and resources of time." Platt theorizes that we need to take advantage of the time we have now to aid the recovery mission before the rules begin to change mid-process, such as raising homes off of the ground.

Platt is a former chair of The Natural Disasters Roundtable at The National Academies, where he gave his speech on Oct. 18. The Disasters Roundtable gives public workshops that focus on issues related to "natural, technological, and human induced disasters, and how advances in science and technology can aid in disaster mitigation and preparedness," according to the National Academies Web site.

The Disasters Roundtable Workshop that Platt was a panelist in focused on "how disaster law is related to issues of public safety," according to the National Academies Web site. Platt is also the author of "Disasters and Democracy: The Politics of Extreme Natural Events."

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3693 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Michael Bussek
Managing Editor Cameron J. Woods
Business Manager Hirak Shah
Production Manager Nicholas Belanger
Night Supervisor Sheryl Wolnik
Advertising Manager Kerry O'Grady
Advertising Production Lauren Egavian
Editorial Production Amanda Allen
Arts & Living Editor Matthew O'Rourke
Copies Editor Amanda Allen
Editorial Editor Allison Edles
News Editor Dan O'Brien
Photo Editor Kate Sachsenmaier
Sports Editor Jeff Howe
Circulation Manager Thomas Hecht
Distribution Manager Nick Gleason
Finance Manager Daniel Conti
Human Resource Phil Smoller
Assistant Operations Linda Walbek
Assistant Advertising Caren Tortorici
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Asst. Arts & Living Mackenzie Imler
Asst. Arts & Living Ian Jones
Assistant News Megan Daley
Assistant News Matt Belliveau
Assistant Photo Elizabeth Carieti
Assistant Sports Eric Athas
Assistant Sports Dan Duggan
Assistant Editorial Kristen LaCasse

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the The Weekly Collegian in 1956. Published daily since 1967, The Collegian has been broadsheet since January 1996. For advertising rates and information, call weekdays between 8:30 a.m. and 3:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today
NIGHT EDITOR
Cameron J. Woods
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Julie Teese
COPY EDITOR
Meghan Murphy
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Nick Belanger
PRODUCTION STAFF
Tiffany Van Langen, Sarah Belanger

SPHS University of Massachusetts Amherst
School of Public Health and Health Sciences

The Department of Public Health cordially invites you to an Open House for prospective graduate students! Please join us on Friday, November 18th, 2005, from 10 am to Noon, at the Campus Center, Room 162 - 75.

Come meet faculty, staff and students from biostatistics, epidemiology, environmental health sciences, community health education, and health policy and management. You can also learn about our online degree program.

Learn about the Department of Public Health admissions process, financial aid opportunities and the curriculum.

For additional information about the Open House, please R.S.V.P. Charlene Gallca at: chargallca@schoolph.umass.edu or call (413) 545-2288

The Journalism Program Lecture Series on Broadcast and the Media

AFTER KATRINA:
How Radio Saved the City of New Orleans

A panel featuring

DIANE NEWMAN, News Director, WWL Radio, New Orleans
MONICA PIERRE, News Director, Clear Channel Radio New Orleans
ERNESTO SCHWEIKERT, Owner, KGLA 1540
The city's oldest Spanish language station

Wednesday, November 16, 2005, 4-5:30 p.m.

THE LEARNING COMMONS
W.E.B. DU BOIS LIBRARY
UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AMHERST

Reception at Memorial Hall, immediately following

This series is funded by David '79 and Teena Kantor

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Who really owns the Internet?

David B. Lawrence

Do you think the United Nations should control the Internet? Several other countries do. A battle for oversight of the revolutionary communications tool is quickly approaching. It appears the United States will have little international support for continuation of its dominion over the Web.

Several countries, including China, Brazil, Iran and the European Union, have criticized the fact that the already influential and powerful United States has oversight over the primary means of exchanging data across the globe's vast technology networks. They have proposed that a multinational body, the United Nations, take over bureaucratic control of the Web. The United States has countered that bureaucratic control by the United Nations and is likely to mirror other U.N. services in speed and efficiency by reacting slowly and ineffectively. U.N. oversight committees are historically slow and indecisive.

To be clear, true control over the Internet is not an issue. The Web is an impossibly large and diverse community, and maintaining any broad control over its content would be a daunting task. What is at issue in this case is control of a technical aspect of the Internet domain names and other addresses. Who owns what domain name, how Internet numbers are assigned and which suffixes are commonly used (like .com, .edu, .org) is decided and organized by an oversight corporation established by the United States in 1998.

> The Internet thrives on speed and constant change, and a pencil-slow U.N. oversight commission could have a negative impact on e-commerce and other online innovations.

The Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers (ICANN) maintains semi-independent bottom up control of the Internet. Currently, final control over ICANN rests with the U.S. Department of Commerce, though within months the organization is likely to become independent. Even then, ICANN will be a U.S. corporation and thus subject to United States rules, regulations and law.

Other governments say they are afraid the United States could use ICANN maliciously. For instance, if U.S. policy turned against New Zealand, ICANN might be used to remove the country's .nz domain from the Internet, in effect punishing the country. This prospect is as ridiculous as it is unlikely. The United States has far greater diplomatic means of influence than the power to mildly inconvenience a country's Internet users.

The United States' critique of the multinational-control proposition has greater legitimacy. Such a body could potentially be slow and inefficient; as executives lumber through the motions of trying to please a few dozen global powers, decisions made by the U.N. oversight commission could take exceedingly long. The Internet thrives on speed and constant change, and a pencil-slow U.N. oversight commission could have a negative impact on e-commerce and other online innovations.

That ICANN is under U.S. control, and only U.S. control, is the point many in the international community disagree with. In a climate already highly critical of U.S. policy in countless arenas, it is unsurprising that several nations would join together in support of multinational control of an invention that the United States researched, funded, built and then willingly shared with the international community.

However, control of such a powerful tool is no trivial matter. Dutch Minister of Economic Affairs Laurens Jans Brinkhorst said, "Materially there's nothing wrong with the current structure. But formally it is strange that something with such a global impact is being controlled by one nation, and there is a sharpened position against the United States' unilateral thinking."

Brinkhorst's sentiments reflect the view of much of the international community. They do not have a problem with ICANN's practices per se, or with how the United States has acted in its position of control, but specifically with the fact that it is the United States in charge. As the world's only superpower, the United States has developed an image within the international community of being unwilling to compromise with the United Nations and its member nations. Recently with its actions in Iraq and rejection of the Kyoto protocol, the United States has invited substantial international criticism, and these most recent complaints about ICANN are likely fallout from those actions as much as they represent legitimate concerns.

Just as it has done by attacking Iraq and rejecting the biased Kyoto protocol, the United States is likely to again act unilaterally by maintaining its control over the Internet. Although several countries have voiced their desire to move ICANN under the U.N. umbrella, that isn't likely to occur. The Bush administration has clearly stated it intends to make ICANN more independent, but it will still be a U.S. corporation and subject to U.S. rules and regulation. The global information business can do without the bureaucratic hassle of the global community.

David B. Lawrence is a Collegian columnist.

More frightening than torture

Mike Sances

This is part two of a two-part series.

Those crazy radicals in Congress are at it again. After the Washington Post disclosed on Nov. 2 the existence of an international network of detention centers for suspected terrorists, codenamed "black sites," "set up by the CIA nearly four years ago that at various times has included sites in eight countries, including Thailand, Afghanistan and several democracies in Eastern Europe, as well as a small center at the Guantanamo Bay prison in Cuba," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and House Speaker Dennis Hastert immediately demanded an investigation.

Into who leaked to the Post.

"If accurate, such an egregious disclosure could have long-term and far-reaching damaging and dangerous consequences, and will imperil our efforts to protect the American people and our homeland from terrorist attacks," wrote Messrs. Frist and Hastert, in their letter to the heads of the House and Senate intelligence committees.

In fact, and if indeed accurate, it is the egregious existence of such a prison system that will undoubtedly yield "long-term and far-reaching and dangerous consequences" to us all, not that system's exposure. Investigating the leak of such a disastrous policy is about as useful as punishing the photographers of the Abu Ghraib prison abuses while granting the architects of torture full immunity.

> Investigating the leak of such a disastrous policy is about as useful as punishing the photographers of the Abu Ghraib prison abuses while granting the architects of torture full immunity.

But never mind. It doesn't take an Amnesty International to figure out why the Bush administration's handling of detainees endangers American lives. Just ask John McCain, or any one of the 46 Republican senators who voted last month to ban "cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment" of enemy combatants in the Global War on Terrorism.

"If we are viewed as a country that engages in torture ... any possible information we might be able to gain is far counterbalanced by (the negative) effect of public opinion," said McCain on CBS's "Face the Nation" this week. (Not to mention that torture doesn't produce reliable information, as both McCain and former Attorney General John Ashcroft agree, but our current Attorney General fails to recognize this.)

Public opinion is generally recognized as the key to winning a Global War on Terrorism, from the editors of the London Financial Times to al Qaeda experts like Michael Scheuer — to the terrorists themselves. In July, al Qaeda's number two man wrote that the "strongest weapon that the holy warriors enjoy is popular support from the Muslim masses. In the absence of this popular support, the Islamic warrior movement would be crushed in the shadows."

Here at home, the president thinks we should trust him with the power to detain foreigners, and sometimes American citizens, indefinitely and without charge. This is the policy that we should oppose, not the simulated drowning and threats of live burial that are but its natural derivatives.

Objectively speaking, the idea that government is too inept or corrupt to exercise such power responsibly is a conservative idea. It's also been proven in case after case since 2001. Take Abu Ghraib. The Coalition Provisional Authority's own intelligence services admitted to the Red Cross in 2004 that between 70 and 90 percent of those interned at the infamous prison had been "arrested by mistake."

Another "mistake" made by the current administration was the arrest of Maher Arar, a Canadian citizen, who was kidnapped by American agents in New York in 2002 and shipped to a Syrian prison, where he was held and tortured for some months. After confessing to attending terrorist training camps in Afghanistan, Arar was sent back home, cleared of all charges.

That same year, two Afghan satirists, Badr Zaman Badr and Abdurrahim Muslim Dost, were apprehended by coalition forces and sent to Guantanamo Bay, where they were questioned repeatedly, according to a Nov. 6 article in Newsday, "over a satirical article Dost had written in 1998, when the Clinton administration offered a $5 million reward for Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden. Dost responded that Afghans put up 5 million Afghans, about $113, for the arrest of President Clinton."

And I'm only sticking to the cases where the detainee turns out to be innocent. While Dick Cheney lobbies Congress to allow the CIA an exemption to torture, Mark Swanner, a CIA employee, has gotten away with murder at Abu Ghraib, according to an article by Jane Mayer in the Nov. 14 edition of the New Yorker.

I'd happily include a case here where information was extracted from a detainee that led to the disruption of an imminent terrorist act. It is just that if there is such a case, it is such a well-guarded secret that not a single person seems to know of it. Somehow, though, we are all expected to blindly accept the claim that whatever the administration does, no matter how outrageous, is done for our own safety. That kind of sentiment should frighten us more than any of the censored photos from Abu Ghraib ever could, if we were allowed to seethem.

Mike Sances is a Collegian columnist.

The global dotcom strain

John Gruenenfelder

Most of us have come to rely on the Internet for many tasks, from school to communication and even shopping. Few, however, probably know much about how the Internet actually functions, not so much at a technical level but at an organizational level. When it comes to technical matters, governmental bodies are usually no more well-versed than the general public, so it is more than a little troubling that the United Nations is to meet next week in Tunis to discuss the future of the Internet. Sadly, while there are important issues that need to be discussed, one has come to overshadow the meeting: an us-versus-them debate over control of part of the Internet.

In this case, "us" is the United States and "them" is the rest of the world. As yet another example of how foreign policy mistakes are hurting us elsewhere, many governments, including the European Union, have decided they are uncomfortable with the United States being in charge of the Internet.

> The Internet is not a "thing," but rather an agreement. Just as you cannot buy the Internet, you cannot control the Internet in any global sense of the word.

Not only is this a misguided attempt to exert some leverage against the United States, it also demonstrates a very poor understanding of just what the Internet is. The Internet is not a "thing," but rather an agreement. Just as you cannot buy the Internet, you cannot control the Internet in any global sense of the word. The beginnings occur when the operator of some small network, say a university, makes an agreement with the operator of another network. Their agreement is that one may, within certain limitations, access data and computers on either network just as easily as accessing them on the local network. Following that lead, the Internet becomes manifest when many networks all make agreements with each other. This is, greatly simplified, where we stand today.

An important piece of this agreement is a way to find the computer you want. The Internet accomplishes this with the Domain Name System (DNS). When I type in www.google.com, the DNS translates that into a series of numbers and then I get connected to Google. Currently, the DNS is loosely managed by a group known as the Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers (ICANN). ICANN operates under a mandate from the U.S. Department of Commerce, and it is this fact that has the world so riled up.

When it was first formed, ICANN did pull some very poor and undemocratic stunts regarding its makeup and potential powers, and there was a definite backlash from the growing group of people who help run the Internet. To their credit, ICANN has substantially backed off and now performs the role they were meant to. They coordinate the DNS at a very high level and also help coordinate technical decisions on how the Internet operates. Of course, back then the Internet was not nearly the giant creature it is now. Regardless, the world community did not complain about ICANN. Now that ICANN has its act together, the rest of the world would like to see ICANN disbanded and replaced by a U.N. group of politicians appointed by countries all across the globe.

If it ain't broke, don't fix it. The United Nations would do well to put aside bickering with the United States and realize the Internet as it stands now is doing a remarkable job of self-regulation. Of course there are problems (spam, anyone?), but a shakeup is not the answer.

Also troubling are the countries, besides the European Union, who are pushing most strongly for the change: China, Iran and Cuba. A more cynical person might suspect the real goal here is for these countries to enable easier control of the Internet as seen by their respective citizens. Being able to exert some control over the DNS would certainly make this job easier, but as China has unfortunately demonstrated, you don't need symbolic control over the Internet to dramatically influence what your people can see.

Thus far, the United States has been almost entirely hands-off when it comes to ICANN and there are no plans to change that. Congress is free to pass laws governing how we may or may not use the Internet, but so far there have been no directives thrown at ICANN telling them what to do, the big exception being the fight over a proposed .xxx domain for adult Web sites. Conservative groups in this country pressured the Department of Commerce until it sent a letter to ICANN urging it to drop the idea.

The government's official stance is that America is going to keep control, thank you very much. This is both good (the Internet is doing quite well as it is) and bad (those countries unhappy with us will see this as further unilateralism). In the end, nothing is going to change regarding the Internet in the foreseeable future, since ICANN isn't going anywhere. But this whole mess is just going to strain our relations with the rest of the world on yet another front.

John Gruenenfelder is a Collegian columnist.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

"PRO-CHOICE" JOURNALISM

In the Nov. 14 issue of the Daily Collegian, Megan Daley wrote a story about the president of Planned Parenthood's speech to students at the University of Massachusetts. The president, Karen Pearl, came to talk about her mounting concern over the latest nominee for the Supreme Court and the possibility for the overturning of Roe v. Wade. The headline accompanying this story read: "Pro-abortion group leader gives speech." I hope I am not alone in taking great offense to this characterization.

No one is "pro-abortion." People who support a woman's right to choose whether or not to terminate a pregnancy join those who do not support this in wishing terminating a pregnancy never has to be an option. Calling a group "pro-abortion" implies they support the act when in fact the support is for a woman to be able to decide what's best for her body rather than the government.

Frankly, you should know better. The term "pro-abortion" is something I expect to hear on Fox News, not in the only daily paper on the campus of the flagship public university in Massachusetts. Regardless of whether this was just a careless oversight or not, it looks like a blatant political tactic to reframe an issue the way one political group would like to. If this has become the editorial standard of the Collegian, than in the interest of equal time, I expect to see articles about "pro-life" speakers replaced with the phrase "anti-women's rights." When covering stories about Republicans' attempts to cut taxes, I expect to see the phrases, "anti-social programs," "anti-poor people" or simply "pro-rich folks."

Issues are defined by how we think of them. When political groups try to reframe issues, they are literally trying to get into our heads and arrange the way we think about an issue. When the media is complacent and compliant with these efforts, they garnish a bias that affects their ability to report accurately. The public's confidence in the media has dropped significantly in the last 30 years. This can certainly be attributed in part to the alleged bias of some media outlets. When the news cannot be trusted, the public has lost its most important defender. In future articles about issues as combustible as a woman's right to choose, the Collegian should report the news in a way that neither promotes nor opposes the issue. Leave those thoughts for the editorial pages.

Bill Butcher
UMass alumnus

UMASS MARCHING BAND PLAYS WITH CLASS

Awkward is the best word to describe how I was feeling at the beginning of the Army-UMass game prior to kickoff. My brother is a first-year cadet at West Point and I am a second-year graduate student here at the University of Massachusetts. I was torn between being a brother and a student. At the game, I sat squarely on the proverbial fence, wearing an Army sweatshirt and a Minuteman hat. Due to a great effort by the UMass football team and an unexpected, moving performance by the UMass marching band, at the end of the game I was immensely proud to be associated with both institutions.

To be honest, I rarely stay for any halftime show and was again ready to leave. While the band was large in number, I was expecting a fairly benign performance. What followed was anything but. The band formed a large block "A" spanning the middle of the field. One of the band leaders turned and conducted the band through a powerful, stirring version of God Bless the U.S.A, presented as a tribute to the cadets and the armed forces.

Initially there was a sense of surprise over myself and the entire crowd of 34,000. Realizing the gravity of the situation, the parents and fans rose to stand with the corps, many singing along. The song ended to an extended standing ovation and put a smile of gratitude on the young men and women in uniform and a smile of pride on the faces of everyone else, including myself. My brother called it the best marching band performance he had seen this season, and another referred to the UMass band as the best band in the east.

The performance was simply one of the purest acts of patriotism I have ever seen. It perfectly complimented an already Herculean effort by the football team and further proved that like West Point, UMass was an institution that also had a sense of duty and honor. After the halftime show, my feeling of awkwardness was gone and replaced by a swelling price for my brother, school and country. I would like to publicly thank the members of the UMass marching band for the time and effort they took in constructing and performing their halftime routine. They further developed the reputation of UMass and showed appreciation and support for the Corps of Army Cadets with a rare sense of integrity and honesty that was truly the definition of class.

Joe Goodwill
UMass graduate student

Write for ED/OP!!!
editorial@dailycollegeian.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 15 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Jeff Tweedy's solo performance leaves Northampton wanting more

By MATT O'ROURKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Singer-songwriters thrive during times of hardship, providing an outlet for those who feel down and out. Jeff Tweedy, the maestro behind alt-rockers Wilco, performed an intimate solo acoustic set at the Calvin Theater on Sunday night, digging deep into his song catalog to find the right words for his emotions.

Percussionist Glenn Kotche, also of Wilco fame, opened for Tweedy with a set that awed the crowd. In a style reminiscent of percussion shows by Blue Man Group and the cast of "Stomp," Kotche performed pieces from his upcoming solo record on Nonesuch Records.

"I'm going to perform my interpretation of the 'Balinese Monkey Chant,'" Kotche told the audience, who responded with a laugh. "That's just the reaction I always get."

The piece sounded as if Kotche ran into the jungle with a tape recorder and simply played it back to the audience. Everything was perfectly mimicked – from looped sounds of crickets to the roars of gorillas produced by Kotche pulling various pieces of metal with string and the tribal drum rhythms produced by Kotche's thundering on the toms.

Taking the stage under a single spotlight with both a harmonica and guitar, Tweedy looked reminiscent of an early Bob Dylan – playing before an auditorium crowded with fans young and old.

Perhaps he was aware of his own image, as he sang the rarely-played "Bob Dylan's 49th Beard" and when he covered Dylan with "John Wesley Harding."

"He was never known to host an honest man," Tweedy sang with an emotional element to his voice, blurring the line between sorrow and hope. The way Tweedy presented himself – in a rip-down-around and blue jeans – was casual, seemingly like a working-class individual.

"Maybe I'm an egotist, but I love having people sing my songs," he said mid-set.

The audience attentively listened to every word Tweedy sang – whether singing or speaking – as his [illegible] lyrics are poignant, with points concerning [illegible] or whatever the topic conveyed easily to any-

[illegible] set was not typical of what a newer fan of [illegible] might expect – little was played from Wilco's [illegible] "Yankee Hotel Foxtrot" or their latest "A Ghost is Born." However, fans were not [illegible], as he did diversify his set, playing [illegible] Treasure," "Wait Up" and a [illegible] of "I Am Trying to Break Your Heart." When playing [illegible] Metal Drummer," Tweedy changed up the [illegible] the names of famous Massachusetts [illegible] normally he sings "Kiss covers." The [illegible] often, almost as a compliment to [illegible]'s [illegible].

[illegible] debuted a new song, which as of yet [illegible] are will be released on a future album [illegible] his newest band, Loose Fur, or his main-[illegible].

[illegible] Tweedy onstage during the encore [illegible] politically charged "Wise on War" and [illegible] Dylan-gone-every ballad "A Shot in the [illegible] of the "Summerteeth" album.

[illegible] asked me to play 'Via Chicago,' but I'm [illegible] It – I need the other guy here with me," [illegible] said. "But the one on our live album is [illegible] we've ever recorded."

[illegible] Wilco's live compilation [illegible] a series of shows in Chicago last year, hits the [illegible]

[illegible] one thing to the audience – you [illegible] Dylan to be lyrically [illegible]

COURTESY ANTON CORBIJN, MICHAEL BEGAL

Alive and 'Kicking'-Wilco keeps live album fresh

By MATT O'ROURKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Wilco's frontman Jeff Tweedy is not afraid to take risks. He's stood up to a large corporate record label when he was told he couldn't make music the way he and his band wanted to and independently recorded a best-selling album, "Yankee Hotel Foxtrot." He followed up this album with the Jim O'Rourke-produced "A Ghost is Born," a Grammy Award-winning alternative rock album that was distinctively different in sound than its predecessor.

Wilco
8.7/10
Kicking Television
Nonesuch

Now Tweedy and company have taken on the live album with "Kicking Television" and they once again have triumphed, enhancing the tracks they recorded in the studio over two discs. Recorded over several nights in Chicago's Vic Theatre, the album features the noise-rock element one would come to expect of Wilco and a great variety of tracks spanning Wilco's career.

The opener "Misunderstood" remains both heavy and soft, featuring a screaming guitar over thundering drums while Tweedy's voice is characteristically light and emotionally.

Wilco, unlike so many bands who have recorded live albums, manages to capture not only the true nature of the crowd but also transfers the detailed effects like xylophones and bells to their live set as featured in "I Am Trying to Break Your Heart."

"Handshake Drugs," "Hell is Chrome" and "At Least That's What You Said" feature guitars played by Kline and Tweedy that simply boom off of the halls of the Theater. "A Shot in the Arm" plays out beautifully with piano and heavy-metal rhythm on Kline's guitar. Complex arrangements such are transferred to the theater with ease, adding an edge of excitement while the crowd sings along.

"Kicking Television," the title track of the album, sounds similar to something Pearl Jam would have recorded on one of their live bootlegs. Featuring an immense sound, the listener may be tempted to headbang along to the track.

The second disc opens with "Via Chicago," a favorite of so many fans, as Wilco plays the song as a tribute to the city in which they reside. Simple, poignant and memorable, this may very well be Wilco at their finest.

"Hummingbird" followed immediately by "Muzzle of Bees" seems to be the best flowing transition of the album, with prominent piano on the first and acoustic guitar on the latter. "Poor Places," and "I'm the Man Who Loves You," sound perfectly transferred to the live setting, even if Tweedy and his backup vocalists can be slightly off key at times.

Tweedy heckles members of the audience, as one might expect during a live show when someone randomly shouts out from the sea of attendees, and this element is not edited, providing a richer live experience for the listener.

Ending with "Comment," with plucking guitar and mandolin sounds over an organ, Tweedy asks, "What is a man without a friend?" and changes up his singing style to a somewhat screeching tone. Kline's guitar sounds bluesy, playing over the variety of instruments introduced here, leaving the listener wondering if this is the new direction Wilco will pursue next. Who knows, but regardless, Wilco has proven they can pull off anything musically when they put their minds to it.

Berkshire-based folksinger, Arlo Guthrie comes to the FAC

By TIM MCCALL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Arlo Guthrie is the son of the late folk legend Woody Guthrie. But don't think he's famous because of his dad. He's famous for writing the song "Alice's Restaurant" among other songs about social injustice in the 1960s.

However "Alice's Restaurant" is not just any song. It's one of the most famous songs in the past 50 years due to its cult like following.

The story of the song is about an incident Guthrie got into with his friends in Stockbridge MA on Thanksgiving in 1963. Guthrie confesses the actual restaurant is not real, but the rest of the events in the song are real.

Arlo Guthrie
Fine Arts Center
Nov. 17
7:30 p.m.
$15

"This song is called Alice's Restaurant, and it's about Alice" Guthrie confessed in the song. The liner notes of the album included an unnamed newspaper clipping talking about the incident. The real and most important factor of the story in the end is really it's just a Vietnam War protest song, with humors undertones throughout the song.

"Cause you want to know if I'm moral enough to join the army, burn women, kids, houses and villages after being a litterbug." Guthrie sang about the war in Vietnam.

The meaning of the song may be gone now since the draft is over, but the legend of the song still lives on. Each Thanksgiving radio stations across the country play the song in its entirety to celebrate the holiday. For a long time this was anyone's only chance to hear the song because Guthrie retired the song after too many requests for the song resulted in him performing it too much.

But not all things from its popularity resulted something bad. Since the song reached large amounts of popularity the songs story was turned into a movie with the same name and Guthrie himself as was the star. The movie accurately portrayed the real events occurred that Thanksgiving in 1963 as much as possible. The movie will be playing tonight at 6:45 p.m. in Northampton at the Academy of Music. Tickets are only five dollars. This side event is sponsored by the Fine Arts Center.

It wasn't until 10 years ago when Guthrie decided to perform the song again to mark the 30 year anniversary of the songs release. After the anniversary ended Guthrie retired the song again and now to mark the 40 year anniversary of the song Guthrie is willing to perform the song again and is going on tour to mark the occasion. He is playing here in Amherst at the Fine Arts Center on Thursday Nov. 17.

"We heard at an Arts Conference that he was planning on doing a 40 year anniversary tour. Since he lives in the Berkshires part time, it was easy to get him. As well the Pioneer Valley is pretty liberal politically so they would like the theme of his music," Shawn Farley of the Fine Arts Center said to the Collegian in an interview about being able book Guthrie.

Guthrie will be performing live with a backing band consisting of his son Abe Guthrie on keyboards and Gordon Titcomb on steel mandolin.

"The concert is appearing to be a success, tickets are selling fast. Of the 1900 seats we have sold around 1400 so far," Farley said concerning the tickets.

The concert starts at 7:30 p.m. And the remaining tickets cost for the public are $40, $30, and $15, kids under 17 are $15. Tickets for Five College Students are $15.

"We want people to go down and see the movie to get pumped up. Then go to the concert Thursday and sing along," Farley said.

COURTESY WWW.FOLKSTREETS.ORG

Arlo Guthrie launched his career in the music industry with the release of "Alice's Restaurant" in 1967. Guthrie is coming to the Fine Arts Center to perform his music often about social injustices.

New Music Tuesdays

"Music is the universal language of mankind." -Henry Wadsworth Longfellow

Neil Diamond

8.7/10

12 Songs
Columbia Records

Call off the race, it's been officially decided that Myspace is cooler than Facebook. Facebook may have more members, but at the end of the day it's the quality of their members that lost the battle. On Myspace you can friend Neil Diamond and hear his entire new album, his first in four years, for free. If that doesn't kick Facebook's butt, what does?

Kidding aside, the new Neil Diamond album "12 Songs" is a good album and perhaps could be the best album he's ever made. Diamond used to carry around too much excess in his songs, but working with rap/heavy metal producer Rick Rubin, there would be none of that.

Rubin put together a very quiet backing band for Diamond to work with, consisting of guitarist Mike Campbell, pianist Benmont Tench and second guitarist Smokey Hormel, along with guest appearances by other musicians such as Larry Knetchtel, Billy Preston and Brian Wilson. Each song was originally recorded while Diamond sung and played guitar. The backing band put some of their own sound onto Diamond's work.

This idea took some getting used to for Diamond. Diamond may be known for writing songs for bands like The Monkees or his high school classmate Barbara Streisand, but he was originally into singing. Diamond and Streisand were both members of their high school chorus.

Besides being an actual singer/songwriter album, "12 Songs" is also some of Diamond's best lyrical work in the past 20 years. In the liner notes of the album, Diamond credits Rubin for editing his songs, not co-writing them. This is a similar approach to the one Rubin took with the late Johnny Cash and his last albums, which also brought him a new following shortly before his death.

Fans of Diamond know the man is not one to back off from the duet so it is fitting to know he ends "12 Songs" with one, but this isn't just any duet. This duet is with former Beach Boy front man Brian Wilson. Wilson and Diamond wrote the song together in the studio and performed it shortly thereafter, creating a really unique, fresh style of the song that matches the overall fresh Neil Diamond.

Kind of Like Spitting

7.8/10

In the Red
Hush Records

Kind Of Like Spitting is not always a band. Kind Of Like Spitting is sometimes a singer/songwriter. When it comes down to which sound the name takes, it's really just up to main member (and sometimes sole member) Ben Barnett's imagination at the time he writes the song.

On Kind Of Like Spitting's latest release "In The Red" Barnett combines his acoustic style and his rock 'n' roll style of albums past.

It doesn't really matter much which style Barnett takes for his songs. Barnett is a lyricist first and musician second. Barnett has been around the musical block and worked with many of today's leading indie musicians such as Death Cab For Cutie's Ben Gibbard. Gibbard played drums for one of Barnett's more rocking albums.

While Barnett and Gibbard are both above-average lyricists, they do have their differences. Barnett is actually different then Gibbard in many ways. Gibbard has more of a melody to his vocal style while Barnett has a whiney undertone in his voice that is easily heard with the acoustic style he often chooses. More times then not Barnett also does most of the instruments himself, except, of course, when he is on stage. Sometimes on stage Barnett has a band, sings by himself or has a string band with violins. Each time is guaranteed to bring emotion out to the listeners in its own way.

"In The Red" is a return-to-form album for Barnett and is overall a mostly acoustic album that isn't all that bad; in fact it's quite good. Songs about love aren't all over the album, but they are frequent in the album's theme. Barnett occasionally carries some Christian themes in his lyrics, but they aren't too Christian like Reliant K or music you would hear in church.

The only quarter of the album that is electric has a very rocking feel, similar to early Weezer minus the metal under tones. Barnett's vocal style isn't at all whiney when he is singing along to the rocking sound.

"In The Red" is Barnett's sixth album release in his young career, but from the success of his previous albums, Barnett is now financially secure to record a well-produced album and it shows with "In The Red."

By Tim McCall
Collegian Staff

Orange

6.5/10

Welcome to the World of ...
Hellcat Records

Looking at the members of Orange, it's difficult to tell whether they are a bad, Casualties-inspired street punk band or an equally bad Good Charlotte knock-off. Thankfully, they're actually neither and they're really not bad.

Their style actually comes off as being a blend of old punk, right at its roots, and newer punk, such as Hellcat labelmates Rancid – perhaps they sound something like the Sex Pistols might have, had they cared how they sounded. If they come off as vaguely dated, it's probably because they pay a lot more attention to borrowing from old bands than new. It's easy to pick out pieces that sound a lot like the Clash or the Buzzcocks as you listen.

This similarity to old English punk bands is intensified by lead singer Joe Denman's English accent. Although Denman and guitarist Jack Berglund were born in Britain, the whole band grew up in Hollywood. The vocals, though, fit the song, regardless of the authenticity of Denman's accent.

The real problems with the album are in the lyrics. Some of the songs, notably the first track, "Hollywood" – a half-serious tribute to the town – and "Affirmation Song," have decent lyrics, but many of them, such as "Orange," do not. The song's chorus is, simply, "Orange/Orange/How come nothing rhymes with orange?" A very insightful sentiment.

Some of this can be forgiven simply because they are a punk band – the anthemic "Don't spit/Don't slack/Don't pout" of "No Rest For the Weekend" – but, really, the album is just lyrically weak.

Another complaint is that about halfway through the album, many listeners will find themselves rather bored. The songs really start to run together after a while, due in no small part to the fact that most people who have listened to punk music have already heard many of these things being done by other bands.

That having been said, "Welcome to the World of..." is worth giving a listen to. It's all been done before, but they pull it off better than a lot of other bands do; certainly, their sound is not entirely derivative. Most importantly, they are a lot of fun to listen to, despite their flaws.

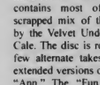
By Ian Jones
Collegian Staff

The Stooges

10/10

The Stooges and Fun House
Elektra Records/ Rhino Records

Like any landmark debut album, the self-titled release from the Stooges had a brilliant opening salvo. A young Iggy Pop infamously set a timeless scene of youth alienation and boredom by simply telling it like it is: "Well it's 1969, okay/All across the USA/It's another year for me and you/Another year with nothing to do." Pop and his band did have something to do, however; they advanced rock 'n' roll far past the 36 years it's been since they appeared. Their dirty, swaggering rock was wildly influential and completely ahead of its time. The Stooges still stand as the definition of punk, even though they preferred bleary-eyed, fuzzed-out riffs to the average punk model. But, then again, The Stooges were anything but average.



Fast forward to 2005 and, even after countless imitators, The Stooges are still one-of-a-kind. The double-disc, remastered reissues of the band's first two albums, "The Stooges" and "Fun House," are historically necessary and musically pleasing to no end. The self-titled debut seems like track-after-track of the most important, and best, songs of the early punk movement – the aforementioned "1969," "I Wanna Be Your Dog," "No Fun" and "Real Cool Time" are all brilliant tracks. "We Will Fall," a song that Pop himself recognizes as a love-or-hate track, is, nonetheless, light years ahead of most of the Stooges contemporaries and is still far beyond the realm of most rock and punk music today.

"Fun House," similarly, will amaze anyone that hasn't heard it before. Pop's sexed-up lyrics in "Loose," Ron Asheton's excellent guitar work on "T.V. Eye" (though Asheton's guitar stands out on every song) and the furious ending of "L.A. Blues" will astound the listener. The sax solo that closes out "1970" shows far more innovation then most people would have expected from a pack of Detroit gutter-punks.

The supplemental discs should be more then enticing enough to people that have heard these albums hundreds of times. "The Stooges" contains most of the original, scrapped mix of the album, done by the Velvet Underground's John Cale. The disc is rounded out by a few alternate takes and excellent, extended versions of "No Fun" and "Ann." The "Fun House" extras consist almost entirely of alternate takes, although two unreleased tracks, "Lost In The Future" and "Slide (Slidin' The Blues)," also make their way onto the disc.

The real target of these reissues, however, should be those that never owned these albums. The Stooges were ahead of their time when they arrived and they sound just as brilliantly out-of-this-world today. If these reissues make one thing clear, it's that no matter what the calendar says, it's still 1969, okay?

Sigur Ross

9.5/10

Takk...
Geffen Records

Every year brings a handful of surprise success stories, but when Sigur Ros, an Icelandic band known for ambient-leaning post-rock, had a breakthrough album with 2002's luminous "( )," they brought with them something that was actually exciting and new. Three years later, Sigur Ros find themselves releasing a highly-anticipated, major-label follow-up in the form of "Takk..." – which translates to "Thank You." Perhaps even more surprising is that the band found a way to upstage themselves; while the band's previous efforts have seen Sigur Ros valiantly and seemingly effortlessly reaching new heights, there was never this much pressure on them. But from the twinkling drone that introduces the title track that opens the album straight through to the end of the disc, Sigur Ros never lets up, sculpting landscapes, skies, seasons, and colors and projecting them through sounds both massive and subtle.

While Sigur Ros has not lost their touch for quieter, more delicate moments, the most surprising and powerful moments of "Takk..." come in bursts of sheer volume, such as the astounding climax of "Glosoli." Sigur Ros hasn't become a slave to convention in any way; refusing to rehash the same albums they have released while rejecting any mainstream compromise. The arrangements are even more complex than before; for instance, the commanding strings of "Hoppipolla" and the band sounding completely united in making huge, compelling and generally brilliant music that wouldn't sound out of place bursting out of the sky at any given moment of natural bliss.

While people more in tune with straight-forward music might be weary of eight and 10 minute songs – though "Takk..." has more songs under five minutes here then on any of the group's other albums – Sigur Ros demands to be heard. They have firmly taken their place as the first great, and perhaps best, band of the 21st century and one of the most important bands to arise in an even longer span of time. And while "( )" had long passages of pure atmosphere, "Takk..." takes to creating a whole new universe with fresh techniques. While the band's standard instruments and strings are still the center of Sigur Ros' world, there is focus on horns, toy pianos, and what sounds like a dying piece of electronics at the start of "Se Lest," a song that perhaps best exemplifies the bright-eyed playfulness that encompasses most of the album.

Indeed, while the world Sigur Ros creates can melt into whatever the listener desires, it often feels like the band has discovered and recorded the sound of the sun on "Takk..." and, despite what narrow-minded rock-n-poppers might think, this is a record that works best when played loud. Sigur Ros is the definition of exhilarating and their music practically leaps out of speakers and soars through the air.

The pure existence of Sigur Ros seems like a phenomenon; the level of popularity and mainstream success they have is unexpected, but it's the fact that they are still elevating themselves to new stratospheres, even after reaching past the sky on their prior releases, that makes "Takk..." a must-have record for anyone that wants to hear the sound of a band transcending time, space, and themselves.

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT
REGISTRATION FOR SPRING 2006

The WRITING PROGRAM PLACEMENT TEST will be offered on:

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 16 @6:30pm in BART 61

This test is a pre-requisite for enrollemnt in Engliwrit 112/113, College Writing.

This test may be taken only once.

Students do not need to register for the test.

Results you can feel... without the side effects!

Dr. Lee Kane
Chiropractic Physician
Participating provider for HMO's student insurance, Blue Cross, GIC, car insurance & most others.

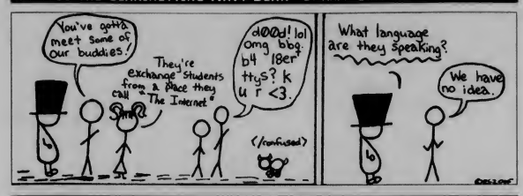
www.AmherstFamilyChiro.com

Amherst Family Chiropractic
549-1500

FRUSTRATED?
PUZZLED?
DO YOU HAVE:

- a grade dispute?
- teacher, roomate or job concerns?
- billing problems?
- harassment?
- ...or any other University related problems?

THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP
(confidentially, of course)



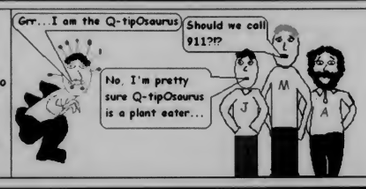
students, faculty, and staff are all welcome

823 Campus Center

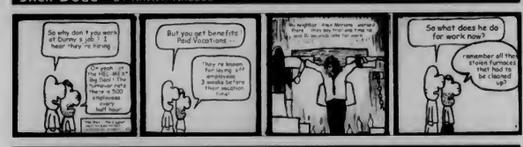
Office Hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.

telephone: 413-545-0867
fax: 413-545-9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

Franco the Clarinetting Navy Bean
By Rainy Stanford



Labrat
By Richard Martell



Random Chatter
By Chris Sala

There are some tell-tale signs that you have been studying too much. Usually it involves frightening your roomates....

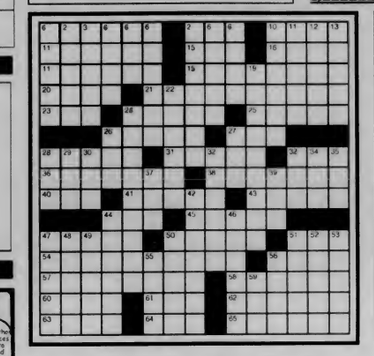
Jack Dogg
By Xavier Rhodes

Paul
By Billy O'Keefe

Quote of the Day

"A lot of people are under the impression that you get to choose who you love."

—The Mexican



ACROSS
1 WWII prison camp
7 Sl crosser
10 Attention getter
14 Personal account
15 Hoover or Aswan
16 Fencer's foil
17 Conundrum
18 Strange
20 Plenty
21 All the people
23 Attempt
24 Inclined trough
25 Hemp for sacks
26 Sheriff's band
27 High mountain
28 Mrs. Bush
31 Swap
33 Bovine call
36 Forgive one's sins
38 Pedicurist's target
40 Soup vegetable
41 Deserve
43 One way
44 Blend
45 Metal fastener
47 Hammerin' Hank
50 Experiencing ladium
51 CEO's degree
54 Gossip channels
56 Chief Justice Warren
57 One's other self
58 Published in installments
60 __ off (annoyed)
61 Rocky peak
62 Develop gradually
63 Comes to a conclusion
64 Canonized Mlle.
65 Reduce

DOWN
1 Small, silvery fish
2 Pinnacle: e.g.
3 Friendship
4 Ships' diaries
5 Intention
6 Charts
7 Compatibility device
8 Worth
9 Actor Jannings
10 Repressed
11 Iberian nation
12 Firmly lived
13 Very small
19 Sharp-sighted
22 Expulsion
24 Collier
26 In favor of 27 Fuss
28 Track circuit
29 Presidential nickname
30 Dos Passos trilogy
32 Clothing
33 West of Hollywood
34 Lubricate
35 Advanced in years
37 Annoy
39 Young louse
42 Mesabi Range yield
44 Powered bicycles
46 Ship
47 Playing marble
48 Senator Specter
49 Assigned a value to
50 Intolerant one
51 Pixels
52 Courageous
53 Steve or Woody
55 Animal docs
56 God of love
59 Actress Arden

Find today's answers online

www.dailycollegian.com

THE HARP
NEW!! Wireless Internet
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted
Irish Pub
November Special!
$1.50 PBR Bottles; Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 A pint / $6.50 a pitcher
Tonight: • TRIVIA NIGHT!
Wed. • Cold Duck Complex
"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst
just north of the apartments

Submit your comic!

e-mail
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

Horoscopes

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You waited too long. That concert is sold out.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Your friends suspect you are involved in highly illegal activities.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You will step in gum today. Prepare by purchasing Goo Gone.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Those earrings are hideous. Take them off immediately.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
It is not necessary to start celebrating Christmas right now.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
You will need large amounts of coffee today.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You will donate money to an animal rights group this month.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You have spent entirely too many hours watching Titanic recently.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
The love of your life will fall madly in love with you.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
That is not your backpack. Put it back where you found it.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Buy some blank CDs and make a bunch of party mixes.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You should probably start studying for that test now.

★ Submit your comic ★

e-mail
collegiancomcis@yahoo.com

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Announcements

White Out Night at The Pub! Friday November 18 at The Pub HTM students are hosting an event to support the American Stroke Association. Wear White Clothing! Buy raffles for a chance to win great prizes! Come out and support the ASA while having fun with your friends!

Montreal Weekend New Years Party $129 Complete cocktail age 18 781-979-9001 Call now montrealexpress.net

Apartment for Rent

1, 2, 3 & 4 Bedroom spacious apartments, Great location, Bus Route, All utilities included No Fee Call 413-253-3000

Employment

Rent us your ears! Listening experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. email: phonetics lab@linguist.umass.edu Voicemail: 545-6837.

November 18th is the last day to apply to become a Legal Assistant with the Student Legal Services Office. Earn 12 undergraduate credits while gaining valuable experience. Contact us at 545-1995 or stop by at 922 Campus Center to pick up an application.

Employment

Part-Time Workers Needed We are looking for part-time assistance with a variety of office and clerical tasks. Preferred candidates will work quickly and accurately and be able to work from 5pm-9pm on days that they work. Pay is $8.00/hour. For consideration, please call (413) 256-0444 for an application or mail resume to: National Evaluation Systems, Inc., Personnel Department, P.O. Box 226, Amherst, MA 01004-0226. Resumes may also be emailed to: personnel@nesinc.com.

Mystery Shoppers get paid to shop! Up to $150 a day. Training provided Call 1-800-690-1273

Employment

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience nees. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

Lost

Green & Black USB Storage Device left in open access computers in the library on Tuesday Morning 9:30 $20 REWARD Contact dmurphy@student.umass.edu

Services

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance. 549-1906

Services

Do you need help filling out Immigration Forms? We can help at the Student Legal Services Office in preparing and filing your Immigration Forms for a reasonable fee. Contact us at 545-1995 or stop by at 922 Campus Center to arrange an appointment.

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

Travel

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

ACT NOW SPRING BREAKERS Book early & Save! Free meals/parties by 11/7. Lowest prices. Be a rep & TRAVEL FREE! Get the ultimate hookups with STA TRAVEL 413-256-1261.

SPRING BREAK - Early Booking Specials – FREE Meals & Drinks - $50 Deposit 800-234-7007 www.endlesssummertours.com

Travel

SPRINK BREAK FROM $569 BAHAMAS, CANCUN, ACAPULCO, JAMAICA! FREE PARTIES, FREE DRINKS. Sign up early and save. Organize a small group and you travel FREE. Or become a CAMPUS REP and GET PAID COMMISSION on each trip sold. Call today and get started 1-800-GET-SUN-1

Collegian Advertising

Want to advertise in the Collegian? Speak with one of our experienced ad reps about your advertising needs! Call 545-3500 or visit us between 8:30am and 3:30pm.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS TUESDAY

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UM finishing strong

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Correspondent

On Saturday, the University of Massachusetts men's and women's cross-country teams competed in the NCAA Northeast Regional in Franklin, Mass. The men boasted a 17th place finish while the women ended their season finishing in the 30th spot.

Men's coach Ken O'Brien said that he had a "mixed assessment" about the race that featured 232 total runners.

The Minutemen moved up in the rankings, advancing from 20th place in the race last year to 17th place this year.

"We fell a little short of our goal, which was [to place] somewhere in the area of 12th or 13th place, maybe 14th, somewhere inside the top 15," O'Brien said.

O'Brien mentioned that the team averaged about 30 places higher per person this season, something he considers positive. But he also acknowledged that they only missed 14th place by 15 points, which would have accomplished their goal of placing within the top 15 finishers.

O'Brien said strong performances were turned by UMass's top four finishers, Nils Fischer, Ryan Corbett, Jesse Regnier and Michael Dulong, who placed 83rd, 85th, 89th and 90th, respectively.

"I think Mike Dulong's performance might have stood out a little bit among the top four, because Jesse, Nils and Ryan had been either first, second or third for us all season long," O'Brien said. "But Michael came on and closed that gap."

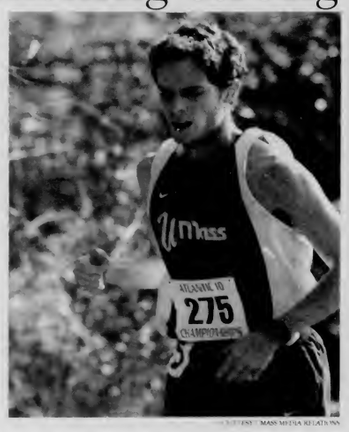
O'Brien said that he was pleased with the team's performance over the weekend, but commented that it also held some disappointments.

"I'm happy that we improved," O'Brien said. "When your team averages 30 places better in a meet this year over last year, that's the improvement, and so I guess in some respects I'm happy about that. [However], when you miss moving up the team rankings four places so that you can finish 14th instead of 17th, that's the disappointment."

Next Saturday O'Brien's squad heads to the Bronx for the ECAC Championships at VanCortlandt Park. The event, which will host 90 Division I schools, takes all of the teams on the East Coast who did not qualify for the nationals.

O'Brien said that the season's rigorous training is over, and that it is important for the team to be healthy and "bounce back from the race last weekend."

As for the women's race, the Maroon and White experienced a heartbreaking weekend. Aside from the consistently dominant Christina Derosa, who placed 34th out of 254 runners, and Amber Sayers, who finished second for UMass with 139th place, the Minutewomen fell under a cloud of bad luck.



Both Cuisle Kerrians and Erin O'Donnell battled tonsillitis, Ashley Davidson had a stomach virus and Amanda Bodette suffered from a pulled muscle, which doomed them to sub-par performances.

However, coach Julie LaFreniere was not angry at her team's performance, saying the unfortunate events were out of the team's control.

"Unfortunately, it has not been a good week for us," LaFreniere said. "Christina has been our number one runner all season long and she ran well. Our number two, three, four and five [runners] all had some problems."

LaFreniere added that it was an unfortunate way for the runners to end the season, but that she is very hopeful that next year will produce better results.

Boston College ended up taking home the prize in the women's competition.

Junior Mike Dulong finished in 92nd place out of 232 in the NCAA Northeast Regional Meet on Saturday at Franklin Park.

A-Rod edges Ortiz in MVP race

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

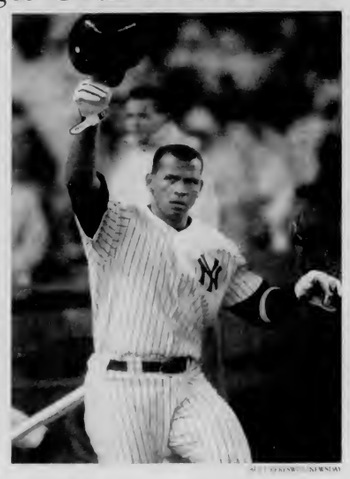
NEW YORK – Alex Rodriguez won the American League Most Valuable Player award for the second time in three seasons, beating David Ortiz on Monday in a vote that rewarded a position player over a designated hitter.

Rodriguez, in his second season as the New York Yankees' third baseman, received 16 first-place votes, 11 seconds and one third for 331 points from the Baseball Writers' Association of America.

Ortiz, the DH for the Boston Red Sox, got 11 firsts and 17 seconds for 307 points. Los Angeles Angels outfielder Vladimir Guerrero received the other first-place vote and was third with 196 points.

"I think defense, for the most part, being a balanced player and also saving a lot of runs on the defensive side, I think was a major factor here," Rodriguez said. "To me, defense is foremost. It's always been. The White Sox showed us this year pitching and defense wins to this day."

Voting was done before the start of the postseason, when both the Yankees and Red Sox were eliminated in the first round. Rodriguez hit .133 with no RBIs in a five-game loss to the Angels while Ortiz batted .333 with a home run as the defending champion Red Sox were swept by the Chicago White Sox.



"I would certainly trade his World Series championship for this MVP trophy," Rodriguez said, thinking back to Boston's 2004 title. "That's the only reason I play baseball. It's what I'm consumed to do right now."

Rodriguez hit .321 with an AL-high 48 homers and 130 RBIs, breaking Joe DiMaggio's 68-year-old Yankees record for home runs by a right-handed hitter (46). A-Rod also won the award in 2003, his final season as the Texas Rangers' shortstop before he was dealt to the Yankees.

He didn't think the award would end criticism that he doesn't perform in the clutch or isn't a winner.

"We can win three World Series, with me, it's never going to be over. I think my benchmark is so high that no matter what I do, it's never going to be enough, and I understand that," he said. "Maybe when I retire is when all critics and all that kind of stuff will end."

Ortiz batted .300 with 47 homers and a major league-leading 148 RBIs. Big Papi had 34 RBIs that put his team ahead, the most in the AL, and had eight RBIs from the seventh inning on that put Boston ahead to stay.

New York's Alex Rodriguez beat out Boston's David Ortiz for the American League MVP award which was announced yesterday.

"He is the one special player right now, like Barry Bonds, who can change the game around simply with his batting," Rodriguez said.

Rodriguez became the first Yankees player to win the award since Don Mattingly in 1985 and only the fourth player to win an MVP with two teams, joining Bonds (Pittsburgh and San Francisco), Jimmie Foxx (Philadelphia Athletics and Red Sox) and Frank Robinson (Cincinnati and Baltimore).

"I'm very pleased with the year he had," Yankees manager Joe Torre said. "He's getting more comfortable here in New York. Alex helped us win so many games, both offensively and defensively, and he continues to improve."

Still, A-Rod would have had a different approach in October if he had a chance against the Angels, who tried to pitch around him.

"My one regret is I thought I could have walked five 12 times and really just passed the baton and been a little bit more patient," he said. "Probably at the end, I got a little overanxious."

A-Rod also is the fourth to win at two positions, following Detroit's Hank Greenberg (first base and left field), the St. Louis Cardinals' Stan Musial (outfield and first base) and the Milwaukee Brewers' Robin Yount (shortstop and center field).

The Yankees have won the award 19 times, the most of any team.

"A-Rod demonstrates the talent, hard work, and dedication of a true winner," Yankees owner George Steinbrenner said in a statement. "I look forward to great things for many years from A-Rod as a Yankee."

Rodriguez also spoke publicly for the first time about a report in the New York Daily News this month that he was at a New York poker club. Playing at such clubs is not illegal, though it can be against the law to operate them, the Daily News reported.

"Obviously, it wasn't the right thing to do," he said. "In retrospect, it's probably a place I shouldn't have gone."

Weis finding reasons to be happy

By Tom Coyne
Associated Press

SOUTH BEND, Ind. – The better Notre Dame's outlook gets, the more coach Charlie Weis' mood sours.

Weis doesn't want the Fighting Irish (7-2), who moved up one spot to No. 6, to get too comfortable with their success. He admits he was ornery last week as Notre Dame prepared to face Navy.

He was hard on the Irish players at practice. He was hard on them in meetings. He even yelled at them as they warmed up before the game Saturday so they wouldn't get too complacent.

Weis said he had decided that was going to be his attitude before he met with the team for the first time last week. It wouldn't have mattered if the Irish had done everything perfect getting ready for the Midshipmen.

"That's irrelevant. You just act in an ornery mood all week," he said.

So with a Bowl Championship Series berth within reach and a Syracuse team that has lost seven straight heading to town, what kind of mood is Weis going to be in?

"Probably worse," Weis said.

Just to accentuate his point, he started his news conference Sunday by emphasizing everything the Irish had done wrong in their 42-21 victory over Navy a day earlier. He called it one of the worst performances by Notre Dame's special teams all season.

"I wasn't very pleased with just about everything we did," he said.

Not even the average 12.5 yards per punt return the Irish had against Navy, which entered the game seventh in the nation allowing an average of 4.22 yards per return.

Despite the Irish defense giving up fewer big plays – which Weis defines as a pass of at least 20 yards or a run of at least 10 yards – than they have all season, he still thought the Irish gave up too many big plays.

"There were way too many 6- and 7-yard gains on first and second down," Weis said.

Nitpicking aside, though, Weis conceded he was pleased with his team's play. Just don't let the players hear about it.

He was particularly pleased that the Irish didn't take Navy lightly even though many outside the program expected an easy victory. He said the fact that the Irish took the Midshipmen so seriously shows they are beginning to mature.

"I think the team is beginning to learn that you can't take anything or anyone for granted," he said. "That's part of the maturing process of a team that's starting to become a pretty good football team."

But even Weis can't stay in a bad mood all the time.

He let his players enjoy their victory after the game on Saturday. In fact, he plans to allow them to savor the victory through Monday.

"I let them have their brief time of enjoyment, then on Tuesday get back to business," he said.

Weis doesn't worry that his team will figure out that his bad mood may be a good sign for the Irish.

"I don't know if they've figured me out yet," he said. "I think eventually my shtick will get old. But I think right now they're learning a different message each week."

The message is simple: keep coach in a bad mood and everything will be all right.

Notre Dame coach Charlie Weis has been hard on his players this season despite their strong play in his first year at the helm.

Busch drives into problems

By Jim Litke
Associated Press

Even for a guy who spends so much time in the fast lane, Kurt Busch went from champ to chump in a hurry.

A year ago, he was fighting off nine rivals in the final weeks of a Nextel Cup championship chase Busch would go on to win. But Sunday, he was serving the first of a two-race suspension imposed by team owner Jack Roush, effectively ending his season and what little hope remained of defending the title. And that was after a Friday night run-in with police for driving recklessly – outside the Phoenix International Raceway.

When an athlete gets in trouble with the law, you often learn a lot about his standing by how much support flows his way. Busch's younger brother, Kyle, wound up winning the Phoenix stop, and not surprisingly, used much of his time on the podium defending Kurt.

"Usually, things in the media are false and that's just what it comes down to sometimes," Kyle said. Asked to elaborate, though, he added, "I'm not going there, bud," and walked out.

When cooler heads prevailed on Kyle to return 20 minutes later, he was more subdued. "There is a lot of speculation out in the media," he said. "And the only things that are out there to acknowledge is the police report and any information Kurt Busch chooses to release in the future."

Kurt did turn up briefly on NBC to offer an abbreviated defense. He denied alcohol was involved and, to be fair, a breath test administered at the scene was inconclusive. The device used by police failed, so Busch was not cited for drinking. Regarding his suspension by the Roush team, Kurt said simply, "That's the decision they made and I will live with it."

Roger Penske, whose team Busch will race for next season, noted the driver made a public apology to the sheriff and added, "We support him 100 percent for the future and we will work with him to be a great driver."

And as far as backing, that was about it.

NASCAR is undergoing a generational shift at the same time the sport is zooming up the charts in popularity. The rewards are bigger, the races closer and tempers shorter than ever. Too many of the younger drivers are looking out for No. 1, and no farther.

That selfishness, both on and off the track, has some people worried about the sport's direction. It moved racing legend Richard Petty to say a few months back, "To be a real, true NASCAR driver, you have to know where the sport came from and you have to respect that history and tradition.

"The guys that don't respect that history and tradition, I don't think they're going to be around all that long," Petty added. "And those guys who don't know the history and tradition, I think it's upon them to learn about it pretty quick if they want to be a success."

Roush found both Kurt and Kyle Busch in the wilderness of truck racing and gave each his start. After five years in stock cars, Kurt was a quick-enough study to turn the advantages Roush Racing offered into a Nextel Cup championship. But he remained rough at the edges, combative on the track, defiant in the NASCAR hauler when officials tried to discipline him, and clumsy in interviews.

Instead of winning over fans, Busch kept finding ways to alienate them. His reputation inside racing wasn't helped, either, when he dumped the perennially contending Roush operation to join Penske – a backward career step – because the money was better. The suspension was hardly a surprise, given the pressure from sponsors and how much Busch's relationship with the Roush team had deteriorated already.

"We're officially retiring as Kurt Busch's apologists," team president Geoff Smith said Sunday, "effective today."

It probably had nothing to do with how Roush treated Kurt, but team members likely were still smarting over Kyle's departure a few years earlier. Roush plucked the younger Busch from the truck ranks as a teenager and had big plans for him, too. But when a NASCAR-mandated change in minimum-age requirements effectively voided Kyle's contract, he used the opportunity to switch teams. While their talent was never in question, their judgment was another matter.

Greg Biffle, who drives for Roush and battled the younger Busch before finishing second at Phoenix, called it "neat" that Kyle won at the same racetrack where his brother won in April. About Kurt's suspension, he added, "I think you'd have sympathy for anybody if you put yourself in that situation and got taken out of the race car. But I have absolutely no information about what was going on."

That will come out at a hearing set for December on the reckless driving charge, but it's hard to imagine a scenario that will play out favorably for Kurt Busch. Shortly before beginning his Nextel Cup defense in February, Busch said he'd learned a few lessons, the most important being his inability to take responsibility for mistakes. While his next chance to do that is already on the calendar, it's something Busch can't get to work on soon enough.

WHAT'S THE SCORE?

Pizza on the go, made fresh at your doorstep.

Shark Tale

The idea for Pizza Shark was inspired by the observation that for many Amherst residents the food pyramid meant:

Subs
Pizzas
Burritos

Lives were hanging in the balance (well, close anyway). We thought we could help.

For the next six months we read everything we could find about healthful alternatives to conventional food preparation. We contacted local sources for organic produce. We ate at the great pizzerias of New Haven (Pepe's, Modern Apizza, and Sally's) and the great taquerias in Boston. Eventually, our kitchen staff, utilizing the finest local and global produce, created a menu of pizza, panini, burritos, International Street Foods, and salads.

Our menu will change seasonally. Our ingredients will range from the conventional to the organic, from local, seasonal produce to far eastern herbs and spices.

On November 16,2005, Pizza will commence home and business deliveries via two mobile kitchens that will allow us to prepare meals on site, on demand. In addition, we operate 7 days a week, from 11:30 am to 9 pm.

We look forward to serving you.

Pizza Shark

1185 North Pleasant St. Amherst
259-4259

As of November 16, 2005, Pizza Shark will be open seven days a week.

Order one Pizza and get any of the international street food items for 50% off.

Taking delivery to new depths

Pizza Shark 1185 North Pleasent St. 259-4257

PIZZA 12"
- 3 Cheese Blend
- Vegetarian
- Buffalo Chicken
- Pepperoni
- Chicken Teriyaki
- Mediterranean
- Meat Lovers
- Ex-Meat Lovers
- Freegan Vegan
- En Fuego

BURRITOS
- Especiale
- " " with Roasted Chicken
- " " with Shredded Beef
- Add Sour Cream and Guacamole

STUFFED PANINI
- Italiano
- Parmigiana
- Stone Roasted Chicken
- Portabella

INTERNATIONAL STREET FOODS
- Nutloaf Wellington
- Jamaican Patties
- Mexican Chop Suey
- Vietnamese Spring Rolls
- Moroccan B'stillas –
- Greek Spinach Pie
- Macaroni and Cheese
- Soup Du Jour
- "Bisqueda" - Baked Stuffed Quesadilla
- Roast Beef Sandwich

SALAD
- House
- Roasted Pear
- Caesar
- Spinach
- Add
- Dressings

BEVERAGES
- Izze's Sodas
- Gatorade
- Red Bull
- Fiji Spring Water
- Tea Drinks

ESPRESSO

SMOOTHIES

ICE CREAM SANDWICH

Dinner and a movie brought to you!

Taking delivery to new depths

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Wednesday, November 16, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXIV Issue 45

SGA passes resolution against HEA provision

By Matt Bellveau
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association at the University of Massachusetts followed suit behind more than 120 other university SGAs Wednesday by passing a resolution in opposition to the Higher Education Act (HEA) Drug Provision.

Since 2000, students with drug convictions have been blocked access to federal financial aid as a result of a provision in the HEA.

The drug provision, added to the HEA in 1998 by Rep. Perk Souder (R-IN), works to delay or deny federal financial aid to students with drug convictions.

In January 2005, the congressionally-appointed Advisory Committee on Student Financial Assistance recommended that Congress remove the drug question from the financial aid application, calling it "irrelevant" to aid eligibility.

According to the SSDP resolution, "Putting up roadblocks on the path to education will do nothing to solve our nation's drug and crime problems; it will only make them worse. Forcing students convicted on drug charges to drop out of school makes them more likely to continue abusing drugs and engaging in criminal activity and less likely to become productive taxpaying citizens, thus reducing the nation's economic productivity."

"This policy only affects students from low- to middle-income families," said Tom Angell, campaigns director of Students for Sensible Drug Policy, who believes that the 1998 amendment has actually encouraged substance abuse in young adults. "Students who are better off can afford tuition without public assistance and can afford a good lawyer to avoid getting convicted in first place."

"The drug provision places all blame on the student, or potential student, in question," said SGA President Pavel Payano. "It limits the ability to go to college of those who perhaps need such an opportunity the most."

According to the SSDP, drug convictions are the only infractions for which students are denied financial aid. Murderers, rapists, burglars, arsonists and other criminals are all eligible to receive aid.

SSDP claims that a student with a drug conviction entering or returning to college reduces the likelihood that an individual will return to engaging in illegal activity.

"The more education a person receives, the less likely they are to commit further crimes and continue to be a costly drain on the criminal justice system," stated the SSDP resolution.

The SGA's resolution has been confronted with some level of opposition within the UMass campus.

"Kids that are caught doing drugs should definitely be kicked out of school," said Shauna McIntyre, a senior psychology major. "You get kicked out of school for other offenses like plagiarism, so why shouldn't you get kicked out for a drug conviction."

With the resolution, which passed with a 47-3 vote with 5 abstentions, the SGA joined the Students for Sensible Drug Policy (SSDP) in their demand for the repeal of the drug provision.

More than 240 organizations have called for the full repeal of the Drug Provision, including the National Education Association, National Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators, Association for Addiction Professionals, NAACP, and the United States Student Association.

According to the Web site DAREgeneration.com, more than 175,000 students have been ineligible for federal loans, grants, and work-study because of the HEA Drug Provision.

For more information on the campaign and a complete list of SSDP members, visit daregeneration.com.

GEO mocks Governor Romney in UMass rally

By Melissa Blanksteen
Collegian Staff

The Graduate Employees Organization held a rally on the Student Union steps at the University of Massachusetts yesterday to raise awareness about their 2004-2007 contracts that the Massachusetts Governor has not yet signed.

Speaking first, Governor Rat Romney, a student dressed with a rat head representing Governor Mitt Romney, rallied the crowd of 150 students.

"I can guarantee that a deal is never a deal, a promise made is never a promise kept, and that your collective bargaining agreements will never be worth the paper they are written on," the rat-governor said.

Graduate and undergraduate students holding "Fund UMass" and "Rat Romney '08" signs cheered the governor on, all while recording and photographing the event. The crowd grew larger as students walked past. Through the crowd, the GEO was circulating petitions.

The rally turned more serious when Anna Curtis, the chairperson of the assembly of stewards, stepped up to the megaphones to rally students to the GEO's cause.

"I am tired of getting screwed over by a rat," Curtis said. "We have done what we were supposed to do and we made a deal with this administration. We have every right to expect that this contract will be honored, and fairly negotiated and now that Rat-bastard is sitting on our contracts to make a political point."

She urged the crowd to take out their cell phones and call UMass President Jack Wilson to take action on behalf of the students.

Peter Vickery, Governor's Council representative for Western Massachusetts, also spoke at the rally. He said he believed that Romney is right in asking for a more "faith-based" government and that public higher education should be run like a business.

"When I say faith-based government, I mean that contacts negotiated in good faith should be honored," Vickery said. "When I say that public higher education should be run more like a business, there is no way a business person would get away with letting a contract negotiated in good faith to sit on your desk."

GEO members, Anna Curtis and Amanda Plumb, speak to a crowd of over 150 students that gathered in an effort to raise awareness about their 2004-2007 contracts that the Governor Mitt Romney has yet to sign.

The rally then went to the Mullins Center to give a petition to the Board of Trustees, who were meeting in committee before their regular meeting Wednesday. The petition had over 800 signatures asking for the Board to support the GEO and pressure the state government to fund their contracts.

Despite the cold drizzle, the students marched, banging pots and pans and chanting. When they reached the Mullins center, the police were their waiting for them, but instead of going in the arena, the protesters marched in a circle in between the Mullins Center and the practice rink chanting. Some members of the Board of Trustees were watching from above, and Megan McDonough, the president of the GEO, delivered the petition.

"Their overall position is that they support the funding of the contracts," McDonough said after the rally. "But I spoke with the vice president of the board, James R Julian, and I am going to be in com-

See GEO on page 3

Documentary illustrates gap between rich and poor

By Kim Beson
Collegian Correspondent

A documentary screening was held Tuesday at the University of Massachusetts Campus Center by Massachusetts Student Public Interest Research Group (MASSPIRG), chronicling food-insecure families in Vermont.

The documentary, "The Red Wagon Facing Hunger," produced by Dave Raizman showed that in today's day and age there is a widening gap between the rich and poor.

The film explains that we live in a consumer society, where people continuously want to acquire more and more material things. We are bombarded with extreme wealth by the media, from such reality TV shows as MTV's Laguna Beach and the VH1 program that shows viewers, "the rich and fabulous life of " so and so.

So much waste and excess exists, that can be regenerated, the film explained, which is why hard economic times face global conflicts, high gas and oil prices, jobs becoming nonexistent, and high education costs.

Unfortunately, the stories of those whose sole goals in life are to survive financially and give their children a good life are not being told by the media. We all seek the American dream, yet things happen out of our control which have major blows to our people's economic status.

Raizman became interested in making this documentary because he had friends who were volunteering at assorted food banks in the Vermont area.

The demand for food is increasing, but the amount of food is rapidly decreasing. Raizman has lived in Vermont for 20 years and had never known that extreme poverty existed around his community. 1 in 6 Vermonters are using emergency food systems such as, food banks and soup kitchens.

"I want the preconceived ideas of those who are hungry and homeless taken apart," Raizman said.

Those who are hungry and homeless are not lazy, in fact 40 percent of them are working minimum wage or have a fixed income and struggle to make ends-meet, he said, citing such factors as divorce, medical problems, and emotional issues can alter people's life where they cannot maintain the security they once enjoyed. Many people need such services as food shelters and soup kitchens but are too embarrassed to get help, so with this documentary he hopes to de-stigmatize acquiring food from such organizations.

Raizman wanted to convey the network of volunteers donating their time at no costs within the documentary, because without them servicing families in need would be more difficult. When beginning this documentary he had issues with how big of a story should he tell, and he decided to focus on the personal side of the story so people can hear direct points of views of families that are struggling.

This screening was held in honor of the Hunger and Homelessness Awareness Week set up by MASSPIRG in affiliation with National Student campaign. MASSPIRG aspires to educate people on the ever existent issue of hunger and homelessness globally and locally.

They wish to seek potential volunteers and activists wanting to help decrease hunger and homelessness. Katharina McCarty, Hunger and Homelessness Campaign organizer, said, "People don't realize that so many are hungry and homeless right here."

Last year, the national poverty rate rose to include 35.9 million Americans, 12.5 percent of the population. Beginning November 14th, students walking through the hall connecting the Student Union and Campus Center will see hundreds of life-size silhouettes, representing hungry and homeless individuals in Western Massachusetts, the country, and the world.

MASSPIRG's final message to the audience: "Leave with a sense to do something more."

Teen accused of slaying waives extradition

By Ashley M. Heher
Associated Press

BELLEVILLE, Ind. Pennsylvania teen accused of killing his girlfriend's parents waived extradition to his home state Tuesday, a day after he and his 14-year-old girlfriend were arrested in Indiana after a police chase that ended in a crash.

Hendricks County Prosecutor Patricia Baldwin said David Ludwig, 18, signed documents at the county jail that clear the way for Pennsylvania authorities to take him to face murder charges there.

Ludwig was scheduled to board a plane Tuesday afternoon to return to Pennsylvania, said State Police 1st Sgt. Dave Bursten.

Authorities have said it remains unclear whether Ludwig's girlfriend, Kara Beth Borden, had any role in her parents' killings.

Richard F. Garipoli Jr., police chief in Pennsylvania's Warwick Township, where the shootings happened, said Tuesday that he is treating the girl as a victim in the case "until I hear otherwise."

He said Borden would also return to Indiana on Tuesday.

"Kara's upset, she's crying. She's a 14-year-old child and we seem to forget that. She's devastated. So it's important that we do put her back with her family where she belongs," Garipoli said.

Police say Ludwig killed Borden's parents, Michael F. and Cathryn Lee Borden, early Sunday after an argument about her curfew when she came home late. The shootings happened at the family's home near Lititz, Pa., about 60 miles west of Philadelphia.

He faces preliminary charges in Indiana of criminal recklessness and resisting law enforcement, authorities said. Police in Pennsylvania issued an arrest warrant on charges of criminal homicide and kidnapping.

Few details were known about the pair's trip. Authorities said they don't know the route they traveled, if they had family or friends in Indiana or if they were simply passing through the state.

The Bordens, both 50, were apparently shot once each in the head, authorities said. Mike Borden worked for a printing company, and his children were homeschooled, said neighbor Tod Sherman. Sherman said the family knew Ludwig through a home-schooling network.

The Ludwig family home is shown in Lititz, Pennsylvania. Authorities said David Ludwig, 18, allegedly killed the parents of a 14-year-old girl early Sunday after they and their daughter argued about her curfew.

Kara's 13-year-old sister, Katelyn, told investigators her parents were shot after they argued with Ludwig for about an hour, according to court papers.

Katelyn said she saw Ludwig shoot her father, and then ran into the bathroom, where she heard a second shot, presumably the one that killed her mother, court papers said. Ludwig then ran through the house calling for Kara, she told investigators.

The couple's 9-year-old son ran to the neighbors, who called 911.

"It's completely insane, completely insane," Lancaster County, Pa., Coroner G. Gary Kirchner said. "This isn't a Romeo-and-Juliet deal. This is far worse than that."

An alert for the girl was issued across the East, and police in Pennsylvania and Indiana investigated reported sightings of the pair as they made their way west in a red Volkswagen Jetta.

File-sharing network, i2hub, shuts itself down

By Alex Veiga
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES Online file-sharing service i2hub, which linked university students and others over the super-fast Internet2 network, has shut down under threat of a lawsuit from the recording industry.

The entire network linking users of the i2hub file-swapping application was taken off-line Monday afternoon, founder Wayne Chang in Boston said Tuesday via e-mail.

At i2hub's peak, hundreds of thousands of students from more than 500 universities were regularly using it, said Chang, 22, who created the software in 2003 as a freshman at the University of Massachusetts.

i2hub was one of seven firms behind file-sharing software who received cease-and-desist letters from the Recording Industry Association of America in September accusing them of enabling computer users to distribute copyrighted music without permission online.

In the notices, the trade group representing the major recording companies warned recipients of legal consequences if they continued to stay in business.

In September, the firm behind the WinMX file-sharing software also apparently shuttered the service after receiving one of the RIAA letters.

The RIAA also has filed copyright infringement lawsuits against 635 individual computer users using i2hub at 39 college campuses this year.

A Supreme Court ruling earlier this year established that the entertainment industry can file piracy lawsuits against technology companies caught encouraging customers to steal music and movies over the Internet.

The court decision significantly weakened lawsuit protections for companies that had blamed illegal behavior on their customers rather than the technology that made such behavior possible.

Associated Press

ARTS & LIVING

KEITH URBAN AT UMASS

Friday night, Australian country star Keith Urban brought his energetic show to the Mullins Center

Page 6

EDITORIAL/OPINION

DRUG PROVISION

Should Students with drug convictions still be eligible for federal financial aid?

Page 5

WEATHER

TODAY Rain, H66°, L39°
TOMORROW Cloudy, H48°, L23°
FRIDAY Mostly Sunny, H41°, L23°

SPORTS

A CULTURAL CONNECTION

UMass field hockey players came from sitmar backgrounds.

Page 12

Iraqi detainees claim that soldiers pushed them into cage of lions

By Lolita C. Baldor
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The claim by two former Iraqi detainees that they were thrust into a cage of lions in a Baghdad palace in 2003 as part of a terrifying interrogation "seems quite farfetched," Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Tuesday.

The Army is looking into the charges, which were made Monday during an interview.

"They took me behind the cage, they were screaming at me, scaring me and beating me a lot," Thahe Mohammed Sabbar said. "One of the soldiers would open the door, and two soldiers would push me in. The lions came running toward me and they pulled me out and shut the door. I completely lost consciousness."

Army spokesman Paul Boyce said Tuesday there is no formal investigation. Defense officials suggested that at times detainees make up claims of abuse. Boyce and Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said they have never heard of lions being used in any detainee operations.

"Everything that everyone alleges is looked into," said Rumsfeld, but he added that documents have been found that "train people, terrorists, to lie about their treatment, and they do it consistently and it works."

Boyce said no mention of lions has never come up in any of the more than 400 investigations into detainee abuse conducted by the military over the past three years.

"We take every allegation of detainee abuse seriously," Boyce said.

"But it does seem unusual that this is now coming out for the very first time after three years of investigations."

Sabbar, 37, and Sherzad Kamal Khalid, 35, are in the United States this week to talk about the lawsuit that the American Civil Liberties Union and Human Rights First filed on their behalf against Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and other military officials.

The suit, which was filed in March and transferred to U.S. District Court in Washington, details alleged sexual abuse, mock executions, water and food deprivation, electric shock and other torture used on eight detainees, including Sabbar and Khalid. It does not mention the lion cage.

The two men described the July day in 2003 when they were arrested by American troops with guns and armored vehicles. They said they were covered with plastic hoods and repeatedly struck by soldiers using the butt of their guns.

They both described standing in front of a lion cage, and said they could hear other prisoners screaming as the metal cage door creaked open and slammed shut.

"They threatened that if I did not confess they would put me in the cage," said Khalid, adding that the soldiers kept asking him where Saddam was. "I laughed, I thought they were kidding me. They asked where are the weapons of mass destruction. I was very surprised and I thought it was weird."

When he laughed, he said, he was only beaten more. And he said they pushed him into the cage three times, pulling him out as the lions moved toward him.

ACLU lead counsel Lucas Guttentag said the lion cage was not mentioned in the initial legal filing because lawyers considered that part of the charges of mock executions, which would later be detailed. He said media reports in summer 2003 documented that American soldiers had access to the lions.

Other reports suggested that the lions were being sent to zoos, although it is unclear when they were moved.

Both men said they suffer continuing physical and psychological trauma, such as pain, ulcers, nightmares and insomnia.

Sabbar said he was held by U.S. forces for about six months, while Khalid was held for about two months.

Study finds fewer college students graduate with four-year degree

By Justin Pope
Associated Press

NEW YORK — For decades, getting more students into college has been the top priority of America's higher education leaders. What's the point, a growing number of experts are wondering, when so few who go to school finish a degree?

Just 54 percent of students entering four-year colleges in 1997 had a degree six years later, according to some of the latest government figures. After borrowing for school but failing to graduate, many of those students may be worse off than if they had never attended college at all.

Now the question of what to do about the country's unimpressive and stagnate graduation rates is on the agenda, from college presidents' offices to state houses.

The latest sign of the trend comes Wednesday, when former Princeton President William Bowen lays out an ambitious research agenda on the question during a speech in New York.

Normally, a scholar's decision to take on an academic topic is hardly news. Bowen, president of the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation, is the kind of researcher whose work is so influential that his very curiosity about a subject can raise its profile.

His data-driven studies on college athletes, affirmative action and college access for the poor have all sparked nationwide debate in recent years, and he attracted widespread attention last year with a speech at the University of Virginia that called for class-based affirmative action in college admissions.

Bowen's latest project will examine in detail who graduates and who doesn't at a group of about 20 varied universities. In an interview, he described the message he will deliver to a Goldman Sachs Foundation gathering on issues facing college trustees as his opening salvo on the topic.

"The United States has always said it believes in opportunity and social mobility and fairness," Bowen said. "If you find that the odds of getting through are very different for different groups of people, that's something you ought to be concerned about."

It's known that elite schools have generally higher graduation rates than non-elite schools. What's less clear is why the graduation rates at seemingly similar colleges vary so much. The main campuses of Penn State and the University of Minnesota have comparable price tags, student SAT scores, and percentage of students from poor backgrounds. Penn State graduates more than 80 percent of its students, and Minnesota barely half.

The federal figures report 57 percent of white students finish their degree, compared with 44 percent of Hispanics and 39 percent of blacks. A 2004 Education Trust report found a quarter of schools have gaps between whites and blacks of 20 points or more.

Traditionally, experts say, blame has fallen on high schools, or on the students themselves.

"You walk into a high school and 50 percent of the kids aren't graduating, people say 'What's the matter with this place? Get me the principal. Get me the school board. Let's put this place in receivership,'" said Patrick Callan, president of the National Center for Public Policy and Higher Education. "But people walk into (a college) and say 'What's the matter with these students? We gave them a chance to go to college.'"

While student responsibility is a factor, "an awful lot of institutions just assumed that getting them in the door was the most important thing," said Kati Haycock, director of The Education Trust.

Now, both Haycock and Callan say there are signs that is changing. Graduation rates are on the agenda of Education Secretary Margaret Spellings' new national commission on higher education. There is growing research on how colleges can get students more involved in campus life, which makes them more likely to stay enrolled. And Callan says some state legislatures, even in the face of pressure to increase capacity, are exploring budget incentives for schools to improve graduation rates, not just increase enrollment.

"But you have to do it carefully, because if you put all the incentives on completion then you just encourage colleges to cherry pick the population of students most likely to graduate, Callan said.

Bay State wine lovers may soon be able to shop online

By Steve LeBlanc
Associated Press

BOSTON — Massachusetts wine lovers would be able to have their favorite cabernet, chardonnay or merlot shipped directly to their home under a bill approved by House lawmakers on Monday.

The bill is designed to make it easier for small vineyards to sell their wines directly to consumers in Massachusetts, bypassing local retailers.

The legislation includes a section that allows restaurants to re-cork bottles of wine so diners can bring them home without violating the state's open container law.

Wine aficionados are welcoming the bill, saying it opens up a new world of possibilities by letting them purchase small wines over the Internet that they may not be able to find locally.

The reaction among wine shop owners is mixed. Some are worried it could cut into their sales while others say purchasing wine is a very personal experience that can't be replaced by the Internet.

John Pendergast Jr., whose family has owned the Cape Cod Package Store in Centerville since 1939, said he hopes retailers and small wineries can work together so shop owners aren't hurt.

"I feel that it's something that we can work out for the small wineries in the state and the retailers," Pendergast said.

Before a winery can start selling directly to consumers in Massachusetts, they would have to apply for a new license and pay an annual $100 fee.

The bill also includes safeguards to make sure only adults can purchase wine shipped directly to their homes.

The containers of wine must include a label requiring a signature. Before accepting the shipment, the buyer must not only sign, but produce a Massachusetts driver's license or valid identification.

Richard Pelletier, owner of Nashoba Winery in Bolton, said he had some concerns about an earlier version of the legislation that would have limited the bill to wineries that produce 30,000 gallons of wines. The final version boosted that to 50,000.

Pelletier was also concerned with some of the penalties in the bill, which he said were harsher than those faced by liquor stores.

Under the bill, a third violation of the law would result in a winery being barred from making any shipments of wine in Massachusetts for a year.

"If I sell to a minor, I shouldn't be subject to greater penalties (than retailers)," he said.

The bill targets out-of-state wine producers. Wineries in Massachusetts are already able to ship directly to consumers in Massachusetts.

The legislation is in large part a reaction to a 5-4 Supreme Court ruling earlier this year that opened the door to more direct wine shipments from vineyards to consumers.

The ruling struck down laws in New York and Michigan as discriminatory because they allow in-state wineries, but not out-of-state businesses, to ship directly to consumers. The ruling forced Massachusetts and 23 other states to revise their laws so all wineries are treated equally.

The bill includes an amendment that would allow restaurants to re-cork a bottle of wine and send it home with diners who can't finish the wine with their meal and don't want to leave it behind.

The restaurant would be required to seal the bottle in a bag to avoid violating the state's law barring the transportation of open containers of alcohol.

Lawmakers said the bill may discourage people from drinking more wine than they should before driving home.

"I think it makes eminent sense given our recent good work," said state Rep. George Peterson, R-Grafton, referring to passage of so-called "Melanie's Bill" which increased penalties for repeat drunken drivers.

A similar re-corking bill is scheduled to be debated by the Senate as soon as Tuesday. The Legislature's formal session for the year ends on Wednesday.

Bill would allow sale of syringes without prescription

By Steve LeBlanc
Associated Press

BOSTON — Intravenous drug users and others would be able to purchase syringes directly from a pharmacist without a prescription under a bill approved by House lawmakers on Monday.

Backers of the bill say it's an important step toward curbing the spread of AIDS, hepatitis C and other blood-borne diseases. Critics said the bill could encourage the use of illicit drugs by allowing anyone to buy needles.

Massachusetts is one of only a handful of states that still bar the sale of hypodermic needles without a prescription. The bill would also decriminalize the possession of a needle.

House lawmakers approved the bill by a 115-37 margin after an impassioned debate.

Rep. Peter Koutoujian, one the main backers, said the bill is an important public health measure. He said other states who have adopted similar measures haven't experienced an increase in drug use.

"This legislation will be effective in reducing the transmission of HIV and hepatitis C," said Koutoujian, D-Waltham. "We can no longer afford to put our communities at risk out of a misplaced fear for encouraging drug use."

One of the main ways that HIV, the virus that causes AIDS, is spread is through the reuse of dirty needles by drug users. In Massachusetts, Koutoujian said, 39 percent of those with AIDS contracted the disease by using a dirty needle or having sexual contact with someone who did.

But critics said the bill will give tacit approval to drug users already engaged in an illegal activity.

Philip Travis, D-Rehoboth, said selling syringes in pharmacies will help people over 18 "learn how to go out to be a drug user."

"I cannot believe that people in Massachusetts are listening to this garbage," Travis said. "It may save people's lives who want to use drugs and transfer needles, buy my God what does it say to the young people?"

Gov. Mitt Romney has also expressed opposition to the bill.

"The governor's concern is that if you allow addicts easy access to the tools of the trade you are facilitating illegal drug use," said Romney press secretary Julie Teer. She said Romney would review the bill if it reaches his desk before making a final decision about whether to veto it.

The bill passed the House by a veto-proof majority.

Rep. Eugene O'Flaherty, D-Chelsea, said he was skeptical of the bill at first, but finally decided to support it as a way to protect the health of the people in his district.

O'Flaherty represents Charlestown, which he said suffers the highest level of heroin overdoses in the city. He said many of those heroin users started out drinking or smoking marijuana before spiraling down into shooting or "booting" heroin.

"When they start booting it, guess what? We've lost them. We've lost them to hypodermic needles and that whole seedy underworld of heroin abuse," he said. "This is about us playing a small role in saving lives."

Only four Massachusetts cities now have needle exchange programs.

Supporters also said the bill will help reduce the number of needle stick injuries to police officers because possession of a needle will no longer be a crime and people won't have an incentive to lie about having a needle in their pocket before a search.

The bill now heads to the Senate.

GEO continue to pressure Romney to fund new contracts

GEO from page 1

munication with him so that we can make sure that they are not empty promises of support."

McDonough says that the Board of Trustees noticed the grass-roots support outside their window.

"We are already halfway through with this contract," McDonough said. "We're receiving 2003 wages and living in 2005 prices. And it really can't continue much longer without stronger action."

For many, the rally was a means of bringing awareness to the campus that these contracts have remained unfunded.

"To me [this rally] means that grad employees as workers are standing up for our rights," said Jed Murr, a graduate student in the English department and introduced Rat Romney at the beginning of the rally after the rally. "We bargained a fair contract with the University that they signed, and now the Romney administration is refusing to give us what we've earned. I mean that's what we're out here for."

The GEO plans to continue to apply pressure on Romney to fund their contracts. They have started "Romney-watch" where members plan to follow Romney throughout the state holding the "Fund UMass" signs.

"A big part of this [rally] is raising the visibility," Curtis said afterwards. "I think a lot of grad students think this is done, and settled, and off, and we would all like to feel that way about this. So I think a big part of this is just we're not done, the battle continues, we need to try and

Rumsfeld quotes Clinton officals in justifying Iraqi invasion

By Robert Burns
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld on Tuesday joined the Bush administration's attack on Iraq war critics, quoting Clinton administration officials who contended in the late 1990s that former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein was a security threat to the United States and its allies.

At a Pentagon news conference, Rumsfeld noted that Congress in 1998 passed the Iraq Liberation Act, making it U.S. government policy to support efforts to remove the Saddam regime from power. He noted that President Bill Clinton ordered four days of bombing in December 1998.

President Bush on Monday hurled back at Democratic critics the worries they once expressed that Saddam was a grave threat.

"They spoke the truth then and they're speaking politics now," Bush charged.

Rumsfeld continued Bush's assault on war critics, citing the words of Clinton, former Vice President Al Gore, former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and Sandy Berger, Clinton's national security adviser.

Rumsfeld quoted Berger as having said of Saddam in 1998, "He will rebuild his arsenal of weapons of mass destruction, and some day, some way, I am certain he will use that arsenal again, as he has 10 times since 1983."

Democrats have accused Bush of manipulating and withholding some prewar intelligence and misleading Americans about the rationale for war.

Shortly before Rumsfeld spoke, the Republican-controlled Senate defeated, on a 58-40 vote, a Democratic effort to pressure Bush to outline a timetable for a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq. It then overwhelmingly endorsed a weaker, non-binding statement calling on the administration to explain its Iraq policy and declaring that 2006 "should be a period of significant transition to full Iraqi sovereignty."

Iraq and a host of other problems, from the bungled response to Hurricane Katrina to the indictment of a senior White House official in the CIA leak investigation, have taken a heavy toll on Bush.

Nearing the end of his fifth year in office, Bush has the lowest approval rating of his presidency. In AP-Ipsos polling, a majority of Americans say Bush is not honest and they disapprove of his handling of foreign policy and the war on terrorism.

Referring to the current situation, Rumsfeld said, "We are in the midst of a war that threatens free people across the world," as evidenced by terrorist attacks in the United States, London, Madrid and other cities. He said the world must face up to the "dark vision" of a network of "Islamo-fascists" and extremists.

"They seek to build in Iraq what they once had in Afghanistan — a safe haven," he said. "And then to expand throughout the region and beyond."

While noting that many Americans want to know when U.S. troops will leave Iraq, Rumsfeld said it would be a grave mistake to leave prematurely.

"We must be careful not to give terrorists the false hope that if they can simply hold on long enough, they can outlast us," Rumsfeld said.

There are about 160,000 U.S. troops in Iraq.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, cited the actions of former President Bill Clinton, noting that Clinton passed the Iraq Libertation Act in 1998, allowing the U.S. armed forces to remove the Saddam regime from power.

House begins debate on Death Penalty Bill

By Steve LeBlanc
Associated Press

BOSTON — The Massachusetts House was debating Gov. Mitt Romney's death penalty bill on Tuesday, taking up a contentious issue that has steadily lost momentum on Beacon Hill since losing by a single vote in 1997.

Romney filed his legislation in April, seeking capital punishment for "very, very rare circumstances," such as terrorism, serial killing or murdering police or other public servants.

Romney said his plan would have the nation's highest standard of proof for ensuring that only the guilty were executed, using scientific evidence such as DNA and multiple checks and balances, including review by the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court.

He said it will include other safeguards to protect the innocent, such as a requirement that physical evidence must directly link the defendant to the crime scene. Only one or two people a year would face the penalty in the state under the bill, Romney estimated.

But critics say there's no way to craft a foolproof death penalty bill and that innocent people could still be put to death.

Rep. Eugene O'Flaherty, D-Chelsea, said as long as scientific evidence must be gathered and interpreted by people, and people sometimes make mistakes, that scientific evidence can sometimes be flawed or misinterpreted.

"No system that relies on scientific evidence can truly be developed that flawlessly and with no doubt separates the guilty from the innocent," he said during the debate.

Death penalty supporters said Romney's legislation was as foolproof a bill as possible, relying heavily on recent scientific advances in DNA research.

They said the death penalty would not only deter people from committing murders, but is also fair justice for someone who kills another. Without the death penalty, the life of the murderer is given greater value than the life of their victim, supporters said

"Without capital punishment we have devalued an individual's life. Someone's got to tell me what a life is worth when that life is snuffed out," said state Rep. George Peterson, R-Grafton. "What is that life worth when someone takes it? I believe it is worth that person's life."

But opponents said the death penalty is unfairly applied to the poor or racial minorities, is too expensive and runs counter to the trend in the world where increasing numbers of countries have abolished capital punishment.

Opponents also said the notion that the death penalty is a deterrent is flawed, given that those convicted of first degree murder in Massachusetts already face life in prison without parole.

"Show me a murderer who decides to kill because he thinks 'I'm only going to get life in prison,'" said Garrett J. Bradley, D-Hingham.

Romney defended the bill, calling it the most fail-safe in the country.

"The bill that we put together is exactly as advertised: One that takes out the risk of executing someone who is innocent and it does put in place the ultimate penalty for those who carry out the most horrible crimes in society," Romney said.

He said he has taken heat from conservatives who feel the bill is too restrictive. Romney also conceded he hasn't give the bill the same level of attention and lobbying muscle as other issues.

Death penalty bills have faced increasing opposition from state lawmakers in recent years.

Support for capital punishment peaked in 1997 following the gruesome abduction and murder of 10-year-old Jeffery Curley of Cambridge.

The House, after a wrenching debate, initially approved the death penalty by one vote. On a final, procedural tally, a single House lawmaker, Democrat John Slattery of Peabody, changed his mind, killing the measure.

Since then, the margin of opposition has steadily grown in the House, which defeated another death penalty bill two years later by 80-73 margin.

In 1982, 54 percent of Massachusetts voters approved a death penalty ballot question, which was later ruled unconstitutional by the state Supreme Judicial Court.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Michael A. Busack
Managing Editor Cameron J. Woods
Business Manager Hitesh Shah
Production Manager Nicholas Belanger
Night Supervisor Sheryl Wolnik
Advertising Manager Kerry O'Grady
Advertising Production Lauren Egerian
Editorial Production Amanda Allen
Arts & Living Editor Matthew O'Rourke
Comics Editor Amanda Allen
Editorial Editor Allison Edles
News Editor Dan O'Brien
Photo Editor Kate Sachsenmaier
Sports Editor Jeff Howe
Circulation Manager Thomas Hecht
Distribution Manager Nick Gleason
Finance Manager Daniel Conti
Human Resource Phil Smoller
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Caren Tortorici
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Asst. Arts & Living Mackenzie Isler
Asst. Arts & Living Ian Jones
Assistant News Megan Daley
Assistant News Matt Bellavance
Assistant Photo Elizabeth Caristi
Assistant Sports Eric Athas
Assistant Sports Dan Duggan
Assistant Editorial Kristen LaCasse

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Bi-Weekly Collegian in 1956. Published daily since 1967, the Collegian has been broadcasted voice-and-ears since 1996. For advertising rates and information, call weekdays between 8:30 a.m. and 3:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Michael A. Busack
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Kate Sachsenmaier
COPY EDITOR
Dan O'Brien
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Amanda Allen
PRODUCTION STAFF
Matthew Fox, Allie Mamone

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 2005

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

HEA Drug Provision in place for a reason

The Higher Education Act Drug Provision has been stirring up a fair amount of opposition. The Student Government Association of the University of Massachusetts, along with 120 other SGAs hope to pass a resolution against the act. This act currently works to refuse or deny students financial aid who have a drug conviction. While the opposition mounting against the provision is understandable, the provision should continue to stand and help serve as a lesson to students convicted on drug charges.

There are many ways students can earn financial aid. Grants, scholarships and loans are among the categories that help students fund their higher education. Some are earned by academic merit and some are earned by financial need. At a state school such as UMass Amherst, funding for education is hard to come by and higher standards need to be met in order to be awarded federal financial aid. It is no great tragedy that these standards include not having a drug conviction on your record.

Short and sweet, the federal government is not funding a student's college education so they can get high. If that is how they choose to spend their money and their time in college, they certainly do not need to be wasting the government's money in the process; money, mind you, that could have gone to students who take their education and time here more seriously. Besides, if you're getting arrested on drug charges you probably don't need to be getting federal financial aid anyway.

Please also realize that eliminating federal financial aid for students with drug convictions will not eliminate a student's ability to attend a college or university. On any college or job application, a question appears which asks the applicant if they have ever been convicted of a crime. If a prospective student is less likely to gain admission to a college or university because they have convicted a crime, why shouldn't the same standard be upheld for the potential grant and loan money? Employers have the right to ask the question and hire or not hire an applicant based on the entire application, including their response to that question. The same should be in the process to get federal financial aid.

Also, this act does not eliminate the ability for students to get financial aid from other places, such as the colleges and universities themselves or private scholarship and grant organizations. Additionally, students are fully capable of applying for a student loan and going through the same process many students go through already. Their conviction is something that will stay with them everywhere they go and should not only be overlooked when it comes to eligibility for federal money. That money should be awarded to students who will actually use the money to fund their education.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

Co-existence between civilizations

Asif Khan

I took World Politics freshman year, like a lot of you probably also did, or are taking it now. In that class one of the articles I read was Samuel Huntington's "Clash of Civilizations." This is now also assigned in a seminar I am taking about the Middle East. That was a couple of months after Sept 11 and reading something that divided up the "Western" and "Islamic" world so explicitly was the last thing I expected to read. The lecturer talked about the reading in class and played upon a lot of stereotypes of Muslims and Arabs, upon which I called him out on and criticized what he was doing, as it would only lead to more conflict and lesser understanding of a very important region of the world that is often ignored from western study.

Before semi-joking to a class of freshmen that all Arab men smoke the hookah (water pipe) and suppress their women, one should teach them about where Arab countries are on the map, because the majority of them do not know the difference between Lebanon and Iran. Huntington plays on the "us vs. them" concept to an extreme and fails to take into account it is ridiculous to put the world's one billion Muslims into one category, the "Islamic world." That is like saying the "Christian world" acts as a bloc. He makes no distinction between the millions of people who are Muslims but belong to very different sects, classes, ethnicities, states and profess very different political beliefs. Bosnians, Turks and Indonesians are not all the same people just because they believe in one God and Prophet Mohammed to be his last messenger.

Huntington also wants the United States to "forge alliances with similar cultures and spread its values wherever possible." That is a very flawed and dangerous statement and the advice he gives is exactly what the United States gets criticized for doing throughout the world. And what cultures is he talking about? Which cultures are similar to the United States? Just Western Europe? But all Americans are not white and their ascendants didn't all emigrate from Germany and the United Kingdom. What about China, India, Lebanon and Mexico? A lot of Americans are born to parents or grandparents who came from these places. Are those cultures similar to America as well? Does Huntington want the United States to "forge alliances" with them as well? I don't think so.

It is propaganda such as this that has created some of the world's biggest disasters. Similar talk of difference, superiority, intolerance and "conflicting civilizations" jargon was used in Nazi Germany, India and Central Africa during their great disasters and continues to be used in many parts of the world by people inciting difference and creating violent situations where people are set off against their own neighbors solely on the basis of skin color or religious belief.

> Before semi-joking to a class of freshmen that all Arab men smoke the hookah (water pipe) and suppress their women, one should teach them about where Arab countries are on the map, because the majority of them do not know the difference between Lebanon and Iran.

In terms of the United States spreading its values everywhere, that is also a very problematic precedent because in the end it does not benefit either the United States or the people who are going to incorporate these values into their culture. Firstly, by doing this there is an inherent belief that one's values and morals are superior and the other's groups are lower and not as good. The same rhetoric was used by colonialists as they brought "culture and civilization" all the way from Australia to Alaska

Opening Starbucks and McDonalds in different parts of the world and trying to control foreign economies and "Westernizing" or "Americanizing" them only creates larger class differences and barriers. This consequently leads to greater resentment among people who do not gain from these supposed advancements. This class rift is responsible for many problems, like terrorism and civil strife in many countries of the world which have experimented with letting the United States and other firms come in and exploit their nations. The recent hotel attacks in Jordan are a testimony to this phenomenon. It is no surprise when attacks happen in Egypt, Indonesia or Saudi Arabia they are always on symbols of western capitalism and trade: hotels, restaurants, night clubs, military bases etc.

So instead of articles and books that create rifts and tell people they cannot get along solely because they live on this side of the world and not that one, college students (and others) should be reading and taking notice of the similarities and co-existence world cultures have. Who knew when the Christian Reconquista began in Spain against its Arab rulers, Spanish Jews fled to the Muslim Ottoman Empire in present day Turkey, where their descendants live to this day? Or that alchemy, algebra, average, coffee, cotton, earth, magazine and sugar are all words that originate from Arabic while father, daughter and mother are from Persian? So next time you get assigned something that will create more difference, it is necessary to speak out and question it like I did. That is what we are in college for, not to just sit and absorb whatever is assigned to us.

Asif Khan is a Collegian columnist.

Mirror mirror on the wall

Colin Jones

I'll still remember my first crush. I met her at the playground. We had an arm wrestling match. She won (but hey, I wasn't trying). One day when I was in the car with my father, I asked him if he thought she would like me. He said, "What's not to like? You're smart, you're nice and there's no question you're a good looking kid." I was dumbfounded. I looked at my reflection in the rearview mirror and blurted out "I am?"

I never told her. She ended up being one of the popular girls. I was one of the dorks; socially inept and introverted, everybody's favorite scapegoat. Near the beginning of high school, I developed an acne problem, which didn't help matters much. Some tragic difficulties presented themselves during those complex years, and for a long time, making friends, let alone getting a girlfriend, were the last things on my mind.

My dad is a really cool guy, and when he rented the movie "Boogie Nights," he let me watch it with him. I saw a number of parallels between myself and Mark Wahlberg's character. I saw the way everyone responded to him, which was undoubtedly related to his appearance. So I started working out, eating right and learning about the science that makes our bodies such amazing machines.

My body responded quickly, to a much greater extent than I would have thought possible. My face cleared up. By the time I finished high school, I didn't recognize myself anymore. People still don't believe my license photo is me. I came here in September of 2001 and everything changed.

When I first got here, I was such a dumb kid. I was, and still am, a genuine and understanding person. But in my innocence and naïveté, resulting largely from my lack of social experience, I foolishly believed most other people were too. But I'm a fast learner, and I put things together quickly. For me, the world has not always been a safe place, and it has always been strange and confusing. I started noticing things. Like if I asked someone for a cigarette, it was not uncommon for them to give me two or three. When I would get a haircut, the girl working would start to act nervous, talk a mile a minute and mention the fact she had a boyfriend.

Vanity is definitely my favorite sin. I'm a recovering mirror junkie. Even now, when I'm dressed to kill or have just finished a workout, it's a struggle not to scan the area for the nearest reflective surface. But when you're looking at the bands of fibers pulled taut under the skin of your chest, the sinews throughout your abdomen contracting as you breathe, you're not thinking about how awesome you are. You're thinking, is that really me? You're thinking, how did I get here? You're thinking, this is better than real life.

> Vanity is definitely my favorite sin. I'm a recovering mirror junkie. Even now, when I'm dressed to kill or have just finished a workout, it's a struggle not to scan the area for the nearest reflective surface.

And then there's the distance. Women question your motives. Guys think you're a jerk; projections and assumptions, which I'm not above making myself. As of now, there has only been one woman I have ever truly loved, and always will. I'll never forget the first moment I saw her. She was getting on an elevator. As the doors closed, our eyes met and I thought she was beautiful. But I also thought she was probably a stuck up bitch. I've never been so wrong in my life. She turned out to be one of the kindest and most compassionate people I have ever known.

Lastly, there's the staring, and the rudeness. I've found if a woman approaches me, or likes me, initially they'll be overly nice. But if I don't respond in the way they would like, they often become exceedingly cold and rude. Over time, as I've learned more about women, I've found how to deal with them and felt progressively more confident in our interactions. But sometimes, it's a little much.

I was recently talking with a buddy of mine who shares similar difficulties, and we agreed that occasionally the intense attention and pronounced responses we receive from women can be overbearing. Sometimes, staring from a woman can make either of us uncomfortable. But we both agreed it's not nearly as bad as when a guy does it. When I think about what it must be like to be a woman, dealing with that constantly, I feel awful. At the very least, I know I am more than capable of defending myself if necessary, while most women are not, making their world a very dangerous place.

So I'd like to broach a sensitive subject. A while back, I ran into a girl I dated briefly and her new boyfriend. It was easy to see why she liked him. She had a certain type, and with our blue eyes, golden hair and jagged cheekbones, we could have been brothers. Of course, I was initially a little resentful, but he was a cool dude. We were swapping fight stories at the DC when a guy sat down at a table next to us and began staring at us in a way that still makes me cringe. My friend told me this guy was in a few of his classes and did that to him constantly. Since that time, I've had such individuals do things like pulling the plug on the treadmill while I was running at the gym or not letting me off the bus when I pulled for a stop as the only passenger.

I can't imagine what it must be like to play for the other team, and I'm sure it's hard. But respect is reciprocal; if you guys want it you have to give it out. My suggestion is if you see someone you might be interested in, hit on them in an obvious but respectful way. If they respond in any way that is not overtly positive, give up and treat them like anyone else. In a few rare instances, I've been hit on by a guy and felt flattered. I'm comfortable with my sexuality and its not as though I have difficulties getting female attention, so having someone let me know they found me attractive was a compliment and I took it as such. But it's almost never handled like that, which is why so many people have negative attitudes.

We're all people. None of us is a shell, though some of us are emptier than others, and we may relate to what we see on the outside at first. But it's inner beauty, warmth, kindness and compassion that are infinitely more valuable and rare.

Colin Jones is a Collegian columnist.

Ugly North Americans

Wesley Miller

"Who the hell is Polk?" I asked myself as I stared back blankly at his drunken face. It was my first time in a Mexican nightclub and I seemed to have caught the attention of a rather drunken gentleman. Apparently, it wasn't so much that he hated Gringos as much as he hated a man named James Polk. "I want my country back man. (Expletive) Polk." It was then that it dawned on me what he was talking about: James K. Polk, former president of the United States during the Mexican-American War. It was apparent this chap needed a history lesson, but more to the point I remember this vividly as the first time I was approached verbally for being an American or, more accurately, a North American.

I tend not to think of myself as a very patriotic person. I probably have more in common with the average Mexican than I do with my brethren under the Mason Dixon line. When asked about my heritage, I tend to reach back to my families post World War II immigration and when asked where I'm from, I tend to say Boston instead of the United States. Unfortunately, in Mexico, nobody cares that I'm a quarter Polish or that I consider the letter "R" the literal incarnation of Satan. I'm a Gringo and I have to deal with that. For the first time in my life I have to consider myself alongside the same people who spawned George W. Bush, American Idol and The Sims. That's a scary thought.

> Unfortunately, in Mexico, nobody cares that I'm a quarter Polish or that I consider the letter "R" the literal incarnation of Satan. I'm a Gringo and I have to deal with that.

Being called a Gringo isn't flattering. We're taught growing up not to give each other labels. Underneath that surface however, difference reigns supreme. Any academic will tell you the single most defining social issue in the United States right now is the problem of race. Just because we don't label each other doesn't mean we don't tend to emphasize our differences. In my case, I've never really had to think too profoundly on the subject of difference having grown up in a largely white community and attending a university where diversity of thought is about as abstract as the art that adorns the walls of the student art gallery in the FAC.

Now, for the fist time in my life, I was being identified as an "other" in everyday situations. At first, I reacted with paranoia hearing people whispering "Gringo" behind me, and looking up from a book on the bus to find an old woman staring me down. For a long time, this made me feel powerless, like I was being marginalized for something I couldn't help. It also didn't help that the majority of the international students here at the school are French and consider Americans to have intellects similar to those of children. In fact, one of the first stereotypically American sentiments I had here was strong dislike of the French and was one of my first impulses to consider my identity as an American. That was the key.

Wesley Miller

Up until that point I had never held any negative feelings toward any particular group of people (apart from maybe the Republican party) and I wasn't about to start then. I made it a point from then on not to identify the differences between others and myself. It had a strange way of making things work; my paranoia disappeared, I got to know more people and I started to reconsider my own identity as a citizen of the United States in a different light. Ultimately I concluded my identity is not something I, or anybody, should be ashamed about.

I feel bad about being an American the same way I feel bad about being white and privileged. But sooner or later I have to realize it isn't my fault. I never chose to go to war in Iraq and I didn't elect George W. Bush. I wasn't alive during the illegal U.S. invasion of Grenada, nor could I have prevented the atrocities in Nicaragua, U.S. backed Latin-American dictators, etc. I didn't hold down the Alamo. I just happen to live in the country that did these things.

Later, I found out that "Gringo" simply means a person born inside the United States It's not the "G" word. The term American, when used by Latin Americans, is used to identify anybody from the Southern tip of Chile to the Northern territories of Canada. This is why the term "Gringo" is used. It's not meant to marginalize me as a fat stupid American. They just can't very well use North American, because there are two countries in North America, ey?

Wesley Miller is a Collegian columnist. He is currently on exchange in Mexico.

Nothing but noise

Duncan Devlin

It is a well-known fact that rock music is the most evil creation on the face of the planet. Even worse than rock music is the young rock guitarist. Whether he or she has long hair or short, is black or white or prefers electric or acoustic music, this type of person demonstrates one immutable quality: social deviation. Uncontrolled, this individual may even break away from the social norm and establish a unique path in life. In response to this dilemma, UMass tries its best, through various housing rules, attitudes of administrators and even influence on the academic curriculum, to crush, or "protect," these social deviants as quickly as possible.

First, there is the total lack of music education available for the young rocker. While some music theory classes do exist, most of these focus on Jazz and Classical theory, leaving rock to rot. Some classes show a hint of usefulness for rock, but most of the materials these classes cover demonstrate little more than could be learned from a $15 blues book down at Amherst Music House. Jack Black's "School of Rock" shows more appreciation for this area than any course in Music Appreciation.

> Guitarists are often told, "people may not share your love of Rock and Roll." Perhaps we don't share their love of peace and quiet, and I would even go so far as to say such statements should be classified as "oppressive."

Furthermore, there is no major in guitar. While nearly every instrument a symphony could possibly muster has dozens of courses dedicated to it, combining academics and practice into one time zone, the guitar becomes a drain on all other academic activities, forcing students to choose between their academics and their passions. It is clear that UMass' policy of, "You could be the next [insert famous name here]" does not include Joe Perry or Jimmy Page.

To make matters worse, housing policies are blatantly designed to prevent the spread of music as a hobby, recreation or career. Many RAs exercise a "closed door" policy to anyone playing an instrument. Rather than allow us to play and attract an audience, we are forced to choose between a productive hobby and a social life. Pesky residents, RAs and "community leaders" are rarely any help in this area. Rather than allow a community to flourish under "the needs of the many outweigh the needs of the few," one resident who cannot wear headphones while studying becomes cause to stop a whole arena's worth of musical inspiration.

The standard response to any statement asking for time to play is to "go to the Fine Arts Center." Most of the people who say this have never been there themselves, and take no heed of the fact the building is 20 minutes away from any housing area. This is quite a walk with an electric guitar and an amplifier. In addition, many guitarists have expressed a certain apprehension to going into the building, as it is generally reserved for those who are "officially" musicians. If we want to indulge in this art form, we cannot do it in our own homes.

Following this standard "go to the FAC" disclaimer, "quiet" residents usually make a statement about peace, quiet and relaxation reminiscent of stereotypical old folk complaining about young people having fun. How about our relaxation? Playing 10 minutes of "Stairway to Heaven" on an acoustic guitar can lead to a well-rested, highly productive evening. Having this interrupted two minutes from completion is a punishment more befitting of someone charged with "disturbing the peace" than playing some acoustic music. It simultaneously removes all sense of freedom from the musician, and denies the guitarist the one solace he or she would find in such times of need.

For any RA, standard response to loud music begins with a slam on the door hard enough to make sure it is heard over the guitar. They will then politely ask the resident to turn it down, as if an acoustic guitar has a volume knob. Just to clarify, "polite" in this case is in a condescending tone, but is combined with the word "please." Many housing areas do not even have a well-defined sound policy, merely demanding an end to "loud" music. To many, rock is just noise pollution, and my RA actually said that world's most sacred song, "Stairway to Heaven," was to her ears, "nothing but noise." Guitarists are often told, "people may not share your love of Rock and Roll." Perhaps we don't share their love of peace and quiet, and I would even go so far as to say such statements should be classified as "oppressive."

Maybe all this is just a way to protect musicians from themselves. We all know that rock musicians never make it. The Beatles was just four lucky guys, and Aerosmith just happened to have known the right people. If you are a musician, just give up now, before that next write-up, and forget Jack Black's advice to "stick it to the man." Finally, if you are the neighbor of a musician, make your silence heard.

Duncan Devlin is a Collegian columnist.

Still crazy after all these years

Gilowen Jenkins

On Wednesday President Bush awarded the Medal of Freedom to famed boxer Muhammad Ali. As Bush was fastening the medal around Ali's neck, he whispered something in Muhammad's ear and then "put up his dukes" jokingly challenging Ali.

To the surprise of many there Ali, who suffers form Parkinson's disease, responded only by making the crazy twirl a few times around his head and then again as he was escorted to his seat. Nervous laughter filled the room for it was quite a surreal moment. And Bush for all expressive purposes seemed obviously shaken by the encounter.

Can anything to be learned from this bizarre exchange? Muhammad Ali is probably one of most recognizable and respected Muslim-Americans. He was a notorious opponent of the Vietnam War, and an outspoken political commentator during his heyday. Was he sticking one to Bush in the only way his depleted mind and body would allow him? Ali's spokesmen and the White House would have you believe otherwise, but I'm not so sure.

I think the "Greatest of All Time" was on to something. Bush really is insane. For that matter you can't mention Bush without mentioning the other insane clowns in his administration and party: Cheney, Rumsfeld, Delay, Frist and Rove etc. I wonder what Ali would have done if those guys had been at the ceremony. Would he have mustered the old "rope a dope" one more time? Wishful thinking I suppose.

But in all seriousness, what other explanation can there be for such miserable arrogance and ineptitude in this administration? If we needed any better indication as to just how crazy Bush and his cronies are, then we don't need to look any farther than his response to the reports that we torture detainees and potential legislation banning the outright use of torture.

"We do not torture," said Bush on Monday. Really, are you sure? Does he mean we haven't tortured in the past or we won't in the future? Because clearly the evidence that came out of Abu Graib, Guantanomo Bay and Bagram Air Base in Afghanistan points to the fact we have. Why lie about something that has contrary evidence in such plain sight? It's kind of like Scooter Libby seemingly and knowingly perjuring himself to protect his boss. In both cases there is an established public record and a law, a law that seems to have been thwarted. What about the latter question? Will we torture in the future? Sadly it seems the policy of the administration that we will continue to do so. Look no farther than The Washington Post report last week that the CIA is running "black sites" or torture camps all over the world.

> ... Dick Cheney has a 19 percent approval rating. According to pollingreport.com, that's 2 percent less popular than cheating on your wife, and 7 percent less popular than teachers beating kids in school.

Consider for a moment Senator McCain's amendment to the defense spending bill which requires Americans holding prisoners overseas to follow the same standards of humane treatment required at home by the U.S. Constitution. The amendment draws out in the clearest terms that any prisoner regardless of their "nationality or physical location, may not be brutalized or tortured." The amendment passed the Senate in an overwhelming 90-9 vote and is being sent to the House.

But all indications seem to point to its overturning or an inclusion of an exemption for CIA sanctioned torture. How is this happening? Why and who is honestly prepared to continue to allow and promote torture? No surprise here to find, its Dick Cheney, who has been spearheading the lobbying efforts in Congress to continue to allow torture.

Though the amendment to ban torture seems destined to fail, Bush and Cheney will ultimately pay another large political price. With Bush's rating at 35 percent and Cheney's approval rating at 19 percent, it's hard to imagine them dropping any further, but don't put it past them. It's not just torture that's pulling the president down. It's the whole façade that's cracking; it's his careless spending, corporate handouts, White House and party corruption and his sheepish, misleading responses and platitudes.

Inevitably, whenever a president falls this hard, we begin to hear rumbling about impeachment. With a Republican-controlled Congress until at least 2006, it seems unlikely he'll be impeached soon. But as a recent Zogby poll revealed, if Bush lied about the war, likely voters would favor impeachment 51 to 46 percent. And though it might be premature to say this, how are these numbers going to get any better for president?

As said above Dick Cheney has a 19 percent approval rating. According to pollingreport.com, that's two percent less popular than cheating on your wife, and seven percent less popular than teachers beating kids in school.

Bush at a dismal 35 percent approval rating is only 2 percent more popular than the idea a woman should submit "herself graciously to her husband," and 7 percent more popular than the idea government should have the right to control the news. As Bob Harris puts it, that's what you call "lunatic" territory.

And that's all this was ever about; Bush and his team have always been a crazy right-wing radical group who managed to pull the cloth over the eyes of the American people and media for four and a half years through clever PR and repetition. But that time is over. They are finally paying the price for their morally and ethically corrupt governance. Muhammad you were right, still crazy they are after all these years.

Gilowen Jenkins is a Collegian columnist.

A future of regret

Brandon Kristof

Have you ever reflected on a choice or action you made and been overwhelmed with a terrible sense of guilt and regret? A ball of tension cramps your stomach, a long sigh is exhaled and a cold sweat coats your forehead. Maybe it was getting in a fight, maybe it was not helping someone in obvious need of help, perhaps you snapped on a boss or customer at work, maybe you got behind the wheel when you couldn't even remember leaving the party. We have all had (most of us?) one or two incidents like these. They occur with no forethought. Your caught up in the moment, and when they pass you wonder what you were thinking.

Within a few years, our country is going to be overwhelmed with this sense of confusion and regret, only much more painfully. What got me worrying about this in the first place was a CIA leak concerning secret prisons in Eastern Europe, and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist's response toward the leak. He explained he was more concerned there was a CIA leak than what was happening in these secret prisons. I understand this is a terrible leak. The consequences could harm this country, and it possibly could disrupt the war on terrorism and the ongoing conflict in Iraq. I want nothing more than to see Osama six feet under, Al Qaeda rendered useless and U.S. soldiers back on U.S. soil. But such a brash and bold statement at a time when our country is involved in a precarious conflict, half the world seems to hate us and we're letting hurricanes clean up poverty, reflects the carelessness of our politicians and their twisted priorities.

> ... Such a brash and bold statement at a time when our country is involved in a precarious conflict, half the world seems to hate us and we're letting hurricanes clean up poverty, reflects the carelessness of our politicians and their twisted priorities.

After hearing about this leak, I wondered what our country is doing. Secret prisons throughout the world, prisoner abuse scandals, battles in Iraq, battles in Afghanistan, Osama still in the caves, over 2,000 dead U.S. soldiers; this is a mess. It would not be surprising to find out hundreds or thousands of detainees have been tortured in attempts to obtain information. Interrogators must act quickly if the information is to be useful, and detainees are not likely to divulge information without a struggle.

Empty verbal threats rarely make any criminal speak, especially when they are fundamentalists strapping bombs to their chest. So what is going on in these secret prisons? We have seen what was going on at Abu Ghraib and that prison was no secret. I wonder if the soldiers made the detainees in the secret prisons pose for pictures? Were there devices used specifically for torture?

Should we zap a few prisoners? Inflict unimaginable pain to get the name of an arms dealer, lock up and humiliate countless suspects, because all they are is suspect? Would you feel less secure if you were absolutely positive our country did not employ torture tactics in order to obtain information? Would we be living at an orange or even red threat level everyday? I don't really care at this point anymore. I'd be willing to sacrifice some of this false security so I could at least have hope our country isn't turning into a global superpower, torturing citizens whenever it sees fit and delivering democracy to the nations who thirst for it so badly in the deserts of the Middle East.

This war is obviously a terrible event. Every side loses; body counts increase with each day, civilians are displaced and maimed and it seems to be generating a feeling of instability throughout the world. Even though we won the official war in Iraq by capturing Saddam, it is now considered a breeding ground for terrorists, troops die every day and images of hooded prisoners being humiliated and tortured will taint the reputation of our country forever. Oil prices are absurd, more troops are needed and no end is in sight. The war we view on our TV or computer screens are a watered down sample of the ruckus in Iraq. With the amount of soldiers involved, as well as the soldiers in Afghanistan, the violence that has taken place in the region over the past four years will reshape the world. Will we still come out on top?

In 10 years, or 20 years or 30 years, our country is going to wake up with a hell of a hangover and start piecing the events of this period together. We're going to dry heave, break out in a cold sweat, our collective brain will throb and then maybe we will rethink our priorities. The fury of war and the fear of terrorism have led us on a reckless binge, one which we will never fully recover from. We cannot let the chaotic nature of war become an excuse for committing atrocities. But is there anything we can really do?

Will 1,000 protests, in Amherst common or on George W.'s front lawn, ever be noticed, and if they are will they be taken seriously? Will the next president bring our soldiers back or will this be a repeat of Vietnam, each president being too much of a coward to break away from his predecessor's policy? When we finally start finding out what has been happening in all the secret prisons, during all the covert operations, on the front lines and in the oval office, it will be a dark day for America. I guess knowing it was done in order to spread democracy and end terrorism will soften the blow, unless, of course, those goals are never achieved.

Brandon Kristof is an Amherst resident.

Questions in a Paris fire

Bret Devereaux

The fact that France is burning to one degree or another seems to have never struck most major news sources in the United States as front page news, and now they are displaying an almost ADHD-like attention span, having already moved on from events that may well end up rocking a continent. However, as Americans, riots in France don't concern us much, right? Much of Europe felt unconcerned by similar riots in France in the not-too-distant past, only to find those riots arrive on their doorstep in 1848. We must take note of these riots, and the critical question we need to be asking is "Why?" Why is there rioting in the Paris "suburbs?"

The elephant in the room in regards to this question has been and continues to be Islam. What role has Islam played in these riots, their genesis and the current path they're heading in? Outlets like the New York Times and the Washington Post barely mention Islam at all, despite reports of rioters tossing Molotov Cocktails while shouting "Allah Akbar." That said, the riots don't seem to have any generalized agenda and claims of a French intifada seem premature. Christians can riot without it immediately becoming a "Christian thing," and while the considerable Muslim contingent in the riots should be a factor to watch, there is no evidence as of yet Islam, much less the radical Wahhabist Islam of al-Qaeda is at work.

> ... Such there has grown a culture in France's so-called suburbs that is deeply alienated from France itself, having never wanted to, nor ever having been given the chance to become truly "French."

More important it seems to the genesis of riots is a sense of cultural displacement. The communities in France that have been rioting are largely immigrant populations that never really assimilated. Having a strong cultural identity, they did not want to become French, and the French seemed quite content to leave that as the state of being. What that says about French attitudes towards other people is a topic for another day, but this does make a point to the United States: large populations of unassimilated people are not desirable.

That's not to say we should enforce homogeneity, but rather when one comes to the United States, one accepts a certain set of cultural and societal norms. This did not happen in France, and as such there has grown a culture in France's so-called suburbs that is deeply alienated from France itself, having never wanted to, nor ever having been given the chance to become truly "French."

Tying into this issue are economics. These so-called suburbs resemble more "the projects" than any concept of suburb we have in the United States. That is, they are state-subsidized high-density housing. Their housing blocks appear to be specifically designed so each suburb area can be closed off with a minimum of effort (a "let them foul their own nests" strategy with has allowed the riots to fester, spread and grow).

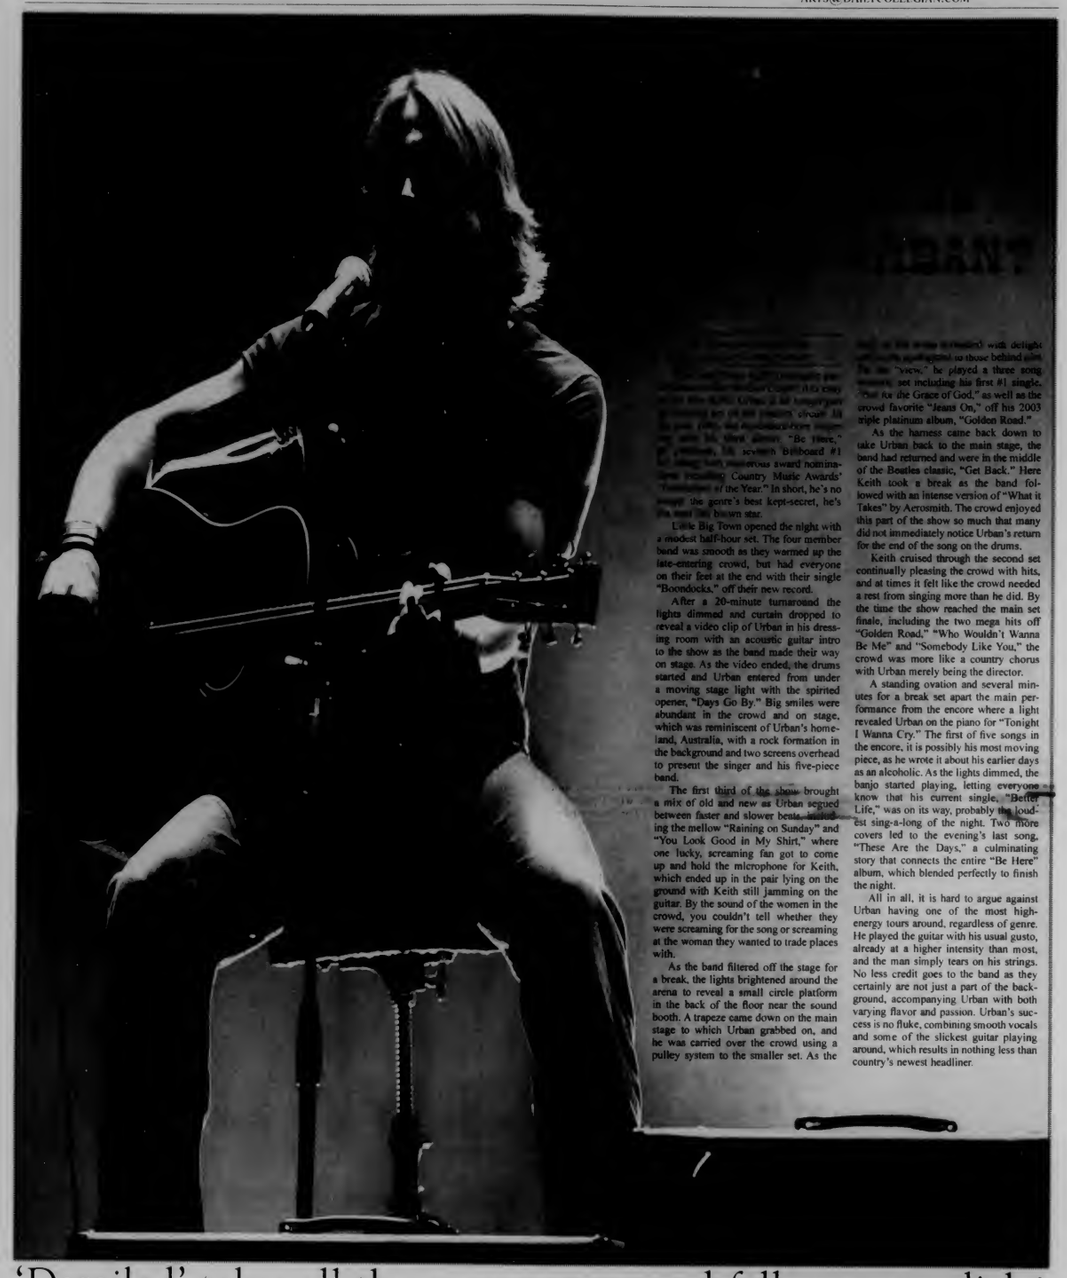
Added to (and exacerbated by) the poverty in these areas is the high crime rate. Before the riots, French policy effectively ignored such areas of Paris, considering them unable to be patrolled. It seems to this writer there was a level of racism involved in the choice not to enforce laws in those regions of France, that is that some in the French justice and law enforcement system may not have cared how much violence there was in an immigrant community, as long as no ethnic French were hurt. Regardless of the reasons, these "suburbs" have very high crime rates and powerful gangs and drug culture. Those last two are of note, as the gangs seem to be involved heavily in the riots as another excuse to just go out and break something, have a good time and fight with the police.

It seems then the problems in France stem from a confluence of factors. Probably the most important was the run-away crime in the affected areas around Paris and in the rest of France, followed by the underlying cause of economic malaise stemming out of a bloated government system and a stagnant private sector. However, the presence of a large and demarcated population that has no assimilated into its host society is important to note.

Thus far the violence has been largely contained to immigrant communities both inside and outside of France. Still, the situation of Europe as it begins to deal with immigration seriously is an important one for the United States to watch. We are seeing Europe attempting to cope for the first time with issues the United States has been dealing with for years (remember 1992?) and the successes and failures of Europe may give us more information with which to approach the issues on our shores.

Bret Devereaux is a UMass student

Submit a letter or opinion to the daily collegian!



editorial@dailycollegian.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

King tries mystery story with 'Kid'

By Jeffrey Horowitz
Collegian Staff

Two young lovers race alongside the roads and beaches of Moose Lookit Island, a small New England town, at sunrise as they do everyday on their way to school. Only on this day, as they run atop the sands of Hammock Beach, they find a sleeping man propped against a litter basket. The boy tries to wake him up as the girl nervously stays close. The boy tugs at the man's shoulder and he falls on his side, his face into the sand. With close inspection, the boy realizes with the pale face and the rigid shoulder that the sleeping man is not breathing. He has in fact, we later find, been dead for four to six hours. A quiet town, clueless cops and three very curious journalists find one completely inexplicable, illogical and eerily mysterious dead body and that is the basis for the new Stephen King novel.

"The Colorado Kid"
By Stephen King
Hard Case Crime

This is not a journey into the supernatural, the horror formula or the unbearably suspenseful. King clearly has that mastered. This is a mystery in the realm of Agatha Christie stories. It is a mystery, above all else, even though it seems King strived for crime. We can't even be sure a crime was committed. The story of "The Colorado Kid" has too many open ends, unanswered questions and unclear details. Even in the end, the story doesn't really fit. What King does is sprinkle bread crumbs here and there, enticing us ever more intensely into his enigma. He has us demanding answers and when we get hints that simply lead to more questions we are not frustrated, but perplexed.

Most perplexed is our protagonist, Stephanie. She's an intern for The Weekly Islander — the town newspaper — who, like us, is hearing the story for the first time from two veteran editors. The editor-in-chief is the 90-year-old Vince Teague. The managing editor is the 65-year-old David Bowie. Together they carry a world of wisdom to bestow on the young journalism major. After a lunch with a Boston Globe reporter, who was investigating unexplained mysteries in their little town for an eight or nine piece column, Stephanie asks of a mystery that has never been solved. They wander hesitantly into a narrative of "The Colorado Kid."

"Mostly what happens is people make up a story and stick with it," Vince said. "That's easy enough to do as long as there's only one unknown factor: one poisoner, one set of mystery lights, one boat run aground with most of her crew gone. But with the Colorado Kid there was nothing but unknown factors and hence there was no story."

After the kids find the body, the town's three authorities, Vince (the editor), George (the law) and Doc Robinson (the General Practitioner) investigate the body. What they find is confusing. The man has his hand gripped around air. He is sitting upward. He has no coat and a short sleeve shirt in freezing weather. Lodged in his throat is a piece of steak, too big to swallow. He choked. Accidental death, right? Not quite.

He has some cigarettes in his pocket from Colorado, so what was he doing in New England? Why did a waitress say she spotted him eating fish and chips earlier wearing a green jacket? Most bafflingly, how could he have been seen talking with associates just five hours earlier in Colorado? There is no way he could have made that trip that quickly, except with intense planning and with the accuracy and speed of one chance in a million. He seemed normal that morning and no one suspected this kid to flee to another state. All he has been seen doing in New England before death is eating fish and chips. A five hour trip for fish and chips? I think not. He doesn't smoke, either, so, why the cigarettes? Here's where it gets creepy, why were muscle relaxants found in his system?

The three journalists mull over endless explanations and hypothetical situations. They do endless research and review 25 years worth of questions and scenarios. In the end, we find some major twists, which I dare not reveal, that leave us with yet more questions than we have when we begin.

King loves revisiting the same scenarios from different points of view, and he loves cramming intimate character studies briefly in between telling the story of this unexplained death. His narrative and his interactions between the old and young reporters are wonderful. He loves taking us in hundreds of different directions for possibilities that lead us into yet another dead end. His mysteries are delightfully infuriating.

He also picks up a nice humor for the dialect, the atmosphere and the types of people that live in this small town. His pace is relentless. It takes off in chapter three and after that the book can be finished in one sitting. I put it down, only to pick it up minutes later. It was the intriguing anonymity that drew me back each time. The more I wanted answers, the further I read and the more I discovered more questions and more secrecy. In the end, you discover the full picture, but one that isn't quite in focus, one whose pieces are missing. "And on the mound the little boy, who had been pitching, held his glove up to one of the bright circles which hung in the sky just below the clouds, as if to touch that mystery, and bring it close, and open its heart, and know its story."

Stephen King's latest novel, "The Colorado Kid," strays from his usual horror work and attempts to create an Agatha Christie-inspired murder mystery.

Glick speaks out on circumcision

By Dave Master
Collegian Correspondent

Last Saturday, Leonard Glick appeared at Jeffery Amherst Bookshop to discuss his newly published novel, "Marked in Your Flesh." Glick talked to a small, interested group of attendees, but he aims to reach an even wider audience. In the book, Glick addresses the commonly misunderstood practice of male circumcision, which has its roots in ancient Jewish culture. Glick argues against the relevance of circumcision not only to Jews, but to all who have an interest in the custom. He cites first-hand accounts, thorough historical research and personal objections regarding the arguably out-of-date sacrificial rite.

"Circumvent," said Glick, "is the opening in front of the boxer shorts of Jewish men." He was received with chuckles from the audience, but his point was serious.

"I am not doing this for tenure or money," said Glick. "I am retired and have plenty of money to sustain my lifestyle."

Glick believes circumcision is wrong, despite the majority of men in America who practice the Jewish tradition.

"The U.S. has the highest circumcision rate out of any country in the world, somewhere between 57 and 58 percent," he said. "Even though they have no affiliation with Judaism, the majority of males are circumcised as routine after birth."

What started out as a distinctive religious ritual has now become the cultural norm. As professor emeritus of anthropology, Glick taught European-Jewish History at Hampshire College for 30 years and never understood the role of circumcision. He describes the ancient tradition as "treatment that seeks something to treat."

"People do it because it's what people do," said Glick.

Many people justify the practice by saying they do it for hygienic reasons, as disease and infection prevention. "That's unnecessary," Glick said. "Most physicians agree that circumcision has no medical benefits, and yet it is still widely practiced."

Through further research on the topic, Glick discovered circumcision's subdued truths.

"It is not just a little 'snip,' as doctors say, rather it is radical reductive surgery," said Glick. "Most of the time, the surgery is performed on infants without anesthesia."

When showing his class a video that captures an infant's circumcision, Glick says, "When I show the film, I have to walk out of the room. I refuse to hear the baby's screams again. I can't take it anymore."

According to Glick, other research revealed that cortisol levels increased when a newborn is circumcised. Cortisol is a substance released into the bloodstream when the body is stressed. Consequently, Glick feels that circumcision has now become a question of ethics.

"No one can claim ownership over another person. Then, do parents really have the right to make that kind of decision, to circumcise or not to circumcise, for their infant?" he said.

Throughout history, Jews held tightly to their way of life because of persecution and the struggle to maintain a historical identity, but they adapted accordingly. Glick argues, but that times are still changing.

"Circumcision is an outdated practice, beginning with the ancient Jews," he said. "It holds no positive contribution to the lives of modern Jewish-Americans... Does circumcision have anything to do with modern Jewish-American identity? I don't think so."

Where is your new fling going?

Lovers Only
Hannah Drake

Here's the scenario: you like a guy. Or, you thought you liked him. Turns out you decide you don't really. He, on the other hand, has gotten the strange idea that the two of you are headed for couplehood. How do you shake him? You can't break up with him, because you've only hung out twice. But he's calling and asking to hang out again.

At this point in the game, my advice would be to not return his phone calls. He should get the hint. If you feel like that's mean and want a more gentle way of ending it, then tell him that you're not looking for a relationship right now, or that you think he's a great guy and you'd love to be friends, but you don't want him to get the wrong idea. Whatever you do, don't lead him on. Many guys think that as long as you talk to them, they've got a chance. They're convinced that when you say "no" today means a possible "yes" tomorrow. Men: we are not playing hard to get. A girl will never say no if she wants to spend time with you. Cut your losses and move on.

With guys, this tends to happen a little differently. Scenario: guy meets cute girl, they start hooking up, and he likes her but isn't really looking for a relationship. Eventually she brings it up. What do you tell her? Tell her the truth. Say: I like you, but I'm just not looking for a relationship right now.

Ideally you had already known this when you started hanging out, and so you told her before you hung out with her the third time — that way it nips any emotional attachment in the bud, and if she gets attached then its her fault, you warned her. Or, along the way you decided you didn't like the girl, and you really shouldn't keep seeing her. Girls think that if you're spending time with them, you like them and want to have something with them. If you've hung out with the girl enough times so that you're relatively close, please give her an explanation before you peace out.

It'll save her a lot of confusion and heartache.

What do you do if you're a girl in this situation, i.e., you think that he may not want a relationship but he never told you that, and now you're really into him? Well, confront him. I know, not appealing, but look at it this way: you're either wasting your time, or he'll listen and talk and things will turn out well. And if you find out you're wasting your time, find some other delicious dude to spend your time on.

One thing I've confirmed time and time again in my own personal dating experiences is that if you have to question something, or someone, or if you find yourself trying to figure out what he meant when he said that, or discussing with friend after friend what is going on with him, then the relationship is bad news. Guys usually wear their hearts on

See LOVERS on page 8

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT
REGISTRATION FOR SPRING 2006
The WRITING PROGRAM PLACEMENT TEST will be offered on:
WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 16 @6:30pm in BART 61
This test is a pre-requisite for enrollemnt in Engliwrit 112/113, College Writing.
This test may be taken only once.
Students do not need to register for the test.

Hey Seniors!
Please visit the Senior Campaign table at the Campus Center Concourse Nov. 21st, 28th, 29th, and 30th to vote on the Senior Class Gift.
All members of the Class of 2006 are invited to attend.
For more information, contact Sarah Weisner, Senior Campaign Coordinator.
413.545.1466
sweisner@admin.umass.edu
University of Massachusetts Amherst
Annual Fund

'Derailed' takes all the wrong turns and falls prey to cliché

By Jake Monte
Collegian Staff

"The author intrigues us by twisting the narrative so you never know what's coming next." Believe it or not, that's not a line from any film review. It's a line of dialogue that comes straight from the mouth of Clive Owen in "Derailed." In the context of the film the line makes sense, but the viewer gets the latent meaning immediately. It's the screenwriter, Stuart Beattie, self-consciously bragging about a script he obviously has a lot of confidence in. But, sorry to say, it's the script in "Derailed" that is one of the principal problems with the film.

"Derailed"
Directed by Mikael Håfström
Starring Clive Owen Jennifer Aniston Vincent Cassel
The Weinstein Company
Rated R
110 mins.
Grade C

In "Derailed," Clive Owen stars as Charles Christopher Shine. Owen plays a role similar to his character in "Closer" — the similarity is especially noticeable when he's flirting. Here, he's flirting with Lucinda Harris (Jennifer Aniston) whom he meets on the train during his commute to work. They are tentative about it — both admit they are married — but clearly they like each other. Charles doesn't kiss his wife before they both leave for work, and when his daughter calls attention to it, he playfully tells her to "shut up," but it's not one of those dead marriages so common to films. Aniston sums it up when she says to him, "Some people just don't know how to appreciate what they've got." As it turns out, her words apply to Charles because he calls her and invites her to lunch. Before long, they are headed to a cheap hotel room.

In the hotel room, they never get to fulfill the act because they are interrupted by a man with a gun (Vincent Cassel) who takes Charles' money and rapes Lucinda. But the masked man isn't satisfied with that and he calls Charles and begins to exploit him for everything that he's worth, threatening to tell his wife about the affair.

The first thirty minutes of the film where Owen and Aniston exchange flirtatious dialogue is excellent. The rest isn't. After those first 30 minutes, the film turns into a thriller with Owen running home to save his family from the masked man from the hotel room, hiring a friend to scare the man into leaving him alone and running smack into two plot twists.

The first plot twist the viewer sees a mile away. You may have even guessed it by reading the synopsis. I'll give you a hint: it's a cliché. The second plot twist is unexpected but not shocking or indicative of any creative genius on the part of the screenwriter. The only other thing the film has in store for us that is notable after the courting period between Owen and Aniston is one fantastic scare — it is punctuated by a chord on the soundtrack that pierces right through us.

The most interesting conflict in the film is the adulterous relationship and the threat it poses to Charles' family. But instead of focusing on Charles' family life, the screenwriter sticks to the standard thriller devices, which may have been okay, had the film not so often lapsed in and out of intensity. This is, no doubt, the fault of the director, who didn't really think about the pacing of the film.

Charles starts out the film as a non-heroic person. He can't save Lucinda from being raped, and he lives at the whim of the Cassel's desires. But as the film progresses he grows more and more street smart and hardened. The message of the film is quite stupid in that sense, because Charles' change is not for the better. The idea is that people who are wronged should take out their aggressions like hard-core street thugs without regard for the law or morality. Cassel says to Owen, "You're getting better Charles!" Better at what?

Aniston is the best she's ever been and the first thirty minutes of the film are superb. But "Derailed" is a film that takes all the wrong turns, falls prey to clichéd devices and ends up, well, derailed.

COURTESY THE WEINSTEIN COMPANY

Clive Owen and Jennifer Aniston star in the new thriller, "Derailed," which, despite excellent performances by both, falls short.

Delivery:
413.549.0077
Tel: 413.256.8923
413.256.8924
Fax: 413.253.1173
103 N. Pleasant St.
Amherst, MA
Panda East
Fine Chinese & Japanese Cuisine
Featuring:
• Vegetarian options
• Lunch Specials
• Sushi Bar
• "Light and Healthy" entrees
~ We Bring China Town to you ~
Semester Special
Bring in this ad and receive 10% off your total
*Cannot be combined with any offers, coupons or OCMP.
visit us at: www.pandaeastamherst.com

RAIN
Three Clubs / DJs Under One Roof! Party Till 2 a.m!
HOT BODY CONTEST
Every Thursday Night
18+ College Night
HAREM FRIDAYS
19 + for Ladies
21+ for Men
"Party with the Harem Girls!!!"
Rain transforms into a Sultan's tent
Party till 2am!
Present this flyer and receive
FREE Admission
for 21+ until Midnight
Cover Ch...
18+ with Col... $10.00
21+ $5.00
Now Hiring: Bartenders, Waitstaff, Promotions and Security Staff
10 Stearns Square - Springfield, MA 01103 - (413) 827-9000 - www.RainSpringfield.com

Bill would release Tupac records

By Alex Amos
Collegian Bureau

WASHINGTON — Fans of Tupac Shakur may soon learn more about the influential rapper's death, thanks to legislation proposed in the House last week.

The Tupac Amaru Shakur Records Collection Act of 2005 would require all federal, state and local agencies to release the files they have that pertain to the life and death of Shakur, including those obtained through surveillance and government operations. The bill was put forward on Nov. 2 by Rep. Cynthia McKinney, D-Ga., who previously drafted similar legislation for the records of the assassination of Martin Luther King Jr.

Tupac Shakur was shot to death nearly 10 years ago in Las Vegas following a Mike Tyson boxing match. Las Vegas police never discovered the identities of Shakur's killers.

According to McKinney spokesman John Judge, the bill has its origins in the Congressional Black Caucus, of which McKinney is a member. At the group's annual legislative meeting, a brain trust was formed to discuss the FBI's "COINTELPRO" operations against musicians and other prominent figures. Tupac's mother Afeni Shakur was part of the brain trust and spoke to the other members as well.

COINTELPRO, short for Counter Intelligence Program, was an FBI program instituted in the 1950s to covertly disrupt radical political organizations in the United States. The program is also known to have targeted artists and musicians, as well as nonviolent political dissidents.

"It's a series of things," Judge said of COINTELPRO operations. "It combines surveillance, black bag operations, secret entrances and theft of materials or copying materials, phone taps and site surveillance."

He continued, "In addition to that, there are active campaigns to disrupt and cause rifts in organizations even to the point of people killing each other."

Though formal operations of COINTELPRO ceased in 1971, some believe that elements of the program still exist in the FBI today. It is these elements that are thought to be connected to Shakur's 1996 death.

"There's quite a bit of evidence that has come out over the years about the surveillance of [Shakur]," Judge said. "Apparently there were people that were surveying him at the time of his murder that were never questioned by police, and the murder never got solved."

The resulting legislation proposed by McKinney has its roots in the 1994 John F. Kennedy Records Collection Act, and is similar in wording to the Martin Luther King Jr. Records Collection Act that was put forward earlier this year.

The main difference between them comes in how the act goes about releasing these records. The Shakur Act is unique in that it employs a citizens' advisory panel, which, according to the text of the bill, must be made up of "distinguished persons of high national professional reputation in their respective fields who are capable of exercising the objective judgment necessary to ... [ensure and facilitate] the review, transmission to the public, and public disclosure of records related to the life and death of Tupac Shakur."

The bill said that the panel must include at least three historians, three civil rights activists, three civil liberties experts and one member of Shakur's immediate family.

The Shakur Act also has notable differences distinguishing it from the Freedom of Information Act, which established the normal process through which citizens request government documents that are within the public domain. "It's more thorough than the Freedom of Information Act, since it asks for foreign records, contractor records, state, local and court records," Judge said. "It's a different sort of legislation."

A new bill proposed by Rep. Cynthia McKinney would require all agencies to release any files they have relating to the death of rapper Tupac Shakur in Las Vegas.

UMass Amherst Center for Student Development
UP TO THE MINUTE

Wednesday, November 16
International Food Festival: Chinese Cuisine
The Great Wall Restaurant, Berkshire DC

November 16 & 18
3rd Korean Film Festival
Campus Center, 168C, 6:30pm FREE

Thursday, November 17
International Food Festival: American Cuisine
Eastside Grill, Worcester DC

FRIDAY, November 18
Something Every Friday
Must Love Dogs
With John Cusick
Campus Center 174-76, 9pm FREE

Saturday, November 19
ULALI
Native American a cappella group blending chant, drums, and vocal harmony.
Bowker Auditorium, 7:30pm FREE

SUNDAY, November 20
Sunday Night Movie
Must Love Dogs
With John Cusick
Student Union, Cape Cod Lounge, 8pm FREE

Student businesses are open! Located in the Student Union: the Bike Coop, Campus Design & Copy (CDC), Earthfoods Cafe, People's Market, Tix Unlimited. Located in the residence halls: Greenough Sub Shop, Sweets 'N More (Field), & Sylvan Snack Bar (McNamara).

Brought to you by Student Affairs and Campus Life
UMass Amherst Calendar of Events: www.umass.edu/umhome.events

Landlords and heating problems

Ask the Attorney
Michele L. Leaf

Q. Now that it is getting colder, I have noticed that we do not have adequate heat in our apartment. We moved in September 1st, so I did not realize this was a problem. I spoke to the landlord about this a few weeks ago, but he never got back to me as promised. We also run out of hot water frequently if the shower is running for more than 10 minutes. We listed the hot water problem on the statement of conditions at the beginning of the tenancy, but the landlord has done nothing. Although we are responsible for heat and hot water under the lease, we feel that the landlord is obligated to make sure that the systems are in good working order. What should we do?

A. By law, Massachusetts' tenants are guaranteed safe, sanitary and decent housing, including adequate heat and hot water. Even though it is your responsibility to pay for the heat and hot water, it is the landlord's obligation to provide the facilities. The state sanitary code specifies that the landlord must provide the equipment to heat the water to between 110 and 130 degrees. The landlord is also required to provide a heating system capable of heating every room to 68 degrees in the daytime and 64 degrees at night. If you report the problems to the town health inspector, an inspection of your apartment will be done which will certify the violations and result in enforcement action against the landlord. The landlord will be ordered to make immediate repairs, because the lack of heat and hot water are considered serious problems.

Once the conditions are documented on an inspection report, you will have the right to withhold your rent. Even without health code violations being certified, you may be able to withhold your rent, provided that you can prove the landlord had knowledge of the problems, but failed to fix them. In your case, the landlord received notice of the hot water problem on the statement of condition which you turned in at the beginning of the tenancy. It is important to now put your complaint about the heat in writing, asking the landlord to take immediate action to fix the system. If you then begin rent withholding, it is a good idea to put your money into a special bank account, known as an escrow account.

By withholding rent, you will be in a good position to negotiate a rent reduction for the landlord's breach of the warranty of habitability. The fact that your apartment lacks heat and hot water makes it worth less than the market rent, which is considered the fair value of the apartment in good condition. You can seek a reduced rent until the conditions are corrected, as well as retroactive rent abatement for the months that you paid full rent for the apartment when it was in defective condition.

The failure of your landlord to fix these conditions constitutes a serious interference with your tenancy, which, in legal terms, is a breach of your quiet enjoyment. If legal action becomes necessary, you can claim monetary damages of the greater of actual damages or three months rent.

Since your landlord may try to evict you for non payment of rent, it is important to seek legal advice before withholding rent to be certain that all legal prerequisites have been followed. If you have reported code violations and the landlord then brings an action to evict, the eviction will be presumed to be retaliatory, entitling you to additional money damages. Don't be afraid to assert your rights as a tenant under Massachusetts law. This will almost certainly result in repairs and compensation for the time you had to endure substandard conditions.

The information contained in this article refers to Massachusetts law and does not constitute legal advice. Please submit legal questions to askthe-attorney@student.umass.edu. If you need legal advice, seek out an attorney who can give you advice based upon your circumstances and applicable law. Fee paying UMass Amherst students with questions may call the Student Legal Services Office at 545-1995 to arrange an appointment, or come to 922 Campus Center to pick up more information.

Surveying your new relationship

LOVERS from page 7

their sleeves when they're serious about someone. And be honest with yourself. You can say that you don't want something serious, but if the lack of commitment is hurting you or causing you stress, then you do actually want more, and you need to admit that to yourself. Then you need to acknowledge that nobody can ever change somebody else's actions, and you have to decide what you want to do based on the knowledge that the guy you like may not necessarily see you in the same light as you see him. You can stay and have some fun, knowing it will end at some point, or you can end it now, save yourself the memories and move on to find someone who wants what you want.

I've said it before but I'll say it again: the three most important aspects of making a new relationship are attraction, timing and wanting the same thing. Mutual attraction is what puts a relationship above the friendship mark; timing is what makes or breaks a person's mindset as to what they're going to be looking for.

If your guy or girl is telling you of a recent heartbreak, then there's a giant yellow flag on the play, and you should get out, and fast. Most likely he or she's not close to ready, and even if they do like you won't have the strength to start another relationship. Wanting the same thing is important because even if the timing is right, some people in college just don't want full-blown relationships. They want booty calls, a hook-up or cuddle buddy. Some people want a commitment for the sake of sexual health; others want it for the sake of building an emotional bond that may lead somewhere. If you're in the beginning of a relationship, I suggest you survey these three ingredients. You'll get a good idea of where, if anywhere, your new fling is going.

Think he's not interested? Don't get why she gets so upset when you forget to call?

Ask Lovers Only

contact.chappell@maine.edu, LoversonLuv@gmail.com

Carlin continues to break ground

By Rob Turkowsky
The Daily Free Press (Boston U)

BOSTON — "Somebody has to think of this stuff. Apparently, I've been appointed," George Carlin said midway through "Life Is Worth Losing," his newest live HBO comedy special.

"This stuff" includes dozens of unprintably profane riffs about, among other things, beheadings, mass suicides, stupid Americans and natural disasters. Prior to the show's start, Carlin's unmistakable rasp came over the PA system, encouraging audience members to turn off not just cell phones and beepers, but all electronic devices, including pacemakers and heart monitors.

At 68, Carlin still has his edge, performing an act that can only air on HBO. This is the man, after all, whose performance of "Seven Words You Can Never Say on Television" resulted in a Supreme Court decision on indecency, and in turn, he later expanded it to a poster version containing 2,443 filthy words.

Carlin engages the audience in what is best described as bare-knuckle comedy. At the HBO show on Saturday night, he is unapologetic — delighted, actually — when the audience recoils in discomfort as he begins a detailed meditation on autoerotic asphyxiation.

"I like to know where the audience draws the line," Carlin said, in an interview with The Muse. "Once I know, 'This is going to make them uneasy,' I like crossing that line, and I like taking them with me — across the line, on the journey — and having them be happy that I did."

Carlin crossed that line and made people uneasy about the topic of school shootings in his 1999 special, "You Are All Diseased": "Kids today are too soft. ... When I was in school and someone came in and killed three or four of us, we went right on with our arithmetic. 35 classmates, minus four ..."

"Life Is Worth Losing" continues Carlin's remarkable evolution as a performer, a journey that includes an unmatched 13 HBO specials, countless albums and three best-selling books. Carlin gained many fans in the 1970s with his laid-back comedy and characters like the Hippie-Dippie Weatherman: "Tonight's forecast: dark."

But his style changed most drastically in the early 1990s. If Carlin earned his reputation as a groundbreaking comic with '70s albums such as "Class Clown" and "FM & AM," then it was in the '90s, on records such as "Jammin' in New York" and "Back in Town," that he claimed his spot as comedy's most daring thinker.

"Besides being an entertainer, I'm an artist," Carlin said, of his comedic growth. "And artists are always on a changing path. Exploring the subject matter, exploring the culture, exploring the species."

Lately, the exploration takes the form of a direct challenge. Through performance, Carlin transcends what it means to be a comedian. Instead of merely making us laugh, he forces us to question what we dare laugh at, what we dare hold as sacrosanct in culture and in religion. "Life is Worth Losing" is arguably not his funniest comedy special, but, as a testament to his fearlessness, it is certainly his most satisfying.

On the surface, Carlin seems to be cranky and cynical. But, after the show, he happily signed autographs and chatted with fans waiting outside the theater. Carlin describes himself as a "disappointed idealist."

He enjoys watching America self-destruct, especially under the man he refers to as "Governor Dask," because "that's really the last thing he was elected to."

"We had a chance to be glorious," Carlin mused. "I think we gave it up for, in this case, cell phones and laptops and jet skis and 39 different flavors of Jelly Beans."

George Carlin continues to live up to his reputation as one of the most daring comedians of his generation with his new HBO special, "Life Is Worth Losing."

Minutewomen embrace sport

F. HOCKEY from page 12

always push me and encourage me to never be satisfied."

That strive to improve has continued at the collegiate level, as both players have faced challenges.

In her sophomore year, Borneo was asked to move from forward, where she had always played, to midfield, in an effort to help the team.

"We've taken [Borneo] from a front-line player to make her more of a defensive player within the midfield," Shea said. "We've put the demands of more defensive leadership on her, which has absolutely grown her game."

"Kwylan came in here as a great athlete, but a pretty unpolished player," Shea said. "She's become a real defensive cog within our system. Her ability to read the game and her ability to execute her stick skills under pressure have improved."

Now in college, Borneo and Jaggassar can look back on the athletic career so far with a true sense of achievement. After so much success in Trinidad and Tobago, as well as internationally, the pair has had a lot of time to think about which moment was their best moment in the sport.

"I would have to say playing for the senior team [in the Pan Am games]," Borneo said. "Seeing that level of play and knowing that you worked so hard to be there" is something Borneo appreciates greatly.

"Just adapting my style of play to how they usually play up here [in the United States] because the Carribean level [of play] is different from the American level," Jaggassar said. "[I was able to] come up here and change my level after playing down there for ten years, and I did it relatively quickly."

When their time at UMass is done, both students plan on splitting their time between the United States and Trinidad and Tobago. Both Borneo and Jaggassar have family in New York, so although they may not be as far from home as it may seem, they still have the desire to return to Trinidad and represent their nation once more in the Senior National games.

"After school I want to spend a few years in the United States and then go home and hopefully make my senior national team and play for a few more years," Jaggassar said.

"It's tough because I'd like to return home to play for my national team, but I'm also thinking about graduate school," Borneo said of her future. "I'm also thinking about travelling abroad and getting some different perspectives from club teams in Europe."

Until then, Borneo and Jaggassar are part of a UMass community that has embraced them as they have embraced the sport of field hockey.

COURTESY OF UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Patricia Borneo, who scored three goals for the UMass field hockey team in 2005, will spend half her time in the U.S. and half her time in her homeland after she graduates this spring.

COURTESY OF UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Kwylan Jaggassar was able to help the UMass field hockey team reach the Atlantic 10 championship game, before being beaten by Richmond 7-1. She is also a member of the Trinidad and Tobago Junior National Team.

UMass receives its 2005 season grades

GRADES from page 12

back on track after what looked like an early season collapse. Shea stressed early in the year that her emphasis was not necessarily on the outcome as much as it was on their improvement. She prepared her team for the seven conference games at the end of the regular season, and never lost patience with a Minutewomen squad that had more freshman than seniors on their roster. Shea never lost confidence in her team, and led UMass to its 16th appearance in the A-10 tournament.

BOTTOM LINE:

There was nothing more the coaching staff could have done to get this team over the hump.

Offense: B

After a slow start, the Minutewomen offense ended the season third in the A-10 in goals with 37 on the season. Freshman Erin Parker and Katelyn Orlando provided to be the team's best 1-2 punch in the offensive circle, as they were the team's leading goal-scorers with five goals each on the year. The duo combined for 26 points and as a result, were named to the A-10 All-Rookie Team.

Parker, Orlando, and freshman Mary Shea all had two game-winning goals on the year, which helped the Minutewomen reach the post-season.

Senior Patricia Borneo proved to be a major player in the Minutewomen offense as well, quietly ending the regular season as UMass' leading scorer Borneo ended the year fourth in the A-10 in assists with seven on the season, and was named a first-team All-Conference selection.

BOTTOM LINE:

The Minutewomen averaged only 1.71 goals per game all year, but were still able to get all the way to the A-10 championship game. In the end, it was a young offense that carried most of the weight, and did a fine job of winning games down the stretch.

DEFENSE: B-

The Minutewomen allowed 49 goals, and were fourth in the A-10 in goals allowed per game with 2.26 on the season.

Senior Jaime Bawden led the backfield with 11 points and was named a first-team All-Conference selection. Bawden stepped up big towards the end of the season, scoring four goals in her last five regular season games, and making one defensive save. The Minutewomen would have missed out on a post-season berth if it were not for Bawden's successful play down the stretch.

BOTTOM LINE:

When compared to the rest of the A-10, the Minutewomen finish the year in a three-way tie for fifth in goals allowed with 49, and that just does not sit well for a team that only scored 37 all season. UMass let up less than two goals a game in only five games all year, and gave up 32 more penalty corners than they received. And in a low scoring sport like field hockey, letting up 2.26 goals per game can be painful.

GOALTENDING: C+

Sophomore Becky Letourneau started in 18 games this season, and finished the year with a 2.39 goals against average. She had a 6-12 record, and posted no shutouts. Toward the end of the season, coach Shea decided to mix things up a bit, giving red-shirt junior Heather Ryan three starts during conference play. Ryan played in five games and posted a 1.52 goals against average with a 2-1 record.

BOTTOM LINE:

The late-season goaltending change was made by the coaching staff, and it seemed to be a game-time decision going into every game during their stretch run, including the A-10 tournament. Letourneau and Ryan made their share of saves with 134 on the season, but it was the 49 they did not make that may have been the difference maker.

OVERALL: B+

While the Minutewomen seemed to rely on their freshman too much, it turns out that it was not a bad thing. Parker, Orlando and Shea combined for 14 goals, seven assists and 35 points. A tough loss in the A-10 Finals ended an exciting run for the Maroon and White, and with a year of experience under their belts, this core of young Minutewomen have a bright future ahead of them under Patty Shea.

Drug policy stiffens

DRUGS from page 12

"We're at the end here, and I don't want to do it, but we need an agreement soon. It's not complicated. It's not complicated. All sports fans understand it," McCain said at the hearing. "I suggest you act — and act soon."

Last week, McCain and Bunning revised their proposed legislation to soften the penalties from two years for a first offense and a lifetime ban for a second. The bill now calls for a half-season ban for a first positive test, one season for a second and a lifetime penalty for a third. Their bill would apply to the major leagues, the NFL, NBA, NHL and baseball's minor leagues.

"This is what I had hoped for all along, for the two private parties to come to an agreement on their own without Congress having to do it for them," Bunning said, but he added that the deal is "not as tough as I would like."

"I and my colleagues will be watching very closely, and if things unravel, we still have tough legislation we can move through Congress."

Had there not been an agreement, Bunning said the bill would have gone to a vote in the Senate on Tuesday night and passed. He said the legislation won't be withdrawn because he wants to "see what the other major league sports do. ... We hope this agreement by major league baseball will stimulate the other sports to stiffen their penalties."

Davis said that Tuesday's news "stops the rush to move legislation through at this time."

Bunning, a Hall of Fame pitcher, noted with disappointment that the new policy makes no mention of erasing or marking with an asterisk baseball records set with the help of performance-enhancing drugs.

Like Bunning, Davis and his committee's ranking Democrat, Henry Waxman of California, said they want to see other sports follow baseball's lead and make their drug policies more strict, too.

"This is a day to celebrate. It's been a long, not exactly smooth, ride," Davis said.

"This is a major step," he added.

Davis and Waxman said they still have some concerns about the agreement, including details of how testing would be carried out and whether designer steroids would be addressed.

Though steroids are a problem in many sports, baseball has been the focal point of congressional interest and pressure. As recently as 2004, there was no suspension for a first offense under the sport's steroid program. As recently as 2002, players weren't tested for steroids at all, unless there was cause.

Under the new deal, according to congressional aides, a first positive test for amphetamines will lead to mandatory additional testing, a second offense will draw a 25-game suspension, and a third offense gets 80 games.

A player will be tested during spring training physicals and at least once in the regular season, plus the possibility of random tests. The old agreement called for a minimum of one test from the start of spring training through the end of the regular season.

Matsui, Yanks' close to contract

By Pete Caldera
Knight Ridder

A contract extension for Hideki Matsui was nearing completion Monday night, which would keep the outfielder with the Yankees for at least the next four years.

Negotiations could possibly extend into Tuesday — the mutually agreed-upon deadline for the Yanks and Matsui to strike a deal.

According to a source with knowledge of the contract discussions, the Yankees offered $48 million over four years.

Matsui's agent, Arn Tellem, was said to be seeking a fifth year. The compromise might be a club option with a buyout that could put the guaranteed value of the contract in excess of $50 million.

It appeared that Tuesday's deadline would not be a hindrance to getting at least a deal in principle. As a provision of Matsui's original three-year, $21 million contract that brought him to the Yankees from the Yomiuri Giants, Matsui would be a free agent if the Yankees failed to sign him by today.

Without a deal, the Yankees would be required to place Matsui on unconditional waivers, preventing him from re-signing with the Yanks until May 15.

According to a published report in Japan, Matsui, 31, has said that he is not overly concerned about the number of years on the contract.

But during the negotiations, a published report surfaced that Matsui's camp had used the Detroit contract signed by Magglio Ordonez last winter (five years, $75 million with Detroit) as leverage.

Tellem and Yankees general manager Brian Cashman have been in direct contact since last week's general manager meetings. A consistent run producer, Matsui batted .305 last year with 23 home runs and 116 RBI.

The Yankees have yet to engage in serious trade talks, but one possibility is dealing for Florida center fielder Juan Pierre.

Knee injuries cause mental pain

By Gordon Wittenmyer
Knight Ridder

ST. PAUL, Minn. — Everything and everybody in major college and major league sports is measured, timed, cataloged, compared, contrasted, evaluated and labeled.

From batting averages to passing averages — from practices to games — it's almost impossible for an athlete to avoid knowing where he stands.

Minnesota Twins pitcher Carlos Silva had the American League's best earned-run average in day games this season. Green Bay quarterback Brett Favre has an almost perfect win-loss record during his career when the temperature is 34 degrees or lower at Lambeau Field.

Suddenly, for Vikings quarterback Daunte Culpepper, there is no mark to meet, no record to chase.

Instead the team's franchise player, who tore three ligaments in his right knee Oct. 30, faces surgery next week in Birmingham, Ala. Then comes a long, lonely rehabilitation of six months to a year.

Other fallen athletes feel Culpepper's pain — literally.

"It's tough. It's real tough," said former Twins outfielder Brian Buchanan, who, early in his professional career, suffered an ankle injury while running the bases that was so severe a minor league teammate went to pick up his shoe before realizing his foot was still in it, twisted at a grotesque angle.

"When you're going through your rehab, your competitive nature is within you. One day you want to lift a pound, and the next day you try to lift a pound and a half. When you're healthy, the competitor is the other team. In rehab it's more what you can withstand and the slow process it takes."

Major league athletes who have made or attempted comebacks from extraordinary injuries seem to agree on this point: The physical part of the comeback from an injury such as Culpepper's isn't nearly as challenging as the mental or emotional part.

Despite the severity of Culpepper's injuries, he is expected to return healthy enough to again play at a high level in the NFL. How much his mobility will be affected and whether he'll have to make many adjustments to his game is unclear. But by sometime next season, he should be back in the Vikings' pocket.

"It may take him two years to feel normal," said former Pro Bowl receiver Sterling Sharpe, a broadcaster for NFL Productions whose playing career was cut short by a spinal cord injury. "But I think he'll definitely come back and definitely be effective when he comes back."

Between now and then, the comeback process could be as solitary as it is long — with the sudden lack of teammates, competition and sense of place having an emotional impact on him not unlike a bicycle chain breaking at full speed.

"For me, it was a six-month process; it was a long, hard road," Washington Redskins quarterback Mark Brunell said in response to e-mailed questions. Brunell tore two of the three major ligaments in his right knee during spring practice in 1991, while the starting quarterback for the University of Washington, but made a full recovery.

"There were good days," he said, "but there were a lot of bad days, too. There were a lot of days that your knee was just not feeling right."

Though Culpepper's injury was severe, other athletes have gone through worse. Lives have been altered, even threatened.

Bo Jackson, the Heisman Trophy winner out of Auburn and a two-sport all-star as a professional, injured his hip so badly while playing football for the Oakland Raiders that he needed hip replacement surgery that ended his football career. But after intense rehab, he came back to play parts of two baseball seasons with the Chicago White Sox and California Angels in 1993 and '94.

Sharpe injured two vertebrae in his neck late in the 1994 season and could not return after that season.

"I had a situation that had to do with life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," Sharpe said. "I don't think Daunte Culpepper, unless something goes wrong in the operating room, has a chance to lose his life or be paralyzed because of this injury."

Some injured athletes return to top form fairly quickly, while for others, the road to recovery winds.

Second-year quarterback Matt Mauck of the Tennessee Titans made a complete recovery and comeback from a foot injury his junior year at Louisiana State that was so serious that it has its own name: Lisfranc. It's a midfoot injury that involves the ligaments and cluster of bones that create the arch. His foot was twisted and smashed when he was tackled by a 300-pound lineman in the eighth game of the 2002 season.

By 2003, Mauck, who like Brunell and Culpepper was known for his mobility as well as his passing, had become a strong enough passer to lead LSU to a share of the national championship and was drafted by the Denver Broncos.

Orlando Magic forward Grant Hill might be in the midst of the mother of all comebacks. He returned to all-star form in 2004-05 after missing almost all of three seasons because of an ankle injury that required five surgeries.

"I'd run into people and tell them I'm getting ready for the season, and they'd say, 'I thought you retired,' " Hill told New York Newsday last season. "Look, I understand. If I hadn't gone through what I've gone through, I would have been skeptical, too. I just felt I could still play.

"It was either I was going to be crazy and everybody else was right, or I was going to have to prove some people wrong."

Culpepper, at least, has optimism on his side. Nobody has predicted that his injury will end his career.

"It's a leg, and it's better for a quarterback to tear up a knee than a running back or wide receiver," Sharpe said. "Even though it's his plant foot, I think he'll be able to overcome that fairly quickly. The quarterback position might be the position — not to say the least affected — but he might have a chance to play quicker than anybody, quicker than a speed guy."

That doesn't mean it will be easy any of it.

"Especially when you have something that not only affects your football career but everyday life for the rest of your life," Mauck said of the recovery process from such extraordinary injuries. "That's something that's pretty tough to take. But the way medicine is today, there's very few things where they can't get you in position where you can come back. It's just about making up in your own mind what you can do."

Brunell, who reinjured his right knee during training camp before the 1997 season (tearing the medial collateral ligament from the bone), has been a Pro Bowl quarterback three times. That includes a Pro Bowl MVP season in 1997 after coming back without surgery.

"There are probably a few things I wouldn't have to tell Daunte — he's had so much success in this league and he's one of the best quarterbacks in the NFL and this is just a minor setback," Brunell said. "But it will take a little time. He will have to have patience."

That's the universal advice offered by those who have been through major rehab.

Jets regroup after loss

By Randy Lange
Knight Ridder

HEMPSTEAD, N.Y. — You can fault the Jets for the way they ended their 30-3 loss to Panthers on Sunday, but don't say it's because they didn't have a clue.

Their exit strategy — huddles using most of the play clock, running plays for rookie Cedric Houston, almost no pass plays for beleaguered Brooks Bollinger — was a planned withdrawal.

"I know how Brooks felt. I know how our team felt. I saw our team on the sidelines," Edwards said sternly Monday. "A long time ago, I used to play. I've been in some games like that, too, now. That (isn't) in the coaching book. I know what's best for this team.

"It's my decision to make certain decisions, and I'm going to make them and I'll live by them, OK?"

This decision began with 7:35 to play and the Jets trailing, 23-3, then became fully operational with 5:30 to play for their final drive after Carolina scored on Will Witherspoon's interception-return touchdown. Edwards decided on this approach for numerous reasons:

—The Jets had turned the ball over on five consecutive possessions, four on Bollinger interceptions — the first picks he'd thrown since the 2002 Alamo Bowl for Wisconsin, including three full preseasons and five regular-season appearances with the Jets.

—Edwards "wasn't going to put the quarterback in harm's way any longer." Bollinger suffered his third sack two plays before the Witherspoon pick.

—The coach "wasn't going to send our defense out there again by turning the ball over."

—Edwards wanted to see Houston run — he had seven carries for 36 yards on the last series — and he wanted Bollinger "to leave the game with some dignity."

Bollinger, named to get his third pro start at Denver on Sunday, said Edwards' perspective from the sideline and his position as the boss made the strategy correct.

"At that point, I really didn't know what I felt. Obviously, I wanted to find a way to win the game, but I'm just running what plays are called," he said. "It's the head coach and he's right, period. Who am I to say what we need to do? Things had, in a quick period of time, gotten pretty bad."

Edwards' explanation was necessary because it wasn't just reporters and fans who had questions. Cornerback Ken Lucas, who had two of the Panthers' interceptions, said after the game, "It's good when you get a team to quit on you."

In context, Lucas' quote wasn't as damning of the Jets' players as of their coaches. Before the sentence with the Q-word, he said, "You thought at the end of the game they would at least try to throw the ball for the end zone, but they just ran the ball and ran the clock out."

FRUSTRATED?
PUZZLED?
DO YOU HAVE:

- a grade dispute?
- teacher, roomate or job concerns?
- billing problems?
- harassment?
- ...or any other University related problems?

THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP
(confidentially, of course)

students, faculty, and staff are all welcome

823 Campus Center

Office Hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.

telephone: 413-545-0867
fax: 413-545-9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

GREAT Reasons to use UHS Eye Care Services

1. Savings on routine eye exams for students at UMass
2. A great place to get contact lenses
3. FREE sample start-up contact lens solutions
4. Same day replacement of disposable contact lenses, in many cases
5. Contact lenses mailed directly to your home or office
6. FREE eyeglass adjustments and one year warranty on frames

SPECIAL OFFER: 10 PERCENT STUDENT DISCOUNT ON ALL FRAMES AND EYEGLASS LENSES!*

"I invite you to use the Eye Care Services"

Frederick H. Bloom, O.D.
Director, UHS Eye Care Services

* Cannot be combined with other insurance discounts.

For appointments or questions, call 577-5383
UHS EYE CARE SERVICES

The Journalism Program Lecture Series on Broadcast and the Media

AFTER KATRINA:
How Radio Saved the City of New Orleans

A panel featuring
DIANE NEWMAN, News Director, WWL Radio, New Orleans
MONICA PIERRE, News Director, Clear Channel Radio New Orleans
ERNESTO SCHWEIKERT, Owner, KGLA 1540
The city's oldest Spanish language station

Wednesday, November 16, 2005, 4-5:30 p.m.

THE LEARNING COMMONS
W.E.B. DU BOIS LIBRARY
UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AMHERST

Reception at Memorial Hall, immediately following

This series is funded by David '79 and Teena Kantor

Watroba's Liquors
79 Sunderland Road North Amherst (liquor store 11:00 AM - 11:00 PM)
Just before the Harp!
Watroba's Market
Red Bull 4 - Pack $7.29 plus deposit

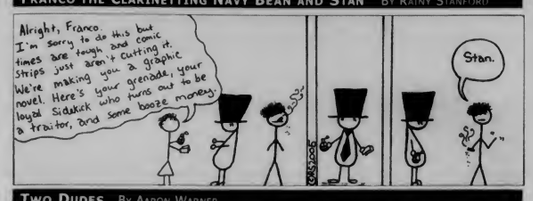
- Corona and Corona Light Loose Case Bottles $20.99 + dep.
- Jim Beam Kentucky Whiskey $19.99 1.75 ml. Btl
- SKYY Vodka $14.49 750 ml. Btl
- Svedka Vodka $17.99 1.75 ml. Btl
- Mirassou Assorted Wines $7.99 750 ml. Btl
- Pabst Blue Ribbon 30 Pack $13.99 + dep
- Genny Light 30 Pack $12.99 + dep
- Vast array of HUGE Deli Sandwiches
- Coke 12 Pack Cans and Coke products 2 for $6.00 + dep.

Jagermeister $20.99 750 ml. Btl. With FREE T-shirt or FREE shot glass

KEG SPECIALS

Bud & Bud Light	$63.99+
Michelob Lager & Ultra	$63.99+
"Natty" Light & Ice	$59.99+
Miller Lite	$59.99+
Pabst Blue Ribbon	$44.99+

Try our selection of European and Micro Brew Beers



LABRAT By Richard Martelly

ELSIE HOOPER By Robert D. Kryzkowski

FRANCO THE CLARINETTING NAVY BEAN AND STAN By Rainy Stanford

TWO DUDES By Aaron Warner

A COLLEGE GIRL NAMED JOE By Aaron Warner

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"It's funny how when you're a kid, a day can last forever."

—Hearts in Atlantis

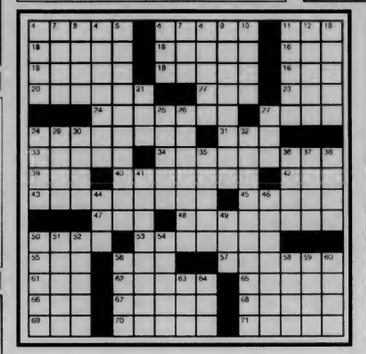
ACROSS
1 Happy songs
6 Low cards
11 Shriver of tennis
14 Vigilant
15 Acquired family member
16 GPs org.
17 Cuban export
18 Dern or Ashley
19 Family member
20 More facile
22 Banned substance
23 Drag along
24 Showy flowers
27 Por source
28 More gelid
31 PFC's address
33 Product sticker
34 Playing a ball game
39 ETa transport
40 Means of access
42 Tic-tac-toe win
43 Pressing device
45 Lugged
47 Suitable
48 Political zealots
50 Luau dance
53 USA part
55 Gasteyer of "SNL"
56 Nice friend
57 Oasis, maybe
61 Get the gold
62 Religious practices
65 Did lunch
66 & so forth
67 Like some gases
68 Concluded
69 Salon solution
70 Analyze, as ore
71 Full of lip

DOWN
1 Tested material
2 Pelvis parts
3 Gams
4 Gallivant
5 Light of the neighborhood
6 Up to, briefly
7 Cell substance letters
8 Sidestep
9 Domestic market?
10 Powerful blow
11 Zé or orzo
12 Love in Limoges
13 Juicy, tropical fruit
21 King of France
25 At no time
26 Measks Range output
27 Child's plaything
29 Grippes
29 Flat float
30 Orchestra member
32 Insect killers
35 Moonlike
36 Jot
37 Carol
38 Valhalla VIPs
41 A, B, C, etc.
44 Drivers org.
46 Sweet potato
49 Lacking brightness
50 Fumbled for words
51 Oneness
52 Knight's weapon
54 Minute arachnids
58 La Scala showstopper
58 Sentence extenders
59 Launch forces
60 Mary Baker or Nelson
63 Paleozoic: e.g
64 Porky's pen



Find today's answers online

www.dailycollegian.com

THE HARP
NEW!! Wireless Internet
OCMPK All Credit Cards accepted
Irish Pub
NOVEMBER SPECIAL!
$1.50 PBR Bottles; Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 A pint / $6.50 a pitcher

Tonight. • Cold Duck Compleat
Thur. • 5th Pocket!
Fri. • Irish Session
Sat. • HiSux ("Bud/Bud light promo with HiSux")

"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments

Submit your comic!
e-mail collegiancomcis@yahoo.com

HOROSCOPES

aquarius JAN. 20-FEB. 18
Your favorite pen will die in the middle of class today.

pisces FEB. 19-MAR. 20
The answer to all of your problems is to stop visiting the library.

aries MAR. 21-APR. 19
Composition books are far superior to spiral notebooks.

taurus APR. 20-MAY 20
You forgot your mother's birthday again. You are a horrible son/daughter.

gemini MAY 21-JUN. 21
You should treat yourself to a manicure this afternoon.

cancer JUN. 22-JUL. 22
Your new goal is to recycle all of your bottles and cans.

leo JUL. 23-AUG. 22
Drive to Maine and cash in on all those bottles and cans your roommate is saving.

virgo AUG. 23-SEPT. 22
You are too stressed out. Don't think about school for the rest of the week.

libra SEPT. 23-OCT. 22
Your new diet is going great. You look better already!

scorpio OCT. 23-NOV. 21
You have a surprisingly poor sense of direction.

sagittarius NOV. 22-DEC. 21
If you wear a nice wool sweater today you will be quite happy.

capricorn DEC. 22-JAN. 19
It's time to start looking for a new pair of snow boots.

★ Submit your comic ★
e-mail
collegiancomcis@yahoo.com

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ANNOUNCEMENTS

White Out Night at The Pub! Friday November 18 at The Pub HTM students are hosting an event to support the American Stroke Association. Wear White Clothing! Buy raffles for a chance to win great prizes! Come out and support the ASA while having fun with your friends!

Montreal Weekend New Years Party $129 Complete cocktail age 18 781-979-9001 Call now montrealexpress.net

APARTMENT FOR RENT

1, 2, 3 & 4 Bedroom spacious apartments, Great location, Bus Route, All utilities included No Fee Call 413-253-3000

EMPLOYMENT

GET PAID VIEWING ADS ON THE INTERNET: $6,000/mo. Potential. START TODAY!! www.ezmoney.FindHere.org

Leaf Raking $10/Hr, Walking distance to campus, we provide rakes. 549-5854

Day Bartenders Position, Mon, Weds, Fri. Local Pub. Call 548-6900

EMPLOYMENT

Rent us your ears! Listening experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu Voicemail: 545-6837.

November 18th is the last day to apply to become a Legal Assistant with the Student Legal Services Office. Earn 12 undergraduate credits while gaining valuable experience. Contact us at 545-1995 or stop by at 922 Campus Center to pick up an application.

EMPLOYMENT

Part-Time Workers Needed We are looking for part-time assistance with a variety of office and clerical tasks. Preferred candidates will work quickly and accurately and be able to work from 5pm-9pm on days that they work. Pay is $8.00/hour. For consideration, please call (413) 256-0444 for an application or mail resume to: National Evaluation Systems, Inc., Personnel Department, P.O. Box 226, Amherst, MA 01004-0226. Resumes may also be emailed to: personnel@nesinc.com.

EMPLOYMENT

Mystery Shoppers get paid to shop! Up to $150 a day. Training provided Call 1-800-690-1273

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience nees. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

LOST

Green & Black USB Storage Device left in open aceess computers in the library on Tuesday Morning 9:30 $20 REWARD Contact dmurphy@student.umass.edu

ROOMMATE WANTED

Apartment in Presidential looking for one or two roommates for spring semester male or female 781-608-1051

SERVICES

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance. 549-1906

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

TRAVEL

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

ACT NOW SPRING BREAKERS Book early & Save! Free meals parties by 11/7. Lowest prices. Be a rep & TRAVEL FREE! Get the ultimate hookups with STA TRAVEL 413-256-1261.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

A cultural connection at UM

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

Any time you attend a game at Garber Field, you can see the American flag flying high at the southeast corner of the field. However, if you go to see the Massachusetts field hockey team take the field, you'll likely see the flag of Trinidad and Tobago flying along with the stars and stripes.

The flag is there in support of two Minutewomen playing far away from home. Senior Patricia Borneo and junior Kwylan Jaggassar are leading a perennial playoff contender in UMass and have done so by bringing a different flavor of field hockey to the team.

Learning in a different arena from the American born students, Borneo and Jaggassar developed unique skills and playing styles that have helped make UMass field hockey be successful.

From the climate, to the playing surfaces, to the competition, field hockey is a very different sport in the Caribbean than it is in the United States.

"It's more of an individual sport [in Caribbean nations]," coach Patty Shea said. "It's more about taking the ball and dribbling. It's not so much of a passing style [because] they learn to play how the men play."

Of course, around the world, field hockey is known as a sport played by men, and therefore, both athletes grew up adapting to the play of their male counterparts. That experience has afforded skills unique to the American game.

"It's little bit more aggressive, but it's also more of a one-on-one [style]," Shea said, and because of that style, she believes "their stick skills are more developed than that of American players."

That variety on the team has produced results, as both players started every game for the Minutewomen. Borneo led the team in scoring during the regular season with 13 points, netting three goals and seven assists, and Jaggassar has scored seven points on the season with two goals and three assists.

However, putting points on the scoreboard is not the only contribution the pair have made.

COURTESY OF UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Junior Kwylan Jaggassar, a native of Trinidad and Tobago, is a vital member of the UMass field hockey team. In 2005, Jaggassar tallied two goals.

COURTESY OF UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Senior Patricia Borneo moved to America from Trinidad and Tobago and became the UMass field hockey team's second-leading scorer in 2005.

"I think one of the great things [Borneo and Jaggassar] have brought to the team is the cultural aspect [of their homeland]," Shea said. "They've opened that up to the other players on the team and helped them appreciate some of the things they have here on the UMass campus."

That cultural influence began several years before, when Jaggassar's sister, Kerry Ann, began her collegiate field hockey career and is now an assistant coach with the team. Her presence on the team has helped both Jaggassar and Borneo develop their games and grow more comfortable with their surroundings as a mentor, especially to Jaggassar.

"Having Kerry Ann here as a coach made it a smooth transition into [UMass]," Borneo says.

"She has been like a pain in my butt," Jaggassar said jokingly, though the reality is that her sister has helped keep Jaggassar on top of her game. "She's a driving force. When I can't motivate myself, she will say something to get me fired up."

"At first, it was tough because I had such high expectations," Kerry Ann said. "I had been [at UMass] for four years and hadn't grown to know her as much, but it worked out OK."

When asked if she thought her sister was tougher on her than the other players, Jaggassar says, "I think so, but don't tell her that."

Both Borneo and Jaggassar came to UMass with a great deal of experience, representing their native country in a number of international tournaments, as well as winning championships for their high school, St. Augustine's Girls' School in Trinidad and Tobago.

Both players participated in the Junior Nationals for the Trinidad squad, and in 2003 and 2004, Borneo played in the Senior Nationals, as well as the Pan American games in 2003.

"It was great being part of the national team, to represent your country," Borneo said. "Later on, when I played in Santo Domingo [in the Pan Am games], it was even more of a great opportunity because I was coming into my sophomore year, and I felt that the international experience would no doubt help the team."

"Seeing how I was the oldest player on the [Junior] National team, it helped me to be more of a leader," Jaggassar said of leading her team in the 2005 Junior Nationals in March. "When I came back to [UMass], I realized I was talking to people more, and ordering people on the field more – it just made me more vocal."

Field hockey began at a young age for both Borneo and Jaggassar, who first learned the game in middle school. As they progressed, they left their mark on the game at each stop along the way. Playing for St. Augustine's in high school, they played in both indoor and outdoor leagues, always ranked as one of the top teams in the country.

"We were always a competitive team, both indoor and outdoor, so during my time there, we've seen a lot of success," Borneo said of her high school teams. "There was no tournament. We would go to where people wouldn't recognize us."

Both girls cite their high school coach, Nicholas Pohan, as a great influence on both as athletes and students.

"All the basics that I know came from him," Jaggassar said of her coach at St. Augustine's.

"I started off with him [as my coach] not knowing anything about the sport," Borneo says. "He would

See F. HOCKEY on page 9

Grading UMass' '05 season

By Danny Picard
Collegian Columnist

So here we are, more than a week after the Atlantic 10 Tournament in Philadelphia. The smoke has settled, and the sun has set on the 2005 Massachusetts field hockey season.

Nonetheless, the Minutewomen had a successful campaign, as they had their season end in a heartbreaking loss to No. 20 Richmond in the A-10 Finals on Saturday. They were one win away from advancing to the NCAA Tournament, but were stopped in their tracks by a Richmond team that is very familiar with them.

The loss marked the third time in four years that the Minutewomen have been eliminated by the Spiders in the A-10 Finals, but let's not make it look like a disappointing season for the Maroon and White.

After all, UMass came out of the gate with an 0-4 start, and things were not looking too good while the Minutewomen were sporting a dismal 3-9 record more than halfway through the season.

For most teams, a 3-9 start to a season would be a cause for concern, but this UMass team kept its composure. The Minutewomen won four of its next six A-10 games, and battled their way into the A-10 tournament as the No. 3 seed.

While the outcome of the weekend did not go as planned, the Minutewomen cannot, and should not hang their heads on what was a most exciting season.

In every season, however, there are questions asked when a team comes home without a championship, and I am here to give you the answers.

Here is my End of the Season Report Card:

Coaching: A

Patty Shea, Steve Simpson and Kerry Ann Jaggassar did a great job getting the Minutewomen

See GRADES on page 9

Koppen out for season

FOXBOROUGH, Mass. (AP) — Patriots center Dan Koppen has been lost for the rest of the season with a shoulder injury suffered during Sunday's 23-to-16 win over Miami.

Koppen, 26, a three-year NFL veteran, has played in 41 games with New England, including 40 starts, since being selected in the fifth round of the 2003 draft. The former Boston College player took over the starting job in the second game of his rookie season.

The Patriots also put defensive back Randall Gay, 23, on injured reserve for the rest of the year with an ankle injury, further hobbling the team's injury-riddled defense.

In other moves, the team signed free agent cornerback Artrell Hawkins, 28, and free agent offensive lineman Gene Mruczkowski, 25, who has been with the team off and on during the past three seasons and can play either guard or center.

Associated Press

STONE / BOSTON HERALD

Patriots center Dan Koppen will miss the remainder of New England's season with a shoulder injury he sustained on Sunday.

Pujols grabs National League MVP

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Albert Pujols started his career with four startling seasons, equal or better than those of many Hall of Famers. Only Barry Bonds always did better — until this year.

Pujols won his first National League MVP award Tuesday, beating Andruw Jones in a close vote that didn't include Bonds, who missed most of the season because of a knee injury.

"A lot of the fans and even the players, they missed Barry," Pujols said of the seven-time MVP, who had won the previous four seasons. "I wished he would have been healthy and played."

Pujols, the St. Louis Cardinals' first baseman, received 18 first-place votes and 14 seconds for 378 points in balloting by the Baseball Writers' Association of America. Jones, the Atlanta Braves' center fielder, got 13 firsts, 17 seconds and two thirds for 351 points.

Chicago Cubs first baseman Derrek Lee got the other first-place vote and was third with 263 points.

"It's awesome when you hear people compare yourself with Barry," Pujols said.

Pujols hit .330 with 41 homers and 117 RBIs. His average was second, five points behind Lee, and he trailed only Jones (51) and Lee (46) in homers. He tied for second in RBIs with 117, 11 behind Jones.

Jones led the major leagues in home runs, batted .263 and won his eighth straight Gold Glove.

"I think he deserved it. The voting was the right vote. He was the right choice," Jones said. "He had the most solid season average wise, home-run wise and RBI wise."

Pujols played in 161 of 162 regular-season games despite being bothered nearly the entire season by plantar fasciitis, a heel injury that he also felt in 2004.

"There were some times when I got out of bed, I had to sit up before I jumped out of bed because it was bothering me so bad," he said.

The 25-year-old Pujols has put up remarkable statistics in his first five major league seasons, averaging 40 homers and 124 RBIs to go with a .332 average.

He was third behind Bonds and Adrian Beltre in last year's MVP voting after finishing fourth as a rookie in 2001 and second to Bonds the following two seasons. Bonds missed most of this year with a knee injury after winning the award four straight times to increase his total MVPs to a record seven.

The Cardinals led the majors with 100 wins this season and breezed to the Central title. Pujols was the driving force on a team that lost Scott Rolen and other key players to injuries.

Atlanta went 90-72 and won its 14th straight division championship. Jones was the only Braves player with more than 21 homers or 78 RBIs.

Steroids penalty gets extended

By Howard Fendrich
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Major league players and owners agreed to toughen penalties for steroid use to a 50-game suspension for a first failed test, 100 games for a second and a lifetime ban for a third.

Baseball also will test for amphetamines for the first time starting next year under the deal, which must be ratified by both sides.

Baseball's current steroid penalties are a 10-day suspension for a first offense, 30 days for a second offense and 60 days for a third. The earliest a player could be banned for life is a fifth offense.

"This is an important step to reaching our goal of ridding our sport of performance-enhancing substances and should restore the integrity of and public confidence in our great game," commissioner Bud Selig said in a statement. "I appreciate the effort put forward by the players' association and our players in reaching this new agreement."

After winning the NL MVP award Tuesday, the St. Louis Cardinals' Albert Pujols said he supported the tougher punishments.

"I think that if you get caught the third time, I mean that's real bad, you should get abandoned from the game," Pujols said. "You shouldn't be able to be caught the third time because after the first time, if you don't learn from that, from 50 games that you sit down without getting paid, that's pretty bad."

The sport's second new steroids agreement in 10 months came after lengthy negotiations prompted by urging from Congress — including the threat of legislation that would require higher penalties and stricter testing standards.

"This agreement reaffirms that major league players are committed to the elimination of performance-enhancing substances and that the system of collective bargaining is responsive and effective in dealing with issues of this type," union head Donald Fehr said in a statement.

Representatives of the owners and players were on Capitol Hill on Tuesday for meetings with Sen. Jim Bunning, R-Ky., and House Government Reform Committee Chairman Tom Davis, R-Va. They are among a handful of lawmakers who have introduced steroids bills — and it was Davis' panel that held the March 17 hearing with Rafael Palmeiro, Mark McGwire and Jose Canseco.

At that hearing, Selig and Fehr were scolded for what congressmen called a weak penalty system for drug testing.

The next month, Selig made a 50-100-lifetime proposal. In September, Fehr countered with 20 games, 75 games and, for a third offense, a penalty set by the commissioner.

The players' association appeared to pretty much capitulate to Selig's April demands, except for gaining the right to have an arbitrator review reinstatement decisions. Fehr was not available for comment, union spokesman Greg Bouris said.

At a Sept. 28 hearing of the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., scolded Fehr in particular for not having reached a deal on a new steroids policy.

See DRUGS on page 10

WHAT'S THE SCORE?

New England's Largest College Daily · Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Thursday, November 17, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXVI Issue 49

SGA says no to warrant-less bag searches

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association of the University of Massachusetts voted unanimously last night for a resolution against possible warrant-less bag searches in residence hall entrances around campus.

Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano had instructed the Student Affairs Judicial Issues Committee (SAJIC) to determine how to implement searches of the personal effects of all students entering the residence halls on campus. The SGA's resolution calls for SAJIC to reject and permanently bar consideration of allowing searches, claiming that warrant-less searches are "unconstitutional."

SGA Senators claimed that warrant-less bag searches violate the Fourth Amendment of the United States Constitution, which protects citizens against unreasonable searches and seizures, and maintains that all searches require probable cause, or a warrant describing the place to be searched and the persons of things to be seized.

The UMass Residence Hall contract in Section XVI reads, "The University will not intrude into a student's personal effects or otherwise search a room except with the permission of the student, or by appropriate legal authorities with a search warrant."

In an email sent to all UMass students, Gargano advised of extra security precautions beginning today. He asked all students to be prepared to show University photo identification; sign in all guests, who also must show photo identification upon entering the hall; assume full responsibility for their guests; and enter and exit residence halls using the main entrance.

"While the additional security will not impact daily life, the increased security measures will be focused on addressing the destruction of property in the residence halls resulting in drunken behavior," Gargano stated in the email.

According to Gargano, college drinking causes 1,700 student deaths, 599,000 unintentional injuries, 696,000

See SGA on page 2

JAMIE LAU / COLLEGIAN

SGA President Pavel Payano addressed the Senate during last night's meeting. The Senate unanimously passed a resolution against possible warrant-less bag searches on students in dormitories.

SCERA lays down demands for UMass

By Christina Baron
Collegian Staff

A coalition of students, faculty, and staff from the University of Massachusetts attended the UMass Board of Trustees meeting at the Mullins Center yesterday morning to ask the board for a more accessible, diverse and democratic university.

The coalition of approximately 45 students from the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) stood in the back of the Massachusetts Room at the Mullins Center in support of UMass Student Trustee Valerie Louis's report to the Board.

Louis spoke to the Board of Trustees on the issue of diversity at UMass Amherst. As a black woman, she said she was surprised when she came to the University and saw "faculty who didn't look like me, administrators who didn't look like me, and students who didn't look like me."

Louis asked the Board of Trustees to "begin to practice what you preach." She said the Board is contradicting itself by emphasizing the diversity on the UMass campus, yet at the same time calling for higher standards to enter the university and privatizing many of its public functions.

At the conclusion of her address, the SCERA students broke into a chorus, singing "We shall not be moved." During the address the students also passed out proposals to the audience and trustees calling for "Affordability, Diversity, Democracy, and Accountability."

Megan McDonough, the president of the Graduate Employee Organization, Daniel Clawson, the president of the Massachusetts Society of Professors, and Kathy Rhines, the president of the Professional Staff Union, also addressed the Board of Trustees on contract and union issues.

McDonough started off the guest speaker session by asking the board to assist the GEO in its lobbying effort to get their contracts funded. The GEO contracts for 2004-2007, which were voted on in May and signed by UMass President Jack Wilson in August, have been awaiting funding on Beacon Hill for the past three months.

In the president's report to the board, Wilson said that he is working hard on the contract issue and is optimistic.

Clawson began by thanking the Board for meeting the challenge to make UMass a competitive research

See TRUSTEES on page 2

Clinton staffer speaks to UMass students

By Matt Hoffman
Collegian Staff

A senior staffer in the Public Affairs department for the White House under President Bill Clinton addressed 40 people last night in the University of Massachusetts Campus Center.

Robert Weiner, who worked for Clinton from 1995 to 2000, spoke at the "Media Handling of High Profile National Issues" lecture. Weiner spoke about such issues as the Iraq war, Hurricane Katrina, the recent overhaul in social security, soaring gas prices, and numerous Supreme Court nominations.

Dean of the College of Humanities and Fine Arts Lee Edwards noted that Weiner's talk touches on a "very timely topic," since the issues are still prominent.

Weiner said that he came to UMass to speak because "we all want to contribute back to the campus community." Weiner has a master's degree in history from UMass. Two of his history professors were in attendance.

Weiner is active in politics and has directed the general press room at the last five Democratic National Conventions. He discussed President George W. Bush's popularity rating, which stands at 35 to 37 percent, down from an all-time high of 90 percent immediately following the 9/11 attacks.

In addition, Weiner discussed Bush's international drug policy. He claims that the Bush administration has chosen not to pursue curbing the opium drug trade in Afghanistan, although the activity of that operation has increased dramatically and helps to fund Al-Qaeda, he said.

Weiner also contended that the real reason behind the lack of effort is that Bush stretched the resources of the American troops to an extreme level.

"We need to put a plan in place in Afghanistan similar to the one that we had in place for Columbia," said Weiner, who claimed that he decreased the incoming levels of drugs to the United States as spokesman and director of public affairs for White House Drug Czar and Four Star General Barry McCaffery under President Clinton.

Weiner also lamented the disproportionate control afforded to oil companies. Despite the worries over the destruction of oil rigs from Hurricane Katrina, a record $100 billion was recorded as profit by the oil companies in the past quarter — $10 billion alone by the mega-company ExxonMobil.

"That figure is the highest quarterly profit of any company ever. The oil companies raised gas prices 24 cents in 24 hours after Katrina, exploiting fear for no empirical reason.

"One basic thing I learned was that the Anti-Trust Act was supposed to stop big monopolies from being created so that there would not be control of prices. Listen to the names: Exxon and Mobil. How much bigger could each be? Is there any longer any point to the Anti-Trust Act if not to stop that sort of thing?" he said.

Weiner talked about the fact that a Parade Magazine survey indicated that Saddam Hussein was the sixth worst dictator in the world, with the dictators in Korea, Burma, Iran, Syria, China, and Libya being equally as horrific or worse.

"Hussein is by all means a horrible person — he gassed his own people," he said. However, Weiner stressed that America is not the world's police and has limited resources at her disposal.

"Media is impacted by the power of those in power. It's understandable — you want sources who control events and policies that happen," Weiner said. He said when he took a job with the White House in 1995, "suddenly my releases and calls to the press meant something again. The White House ran agencies and could make things happen for people."

JAMIE LAU / COLLEGIAN

Robert Weiner, a senior staffer in the Public Affairs department under President Bill Clinton spoke to students at UMass last night about current political issues.

How did the radio help save New Orleans?

By Emily Morris
Collegian Correspondent

Speakers at the "Radio Saved the City of New Orleans" lecture at the University of Massachusetts's Memorial Hall explained last night how radio helped survivors of Hurricane Katrina.

The lecture was the first of the UMass journalism department's Lecture Series in Broadcast and the Media.

Thanks to 1979 alumni David Kantor's donation, a group of students, led by journalism faculty member B.J. Roche, brought two local New Orleans heroes to the UMass to tell their stories.

Monica Pierre is an Emmy Award winning news director for Clear Channel Radio, and Ernesto Schweikert is a leading voice on Radio Tropical, a Spanish language radio station in New Orleans. Both radio personalities were credited with saving lives on-air in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

Both Pierre and Schweikert have slowly been realizing their impact on the communities of New Orleans and beyond in the aftermath of Katrina.

Even yesterday, a police woman told Pierre "you all saved our lives." The woman walked 23 miles to the Superdome after hearing Pierre's plea on the radio to evacuate before Katrina hit.

"It's a humbling statement," Pierre said about her new label as "radio heroine."

"You were the only source of information," another thankful listener told Pierre. "You were a familiar voice."

Shweikert, who is originally from Guatemala, never intended to entertain radio as a profession.

"I came to New Orleans and started a travel business," he said. But after seeing how lucrative advertising on Radio Tropical was to his Spanish audience, he bought the small station.

See RADIO on page 2

S.O.M. students pack Campus Center for Responsibility Fair

By Matt O'Rourke
Collegian Staff

First-year Isenberg School of Management students packed into the University of Massachusetts Campus Center Auditorium Monday night for the second part of the Business and Social Responsibility Fair.

The fair is part of a first-year seminar for S.O.M. students called "Transitions," which introduces them to various aspects of the school, the university and the surrounding community. The seminar is divided into 30 small sections of roughly 15 to 20 students each and culminates with the fair.

"[The fair] increases the focus on a business's role in society," said Dennis M. Hanno, Associate Dean for Undergraduates at S.O.M. "It gives students a chance to think about ethics early on in their career."

Featuring topics as diverse as Starbucks Coffee's involvement with Fair Trade to Larry Flynt's Hustler vs. Falwell court victory, students examined both companies that have been socially responsible and those which have not.

"Over the years there have been many protests about how Starbucks obtains and grows their coffee," said Paul Mcalamey, an S.O.M. premajor who researched the company. "Recently they've been getting better about using fair trade, increasing their use of 'shade-trees' which results in better yields for poor farmers."

Through fair trade, Starbucks is required to pay a flat rate of $1.26 per pound to farmers to help them improve the quality of their life and the technology they use. In the past, Starbucks has relied heavily on free trade, but they've come under criticism from environmentalists and human rights groups like Oxfam, who cite that free trade allows the company to pay as low as 10 cents per pound of coffee.

The exhibition of student projects occurs over two nights. Students who aren't presenting on the first night evaluate other students, which helps determine a student's grade, along with a teaching assistant's evaluation.

"The assignments are determined via a lottery system," said Hanno, "so students don't know who will be coming to see them until the night of the presentation."

Management major Matt Broderick, who studied the Larry Flynt court case, said he was able to take something away from the fair. "We chose to study freedom of speech in the media, and how that impacts what a business, such as a magazine, can or cannot say," he said.

At another table, the impact of Microsoft's investments into the University, including the recent construction of the Learning Commons at the W.E.B. DuBois Library, were explored.

"Microsoft has given a lot back to campus," said Arielle Gendzel, a freshman. "They've debuted some of their newest technology for students, which benefits everyone overall."

See SOM on page 2

JAMIE LAU / COLLEGIAN

Crash...

Residents Laura Rhatigan and Benjamin Feder evacuated their North Pleasant Street apartment yesterday after a large tree crashed onto the roof, damaging the interior as branches punched through the ceiling.

ARTS & LIVING

REVOLUTION AT UMASS

O.A.R. to rock Mullins Center tonight.

PAGE 6

EDITORIAL/OPINION

DISMAL FAN SUPPORT

UMass fans need to step up the support for the Minutemen.

PAGE 5

WEATHER

TODAY Pt. Cloudy H46°

TONIGHT Pt. Cloudy L33°

TOMORROW Pt. Cloudy, H41°, L22°

SPORTS

SEASON ON THE LINE

The Minutemen head into their season finale against Hofstra knowing one thing: Win or go home.

PAGE 12

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Michael Busack
MANAGING EDITOR Cameron J. Woods
BUSINESS MANAGER Hiral Shah
PRODUCTION MANAGER Nicholas Belanger
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Sherel Wolnik
ADVERTISING MANAGER Kerrs O'Grady
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Lauren Egavian
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Amanda Allen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Matthew O'Rourke
COMICS EDITOR Amanda Allen
EDITORIAL EDITOR Allison Edles
NEWS EDITOR Dan O'Brien
PHOTO EDITOR Kate Sachsenmaier
SPORTS EDITOR Jeff Howe
CIRCULATION MANAGER Thomas Hecht
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Nick Gleason
FINANCE MANAGER Daniel Conti
HUMAN RESOURCE Phil Smoller
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Caren Tortorici
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Nathan Chomsky
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Mackenzie Isler
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Ian Jones
ASSISTANT NEWS Megan Daley
ASSISTANT NEWS Matt Bellineau
ASSISTANT PHOTO Elizabeth Caristi
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eric Athas
ASSISTANT SPORTS Dan Duggan
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Kristen LaCasse

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SCAN IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE DAILY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967. THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 5:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Sheryl Wolnik
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Jamie Lau
COPY EDITOR
Katie Huston
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Ginny Nieken
PRODUCTION STAFF
Chris Martin, Kristen LaCasse

SGA against bag searches

SGA from page 1

assaults, 79,000 sexual assaults and academic consequences for 25 percent of all students.

"I have heard from your student peers, many of your parents, concerned faculty and staff and the maintainers who clean up the vomit and vandalized residence hall bathrooms on Thursday, Friday and Saturday evenings," stated Gargano in his email to students. "They have all advised Student Affairs and Campus Life to take to take the necessary steps to change the culture of alcohol issue."

The Senate recommended that Gargano immediately withdraw and never resubmit his consideration. The Senate also stated that if Gargano refuses to affirm their proposal that the referendum be sent to Chancellor John Lombardi for his consideration and then, if rejected by Lombardi, moved the Board of Trustees.

In other SGA motions, the SGA Senators voted to resolve a recommendation that would keep the student activities fee at $81 per year.

The SGA Ways and Means committee is planning to hold a community workshop for Residential Student Organization to advise the organizations on the proper way of applying for next year's SGA budget. The workshop is set to be conducted Dec. 14 and the location is to be announced within the month.

In last week's meeting SGA President Paivel Payano raised concern over the impact the new North Residential Area, which is still under construction, would have on the Worcester Dining Common, claiming that the dining common is already overcrowded and that adding more students would only aggravate the problem.

Chairman Eric Robbie furthered those concerns this week by voicing his concern over next year's renovations of the Berkshire Dining Common in Southwest. This would leave the Southwest campus with only one dining common, the Hampshire Dining Common, during renovations.

"I work in Hampshire and I know there's no way we will be able to maintain all of those students," Robbie said.

Southwest area governors are planning to meet and discuss the problems that await the area.

Radio helps Katrina victims

RADIO from page 1

Radio Tropical is a small AM station in the heart of New Orleans. During the storm, the station lost power and did not have a strong signal, but the size of the station did not keep Shweikert from going on-air amidst death and destruction.

"There wasn't any power, so we had a generator to keep a TV running and at night we read the news by candle," he said.

Since all of the news that Radio Tropical received was from other English-language stations in the area, Shweikert had to translate all of the news into Spanish for the 180,000 Spanish speaking people of New Orleans.

Radio Tropical also shared signals with radio stations in Honduras, Mexico, Guatemala and Argentina so families could reach one another. He even received a call from a Spanish family in Japan searching for a family member in New Orleans.

This radio personality crossed the line from a journalist and businessman to a humanitarian and hero, even using his press-pass privileges to search for one listener's relatives. The man begged Shweikert to go to his aunt's house, and when he did he found her dead on the top floor, trying to escape the floodwaters.

Not every story ended fatally. Pierre worked with the United Radio Broadcasters, which linked up to 18 stations together sharing one signal to help callers find loved ones and get the latest news about the flooding to listeners.

While helping people cope with their losses and find loved ones, Pierre said, "[I] didn't have any time to think about myself because too many other people were hurting and too many people were dying."

Pierre says she wishes people heard more about the stories of average people saving lives across the city. She explains she did all that she could do when people needed her for information, and never considered it heroic.

As a result of Shweikert's efforts to reach out to the Spanish-speaking community, the FCC is now creating a multi-language emergency radio broadcast channel, which will help people who were unable to understand the warnings and calls for evacuations on the English language stations during Katrina.

From right, Ernesto Schweikertz of Radio Tropical and Monica Pierre of Clear Channel Radio in New Orleans explain their roles in providing crucial information to people in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

Faculty seek help from UMass trustees

TRUSTEES from page 1

university by increasing its number of faculty. He also repeated McDonough's request, saying that it is not "a winning message" to have unfunded contracts when the university is trying to attract new professors.

Clawson said that he believed that UMass was in a "moment of renewal and transition" and that the board must decide what kind of university UMass will become. He said he hoped it would be one of working and middle class, black and white, and newfound ideas as well as traditional wisdom.

Rhines asked the trustees to push for UMass to respect the recent vote of the Professional Staff Union to be affiliated with the Massachusetts Teachers Association. Last Wednesday the Professional Staff Union voted to move from the Service Employees International Union to MTA, but UMass officials have not recognized the MTA as their bargaining union, according to Rhines.

During the reports of the standing committees, the trustees voted to approve appointments to professorships, the fiscal year (FY) 2007 state budget request, and FY 2005 University Financial Report. The board also heard from the newly founded Science and Technology Task Force, which gathered data from all UMass campuses to assess their science and technology research programs.

Lawmakers reject death penalty bill

BOSTON (AP) — Gov. Mitt Romney had hoped to overcome the biggest fear of death penalty opponents — the possibility of executing an innocent person — by forcing prosecutors to climb the highest evidentiary wall possible.

In the end, it wasn't high enough.

On Tuesday, House lawmakers soundly rejected Romney's death penalty bill, dashing the Republican governor's hopes of establishing a national "gold standard" for capital punishment in liberal Massachusetts.

Romney had touted the bill as foolproof, saying it would have strict safeguards and seek executions in "very, very rare circumstances," such as terrorism, serial killing or murdering police officers or other public servants.

But critics said there's no way to craft a foolproof death penalty bill and that innocent people could still be put to death.

The House defeated the bill on a 99-to-53 vote after more than four hours of impassioned debate. The Senate hasn't scheduled a debate on the bill.

Rep. John Keenan, D-Salem, a descendant of one of the victims of the Salem witch trials, said even the most sophisticated DNA evidence can't erase human error, prejudice or fear.

— Associated Press

S.O.M. responsibility

SOM from page 1

The fair began last semester and was successful, according to Hanno. Future projects similar to the fair, such as an ethics competition, are in the works with some alumni who have made financial contributions to the school.

"I feel that we've done our job well if students realize that business does not operate in a vacuum," he said. "There may be six Wal-Mart presentations, three will tell you they're responsible, and three will tell you otherwise, but at least we know what the students thought about it.

"The fair also provides a chance for first-year students to get to know each other and work in groups," Hanno said.

Youth vote doubled in 2004, stats show

KRT

Voters make their way to and from the polls in Suffolk, VA last week.

By RON FOURNIER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Turns out, the kids rocked after all.

Nearly half of all eligible young voters cast ballots in the November 2004 election, raising their turnout rate by more than twice any other age group.

"This is big," said David King, associate director of the Institute of Politics at Harvard University who highlighted the Census Bureau findings in an IOP report Wednesday. "When you vote young, you're much more likely to vote the rest of your life, so the 2004 campaign turned a generation on to politics."

Exit polls from Election Day 2004 had shown that 9 percent of voters were 18 to 24, about the same proportion of the electorate as in 2000. Those figures were interpreted as a sign that young voters failed to increase their political impact in an election that focused on the Iraq war and included unsubstantiated rumors that the Bush administration might impose the draft.

The Census numbers suggest that young voters did get involved.

About 47 percent of Americans 18-24 voted in 2004, up from 36 percent in 2000, according to the Census Bureau. No other age group increased its turnout by more than 5 percentage points.

Even with the increase, the youngest voters still had the lowest turnout rate. Nearly three of every four people aged 55-74 voted in 2004.

Those numbers explain why elderly voters are highly prized by candidates. But they also suggest there is enormous potential in the young vote, and that efforts by President Bush and Democratic rival John Kerry to recruit college-age students were worth the trouble.

The 18-24 set made up 9 percent of the electorate last year, up very slightly from 8 percent the previous election. It's unclear what that might mean for the young vote in the future.

"Will it work for kids who were 14 years old in 2004? No idea. That work still remains to be done," King said. "But the 2004 campaign itself was an immense mobilizing event, bringing out the largest percent of young voters in 32 years."

Democrats found hope in the statistics because, according to exit polls, Kerry won 56 percent of votes cast by people aged 18-24. Bush earned 43 percent of their votes.

The Census Bureau statistics have their limitations. Unlike exit polls that capture voters as they leave balloting stations, the Census relies on people to be honest and accurate about their past voting behavior.

Still, King and others said there was no reason to believe one age group would start exaggerating voting habits more than others.

"If there is a lot of social pressure to vote, we find that based on class or incomes, not based on age," King said.

"There is some suspicion that there is over-reporting, but we don't have any way of telling who is telling us the truth and who isn't," said Kurt Bauman, chief of the Census Bureau's education section.

Sheehan pleads not guilty in court

By PETE YOST
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — War protester Cindy Sheehan and several others pleaded not guilty Wednesday to charges of demonstrating without a permit outside the White House.

The protesters, who face fines and not jail time, were being tried Wednesday afternoon by U.S. Magistrate Alan Kay after several hours of talks with court officials about how quickly their trial could be wrapped up.

Before the trial began, Sheehan announced plans to revive her protest near President Bush's Texas ranch during Thanksgiving week, despite new county ordinances banning roadside camping.

Sheehan and other anti-war activists arrested with her Sept. 26 in Washington conducted a news conference in front of the federal courthouse Wednesday before heading to a court appearance on the misdemeanor charge.

Sheehan, whose 24-year-old soldier son Casey was killed in Iraq last year, said "2,062 people have been killed as of today in this monstrosity."

She and more than 300 others were arrested as they gathered near an entrance to the White House grounds in the September protest. Each carried a board bearing the name of a U.S. soldier killed in Iraq.

The arrests outside the White House concluded a weekend of protests that drew more than 100,000 anti-war activists and a smaller group of counterprotesters. It was the largest anti-war demonstration since the Vietnam War.

Those arrested got $50 tickets and authorities charged them with protesting without a permit. All were released.

In Texas next week, Sheehan and at least a dozen supporters are prepared to be arrested as they return to the makeshift campsite along the road leading to Bush's ranch, where he is expected to spend the holiday.

"It is critical for our democracy that we continue to ask the same questions that Cindy Sheehan asked this summer: What is the noble cause for the war with Iraq, and at what point do we say enough bloodshed has happened?" Hadi Jawad, co-founder of the Crawford Peace House, said Tuesday.

Bush defends the decision to go into Iraq in 2003, citing the threat posed by Saddam Hussein. The president says troops will remain in Iraq as long as necessary.

Sheehan was not arrested during her 26-day vigil that coincided with Bush's working vacation at his ranch just outside Crawford.

But dozens of residents in the rural area complained of noise and traffic congestion as the protesters pitched tents in shallow ditches about 2 1/2 miles away from the ranch. Some traffic was from counter protests of hundreds of Bush supporters who said Sheehan's group was hurting troop morale

Anti-war "Peace Mom" Cindy Sheehan speaks at UMass last Friday. She pleaded not guilty in a Washington, D.C. court yesterday for demonstrating without a permit outside the White House on Sept. 26.

Amherst's CopyCat sued for violating copyright laws

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — A group of publishers is suing two printing companies for allegedly copying materials without permission for teachers at the University of Massachusetts and Northeastern University.

In separate lawsuits filed Tuesday in U.S. District Court in Boston and Springfield, the 10 publishers say the copy shops violated federal copyright laws by failing to get the OK to reproduce their materials.

One complaint accuses Gnomon Copy in Boston of 69 counts of copyright infringement. The lawsuit says the business printed up coursepacks — which are compilations of excerpted materials — for teachers at Northeastern.

But Gnomon allegedly never got the clearance it needed from the publishers, which include the American Psychological Association, Elsevier, Houghton Mifflin, Pearson Education, Princeton University Press, Sage Publications, Thomson Learning, the University of Chicago and John Wiley & Sons.

"I don't know what they're talking about," said Julie Knapp, Gnomon's owner.

The other lawsuit targets CopyCat Print Shop in Amherst, alleging the store didn't get permission from Harvard Business School Publishing, Elsevier, Princeton University Press, John Wiley & Sons, SAGE Publications and the American Psychological Association to produce coursepacks for UMass instructors.

The complaint names Reza Shafii and his wife Jennifer Shafii as the defendants in the lawsuit, but Reza Shafii said he doesn't own the Amherst shop. He said he owns six other CopyCat shops in western Massachusetts, but they produce very few coursepacks. Ray Shafii, a relative of his, owns the Amherst store, but is not named in the lawsuit. Ray Shafii did not immediately return a telephone call seeking comment.

Associated Press

For the record...

In Monday's Daily Collegian, the word "pro-abortion" was incorrectly linked to pro-choice groups in an article outlining a speech by Planned Parenthood interim president Karen Pearl.

We apologize to our readers for the error.

Thinking about an internship for the spring?

Come Today!
INTERNSHIP INFO SESSION
Learn the process from staff and students who know the ropes!

Thurs, Nov 17th
3pm
Calipari Room, Dubois Library

phone 413-545-2224
fax 413-545-4426
www.umass.edu/careers
CareerServices
Career Services Office
UMass Amherst
511 Goodell Building
a division of Student Affairs & Campus Life

SOUP & ARTISAN BREAD SPECIAL

SOUPS:
Aztec Vegetable, French Onion, Clam Chowder and Thai Fire and Rice Chicken

BREADS:
Tomato Parsley, Honey Wheat, Garlic Semolina and French Baguette

DINING SERVICES UMassAmherst

November 21st from 5-8pm in all DCs

NATIONAL AND WORLD NEWS

Top Guatemalan officials held by U.S. for drug smuggling

WASHINGTON (AP) — Guatemala's top anti-drug investigators have been arrested on charges they conspired to import and distribute cocaine in the United States after being lured to America for what they thought was training on fighting drug traffickers.

A three-count indictment issued Wednesday by a federal grand jury in Washington names Adan Castillo, chief of Guatemala's special anti-drug police force, who has lamented the slow pace of progress in combating cocaine smugglers in Guatemala. Also indicted were Jorge Aguilar Garcia, Castillo's deputy, and Rubilio Orlando Palacios, another police official.

They were arrested Tuesday after arriving in the United States for Drug Enforcement Administration training on stopping drug trafficking in ports, Guatemala's interior minister and two U.S. law enforcement officials said. In reality, the DEA had been investigating the men for four months with the help of the Guatemalan government.

Authorities acted now because they had grown concerned that Castillo could compromise ongoing investigations, one U.S. official said. Both officials spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss details not contained in the indictment.

Castillo, Garcia and Palacios pleaded innocent to the charges in federal court Wednesday and were being held without bail.

"More than corrupting the public trust, these Guatemalan police officials have been Trojan horses for the very addiction and devastation that they were entrusted to prevent," DEA Administrator Karen Tandy said. She announced the indictment along with Alice Fisher, an assistant attorney general.

Guatemalan Interior Minister Carlo Vielman called the arrests "a strong blow to the infiltration of organized crime in the structures of the Guatemalan government."

U.S. officials say an estimated 75 percent of the cocaine that reaches American soil passes through Guatemala, in part because its government long did little to stop it.

President Oscar Berger took office in January 2004 promising to undo the damage of his predecessor, Alfonso Portillo, who caused Washington to drop Guatemala from its list of anti-narcotics allies. But Berger has made little progress.

In a recent interview with The Associated Press, Castillo said as many as 4,000 smugglers operate in Guatemala. They get cocaine shipments and move them to the Mexican border, where more powerful gangs take over, he said.

Castillo said he was frustrated with the inability to stop the smuggling and was planning to leave his post in December, after just six months.

"There are moments when you start to think you're swimming against the current," he said.

—Associated Press

Sunnis allege secret torture by U.S.-backed Shiites in Iraq

By Chris Tomlinson
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Iraq's main Sunni Arab political party on Wednesday demanded an international investigation into allegations that security forces illegally detained and tortured suspected insurgents at secret jails in Baghdad.

Five U.S. Marines were killed in a firefight in the western Iraqi town of Obeidi near the Syrian border, the military said. That brought to 2,079 the number of U.S. service members who have died since the war began in 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

In Baghdad, Omar Ileikal of the Iraqi Islamic Party said it was now clear that majority Shiites in the U.S.-backed government were trying to suppress minority Sunnis ahead of the Dec. 15 parliamentary elections.

"Our information indicates that this is not the only place where torture is taking place," he said, reading an official party statement. The party "calls on the United Nations, the Arab League and humanitarian bodies to denounce these clear human rights violations, and we demand a fair, international probe so that all those who are involved in such practices will get their just punishment."

At least four Iraqi policemen were treated at Yarmouk Hospital for injuries they said were suffered in beatings by men who identified themselves as Interior Ministry commandos after they were stopped Monday on patrol in the Dora neighborhood of southwest Baghdad.

An Associated Press photographer and an AP Television News cameraman saw long, thin black and blue bruises and welts on their backs and shoulders. None of them appeared to be so seriously injured as to require hospitalization.

The men were visibly nervous and refused to speak in detail about their ordeal, fearing reprisals. They told AP journalists that they were blindfolded and taken to an unknown location but were released after the "Americans interfered." They refused to give their names or say more.

The AP tried to get comment Wednesday from the Interior Ministry were unsuccessful because the ministry had closed for the day and senior officials had switched off their mobile phones.

On Tuesday, Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari confirmed that more than 173 Interior Ministry prisoners were found malnourished and possibly tortured by government security forces at a Baghdad lockup Sunday.

Al-Jaafari's comments came a day after an Interior Ministry official said an investigation will be opened into allegations that its officers tortured suspects detained in connection with the insurgency.

"I was informed that there were 173 detainees held at an Interior Ministry prison and they appear to be malnourished. There is also some talk that they were subjected to some kind of torture," al-Jaafari told reporters.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said U.S. and Iraqi forces went into the facility in Baghdad suspecting that individuals there might not have been appropriately handled or managed, and "they found things that concerned them." Whitman said Wednesday he had no information about further investigations of Iraqi Ministry of Interior prisons.

France extends its state of emergency

PARIS (AP) — Parliament gave final approval Wednesday to extending France's state of emergency for three months after the government said the powers are still needed to end the country's worst civil unrest in four decades.

The Senate voted 202-125 to extend emergency powers until February. The extra powers — which were approved by the lower house on Tuesday — allow regional and local officials to impose curfews and permit police searches at night, among other measures.

Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy told the Senate that tensions in troubled neighborhoods justified the continued state of emergency powers. The number of towns affected by unrest dropped to 79 overnight, down from 102 the previous night and more than 300 at the peak of the unrest, he said.

Lawmakers in the left-leaning opposition Socialist Party said the government has been too slow to act to restore calm in the suburbs, where many of the rioters are unemployed youths of African and Arab descent.

"The government has been late in many, many," Sarkozy added. "The future cannot be built on violence."

The leftist opposition says the emergency powers, first put in place Nov. 9 for a 12-day period, are no longer needed.

Criticism has also mounted among others concerned that France is compromising its values and risks further enflaming passions. Dozens of groups held protests in Paris on Wednesday.

At a rally that drew several hundred people, demonstrators demanded what they called a "social state of emergency" that gives a voice to immigrants and their French offspring.

But Sarkozy said the emergency powers would be used responsibly and only where necessary. He told the Senate that 75-80 percent of the nearly 3,000 people arrested were already known to police.

—Associated Press

Bush visits Asia seeking greater support

By Terence Hunt
Associated Press

BUSAN, South Korea — Counseling resolve and patience, President Bush is looking for a show of unity among Asian leaders to press North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons program.

Among those gathering here for a 21-nation summit are the leaders of the five countries — the United States, China, South Korea, Russia and Japan — negotiating with North Korea for its nuclear disarmament. Bush was meeting Thursday with South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun after talks Wednesday in Japan with Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi that included a call for dismantling North Korea's nuclear program.

South Korea has resisted the tough approach advocated by the Bush administration for ending the impasse with North Korea, opposing the idea of military action if diplomacy fails. South Korea also is cool to the idea of taking the standoff to the U.N. Security Council for possible sanctions.

"The tone is different sometimes because, of course, for the people of the Republic of Korea, the demilitarized zone is right at their doorstep," said Mike Green, senior director for Asian affairs on the National Security Council.

Green said Seoul, the South Korean capital, is as close to the demilitarized zone separating the two countries and to North Korean artillery as the White House is to Dulles International Airport, some 30 miles outside Washington.

"It's very much a clear and present threat for the people," he said.

Green, talking with reporters on Air Force One as it flew to South Korea, said Bush and Roh would discuss ways to strengthen coordination on foreign policy. The objective was to have the pursuit of North-South reconciliation reinforce the disarmament talks, Green said. One proposal calls for a peace treaty to replace the armistice that halted the 1950-53 Korean War.

Bush and Roh were to confer in Gyeongju, the ancient capital of Korea.

Bush's eight-day journey to Asia offers him a reprieve from troubles at home, where his approval rating has fallen to the lowest point of his presidency. Unhappiness over the war in Iraq has hurt Bush's popularity and credibility, and Republicans are nervous about how the war and the president's other woes will affect next year's midterm elections.

Roh has been a major supporter of Bush's Iraq policy. South Korea is the third-largest contributor of troops behind the United States and Britain, deploying more than 3,000 soldiers. Like Bush, Roh's domestic approval ratings are down, and his foes call him a lame duck.

Bush flew here for the annual summit of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum, representing 21 countries that account for about half the world's trade. APEC is expected to call for progress at the next round of World Trade Organization talks in Hong Kong next month toward a global trade agreement.

APEC represents "a significant bloc in the WTO membership," said Faryar Shirzad, deputy national security adviser for international economic affairs. "And so when they speak and lay out an agenda of ambition, it's an agenda that the membership at the WTO takes note of and helps drive the negotiating dynamics in a constructive way."

In addition to the APEC meetings, Bush will hold separate talks with the leaders of Malaysia, Russia and Indonesia before traveling to China on Saturday.

President Bush and Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi meet at the State Guesthouse in Koyoto, Japan before talks yesterday.

If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!
POTTERS AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL
Insurance Replacement Rates FREE PICK-UP
• Direct Billing to Insurance Company
• Locally Owned & Operated
• 7 & 15 Passenger Vans
• UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates
North Amherst Motors
Collision Repairs & Glass Replacement
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
(413) 549-RENT (7368)
www.northamherstmotors.com
(One mile North of UMass - on bus route)

Could you make the Wizard of Oz on your laptop?
What once required a lot of heavy equipment can now be accomplished with lightweight, lightning-fast digital technology. If you have the know-how. That's why UMass Amherst offers a Certificate of Digital Media Production that'll give you the skills to produce the next Star Wars, eBay or Odeley.
DIGITAL MEDIA PRODUCTION
www.UMassULearn.net
413-545-2414
100 Venture Way, Hadley, MA
UMassAmherst Continuing Education

Winter-Session Housing
Taking a class this winter?
Need a place to stay?
Great rates available.
Howard Johnson
Econo Lodge BY CHOICE HOTELS
University Lodge
413-586-0114 413-582-7077 413-256-8111
www.hampshirehospitality.com

Cultural Survival
BAZAAR
Indigenous Crafts, Art & Music From Around The World
November 19 20
10:00am - 6:00pm
Northampton
Center for the Art
17 New South St. Suite 101
Northampton, MA
WWW.CS.ORG
617 441 5410

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it" Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The Minutemen need you

Jon Brandt

Last weekend, while many students decided to go home for the Veterans Day weekend, I chose to go to the United States Military Academy at West Point, New York to see our Minutemen go head to head against the Army Black Knights. Even though we ended up losing the game 34-27, it was a thrilling game that went back and forth until the final minutes of the fourth quarter. During the game I had a chance to see just how well our team could perform under pressure, and how they showed some great potential for success in the future. To be honest, it was in fact a pretty sloppy game, as UMass quarterback Liam Coen had three interceptions. However, he also managed to go 21-34 and throw for 213 yards. As he is only a freshman, I believe Liam will improve greatly after the experience of this season, and next year I think we have a great chance to once again be a huge factor in the A-10.

Regardless of the fact we lost the game, we were able to keep up with a bigger team for the majority of the time. Army is a Division 1A team, and while it is true that they are a pretty weak team in their division, they are still a bigger and better team than we are. Nevertheless, I see no reason why UMass should not be able to compete with teams like them, or dominate in the A-10 for that matter. I think we have a very good chance to do well in the playoffs this year, and if we keep it up there just might be a chance for a championship title.

I have heard many students arguing that we need a newer and bigger stadium with lights so we can play more night games. While it would be nice to get new facilities, the most important thing is that we get students in the stands. There is nothing that can replace fans cheering on their team, and the psychological factor for the opposing team's members when they have to play in a hostile environment is enormous. There were a few games this year where McGuirk Stadium managed to fill in nicely, but it still was not sold out. For the number of students who go to this school, the attendance at sporting events is terrible.

I have heard many students arguing that we need a newer and bigger stadium with lights so we can play more night games. While it would be nice to get new facilities, the most important thing is that we get students in the stands.

At West Point, every cadet is required to attend the football games. Obviously this would never even be thought of as a possibility at UMass, but we could take a lesson from the Black Knights. The corps is only comprised of 4,000 cadets, yet the student section manages to drown out everything else in the stadium. Michie Stadium, the home of the Black Knights, is a much larger stadium than ours, and yet they filled up almost the entire stadium last Saturday. Army has a record of 3-6, and yet every game their faithful fans come out and go nuts. UMass has a record of 7-3(6-1 A-10), and yet we have trouble getting even a few thousand fans to go, despite the fact that tickets are free to students.

If we want our team to do well, then we need to show our support. Everyone who enjoys college football or just loves this school needs to go out to every game next year and show what this school is about. If we keep getting a bad reputation as just a party school, then we should at least try to counter that with a good reputation as a school with good sports programs. While at West Point I was proud to see there were a large number of UMass fans in attendance. At least a quarter of the visiting side's stands were painted with maroon and white sweatshirts, which can give a great boost of confidence and pride to the players on the field.

What it all comes down to in the end is the fact that a team cannot truly be successful without the support of its fan base. Even though Army has basically had a pretty bad team for an extremely long time, they still somehow keep the money flowing in from alumni and boosters, as well as from high ticket sales. The fans have always remained loyal, as is clearly visible when you go to one of their games. I see no reason why UMass shouldn't be like this as well. The first part to winning is getting the support of the home front, and we clearly need to work on that.

Jon Brandt is a Collegian columnist.

No ordinary run in Amherst

Rebecca Paskievich

I have tripped while running numerous times since arriving here at UMass in September. Not just the I-lost-my-step-for-a-moment-and-then-kept-going trip; these were full-fledged wipeouts. The source: the bunny loops on my shoelaces were too large. The front of my foot got caught in the huge hoop of lace and I was flung forward onto the pavement ... twice.

The first time this occurred I was running on a trail behind the football field, where little kids practice soccer and people often walk their dogs. On this unseasonably cool October day, I was rocking out to Ashlee Simpson when all of a sudden, bam. I was on the ground. I tried to play it off like I was stretching; ya, I'm stretching in the middle of the path. A few seconds after my lunges to the left and right I got up and started a casual jog. Surprisingly enough I had held onto my iPod, yet it had jammed and wasn't working. I pretended I was bounding along with a beat as I limped back to my dorm room, praying nobody witnessed the fall.

Overly-wide shoelace loops are not the sole obstacle I face as an avid runner in the town of Amherst. The animal world and I also have some issues. The squirrels here are fearless and vicious. They see me running and are determined not to move from the path. They give me a devious stare, and I literally have stopped in my tracks and waited for a psycho squirrel to dart up a tree before continuing. Aren't they supposed to be afraid of me?

As mentioned earlier, where I run, from time to time people walk their dogs. They throw Frisbees and let their dogs run free. I'm glad they have this liberty, yet don't appreciate the incessant paranoia that surfaces when I see a pair of huskies running amuck on the path. I have always been a little cautious around dogs, and I literally panic when I see leashless pups.

There are always those owners who think I love it when their panting pawed pals sprint up to me and jump upon me while I'm attempting to enjoy a nice run. They laugh and insincerely apologize while they leisurely stroll over to where I am being attacked.

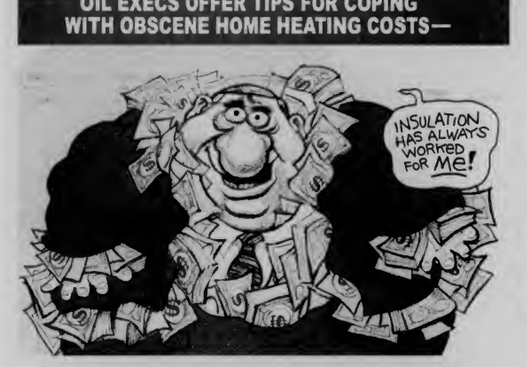
Now, when I see a dog in the distance, I turn off my music and avert eye contact as much as possible. I'm still debating whether to pick up the speed to pass them quickly or to go slow and steady as to not excite them. This may seem like an irrational preoccupation, but it's nerve-wracking when I'm trying to do crunches and a huge slobbery face appears on top of me ... not cool.

I want to warn all of you who intend to head out for a leisurely jog that what may start as a simple run could turn into a crazy adventure.

Here's another situation that contributes to my running stress.

On this same dog-filled path where I often run, there is a woman who runs at about the same time I do everyday. The first time we see each other we say hello with a smile and maybe even a little wave. The second time we exchange an awkward closed-mouth grin. The third time I pretend to be sorting through my iPod. The fourth time we pass I simply neglect to look her way ... I'm sure she's doing the same thing. It's just too much to say an enthusiastic hello with each passing. I don't want to seem mean, so I hope she's on the same track as I am in the thinking process of our daily greetings.

But back to my clumsiness. The second time I fell was even more embarrassing than the first. I was on a side street heading towards town, my mind off in another world as usual. Once again I was flung forward, but this time my iPod landed a good 10 feet ahead of me and I really got banged up. I landed on my right knee and it was cut open; gravel had dug its way into my palms. My legs and hands stung and I didn't even attempt to fake stretch. A woman in her car stopped to make sure I was okay. Once I got up she took off, saving me the embarrassment of reassuring me I was fine, just a klutz. I retrieved my iPod, which had a piece broken off, and continued on my run with blood dripping down my leg. I looked pretty hardcore but I was biting my lower lip with each stride to keep the tears from coming.



I've learned from these tragic trips, and I now take a solid 10 minutes before my runs to knot my shoelaces 700 times before heading out. I want to warn all of you who intend to head out for a leisurely jog that what may start as a simple run could turn into a crazy adventure. You never know what might pop up from the mounds of leaves on the sidewalk or if you'll trip and wipe out at a moment's notice.

I must admit one great thing has occurred since the start of my daily runs here in Amherst. When passing fellow runners, I now get the signature hip-height wave. I think I'm in. I'm an official "runner." I feel like I'm in the secret society that the hardcore runners belong to. I act like its no big deal, of course, and nod my head with the same level of suaveness that possessed their wave.

If you are a habitual runner, feel free to give me the old hello when you pass me (because you will most likely be passing me, not the other way around). I'll be the girl with bruised legs and a mangled iPod, singing aloud to Christina Aguilera as I run along the streets of Amherst ... avoiding as many dogs and oversized shoelace loops as possible.

Rebecca Paskievich is a UMass student.

OIL EXECS OFFER TIPS FOR COPING WITH OBSCENE HOME HEATING COSTS—

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

A SKEWED VISION OF DIVERSITY

Perhaps the most valuable skill acquired in college is the ability to think clearly and critically. Opinions are only valuable to the extent that they may be supported by clear thinking. When an opinion is made public, and is unsupported by logic, it only results in a tendency to dismiss the speaker's ideas outright. Such is the case with a recent editorial by Jeff Napolitano.

Mr. Napolitano asserts that because Massachusetts's diversity is increasing, UMass's decreasing diversity is the result of racial discrimination. First, this assumes that all people value and pursue college education to the same extent. This is not true, nor should it be. Some of the most successful people in society have dropped out of college or skipped it entirely.

Secondly, it fails to address the possibility that not all the people comprising Massachusetts's census data are of college age. If increased minority proportions include very young people, as is likely the case, we would not expect their representation at UMass to increase for several years.

Mr. Napolitano does not suggest any reasonable mechanism by which such race-based exclusion may occur. Race is not a required entry on UMass applications, and, in lieu of a crystal ball, I fail to see how the admissions department would conduct racial profiling otherwise. In any regard, I seriously doubt that either Mr. Gargano or Mr. Lombardi are directly involved in the admissions process, and any effort to deliberately exclude applicants based on race would require such a vast conspiracy that its existence is doubtful. I think both Mr. Gargano and Mr. Lombardi are owed an apology.

Mr. Napolitano misunderstands the message contained in the university's mission statement. "Accessible" is not the same thing as "not meritorious." Accessible means the college is open to all those who meet its academic standards; it does not mean it is open to anyone who wants to go.

As far as I know, academic ability is not the birthright of any one race or ethnicity, thus all races have equal access. Is Mr. Napolitano suggesting otherwise?

Finally, Mr. Napolitano's contention that by "the disproportionate number of white faces, we all know which race is being favored," is offensive on many levels. I am sure if he passed me on campus, Mr. Napolitano would racially profile me as another "white face." This completely discounts my heritage, which includes Latino and Native American roots, and the fact that I am a member of ALANA. Secondly, the most recent census of Massachusetts revealed the population is 84.5 percent white. Walking around campus and counting 10 people at random, not once in several attempts did I observe a sample which contained more than eight "white faces." Try it yourself.

Given these facts, how can Mr. Napolitano's position be taken seriously?

W. Parsons
UMass graduate student

A class to forget

Gilad Skolnick

We all breathed a sigh of relief when they left, the burden of UMass, the class of 2005, finally drunkenly stumbling out of our campus last spring, and I must say things have drastically improved.

Unlike such noble classes as the class of 1950, which has graced us with the beautiful statue of Sam the Minuteman, the class of 2005 has yet to provide a class gift. What are they waiting for? The clock is ticking, and UMass needs some campus beautification now more than ever. Knowing them, though, the best we can expect is a bench of some sort.

The class of 2005 brought us countless riots in Southwest, and the link between the riots and their four-year reign of disaster over UMass is clear — the first year they're gone, the riots stop. The Hobart Hoedown can be characterized by fire, destruction, panic and riots, the same words most people would use to characterize the class of 2005 who brought us this calamity. They were the only class to make the campus swans so uncomfortable they had to leave. They have brought sin, rudeness, a lack of recycling and excessive trampling on our beautiful lawns, all things that were once so foreign to our university.

. . . I have looked into the eyes of these graduates of 2005 and have seen no motivation or drive for success; just laziness — not to mention their pompous attitudes.

To be honest, these people, often referred to as the "lost generation," did struggle through some tough times. Many felt a lot of pressure for being the first incoming class of the new millennium. With Nicole Kidman and Tom Cruise's difficult separation in February of 2001 and the release of the dreadful movie "Rollerball" the following year, this was certainly a stressful time. Still, I have looked into the eyes of these graduates of 2005 and have seen no motivation or drive for success — just laziness, not to mention their pompous attitudes.

In contrast, the class of 2006 has brought a wave of tranquility and order to campus. With the addition of the bright minds of the class of 2006, a UMass degree will now mean something; no longer will it be diluted by the class of 2005 hooligans. Most people would agree that the class of 2006 is a beacon of light onto the world; unlike the stingy class of 2005, 2006 will probably donate something grand — like a few more floors to the top of the library, so we can regain the title of the tallest library in the country.

I myself have noticed a lot of students who used to be part of the class of 2005 have stayed another year, and this can be understood; who among us wouldn't do whatever it took not to be part of that horrid class?

These honorary members of 2006 should be treated with the utmost respect for the brave and noble step they took, and I am jealous of the ever-so-lucky class of 2009 who has been fortunate enough to enroll in UMass once 2005 left. Their early successes show there is no one to drag them down now.

Since 2005 left, rapid construction of new dorms has begun, a new state-of-the-art learning commons in the library has been completed, and RSOs have been getting more members than ever before, no longer held back by the disaster that calls itself 2005. In addition, enrollment has skyrocketed, and students have said in multiple unscientific polls that they feel more content with their lives.

The class of 2005 has set a new low in pathetic-ness. Yet we must remember that not every member of the class of 2005 has been responsible for this – just most of them. Now, how many of them are lawyers, doctors or professors? These UMass graduates are disturbingly virtually nonexistent in these professions, unlike UMass alumni from previous years.

We all sink or swim together, as the saying goes, and fortunately now we can swim again. My only wish is that the classes of 2007 to 2009 continue to emulate the strong example 2006 has set. May one day everyone be a bit more like the class of 2006. May be then we would have a better world.

Gilad Skolnick is a Collegian columnist

We need columnists and political cartoonists!
If interested contact us:
editorial@dailycollegian.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

A revolution in New England

By Allie Roth
Collegian Staff

Can one band, O.A.R., be held responsible for fueling the popularity of the game of poker in America? Recently, the popularity of poker has caused it to fully surpass Go Fish and Rummy put together. One might attribute this success to the fact that the game of poker has an anthem called "That Was a Crazy Game of Poker." None of the other card games have an anthem that you can dance to. Some may think that an anthem alone is why many young collegians are flocking towards the potentially money-making card game, or that music has no place in the world of card playing. Some may think that neither of these factors have anything to do with each other.

Either way, though, O.A.R. has reached a cult-like popularity by providing songs that are musically creative and lyrics that offer many opportunities to be quoted in away messages. Songs like the aforementioned "That Was a Crazy Game of Poker," along with "Hey Girl," "I Feel Home," and "Night Shift," have graced mix CDs inspired by the semester-long experiences of many college students. The members of O.A.R. were once college students themselves and truly know how it is.

O.A.R. started with Marc Roderge and Chris Culos, two typical Maryland junior high school kids who were looking for an after school activity. They started playing together, and once they reached high school, Chris and Marc teamed up with bassist Benj Gershman and guitarist Rich Oh. This foursome started making music that fused the elements of reggae, ska, soul, and rock into one musical melting pot. The lineup became complete in 1997 when the four original members moved to Columbus, Ohio to attend Ohio State University. Here, they recruited saxophonist Jerry DePizzo and named themselves of a revolution, shortened to O.A.R. The revolution, according to guitarist Rich Oh, is the way the members clicked together so smoothly and the ease with which they came to create the type of music that they enjoyed playing and writing.

O.A.R.
Mullins Center
Tonight
7 p.m.

While at Ohio State University, O.A.R. started booking gigs at local clubs. Much frustration arose, however, when they could not get on the bill at over-21 clubs because of their underage status. O.A.R. responded to this and started playing university bars to get a time slot. They played sets in any venue available, from the Student Ballroom of OSU to various campus parties. Their name began to spread beyond the Ohio State campus through a grass-roots movement fueled by the prominence of file-sharing programs like Napster, the power of word of mouth, an exciting live show, and loyal fans.

They released their first studio album, "The Wanderer," in 1997, which included the tracks "Black Rock," "About Mr. Brown," and "That Was a Crazy Game of Poker." This release was quickly followed by another album called "Soul's Aflame," featuring such songs as "Hey Girl," "I Feel Home," and "City on Down."

Both of these albums experienced underground success that prompted O.A.R.'s manager, Brian Manning, to create Everfine Records so that the music could be distributed to a larger audience. The venture paid off when O.A.R. started to receive attention from major labels, but the band, as a whole, believed that it was not the right time to sign with a major label.

In 2003, they signed to Lava Records (now Atlantic), subsequently releasing a studio album entitled "In Between Now and Then" in October of the same year.

"We wanted to grow more and have the opportunities that come with being on a major label," Rich said. They still maintained the same creative freedom that they had in the past, but this time they could take advantage of a larger distribution and more late night show appearances.

After 10 years of playing together, O.A.R. has achieved a grass-roots style of success. They find much of their fan base in college students and through word of mouth. They have toured with such acts as Sheryl Crow, Ziggy Marley, and Matt Nathanson.

On October 4th, they released their newest album, titled "Stories of a Stranger," and the single "Love and Memories." Lyrics of this song are said to be inspired by the movie "Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind."

When asked about this in a recent interview with the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, Rich said, "The idea of the song is frustration of a loved one forgetting about you ... just like in the movie."

This new album has allowed O.A.R. to explore a more straightforward, rock-oriented path. Rich believes that this shift in sound has arisen because "growing up leads to making different music ... it changes."

"A wise man once told me, he said / when music is the one thing that surrounds you / you feel no pain." It's true. Music is like a drug, and O.A.R. fuses the necessary strings together to make a cure possible. After a stressful week, O.A.R. can provide a way to alleviate the pressures of schoolwork, tests, and college life.

When asked why students should come see the show, Rich responded, "We will put on a good show full of positive energy, excitement, and keeping things fresh."

They will be performing tonight, starting at 7 p.m. at the Mullins Center.

Straitharn's performance brings 'Good Luck' to the silver screen

By Matt O'Rourke
Collegian Staff

Hollywood has struggled to craft a compelling and engrossing film recently, leaving viewers dissatisfied after just paying up to $10 for two hours of mediocrity. Then George Clooney came along, signing a deal with Warner Independent Pictures (a division of Warner Brothers) to direct and co-star in "Good Night, and Good Luck," a film that grasps the viewer's attention from the opening credits to the finale.

"Good Night, and Good Luck" is the true story of broadcast journalism pioneer Edward R. Murrow's battle with Senator Joseph McCarthy during the 1950s Red Scare. The film surrounds the staff of CBS's news magazine "See It Now," which ran for six years beginning in 1951 and combined commentary with news. David Straitharn (of "L.A. Confidential" and "Simon Birch" fame) masterfully portrays Murrow, from his expressionless, stern facial expressions down to the way he holds a cigarette. In fact, there is not a scene in the film where Murrow doesn't smoke.

Clooney utilizes classical film elements to further engage the viewer. The entire picture was shot in black and white, and in fact draws upon real footage of Senator McCarthy's hearings and interviews. Some television advertisements, including cigarette ads, are also employed for comic relief and historical depth. Senator McCarthy is played by himself, as Clooney cleverly edits scenes from Murrow's interviews to include him. The contrasts between silence and sound are poignant and effective, as singer Diana Reeves plays a recording artist whose cabaret-style jazz fills the gap as particular events unfold. Reeves's lyrics, akin to that of the chorus in a Greek play, can be either heartbreaking or uplifting, depending on what is currently taking place.

'Good Night, and Good Luck'
Directed by George Clooney
Starring George Clooney, David Straitharn
Warner Independent Pictures
Rated PG
90 mins.
Grade A-

Clooney's use of cinematography is brilliant. In a scene where Murrow begins his attacks on Senator McCarthy's communist witch hunts, Murrow is portrayed as both calm and collected and simultaneously somewhat fearful of the repercussions — the camera first focuses on his body above the desk, then pans down to show his foot nervously tapping.

The viewer can sense the fears of the time as Joe Wersheba (Robert Downey Jr.) pleads with his wife Shirley (Patricia Clarkson) to sign onto a list that states she is not a Communist. This is the least of the Wersheba family's problems, though, as they are also secretly married to one another (CBS's policy prohibited coworkers from engaging in relationships). Several times Murrow is pulled into the

See GOOD NIGHT on page 8

David Straitharn (pictured above) plays the role of Edward R. Murrow, a news broadcaster for CBS who challenged Senator Joseph McCarthy's Communist blacklistings.

Joaquin Phoenix, Reese Witherspoon walk the walk in Cash bio

By Terry Lawson
Detroit Free Press

TORONTO — Four years ago, we talked to Joaquin Phoenix in a Toronto hotel room much like the one he occupied at September's 2005 Toronto International Film Festival. After hellos, he politely asked permission to smoke. Over the next 40 minutes, Phoenix smoked three cigarettes, and his left leg never stopped jittering. As articulate as he might have been, his body language was that of someone being questioned about a crime he didn't know if he had committed.

This time, Phoenix, 31, still asks if it's OK to smoke, but at the end of the conversation, only one butt is in the ashtray. He is looking relaxed and speaking confidently, like someone who knows he has done justice to a bona fide legend.

In director James Mangold's "Walk the Line," opening Friday, Phoenix plays Johnny Cash, a man whose face, style and voice is familiar even to those with an aversion to country music. The film focuses on the tumultuous relationship between Cash and the woman who would be his wife, June Carter, played by Reese Witherspoon. Though Phoenix pursued a part that many actors coveted, he admits to being a "little panicked" when he was told he had won the job.

"I thought, 'Oh, this great!' followed by, 'Oh, I don't know if I can do this.' The truth is, I was an admirer of Johnny Cash the man, but I really wasn't familiar with his work," Phoenix said.

He first talked to Mangold, director of the gritty thriller "Copland," around the time he was getting his first mass exposure in his supporting role in "Gladiator."

"My girlfriend of the time, Liv Tyler, knew Jim and had told him she thought I might be right for the part, I'm not exactly sure why. Anyway, we had a good talk, but I told him upfront I wasn't a musician or a singer. At that time, it hadn't been decided if we would actually perform the music or use Johnny's original recordings.

"Still, the first thing I did was go out and buy a guitar and just learn how to hold it, you know? I got a book and taught myself a few chords. But I didn't do any research really, because I thought if I did, I'd jinx it. So when the film finally did get a green light, I had some cramming to do."

Reactions to "Walk the Line" following its Toronto premiere were mixed, but one thing nearly everyone agreed on was the strength of the performances by Phoenix and Witherspoon and the chemistry between them.

"I don't know that I could have done this without Reese," says Phoenix. "We have very different acting styles, but she had enough faith in our compatibility for the both of us. She's the one who got me a singing coach and hooked me up with T-Bone (Burnett, the producer and guitarist best-known as the man behind the multi million-selling "O Brother Where Art Thou" soundtrack), who was really encouraging.

"But I think the first time I felt like it was going to be OK was when Johnny's son John R. came to a rehearsal," he says. The younger Cash was a consultant on the film, and acted as a go-between for the producers and his then-ailing father.

The late Johnny Cash (above) is the subject of a new film titled "Walk the Line" which chronicles his life.

Actors Joaquin Phoenix and Reese Witherspoon, who co-star in "Walk the Line," present an award during the 39th Annual Country Music Awards, held at Madison Square Garden in New York, on Tuesday November 15, 2005.

"He said, 'You know, you hold that guitar just like Daddy did.' That was enough to keep me going."

Witherspoon, interviewed later from Los Angeles, was also intimidated by playing someone so well-known. She grew up in Nashville where, she says, "country music was everywhere. The voice of Johnny Cash was everywhere.

"I had never played any real-life characters in any of my films, and I realized pretty quickly there was a responsibility attached. You want to be true to who these people were, but you also have to have their trust. Remember, John and June were both still alive when James started working on this almost 10 years ago, and they were very concerned about how they would be portrayed."

Though Cash and Carter had written and talked extensively about their relationship — which began when June was still performing as a member of the legendary Carter Family singing group and Cash was an up-and-coming young country star appearing at the Grand Ole Opry — they had always said their relationship was never physical while both were married to other people.

"Nobody really believed that, but these were Christian people with families who grew up in a time and place where adultery was considered a truly sinful act, not some sort of casual thing that was easily forgotten or forgiven," says Witherspoon, whose company produced the film.

"Finally, Jim just told them he couldn't make the movie and make it convincing if he tried to maintain that fiction, because the truth was, what they had done weighed heavily on them; it affected how they lived. Ultimately, they said OK, but it was hard for them."

Witherspoon said that the idea of doing the actual performing in the film initially "scared me to death. The only public singing I had ever done was as a kid, in plays, that sort of thing."

But it was eventually decided that unlike "Ray," the Ray Charles biography with which "Walk the Line" is destined to be endlessly compared, the actors would do their own singing.

"I actually had it easier than Joaquin because while June had a beautiful voice, the focus was never on that in the early years; her sisters were always considered the real singers. She mostly contributed harmonies."

It was decided that Phoenix would try to find the essence of Cash's distinctive unvarnished baritone and not attempt an imitation.

"I couldn't go out there and say, 'Hello, I'm Johnny Cash' and then have a voice come out that sounded like some punk rocker or something," says Phoenix. "James just kept reminding me that if people wanted to hear the actual voice of Johnny Cash, they should buy the records. That took some of the weight off."

Phoenix met the Cashes only once, at a dinner party in Los Angeles, before they died in 2003. "What I mostly remember is being a little in awe, and them making me feel comfortable," says Phoenix. He researched his role by reading Cash's two autobiographies, listening to "some pretty wild-ass stories from members of his family and people who knew him," and watching film of Cash performing and being interviewed.

"Walk the Line" ends in 1968, with Cash's historic and defiant performance at Folsom Prison, before he had a weekly TV show and became a national icon.

"I wanted this to be authentic as possible, but I also wanted to play the people, not the images," says director Mangold. "The Johnny and June you see in this movie are the people outsiders never saw."

Still, the only time Phoenix bristles is when asked whether the stories were true that he did a Daniel Day Lewis on the set, remaining in character throughout the shoot and only responding when addressed as John or Johnny.

"I don't even know what method acting is actually," he says. "What I know is what works for me, what feels comfortable and right. And if I'm constantly switching between the character I'm playing, losing his walk or speech and joking around with my friends between set ups, it takes me out of the work. So, no, I don't like hearing somebody on the crew yell, 'Hey Joaquin,' or doing an interview when I'm working. The thing is, it's embarrassing to talk about now, when it's over, but at the time, it feels right. Some films, I might not go that way, and I might try something differently at another point in my life. But for now, this works for me."

On reports that her and Phoenix's acting styles and personalities clashed during filming, Witherspoon is diplomatic.

"We all have different ways of working, and after you make enough movies, you learn to accept that people have to go where they have to go to get the best from themselves. I can tell you that any disagreements any of us had were always about making the movie better, about honoring the story," she says.

"I'll tell you this about Joaquin," says John Travolta, who played Phoenix's fire captain mentor in the smoke-eaters drama "Ladder 49." "I don't think he took one breath in that movie he didn't believe. This is one very committed young actor I looked at him and wished I had always been that dedicated when I was his age."

After a five-month rehearsal period and four months shooting the film in Nashville and Mississippi (during which time the stars also recorded their vocals), Phoenix admits it took him a while to find himself again. "There would have been no way I could have just jumped into another movie."

Besides, he says, he had done three movies "pretty much back-to-back" before plunging into "Walk the Line."

"I definitely needed some time off, but when we were done" — with "Walk the Line" — "I didn't know what to do with myself. I felt like I was separated from that reality for a long time. Plus, I was really anxious about what Johnny and June's children would think. That was the review that I really needed to hear."

Phoenix says his reward was shaking John R. Cash's hand after the family's private screening, and getting the verdict.

"I think a lot of this might have been hard for him and my mother to watch if they were still here, but I truly think he would have been proud," says Cash. "The thing he cared about the most, in his music and his life, was being truthful. And I believe he'd say it got to the truth."

Today's engineers aren't driving trains. They're driving technology.
That's why UMass Amherst offers courses in computer science, electrical engineering and all things digital. Get the skills you need to advance in today's technology-driven economy. You can even get credit for work-related projects.
ENGINEERING AND APPLIED SCIENCES
www.UMassULearn.net
413-545-2414
100 Venture Way, Hadley, MA
UMassAmherst Continuing Education

LONG RADIO
Quality Sales, Service, and Installation
Audio
Video
Sattelite Radio
NAV
Remote Starter
Alarms
Radar Detectors
Lazer Detectors
Performace Parts
30 Russell Street Hadley, Ma 01035 413-584-3259

Monday-Friday 7:30-6
Thursday 7:30-8
Saturday 7:30-4
Saturn of Hadley
40 Russell St, Route 9
Hadley, MA 01035
(413) 584-6066
SATURN
Our service center repairs all kinds of cars...not just Saturns.
Oil & Filter Change Only $19.99
Includes topping off all fluids, adjusting tire pressures, Check antifreeze for winter protection
FREE wash & vacuum FREE 27 point inspection.
• Mass State Inspection Station
• Free shuttle service to & from UMASS
• Located directly on bike path & PVTA stop.
No Appointment Needed
10% off mechanical repairs
Late hours on Thursdays

Coffeehouse II
at the
UMass Theatre Guild
COFFEEHOUSE
Sunday, November 20, 2005
Student Union Ballroom
7:00-11:00 p.m.

Hey Seniors!
Please visit the Senior Campaign table at the Campus Center Concourse Nov. 21st, 28th, 29th, and 30th to vote on the Senior Class Gift.
All members of the Class of 2006 are invited to attend.
For more information, contact Sarah Weisner, Senior Campaign Coordinator.
413.545.1466
sweisner@admin.umass.edu
University of Massachusetts Amherst
Annual Fund

comedy CONNECTION
HUKELAU
413•593•5222
705 Memorial Drive in Chicopee
www.hukelau.com
Star of the HBO special "Robert Schimmel: Unprotected"
ROBERT SCHIMMEL
NOVEMBER 25TH
From "The Howard Stern Show"
DECEMBER 3RD
From Comedy Central's "Chappelle's Show"
CHARLIE MURPHY & FRIENDS TOUR

Five days of film in the Valley

By Morgan-Ann Rousseau
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — The 11th Annual Northampton Independent Film Festival was an event graced with eclectic people, charismatic staff and unique films that held nothing back. From Wednesday until Sunday, the festival presented downtown Northampton with more than enough to quench an alternative thirst.

"The Good, the Mad and the Documentary" was the catchphrase of this indie-flick fiesta, a slogan that was certainly proved true by its screenings.

The festival started off with a casual-yet-elegant dinner reception at the Northampton Center for the Arts Ballroom Wednesday evening. About 100 guests enjoyed the reception that was attended by distinguished artists, sponsors, and local art lovers. Lively guests sipped champagne and One Eared Monkey brew amidst live piano playing. The commencement was also home to a witty art gallery exhibit of homemade bras, to benefit breast cancer research.

"We're trying to put the 'festive' back in festival," said festival director David Leo. "Tonight we're here to eat, drink, have fun, then go across the street and watch a movie."

Just a stroll across the street to the Academy of Music is where the festival's film debut of "Bereft" awed audiences. The film is a unique and beautiful drama that was shot on location in the hills and valleys of Vermont, a picturesque backdrop to which the cinematography did justice. The scenery also went breath and pulse with the haunting, emotional story of a landscape photographer, Molly, who, after losing her husband a year earlier, finds herself unraveling day-to-day with memories, loneliness and a sadness even sweeter than the love she once knew.

This leading role was played perfectly by beauty Vinessa Shaw, who is probably best known for her sensual role in "Eyes Wide Shut" (though I always think of her as the early blooming teen in "Lady Bugs" and "Hocus Pocus"). Shaw's portrayal of this quirky and misunderstood young woman easily distinguishes the performance as her best yet.

Tim Daly, who co-directed "Bereft" with J. Clark Mathis, also starred in the film, along with his wife Amy Van Nostrand. "Bereft's" writer Peter Ferland and Van Nostrand were at the Academy of Music during the screening, and answered questions after credits rolled.

Questions ranged from aspects of the writing to production techniques. Ferland described the evolution of the story.

"Two ideas merged together in my head," said Ferland, who also said he considered "how relationships still speak to you after they're gone."

Van Nostrand told inquiring viewers that she modeled her character around some local people she meant in Vermont.

"I saw how sincerely unaware people in Vermont can be of their inappropriateness," she said.

The opportunity to meet and talk with filmmakers throughout the week was a regular and appealing element of the festival. At these post-screening question-and-answer sessions, viewers held nothing back.

"What are your fantasies?" asked one assertive viewer, addressing Gorman Bechard, the writer and director of the off-color film "You Are Alone."

The tasteless question was greeting by the film maker's equally tasteless response, but suited the mood set forth by the prior 84 minutes. The film, despite some good criticism, lacked any inventive substance, and continued the over-done phenomena of sexual stereotyping as not only a theme, but a genre of film. At least the audience could look to schoolgirl nudity as a distraction from the awkward acting and cliched dialogue.

NIFF offered a few other opportunities for risqué indulgences. On Friday night viewers age 17 or older enjoyed the explicit documentary film "Kissing on the Mouth." The work, made by Chicago filmmakers, explores issues of sex and infidelity within post-college relationships.

The Northampton art scene embraces the opportunity for an array of different appreciation, styles and genres. At NIFF open-minds are certainly welcome, and this attitude offers a home to unique interests. And if one such interest is bondage, Saturday night's screening of "Going Under" definitely delivered. The movie, about an erotic romance between a dominatrix and her client, explored the limitations of sadistic pleasure and fantasy.

However, explicit content was only one of many themes in this year's festival. Other films delivered powerful messages on societal issues, as told through documentaries, on activism and poverty, short films about abortion, and feature films that told stories in a dramatic and personal way.

"Missing in America," which screened on Sunday, is one such example. The film is a heartwarming tale about a Vietnam veteran and his relationship with a young Vietnamese-American girl who he must take care of for an old war friend.

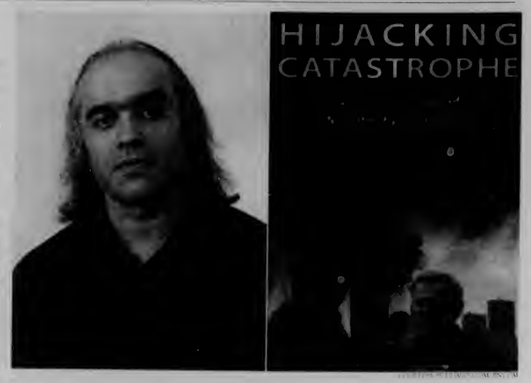
Sunday touched on a lot of relevant political and social issues, with screenings like "The Peace Patriots," which chronicled citizen activism in the Pioneer Valley since the onset of the Iraq war. Sunday also saw "Searching for Angela Shelton," which uniquely and personally exposed hard truths about the abuse and victimization of women in the United States.

It's worth noting that Independent Film Festivals are an open floor for any kinds of alternative films that don't fit into mainstream form. This exposes a diversity of otherwise unrecognized and "unusual" films. You couldn't miss these at the Saturday night screening, The Best of the Boston Underground Film Festival.

There nine screenings of a truly unique nature left viewers laughing, cringing and curious. The short films "Big Screen Version" and "Nightlight" experimented with cinematography and editing and produced a multi-media canvas of creativity.

More graphic ("bloodier") films, like "S.O.S," "Les Drujes" and "Something Red," gave the complete experience of underground film by confronting viewers with artistic interpretations of life's most deranged capabilities. Everyone undoubtedly went home disturbed.

Other themes of short films included experimental, animation, emerging student filmmakers, and dysfunctional families.



Experienced film makers held free panels on "Self Marketing and Self Distribution" and "Sound Advice."

More than Meets the Eye." At these panels anyone could learn valuable information and advice about technicalities, economic issues, classifications, and the ingenuity of serious independent film making.

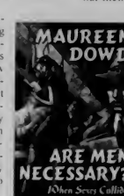
NIFF's sponsors range from big names like Comcast to local publication "The Valley Advocate" and "mom-and-pop" local businesses. Fundraising volunteers said that especially in Northampton, people are supportive of these artistic events.

"We get a lot of local contribution because the community is eager to support something it believes in," said one fundraising representative.

Many students from Smith College also volunteered their support for the NIFF and its continued exploration, examination, and celebration of independent filmmaking.

"Hijacking Catastrophe," a film by Communications professor Sut Jhally, tied for "Best Documentary Feature" at this year's Northampton Independent Film Festival. Jhally wrote a forward in a book by the same name.

Dowd's book unnecessary



By Nahal Toosi
Associated Press

In her new book, New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd asks whether men are necessary.

It's a fair question. Unfortunately, Dowd doesn't bother to answer it.

Instead, "Are Men Necessary? When Sexes Collide" should have been called, "What Has Happened to Women?"

This wide-ranging, overreaching and ultimately shallow book attempts to describe how feminism has faltered in its quest for female liberation, leading many of today's women to covet homemaking over lawmaking and Playboy Bunny T-shirts to Ms. Magazine.

'Are Men Necessary'
By Maureen Dowd
The New York Times

Dowd examines — well, that's too strong a word, but whatever — the influence of women's publications, Hillary Clinton's political prospects, the degeneration of the Y chromosome and high-powered men's lust for the secretaries who orbit them, among other subjects.

She wonders whether career women destroy their chances of finding men who will marry them. She questions why feminists were willing to attack Clarence Thomas but not Bill Clinton over sexual impropriety.

She tries way, way too hard, to touch on too, too many questions, leading to a faint spell of dizziness and yet no definitive conclusions. Granted, Dowd acknowledges that her book is not a systematic inquiry and that she's not out to offer solutions, but then the question is why did she bother to write it?

The book probably could have benefited from more rigorous research. On the subject of cosmetic surgery, for example, you put down the book with the feeling that the entire female population of the United States is sliding under the scalpel. Sure, more women may be turning to plastic surgery, but is it a pandemic?

Far too often, Dowd's generalizations rely on the word of one person, such as a young reporter at The New York Times, a magazine editor whose work is clearly to caricature societal trends, or some other person in the circles in which she thrives. (A personal favorite: "As a guy I know says..." Really? A guy you know?)

Many things are said at East Coast cocktail parties; not all of them are wise.

Furthermore, it's simply too easy to go elsewhere and find a contradictory opinion. Even when Dowd turns to social science studies to prove a point, it's a weak attempt because it is so clearly selective.

Dowd overindulges in her penchant for witty zingers such as this one: "In the '50s, women vacuumed. Now women are vacuumed." It is cute in small doses, just as in her columns. But a book overflowing with such attempts at pithiness ultimately feels hollow.

The deepest — and unfortunately briefest — passages of Dowd's book are those that touch on the plight of women in societies beyond the West, notably in Muslim countries. It is here that the reader is reminded that the inequality between men and women has consequences far more serious than whether Yale girls will or won't wear makeup.

Many women believe that the greatest triumph of feminism was in giving them more choices in the first place. It is having the choice to pursue a partnership at a law firm, the choice to stay at home with your children and the choice to embrace or eschew plastic surgery that has made at least this country a better place for women.

Luckily, people also have a choice not to buy "Are Men Necessary?"

Clooney's 'Good Luck' pays off

GOOD NIGHT from page 6

office of CBS Chairman William Paley (Frank Langella) to be questioned or told to change his ways.

Murrow's investigations were bold, questioning the authority that unlawfully stripped Milo Radulovich, an Air Force reservist with access to top-secret documents, of his powers because of his immigrant family, deeming them "Communist sympathizers." Through Murrow's team, consisting of Fred Friendly (George Clooney) and Don Hollenback (Ray Wise) among others, the Communist "blacklisting" of citizens is brought to a halt. Clooney is not selfish like so many actors who direct and star in their own films, leaving much if not most of the screen for Straitharn.

The script is well written, and the viewer may often believe everything — including side conversations — was copied out of time, word for word. Murrow, in an eloquent and well-articulated newscast, calls upon Americans to not be afraid to speak out against McCarthy. "We proclaim ourselves, as indeed we are, the defenders of freedom, wherever it continues to exist in the world, but we cannot defend freedom abroad by deserting it at home," he says.

Even after directly attacking McCarthy himself, Murrow gives him the option to appear on "See It Now," and a month later, McCarthy does. Within that month, Murrow himself has been accused of being a Communist by some of McCarthy's cronies, and the pressure builds on his staff. Both Murrow and Friendly pay for lost advertising out of their own pockets in order to keep "See It Now" afloat. When McCarthy does finally speak (and Clooney once again uses McCarthy's original telecasted response), he crumbles, unable to keep his idealism driving.

However, Murrow is not left unaffected. "See It Now" is eventually cancelled, but both he and Friendly remain satisfied with their work.

Clooney's film draws upon many parallels to the present day, but never forcefully tells the viewer what to believe. Here lies the true strength of "Good Night, and Good Luck" — it allows the viewer to think for themselves, and perhaps, rebuilds a little faith in modern journalism.

The T-Shirt Factory
A division of The Image & Mail Factory, Inc.
Serving Colleges Throughout New England

Custom Printed T-Shirts

12 FREE CUSTOM PRINTED T-SHIRTS When You Order 72 or More Call For Details!

▸ Clubs ▸ Parties
▸ Fraternities ▸ Special Events
▸ Fundraisers ▸ Sports Teams
▸ Give Aways ▸ Student Union

OFFER ENDS Nov. 30, 2005
Call Today! TOLL FREE 877-439-5629
THE T-SHIRT FACTORY
Visit Our Website at www.nefactory.com for Our Online Catalog.

FOUR Seasons
WINE • LIQUOR • CIGARS
333 Russell St., Rt. 9
Hadley, MA 01035
584-8174
Sale date: 11/17/05 - 11/23/05
not responsible for typographical errors.

Beer

Becks 24 pk btl $19.99*	Lionshead Lager 24 pk btl $12.99*	Sierra Nevada Pale Ale 12 pk btl $11.99*	Bass Ale 16oz 8 pk can $8.99*
Rolling Rock 24 pk btl $15.99*	Milwaukee's Best 30 pk can $11.99*	Red Stripe 12 pk btl $10.99*	Harp Irish Lager 12 pk btl $9.99*
Busch & Busch Light 30 pk can $13.99*	Busch & Busch Light 24 pk btl $11.49*	Stella Artois 12 pk btl $10.99*	Rheingold Lager 12 pk btl $6.99*

Liquor

Grand Marnier 750 ml	$29.99
Navan Vanilla Cognac 750 ml	$29.99
151 Lane Rum from Trinidad 750 ml	$29.99
Three Vodka 750 ml	$24.99
Jim Beam 1.75 liter	$22.99
Jose Cuervo Tradicional Tequila 750 ml	$32.99
Boru Irish Vodka 1.75 lt	$19.99
Godiva Liqueur 750 ml	$16.99
Seagram's 7 Whiskey 1.75 liter	$16.99
Calico Cask 1.5 liter	$13.99
UV Flavored Vodka 1 liter	$10.99
Pinnacle Vodka 750 ml	$10.99

Wine

Chandon California Sparkling Wines 750 ml	$14.99
Solaris Wines 750 ml — Chardonnay, Merlot, Cabernet, Pinot Noir	$10.99
Clos du Bois Chardonnay 750 ml	$9.99
Liberty Chardonnay 750 ml	$9.99
Guenoc 750 ml — Cabernet, Syrah, Blanc, Chardonnay	$9.99
Principato Pinot Grigio 1.5 lt	$8.99
Carlo Rossi 4 Liter	$8.99
BV Century Cellars 1.5 lt — Chardonnay, Merlot, Cabernet	$10.99
Barefoot Vineyards 750 ml	2 for $10.00
Bunrock Station 750 ml — Chardonnay, Cabernet, Merlot, Shiraz	2 for $10.00
Barton & Guestier 750 ml — Chardonnay, Merlot, Cabernet	2 for $10.00

Hours: Monday - Saturday 9am - 11pm, Sunday 12pm - 11pm

Playoff berth on the line

FOOTBALL from page 12

with 18 touchdowns and nine interceptions. Clarkson's two main targets, Devale Ellis and Marques Colston, provide him with a one-two punch of speed and size.

Ellis is the speed receiver, catching 70 passes for 906 yards and five TDs, while Colston, who stands at 6-foot-4 and 230 pounds, has grabbed 62 passes for 804 yards and five touchdowns.

Slowing down that offense will be the top passing defense in the conference in UMass, which has allowed just 1,341 yards in 10 contests this season. Led by 2004 All-American and 2005 Buck Buchanan Award nominee Shannon James, who returned a fumble for a touchdown on Saturday at Army, the Minuteman defense has been cracking down on offenses and is allowing an average of 12.5 points per game. Nose tackle John Hatchell has accounted for 33 tackles and two sacks so far in 2005.

"Obviously, they've been known to pass the ball a lot, and although they're running the ball more than they have in the past, I think that's definitely the key to the game — slowing down the passing game," Hatchell said. "They're a dangerous team, and there's nothing but respect for them. It's going to be a battle. There's no doubt about that."

Another force on the defensive side is junior strong safety James Ihedigbo, who has been able to take advantage of the blitzing opportunity, racking up 7.5 sacks and 12 tackles for a loss.

Coen and the Minuteman offense are not underrating the Pride's defense and understand that this is not a one-sided game.

"Their defense is very physical. They're always trying to get an extra guy in the box, trying to stop the run," Coen said. "We know how potent their offense is, but their defense is going to come after us. They have some size, and they run well, so we're not underestimating their defense whatsoever."

Using a consistent running game, spearheaded by junior Steve Baylark, the Maroon and White's offense will look to control the clock on Saturday.

Baylark is only 16 yards away from reaching the 1,000-yard plateau for the third straight season and should have plenty of carries to give him the chance to hit that statistic on Saturday.

Coen has benefited from the rushing game in 2005, keeping defenses on their heels while completing 156-of-254 passes for 1,971 yards and 10 touchdowns.

The Minutemen, who are capping off a three-game road trip on Saturday, have dropped two of the last three games, with the first coming against now-No. 1 New Hampshire.

PROJECTED STARTERS

UMass		Hofstra
Offense		Offense
QB 12 - Liam Coen, Freshman		WR 89 - Marques Colston, Senior
RB 5 - Steve Baylark, Junior		WR 88 - Charles Sullivan, Sophomore
FB 13 - Kyle B. Harrington, Sophomore		LT 52 - Jed Prisby, Junior
WR 81 - Brandon London, Junior		LG 65 - Tom McHugh, Senior
TE 44 - Mike Douglas, Senior		C 58 - Jason Goodman, Sophomore
LT 67 - Brent Caldwell, Senior		RG 64 - Chris Durkin, Junior
LG 68 - Matt Austin, Sophomore		RT 77 - Willie Colon, Senior
C 62 - Alex Miller, Junior		WR 83 - Brian Wolman, Senior
RG 73 - David Thompson, Junior		TE 8 - Brandon Sebald, Senior
RT 63 - Sean Calicchio, Freshman		WR 2 - Devale Ellis, Senior
WR 9 - Dominique Stewart, Senior		QB 11 - Anton Clarkson, Junior
Defense		Defense
LE 93 - Keron Williams, Senior		LE 99 - Daniel Garay, Senior
DT 57 - Justin Schweighardt, Senior		LT 92 - Shemiah LeGrande, Sophomore
NT 55 - John Hatchell, Junior		RT 71 - Edward Greene, Senior
RE 48 - David Burns, Sophomore		RE 94 - Stephen Bowen, Senior
WLB 29 - Brad Anderson, Senior		OLB 54 - D.J. Talvacchio, Junior
MLB 51 - Serge Tikum, Senior		MLB 50 - Cole Haley, Senior
SLB 29 - Jason Hatchell, Sophomore		OLB 48 - Chris Sebald, Junior
CB 26 - Tracy Belton, Junior		CB 20 - Nick Altomare, Freshman
FS 6 - Shannon James, Senior		FS 10 - Stephen Tate, Sophomore
SS 7 - James Ihedigbo, Junior		SS 37 - David Darby, Junior
CB 2 - Steve Costello, Senior		CB 1 - Brian Booth, Senior
Special Teams		Special Teams
K 31 Armando Cuko, Freshman		K 18 - Rob Zamilli, Sophomore
P 13 - Christian Koegel, Junior		P 40 - Chris Hanly, Sophomore
KR 3 - R.J. Cobbs, Senior		PR 25 - Kareem Huggins, Sophomore
PR 2 - Steve Costello, Senior		KR 25 - Kareem Huggins, Sophomore

KAREN WINSOR/COLLEGIAN

UMass free safety Shannon James (6), defensive tackle Jason Leonard (97) and linebacker Jason Hatchell (43) swarm to the ball carrier earlier this season against UNH. The Minutemen close out their schedule against Hofstra on Saturday.

Pride is riding high

EMOTION from page 12

overwhelmed with the chance of a loss, but are instead focusing on getting a win.

"Obviously it's a motivating factor — an A-10 Championship is a pretty big deal," nose tackle John Hatchell said. "Obviously, we know we've got to win this one, or our season is over and we're going to go home for Thanksgiving. The feeling around this locker room is that no one wants to do that."

If the Minuteman can pull off the victory, it would open up a number of playoff scenarios, but would give them a solid opportunity at a postseason berth regardless of the outcome of other contests. UMass is tied with UNH for first place in the A-10, but since the Wildcats beat the Minutemen, the tiebreaker and automatic A-10 bid goes to them.

The emotional bend for the Pride goes past the fact that they can knock A-10 foe UMass out of the playoffs. Hofstra coach Joe Gardi, who has held the reigns in Hempstead for 16 seasons, will be coaching his final game for Hofstra on Saturday after just announcing his retirement on Tuesday.

Gardi, whose 654 winning percentage is the second-best in Pride history, has a 118-62-2 career record, and will surely be missed as the team's leader.

Even with emotion looming on both sides of the ball, Hatchell does not think that it is something that will make or break the outcome of the game.

"I'm sure they all want to go out on a good note, and that's a lot of added emotion into this game," Hatchell said. "That can only last throughout the pre-game, or maybe the first couple of snaps. And after that, once people start getting into the flow of the game and everything like that, it comes down to execution and preparation."

sports@dailycollegian.com

Hochstein steps in yet again

FOXBOROUGH, Mass. (AP) — Russ Hochstein has been in this position before, that of a little-known reserve replacing a high-profile teammate.

Hochstein stepped in at left guard for Damien Woody during the New England Patriots' playoff run to a Super Bowl crown two years ago. Now, he must replace center Dan Koppen, who sustained a season-ending shoulder injury last Sunday in Miami.

Koppen had started all 46 games, including playoffs, since the second week of his rookie season of 2003.

"That's a tremendous loss," Hochstein said of Koppen. "He was a leader on and off the field. All of the success we've had, a lot of it is from him. He helped get us there. Those are some pretty big shoes to fill."

Including his playoff appearances, Hochstein has started only six games in five seasons, none at center.

"I've taken reps at it, and I've played some in preseason, things like that, but this is a whole new ballgame," he said. "I need to work hard to improve. I have to work on knowing things a lot better, seeing things more, being alert to things that I wasn't maybe as in tune to doing."

The Patriots (5-4) are dealing with an injury crisis on both sides of the ball.

Six defensive backs are out for the season, including cornerback Randall Gay, placed on injured reserve Tuesday along with Koppen. Defensive end Richard Seymour returned to the lineup last week after missing four games with a knee problem.

Koppen is the third member of the offensive line to be hurt this season. Left tackle Matt Light has missed six games with an ankle problem, and right tackle Tom Ashworth sat out the 23-16 win over the Dolphins with a knee injury.

The Patriots also were without receiver David Givens (knee), tight end Dan Graham (shoulder), fullback Patrick Pass (hamstring) and backup running back Kevin Faulk (foot).

Running back Corey Dillon, nursing a sore ankle, left after the first play of last week's game with a calf injury. Newly signed fullback Heath Evans stepped in and carried the ball 17 times for 84 yards.

The Patriots have earned a reputation for overcoming injuries, dating all the way back to their Super Bowl season of 2001. Tom Brady became a starter then after Drew Bledsoe went down.

In 2003, Woody hurt his knee in the first round of the playoffs. Hochstein finished up and then started the AFC championship game win over Indianapolis and the Super Bowl victory over Carolina.

Before the Super Bowl, defensive lineman Warren Sapp, a former teammate of Hochstein with Tampa Bay, ridiculed his ability on national TV. Sapp predicted Hochstein would struggle with the Panthers' talented defensive line.

But Brady completed a Super Bowl-record 32 passes and was not sacked as the Patriots won 32-29.

"Well, that was two years ago," said Hochstein, a former standout at Nebraska. "It was the Super Bowl, but it was also at a different position. So, I'll leave that in the past and work on what I have to do now."

Associated Press

Congress votes down boxing bill

By Devlin Barrett
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Fresh from dealing with baseball and steroids, Congress chose Wednesday not to step into the ring as boxing's referee, voting down a bill to create a federal agency to protect fighters' health and wallets.

The House voted 233-190 against forming a U.S. Boxing Commission within the Commerce Department. Most Republicans opposed the measure, while most Democrats voted for it.

Critics attacked the bill as a misguided effort to expand the federal government to manage a part of the entertainment industry.

"This is a big government bill. It creates a new federal agency that provides for more regulation and is not self-financing," said Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis.

The Senate in May approved a similar bill offered by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz.

Boxing has suffered from waning popularity in recent years, hurt in part by legal tussles between promoters, sanctioning bodies and the fighters themselves.

The House bill from Rep. Cliff Stearns, R-Fla., would have created a three-person U.S. Boxing Commission, appointed by the president to three-year terms, funded by licensing fees imposed on those who make their living in the fight business.

Proponents argued a U.S. commission would solve a range of problems, including fighters risking their health to fight in states with weak regulations, a lack of financial support for run-down boxers, and unscrupulous managers.

Rep. Tom Osborne, R-Neb., a former college football coach, said it was long past time to address the centuries-old lack of proper safety controls in boxing.

"How many people have to die, how many people have to have their brains scrambled? ... We wouldn't do this with animals," he said.

The vote against a federal commission came a day after Major League Baseball announced it was toughening its anti-steroids policy, spurred largely by the threat of federal legislation that would have been dealt more severely with players caught cheating with drugs.

Stearns said the boxing commission would pay for itself by licensing fees, but that left others complaining Congress had dropped more important work to focus on sports.

One of the sport's biggest promoters, Bob Arum, said he supported the federal intervention, but worried about the consequences.

The bill, he said, would have taken the sport "into uncharted waters. Can a federal bureaucracy regulate a sport fairly? Some things the federal government does very well, and some things they screw up, like Hurricane Katrina."

Arum criticized lawmakers for seizing on sports as a target for reform.

"The problems they generally deal with have become so immense that, like everybody else, Congress is looking to sports for a diversion. It's easier to make baseball steroids-free or make boxing better than to deal with the situation in Iraq," he said.

IF YOU SAVE A HERO WHAT DOES THAT MAKE YOU?

More men and women on the front lines are surviving life-threatening injuries than ever before for one reason: We have the most elite nurses in the world. As a U.S. Air Force nurse, you receive the most advanced training and have access to the best medical technology on the planet. And whether you're treating Airmen on foreign soil or their families on bases here in the U.S., you can put all of that training to use. If you're interested in learning more about a better place to practice medicine, call or visit us online.
1-800-588-5260 • AIRFORCE.COM/HEALTHCARE

Belichick plugs in pieces

RICE from page 12

Although it is certainly not expected that he will perform like this consistently for the rest of the season, it is encouraging to see the Patriots' offensive line create holes for any running back.

The next thing I noticed was that rookie second-round draft pick Ellis Hobbs was making his first career start in place of the injured Duane Starks, who struggled in his first year as a Patriot and was himself starting in place of the injured Chad Scott, who struggled in his first year as a Patriot (noticing a trend?), who, in turn, was playing for the off-injured Tyrone Poole.

I had been hoping for Bill Belichick to give Hobbs the nod for several weeks after Starks, a former Baltimore Raven and Arizona Cardinal who owns a Super Bowl ring from his years in Brian Billick's loaded Baltimore defense of 2000, has given up big play after big play, allowing teams to pull away from the Patriots early in games.

I was not expecting Belichick to rush to that decision, as he has a history of waiting to start capable younger players until injuries force him to (see Eugene Wilson in 2003, or Randall Gay in 2004).

Starks's style of playing seven-to-10 yards off the receiver may have worked out well in Baltimore and Arizona, but it failed to produce anything but touchdowns for the other team in Belichick's typically physical defensive game-plans, which involved press coverage of receivers at the line of scrimmage.

Although I'm sure Patriot Nation will be praising Hobbs for weeks as though he were Tom Brady replacing Drew Bledsoe in 2001, he didn't have a spectacular game. Hobbs covered Miami's No. 2 wideout Marty Booker most of the game, who finished with five catches for a game-high 102 yards receiving.

However, the difference in play from Starks to Hobbs was evident. Hobbs played physically, at times giving up plays, but was consistently in the receiver's face. The play that fans will remember is his pass deflection against Booker in the endzone on first-and-goal from the New England five. Looking directly into the sun, Hobbs won a battle in which he was oversized by getting himself in great position to bat away the ball.

In a goal line situation at the end of the game, Hobbs stayed with his man and prevented Miami from tying the game. In very similar scenarios, both Chad Scott and Duane Starks have found themselves out of position and watched their man score a crucial touchdown (see Carolina Panthers, San Diego Chargers and Denver Broncos).

Finally, one of the biggest changes I saw was that outside linebacker Mike Vrabel was announced as a starter at inside linebacker alongside Tedy Bruschi, whose story we've all heard by now, allowing one-time Chicago Bear Rosevelt Colvin to make a rare start at OLB opposite Willie McGinest.

After seeing former Pittsburgh Steeler and Seahawk Chad Brown miss numerous tackles, and watching one-time Kansas City Chief Monty Beisel get plowed over by 221-pound LaDainian Tomlinson twice for scores from inside the 5-yard line, I was excited to see some defensive upheaval in the linebacking corps.

Vrabel played well, recording eight tackles, as did Colvin, who made six of his own in extra playing time. The move was probably a combination of Brown and Beisel's struggles so far this season, as well as the fact that moving Vrabel inside means four starting linebackers who are well versed in Belichick's defensive system.

However, it was not what I, nor anyone else, noticed during this game that encouraged me the most. It was what no one watching the game — or the coverage thereafter — heard, saw or read about. Despite being bumped from the starting lineup quickly following Bruschi's return, neither Brown nor Beisel had anything negative to say about their role on the team.

In fact, both veterans could be seen making plays on special teams, with each recording a tackle against the Dolphins. This turn of events — or lack thereof, really — reminds me of why this organization has been so successful this decade. Chad Brown and Monty Beisel demonstrated selflessness and a team attitude that has been a staple of Patriot football since the Belichick era began.

Team chemistry, an issue that has often led team to ruin — such as New England's last Super Bowl victim, the Philadelphia Eagles — has, in many ways, kept this team afloat. Once again, players have been willing to play out of position, including Brown who is naturally an outside linebacker, and share time on the field for the betterment of the whole. Even the ageless Troy Brown has found himself in the defensive secondary once again.

Although it may not be as successful this year, as the Pats already have the same number of losses this year as the last two combined (still not saying much), the team's ability to manage games with role players and injury replacements is commendable.

At 5-4, the Pats are still in first place in the AFC East and only two games back of conceivably earning a first-round bye in the playoffs, though such thoughts are still months away from any serious consideration.

With a much easier schedule ahead of them than what lay behind, the Patriots are still very much in the hunt, and it is because of players like Chad Brown and Monty Beisel who make the team as tightly knit of a unit as can be found in the NFL.

Both players are prime examples of how Bill Belichick, as well as VP of player personnel Scott Pioli, scout their players. Character is a high priority for the New England front office, and it shows when you see Chad Brown, a starter since his rookie year in Pittsburgh, making a tackle on a punt inside the 20-yard line.

Jeremy Rice is a Collegian Columnist

Undefeateds clash in West Point waters

SWIMMING from page 12

up for a couple of years. It's nice to finally fit them in."

Newcomb added that they have to start off with a bang as they did last weekend against the Terriers, when freshman Taryn Prout, sophomore Samantha Demty, and seniors Melissa Stango and Kelly Hoffrage won the 400-yard medley relay that set the pace for the rest of the day.

"Hopefully, we'll come out with a win," Newcomb said. "[Army] is a very well-coached program. It's going to be very exciting."

Freshman Karen Upperco, who also qualified for the NCAA Zone A Diving Regional Meet last weekend and was just named A-10 Rookie of the Week, earned the third-best score on the three-meter and the sixth-best score on the one-meter in school history.

Upperco's counterpart this weekend, senior Chelsea Haviland, continued dominating last weekend against Holy Cross, as she improved her record to 8-0 this season. Haviland is six-for-six at the Patriot League Championships and finished fifth in the one-meter dive and eighth on the three-meter dive at the NCAA Championships.

NOTE: Earlier this week, it was reported that new school records in the men's 400-yard medley relay and the women's 400-yard freestyle relay were broken last weekend against BU, but this was incorrect, as there was a technical error with the clocking system.

Ortiz honored with Ted Williams Award

BOSTON (AP) — Red Sox designated hitter David Ortiz, who was the runner-up in the AL MVP voting this week, was second-to-none in the voting for the top two awards given by the Boston chapter of the Baseball Writers Association of America.

Ortiz will be given the Ted Williams Award as the top batter in the major leagues, along with the Yawkey Award as the Red Sox Most Valuable Player, at the Boston BBWAA's annual dinner on Jan. 12.

Ortiz batted .300 with 47 homers and a major league-leading 148 RBIs this season. He also had 34 RBIs that put his team ahead, the most in the AL, and eight RBIs from the seventh inning on that gave Boston the lead for good.

On Monday, he finished second in the MVP voting to Alex Rodriguez of the New York Yankees.

Awards not yet announced include the prestigious Fuchs Award, for long and meritorious service to baseball, and the Tony Conigliaro Award, which is given to the player who embodies the spirit and determination of the former Red Sox star.

The master of ceremonies will be comedian Mike O'Malley, from TV's "Yes, Dear" and known to sports fans as "The Rick" from ESPN commercials.

Allen Indicted ForFight

CHICAGO (AP) — A Cook County grand jury has indicted Boston Celtics guard Tony Allen on three counts of aggravated battery stemming from a fight that escalated into a shooting outside a Chicago diner in August, officials said Wednesday.

Cook County state's attorney spokesman Tom Stanton said the indictment was read to Allen during a hearing in a Chicago courtroom Wednesday. Allen did not enter a plea.

Allen, who was charged last month with aggravated battery and released from custody on a $150,000 bond, is scheduled to return to court Dec. 6 for arraignment, Stanton said.

Aggravated battery carries a maximum sentence of five years in prison, he said. A telephone call to Allen's attorney, Michael Zaslavsky, for comment was not immediately returned Wednesday.

Allen is accused of being involved in an early morning fight at the White Palace Grill, a diner south of the downtown business district. According to police, he punched another man in the face, breaking the man's left eye socket. Another man was shot in the left arm and left side but police spokesman Pat Camden said Allen is not suspected in the shooting.

Allen, who played college basketball at Oklahoma State, was drafted by the Celtics 25th overall in the 2004 draft. He started 34 games as a rookie, averaging 6.4 points and 2.9 rebounds a game.

Sox Call To Bullpen

BOSTON (AP) — Al Nipper, a former Red Sox draft pick who played the majority of his career with the club, was named Boston's bullpen coach on Wednesday.

The right-hander, selected in the eighth round of the 1980 draft, won 42 games with the Red Sox from 1983 to 1987, and was a member of the 1986 team that lost to the New York Mets in the World Series.

He was 46-50 with a 4.52 ERA in a seven-year major league career that included stints with the Chicago Cubs and Cleveland Indians.

He began his coaching career with the Red Sox in 1992 with the rookie-level Gulf Coast Red Sox and remained in the organization through 1997. He was the Texas Rangers minor-league pitching coordinator for two seasons and Kansas City Royals pitching coach for two seasons. He returned to the Red Sox organization in 2003 as the pitching coach at Single-A Sarasota.

The team also announced that Bill Haselmen, Ron Jackson, Brad Mills and Dave Wallace have been invited to return to the major league coaching staff.

Bring hoops back to the Cage

GREENFIELD from page 12

the bowels of the building, going underneath the side stands and walking on the track that runs around the court.

The faded red running space wraps itself around the court while going down narrow hallways underneath the stands on both sides. The hallways are lit by broad fluorescent lights that you can probably find in your nearest bathroom.

Along this hallway you can find exits to the outside of the building, as well as something you might not expect to find at the former home of UMass basketball: locked inside a floor-to-ceiling fence, there is old gym equipment — jump ropes, hockey sticks, orange cones — just in case a game of floor hockey breaks out.

There is only one scoreboard in the gym, and it hangs from the rafters along with group of speakers (no surround sound in this place). The scoreboard is old-school — no video screens, no commercial endorsements, not even a screen for keeping track of individual player fouls. The small CocaCola sign at the top is the only reference to a commercial endorsement. The scoreboard shows only the UMass score, visitor score, period, team fouls and time.

The fluorescent lights hung throughout the gym are kept up, like the scoreboard, by an elaborate set of bars and beams that seem imposing when observed from the stands. The ceiling hangs deceptively low.

Despite the obvious aging, there is no obstructed-view seating — even from the corners of the stands, in the darkest parts of the Cage, there is still a full view of the entire court. The ceiling is low compared to the modern basketball facilities, and the 4,000 fans the Cage holds could easily make Mullins Center noise with the acoustics of a tight gymnasium.

The fans would be right on top of the court, prompting a more interactive relationship between players and their supporters. And everyone knows that, in last year's UConn triumph, the Minutemen got an assist by a loud and raucous Mullins Center crowd.

The hardwood still glistens under the glare of the Cage lights, and despite a few kinks here and there (including the felt on the bench chairs peeling off), it would be prime real estate for an intense, Division 1 college basketball atmosphere. The Cage breathes basketball. It is a throwback to the smaller gyms (I could easily see the Cage in the movie "Hoosiers") in which basketball was created.

When you walk into the outer hallway of the Cage, you will see a trophy case (in high school fashion) displaying the various awards UMass sports have collected over the years. There were scattered awards from different UMass sports, but I looked closely and was surprised to find an autographed picture of Julius Erving.

Dr. J is history, and history is in the Cage.

Sure, the parking could be a nightmare if the Minutemen played there. The basketball program would sell fewer tickets, and the players' luxuries would be downgraded. But I'm tired of sports being about money and excess all of the time. It is about the game, and playing at the Cage would be a better atmosphere for UMass basketball. The Mullins Center is a great facility, but Massachusetts basketball should do the real fans a favor: bring the Cage back.

Rob Greenfield is a Collegian Columnist

COMIC BOOKS
MAIN VEIN COMICS
COLLECTIBLES & CREEPY STUFF
74 FEDERAL ST, GREENFIELD, MA
(413) 773-7775
MAINVEINCOMICS@AOL.COM
NEW & BACK ISSUES, TRADES, TOYS, & MORE
THROUGH THE MAIL SUBSCRIPTIONS AVAILABLE FOR COLLEGE STUDENTS!

Be a Web-savvy writer.
There are some significant differences between writing for the printed page and writing for the Web. That's why UMass Amherst offers a Certificate of Online Journalism that'll give you the skills editors are looking for. Tomorrow's journalists will know their news and know their 'Net.
ONLINE JOURNALISM
www.UMassULearn.net
413-545-2414
100 Venture Way, Hadley, MA
UMass Amherst Continuing Education

STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE UMASS, AMHERST
HELPING STUDENTS PROTECT THEIR RIGHTS FOR 30 YEARS
Free Legal Advice, Referrals, Representation and Counseling for UMASS Students
Student & Workers Rights, Family & Criminal Law, Landlord Tenant & Consumer Disputes
CALL 545-1995
or stop in at 922 Campus Center

MAKE MONEY
start an internet business be in college
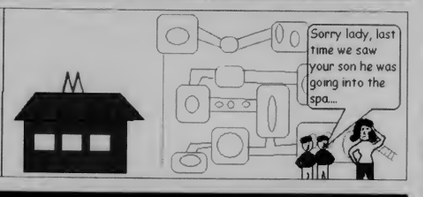
$$ make money $$
www.more-spending-money.com

Budweiser BUD LIGHT
THE HARP
Prizes! Prizes! Prizes!
No Cover!
Live Music with Hi8us!
PROMO!
November 19TH
9 - 1 AM
"Come party like you're Irish"
413-548-6900 163 Sunderland Rd. • N. Amherst www.theharp.net



SPHS University of Massachusetts Amherst
School of Public Health and Health Sciences
The Department of Public Health cordially invites you to an Open House for prospective graduate students! Please join us on Friday, November 18th, 2005, from 10 am to Noon, at the Campus Center, Room 162 - 75.
Come meet faculty, staff and students from biostatistics, epidemiology, environmental health sciences, community health education, and health policy and management. You can also learn about our online degree program.
Learn about the Department of Public Health admissions process, financial aid opportunities and the curriculum.
For additional information about the Open House, please R.S.V.P. Charlene Gallca at: chargallca1@schoolph.umass.edu or call (413) 545-2288

FRANCO THE CLARINETTING NAVY BEAN AND STAN By Rainy Stanford

RANDOM CHATTER By Chris Sala

Anyone that has been to a McDonald's lately has seen how complicated these playplace things have gotten. Its madness

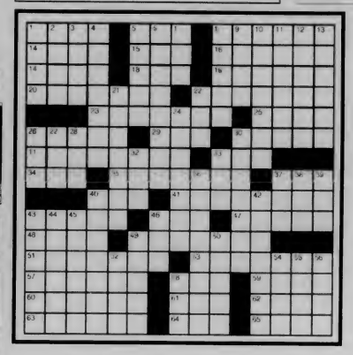
JACK DOGG By Xavier Rhodes

PAUL By Billy O'Keefe

A COLLEGE GIRL NAMED JOE By Aaron Warner

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"Mistakes are the portals of discovery."



—James Joyce

ACROSS
1 Charity for the poor
5 Blowup letters?
8 Unpaid servants
14 Casting place
15 Acoustic organ
16 Mining disaster
17 Heart
18 Nose into
19 East African republic
20 More sharply inclined
22 More impetuous
23 Math proposition
25 Farmland unit
26 Supply the food
29 Sebaceous cyst
30 Printing machine
31 Runs
33 ___ Moines
34 Retrieve
35 Brandy cocktail
37 Actress Arthur
40 Blue or Cross
41 Decayed state
43 Theater sections
46 Movie on a PC
47 Greek letters
48 Sharer's word
49 One who makes a fold
51 Dignified and impressive
53 New England state
57 New York city
58 Peggy or Brenda
59 Strongly assert
60 Tarry
61 Drop the ball
62 Dale
63 Distinctive mannerisms
64 Orbiting loc
65 Hogs' dinner

DOWN
1 Circle parts
2 Joe Orton play
3 Additional amount
4 Pesky critter
5 Conical home
6 Got lighter
7 Sample
8 Go away
9 Hard and fast rules
10 Archetypes
11 "Death in ___"
12 Ducks for down
13 Catches
21 Word groups
22 Female fowl
24 Residence
26 Machine part
27 Simian
28 Hanoi holiday
30 More full of bounce
32 Malleable metal
33 Ex-QB Marino
36 Dead bodies
37 Take the odds
38 NASA partner
39 Beast of burden
40 Suburban
42 Control groups
43 Defeated side
44 Wall socket
45 Annual music award
46 Matter-of-fact
49 Highland groups
50 Oracles
52 Cleveland's lake
54 Roundish shape
55 Jules Verne's captain
56 Golf-course hazard
58 Island garland

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

the Moan and Dove
Open at 8:00pm Thanksgiving Day
themoananddove.com
460 West St. • Rte. 116
Amherst, MA • 256-1710
3pm 'til 1 am every day

Submit your comic!
e-mail collegiancomics@yahoo.com

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Your cell phone will break at the most inconvenient moment.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
All of your dreams will come true, if you wait long enough.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
If you happen to eat an orange today, attempt to peel it all in one piece.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
That zipper on your hoodie will be broken by the end of the day.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Your computer needs a new background.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
You will miss out on something wicked fun this weekend.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You will be splashed with muddy water by a passing car today.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You will not order any more pizza this semester.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
You will not have any run in's with the law in the near future.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Ask for paper instead of plastic at the grocery store today.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
You will have an unfortunate accident involving super glue tonight.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You will be hollered at on more than one occasion today.

New in Town?
Amherst Hairstylists
Caren's Place
You can trust us with your hair.
40 Main St.
Downtown Amherst
(Next to Newbury Comics)
413 253 1200
Mon-Fri 10-6
Sat 10-4
Visa/MC/JS
This Ad Will Run Mon & Thurs
•Haircuts & Styling
•Hair Coloring (Free Highlighting Consultation)
•Multi-Color Highlighting
•Body & Facial Waxing
•For Both Men & Women
•Walk-Ins Welcome!
Get it done right the first time!
Fall Semester Coupon Specials!
1/2 price facial waxing on Wed through December.
$1 off any service with this ad until 12/05
Only with this coupon
www.carensplace.com

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ANNOUNCEMENTS

White Out Night at The Pub! Friday November 18 at The Pub HTM students are hosting an event to support the American Stroke Association. Wear White Clothing! Buy raffles for a chance to win great prizes! Come out and support the ASA while having fun with your friends!

Montreal Weekend New Years Party $129 Complete cocktail age 18 781-979-9001 Call now montrealexpress.net

Looking for GO, Baduke, Weigi Players. New players welcome. Call 339-225-0537 253-9873

APARTMENT FOR RENT

1, 2, 3 & 4 Bedroom spacious apartments, Great location, Bus Route, All utilities included No Fee Call 413-253-3000

EMPLOYMENT

Leaf Raking $10/Hr. Walking distance to campus, we provide rakes. 549-5854

Day Bartenders Position, Mon, Weds, Fri. Local Pub. Call 548-6900

Rent us your ears! Listening experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu Voicemail: 545-6837.

EMPLOYMENT

Part-Time Workers Needed We are looking for part-time assistance with a variety of office and clerical tasks. Preferred candidates will work quickly and accurately and be able to work from 5pm-9pm on days that they work. Pay is $8.00/hour. For consideration, please call (413) 256-0444 for an application or mail resume to: National Evaluation Systems, Inc., Personnel Department, P.O. Box 226, Amherst, MA 01004-0226. Resumes may also be emailed to: personnel@nesinc.com.

EMPLOYMENT

November 18th is the last day to apply to become a Legal Assistant with the Student Legal Services Office. Earn 12 credits while gaining valuable experience. Contact us at 545-1995 or stop by at 922 Campus Center to pick up an application.

Mystery Shoppers get paid to shop! Up to $150 a day. Training provided Call 1-800-690-1273

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience nees. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

ROMMATE WANTED

Apartment in Presidential looking for one or two roommates for spring semester male or female 781-608-1051

SERVICES

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance. 549-1906

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

TRAVEL

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

ACT NOW – SPRING BREAKERS Book early & Save! Free meals/parties by 11/7. Lowest prices. Be a rep & TRAVEL FREE! Get the ultimate hook-ups with STA TRAVEL 413-256-1261.

SPRING BREAK – Early Booking Specials – FREE Meals & Drinks - $50 Deposit – 800-234-7007 www.endlesssummertours.com

TRAVEL

SPRING BREAK FROM $569 BAHAMAS, CANCUN, ACAPULCO, JAMAICA! FREE PARTIES, FREE DRINKS. Sign up early and save. Organize a small group and you travel FREE. Or become a CAMPUS REP and GET PAID COMMISSION on each trip sold. Call today and get started 1-800-GET-SUN-1

Collegian Advertising
Advertise in New England's largest college daily! Reach over 14,000 readers per day. Call 545-3500 between 9:00am and 3:30pm M-F

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS THURSDAY

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Showtime for the Minutemen

Season finale to determine playoff fate

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

The clichés are overwhelming when it comes to Saturday's clash between the No. 7 Massachusetts football team (7-3 6-1 Atlantic 10) and Hofstra (6-4 4-3 A-10). Whether it's "do or die", or "win and you're in," the Minutemen simply have a shot at the A-10 championship and a tournament bid with a win at Shuart Stadium in Hempstead, N.Y. at 1 p.m.

"Everybody would like to win a dominated game and put up all big numbers, but we just have to win — that's the bottom line," redshirt freshman Liam Coen said. "We have to execute and win the ballgame."

After dropping its third contest of the season at Division I-A Army, 34-27, on Saturday, UMass immediately realized the urgency going into its game against the Pride, as the very fate of the 2005 season will rest on Saturday's battle. Hofstra's season will officially end at the conclusion of Saturday's game with no chance at a tournament bid; the 6-4 team lost three vital games by a total 12 points this season.

The Pride have been able to keep tough games close by making use of their deadly passing game, which ranks atop the entire A-10. So far this season, quarterback Anton Clarkson has led the attack, throwing for an average of 307.2 yards per game

See FOOTBALL on page 9

GAME DAY CENTRAL

No. 7 UMass	Hofstra
(7-3 Overall 6-1 Atlantic 10)	(6-4 Overall 4-3 Atlantic 10)
Last Week: Lost 34-27 at Army	Last Week: Won 20-17 at Northeastern

Shuart Stadium, Hempstead, N.Y. (15,000)
Kickoff: 1 p.m.

Television: RNN in New York Area On Delay
Radio: UMass Sports Network - WRNX 100.9 FM Holyoke, flagship (Bob Behler: play-by-play, Matt Goldstein: color commentary, Mike Marzelli: sidelines)

Series: Hofstra leads 5-3

KAREN WINDOR/COLLEGIAN

Redshirt freshman quarterback Liam Coen will have to be on his game on Saturday if the Minutemen are to come out victorious in their 2005 finale against the Hofstra Pride.

Teams have a lot on the line Saturday

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

It is hard to comprehend the amount of emotion intertwined into the 60 minutes of football that will be played on Saturday when the No. 7 Massachusetts football team takes on Hofstra at Shuart Stadium in Hempstead, N.Y.

Both squads will have an equal fire in their eyes when they emerge onto the green Astroturf, and while both groups will have different reasons for getting the win, it is a guarantee that they will all be playing from their hearts.

For UMass, its highly anticipated 2005 campaign can either continue on or come to an abrupt halt on Saturday, as it must leave Hampstead with a victory to earn a spot in the NCAA Division I-AA playoffs.

"It's easy to say that you look at it as any other game, but you know there's a little bit more sense of urgency coming into this game," quarterback Liam Coen said. "We have to get this game taken care of."

After falling to New Hampshire 34-28 on Oct. 29 and then to Army last Saturday, the Minutemen were forced into a situation in which they have to beat Hofstra on the road.

Despite the fact that the contest is vital to the team, the Minutemen are not getting

See EMOTION on page 9

Pats keep on finding pieces

Jeremy Rice

As I watched the Patriots play this past Sunday against their longtime rival the Miami Dolphins, I noticed several things that gave me reason to hope for a better second half to what has been a tumultuous season for the Pats thus far.

The first thing I noticed, mainly because New England started with the ball, was Heath Evans making an almost immediate replacement for struggling running back Corey Dillon. On the first play from scrimmage, it appeared Dillon re-aggravated a leg injury that has plagued him for most of this season. With only 441 yards rushing this season, Dillon is a far cry from his record-setting performance from a year ago.

With Patrick Pass and Kevin Faulk, two shifty, third-down style backs, inactive for Sunday's game, recent addition Evans, primarily a fullback who was released by the Dolphins just two weeks prior, carried the load with 84 yards rushing.

Producing nearly half of his career totals from four-plus years with the Seattle Seahawks and the Dolphins in one game, Evans was no doubt a suprise.

See RICE on page 10

UM to battle with Army

By Joey White
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team will have its 11-meet winning streak and undefeated season record of 3-0 on the line tomorrow when it travels to West Point, N.Y. to face another unbeaten team in the Black Knights of Army.

The Black Knights stretched their own winning streak and season record to 4-0 with a victory over Holy Cross, 168-113, while the Minutemen last weekend defeated Boston University 141-97.

Schools like Army, and Brown in two weeks, have been added to the schedule to upgrade it and challenge the UMass swimmers at a higher competition level.

"I don't think we have ever swam against them," UMass coach Russ Yarworth said. "It is a test. We'll see how they step up against higher competition."

Comparing Army's times with the Minutemen's times, Yarworth admits that the Black Knights are a better team on paper.

"It's good to swim as underdogs, like we have the past few years in the Atlantic 10 Championships," Yarworth said. "I'm putting my best lineup in, and we're going to swim to win."

Yarworth's "Swimmer of the Meet" last weekend against the Terriers, freshman Tristan Partridge, who showed him that he can swim the long distance events with his second-place finish in the 1000-yard freestyle, will take on the "iron triangle" against the Black Knights. The "iron triangle" is comprised of the 1000-yard freestyle, 200-yard butterfly and the 500-yard freestyle events.

"He's going to take it on; he's a tough kid. We'll see how he responds to it," Yarworth said. "He allows you to put [junior co-captain Greg] Chartier in different events."

The Maroon and White will be looking toward the diving sections of the meet to give them an edge, as they have been doing so far this season. "On paper," comparing last weekend's meets, sophomore R.J. Rappe scored higher than Army's top divers in both the one-meter and three-meter events. Rappe, with his score of 315.68 in the three-meter, qualified for the NCAA Zone A Diving Regional Meet, where he will have the opportunity to qualify for the NCAA Championship Meet.

The Massachusetts women's swimming and diving team will also be traveling to West Point to take on the Black Knights. The Minutewomen will take their undefeated record of 3-0 against Army's 2-1 record.

The Black Knights are coming off of their second victory in a row. They defeated Holy Cross 159-120 last weekend, where they captured nine out of 16 events along with eight second-place finishes. The Minutewomen beat down on Boston University last weekend 141-100.

"We haven't swam against Army in my years here," UMass coach Bob Newcomb said. "We've tried to pick them

See SWIMMING on page 10

Curry Hicks Cage provides better scene

Rob Greenfield

From a distance, the Curry Hicks Cage doesn't seem special. The black brick pyramid top is the only distinguishable feature in its appearance.

It is tucked in between Garber Field and Herter Hall — a cozy location in the middle of campus. The front entrance is cluttered with construction; the silver, chain-linked fences (that we've all become accustomed to seeing) crowd the narrow walkways in between buildings. There are only 10 parking spaces for the Cage, and those are blocked right now by the construction in between Tobin Hall and Bartlett Hall. It is utterly inaccessible. But UMass basketball should still bring it back.

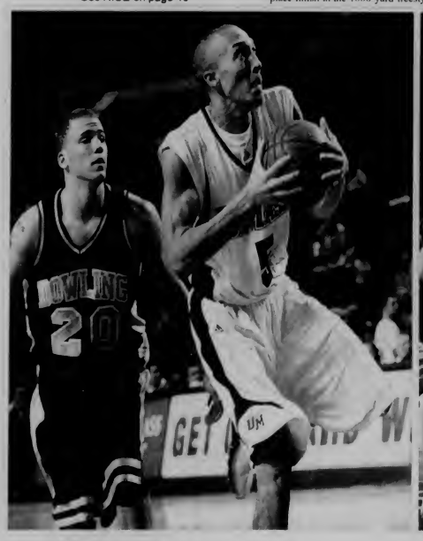
The mundane Mullins Center is a polished facility, oozing convenience and providing accessible parking for visitors and comfortable locker rooms for the players. But there is something missing.

Rarely does the Mullins Center sell out these days. Rarely is there the deafening noise that gives big college basketball programs a significant home court advantage. And the lofty ceilings, spacious hallways and the separated location leave the Mullins Center feeling empty and foreign.

Playing in the Cage would be a welcomed change of pace for Travis Ford, who is trying so desperately to get an electric atmosphere back on the UMass campus.

The nuances of the Cage are what make it such a special basketball venue — and it has plenty of quirks that make it unique.

In the silence of the Cage after the women's basketball practice, the fluorescent lights — which are hung from long, thin wires that stretch all the way to the ceiling — buzz, and the crackling of the heat ducts pierces through the gymnasium.



There are wooden stands that pull out almost to courtside on the long ends of the hardwood, and fold back onto a rubber floor to make room for the retractable basket to be lowered from the ceiling for practice. The seats in the wooden stands are numbered by black paint written on the front of each space — there wouldn't be much space for each person, but then again, there isn't at Fenway Park, either.

About 20 rows up, there is a metal railing that divides the side sections, and there is another set of rows above the railing. The head room for the fans would decrease the further back they are, and the upper stands go nearly to the wall, leaving an aisle about four feet wide behind the stands for fans to get by each other and find their seats.

Behind each baseline, the stands run down to the base of the basket and stretch up 15 rows before a glass railing divides the lower section from the upper. On both sides, the railing extends around the court until it reaches the stands on the side. Behind the seats in the upper section, the white paint is pealing off of the walls — the result of an aging complex.

The stairs that go directly to the upper levels are hidden away in the four corners of the complex. In order to get to the other side of the gym from the entrance, a fan would have to take a detour through

See GREENFIELD on page 10

KAREN WINDOR/COLLEGIAN

Opening night inches closer

The Massachusetts men's and women's basketball teams are only a day away from opening their respective 2005-06 basketball seasons. Be sure to check out tomorrow's issue of the Collegian for a full Sports section devoted to getting you up to date with the newest editions of the two teams.

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY · EST. 1890

The Daily Collegian

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 2005 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM VOLUME CXVI ISSUE 50

UMass officials claim ABC news report is 'unfair'

An ABC News report about crime on college campuses outraged University of Massachusetts officials before the report aired last night on the news magazine show "Primetime."

The report names UMass as having the highest rate of on-campus violent crime nationwide. University officials said in a press release yesterday that labeling the University in such a way is unfair because the report was based on crime statistics from 2002 and 2003.

Ed Blaguszewski, director of News and Information at UMass, says on-campus crime decreased by 50 percent in 2004.

"If you live and work here, the report doesn't make any sense," said UMass Chancellor John Lombardi.

Blaguszewski also had issue with how ABC determined UMass is "the most violent campus." He says ABC took the total number of crimes and divided it by the total enrollment, instead of dividing it by the total number of students living on campus.

"I am very pleased to announce that UMass Amherst has been able to reduce violent on-campus crime by more than 50 percent over the past year," said UMass President Jack Wilson. "We want students, the parents of students, as well as our faculty and staff to know that safety is a top and enduring concern at UMass."

Wilson announced in a statement that James Kallstorm, a former assistant director of the FBI will now be serving as a special adviser on safety in the UMass system.

"While there has been impressive and tangible progress, everyone associated with UMass believes that one crime is one crime too many," Kallstorm, a UMass alumnus, said, "and there is a strong commitment to building on recent successes."

UMass officials have been in contact with ABC to discuss the date being used in the report, according to Lombardi.

ABC would not comment on the "Primetime" report yesterday afternoon.

—Dan O'Brien

Faculty Senate works to increase fundraising

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

The Campaign for Amherst plan to increase fundraising at the University of Massachusetts was the main topic of discussion at last night's Faculty Senate meeting.

Joseph Bartolomeo, the Chair of the University Advancement Council gave a PowerPoint presentation to the assembled faculty senators with an update on the status of the two-year-old Campaign for Amherst.

The Campaign is an attempt by the university to set up a "major, professionally-managed, donor-driven fundraising program," according to its Web site. To this end, the university has set up the University of Massachusetts Amherst Foundation.

The Web site, which can be found at umass.edu/campaign, describes the Foundation as "An independent … campus-based foundation, led by some of our most dedicated and effective volunteers and donors, provides direction and policy guidance for this campaign."

Bartolomeo and his committee have been working on improving the campaign structure, opting for a decentralized effort among the colleges and schools of UMass to suit each department's financial fundraising needs.

The goals of the fundraising program that Bartolomeo mentioned in his presentation included professorships, academic programmatic initiatives, student activities and scholarships for undergraduates and graduates and academic capital investment.

Some sources the UMass Foundation plans to tap for this fundraising money include those who have donated money to the university in the past, corporate and foundation sponsors and alumni.

Chancellor John V. Lombardi said those involved in fundraising must reconnect with successful alumni. He said such reconnection has often proven to bring back fond memories of UMass with the alumnus and constant contact with that person can then be established until the topic of monetary donations can be breached. Often, according to Lombardi, when donors give their old school money, "it is the happiest day of their lives."

Lombardi explained that most donors have expressed satisfaction when they see what changes are wrought on their alma mater due to their investment.

"It's not about squeezing money out of the unwilling," Lombardi said, "It's about making those who would be willing to remember their college."

JESSICA HILL/COLLEGIAN

Joseph Bartolomeo, Chair of the University Advancement Council, presented a PowerPoint presentation to Faculty Senate members, updating the status of the University's campaign for increased fundraising.

Bartolomeo said a lot of the success of the fundraising campaign rests on the involvement of the members of the faculty. Some faculty senators expressed concern at this, asking for further clarification about what fundraising duties would be expected of them.

Lombardi responded to this query, saying, "We know the faculty's job is not to raise money, but to teach and research." He explained that faculty involvement would come on the level of deciding how to use funds effectively within each department.

Lombardi also said that when people are considering making a donation, it is often enough to introduce them to the faculty members in the potential donor's area of interest. Then, it is up to the faculty to tell these donors about what it is they research or teach in the school to show that person their money would be used effectively.

The Campaign is running in three stages, the planning stage, the leadership phase and the public phase. According to Bartolomeo, the first stage is almost complete and the committee is moving into the second stage.

This second phase will involve recruiting campaign leadership, identifying and soliciting donors and launching campaign communications. Eventually, Bartolomeo hopes the Campaign will reach its third and final stage and be ready to go public with their fundraising "corporation."

Warren residents brace for closing of local factory

By Matt O'Rourke
Collegian Staff

WARREN — Gail Sledziewski of Warren has worked for the Wm. Wright Company for 34 years, assembling fashion trimmings. Her grandmother worked there when the company manufactured parachutes during World War II.

Come next April, Sledziewski will be out of a job, along with 250 other employees, when Wright merges with Conso International, one of the world's largest trimmings manufacturers. One of many such rural communities in New England, where life and livelihood center solely around the economy produced by a single industrial facility, the reality is devastating.

"I'm getting close to retirement age, and I'm going to find myself without a job at a very bad time in my life," said Sledziewski.

Sledziewski is saddened, more than angry, about the move.

"They've been very good to the workers over the years — they have 'mother hours' for working mothers, they hire the youth to work after school and during the summer. Retirees work there part time, too," said Sledziewski.

Wright also provided workers with bus transportation and classes to educate staff on new trends in business, including typing and data information courses.

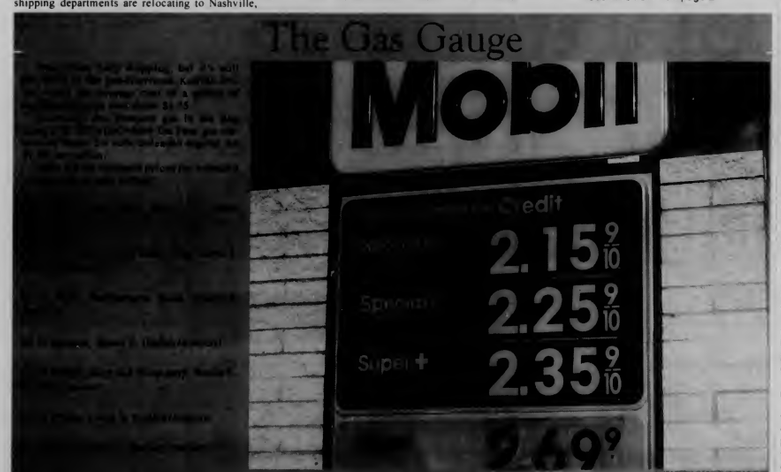
Wm. Wright Company's manufacturing and shipping departments are relocating to Nashville, Tenn. The company decision came after Michael D. Fuss, President and Chief Executive Officer of Wright, deemed the nearly century old building "inefficient." Fuss could not be reached for comment.

Parts of the Warren plant facility will be renovated, as the company plans to make its corporate headquarters in Warren. Wright management promises to keep some of its current workforce at the headquarters, offering computer training to some, said Sledziewski.

There are differing opinions concerning responsibility for closing plants in Massachusetts. Tom Juravich, a Labor Studies professor at the University of Massachusetts, said many manufacturing jobs lost in the state are the result of near shoring rather than outsourcing.

"Tennessee is a 'right to work state,' meaning that union membership is not a condition for employment, which means lower work standards and cheaper labor," said Juravich.

According to the report "Capital Mobility and Job Loss in Massachusetts," by Stephanie Luce and Kate Bronfenbrenner, the textile industry in Massachusetts lost approximately 6 percent of its jobs in 2004. The same report states Massachusetts accounts for 8 percent of the total textile industry in the United States, resulting in a net loss of 3 percent of jobs nationally. However, total unemployment in Massachusetts dropped slightly from 5.3 percent to 4.7 percent since July 2004, according to a report released by the Department of Labor in July 2005.



"I think that the impact will be felt far and wide throughout the community," Sledziewski said. "It's going to be difficult to find jobs and others will be affected, especially the youth."

When the factory closes, there will be less revenue for the town, which will in turn affect the amount of funding schools receive, along with other public institutions, said Gary Lindsay, a member of Warren's Planning Board.

Lindsay believes NAFTA is responsible for the closing of so many manufacturing facilities. The North American Free Trade Agreement, officially begun in 1994, encourages free trade among the United States, Canada and Mexico by lifting tariffs on the majority of goods produced by these countries, under the premise that doing so is good for the economy. One of the primary industries affected in the United States is textile manufacture. American labor in opposition to NAFTA claims rampant job losses of thousands of American textile workers resulted as American industries closed plants and moved their facilities to Mexico, outsourcing jobs and goods.

"Its going to put a big hurt on the town," said Lindsay. "Right now there isn't anything in the works to replace the factory. The manufacturing industry isn't really coming to this part of the

See FACTORY on page 2

ELIZABETH CARUSO/COLLEGIAN

The Kwik Fill convenience store and shop strip on Route 9 in Hadley held the fifth highest price in the week's edition of "The Gas Gauge."

Sudanese victims address crowd at UMass Hillel

By Matt Hoffman
Collegian Staff

The Hillel House at the University of Massachusetts hosted three speakers associated with the Western Massachusetts Darfur Coalition and Students to Save Sudan International on Wednesday night.

Nathan Abraham, publicity director and director of these groups, moderated the event. Abraham, an alumnus of UMass, contacted Batya Kaga, the assistant director at Hillel, searching for a program idea. Kagan proposed that he work together with Tzedek, the community service and social justice group at Hillel.

"The United Nations has called this situation the worst humanitarian crisis on Earth," said Tamador Gibreel to an audience of 40 people.

The Darfur region, located in western Sudan, has seen a genocide being carried out by Arab Muslims, including the Sudanese government and government-sponsored gangs called janjaweed, against tribal African Muslim farmers. The violence has claimed 200,000 lives since February, 2003. In addition, there have been numerous rapes and village pillaging recorded.

"Janjaweed used to be the term for a way of life," stated one of the speakers, who asked not to be identified for fear of government retribution on his family remaining in Sudan. "The Janjaweed were at one time nomadic. When my brothers and I would just hang around, my mother would tell us that we were being 'janjaweed.'"

Now the government has taken advantage of these nomadic Arab people and began using them as tools to inflict harm on the African Muslims.

This speaker explained that "Not only has petrol oil been discovered in Darfur, but this region has the largest share of Sudanese livestock." Sudan is the largest country in Africa in terms of land-mass, and has a population of 40 million people.

The African Union has deployed peace keepers in the area, yet they are not able to protect the citizens in the area due to their lack of power. This organization has a severe lack of funding. Also holding this unifying group from completing its mission is the fact that the mandates which the United Nations has provided them with are so weak that virtually nothing can be done to stop the genocide without a broadening of powers for the peacekeepers.

The speakers continued by mentioning that one way in which students can be involved in stopping the genocide in Sudan is to pressure large American corporations and universities to divest their pensions from international companies that do business with the government of Sudan. The Sudanese government supplies airplanes and ammunition to the janjaweed, and therefore the United States has banned U.S. corporations from doing business with that government. However, companies listed on foreign stock exchanges bypass this rule.

Gibreel thanked those in attendance, saying, "It shows me that you care."

Abraham closed the session by remarking that the world "needs people who are at the cutting edge, and who are willing to do more than just sign petitions. If not, we're kidding ourselves. I don't want to see a movie named 'Hotel Darfur,'" a reference to the hit "Hotel Rwanda," which depicted one man's attempt to save lives during the slaughter of 800,000 Rwandans in 1994.

For more information on how to help, contact Nathan@nathanabraham.com or visit iAbolish.com.

ARTS & LIVING
THE VALLEY'S GALLERIES
UMass, Amherst College and Smith house many unique exhibitions.
PAGE 5

EDITORIAL/OPINION
NEW GROUPS ARE CAUSING A WAVE
In the past country music only made a splash. Now, new blood is making a tidal wave.
PAGE 4

WEATHER
TODAY Sunny, H40°, L21°
TOMORROW Mostly Sunny, H44°, L26°
SUNDAY Partly Cloudy, H50°, L27°

SPORTS
TIP-OFF TIME
UMass begins season at home against Hartford tonight at 7 p.m.
PAGE 10

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Michael Busack
MANAGING EDITOR Cameron J. Woods
BUSINESS MANAGER Hirak Shah
PRODUCTION MANAGER Nicholas Belanger
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Sherif Wahsh
ADVERTISING MANAGER Kerry O'Grady
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Lauren Egavian
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Amanda Allen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Matthew O'Rourke
COPY EDITOR Amanda Allen
EDITORIAL EDITOR Allison Edles
NEWS EDITOR Dan O'Brien
PHOTO EDITOR Kate Sachsenmaier
SPORTS EDITOR Jeff Howe
CIRCULATION MANAGER Thomas Hecht
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Nick Gleason
FINANCE MANAGER Daniel Conti
HUMAN RESOURCE Phil Smoller
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Caren Tortorici
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Nathan Chomsky
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Mackenzie Isler
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Ian Jones
ASSISTANT NEWS Megan Daley
ASSISTANT NEWS Matt Belliveau
ASSISTANT PHOTO Elizabeth Caristi
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eric Athas
ASSISTANT SPORTS Dan Duggan
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Kristen LaCasse

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE NEWS IN 1903, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE DAILY COLLEGIAN IN 1936. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967. THE COLLEGIAN IS ON THE BROADSHEET SIZE. JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 5:00 P.M.

Campus Perspectives

Should Residence Hall security be allowed to conduct random bag searches?

Junior
Stockbridge

I don't have anything to hide so I don't care.

Travis Shultz

Freshman
History major

I think it's pretty stupid—it's a hassle.

Bryan Staple

Freshman
Finance major

I don't think they have a right to do bag searches.

Ami Patel

Freshman
Poli—Sci major

I think it would make it more difficult for campus police. I think it's an invasion of privacy.

John Halter

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Allison Edles
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Elizabeth Caristi
COPY EDITOR
Ian Jones
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Ginny Nielsen
PRODUCTION STAFF
Sean Duram, Jeston Sussman

News
We got it you want it come and get it for yourself. Write for news. call Dan, Matt, or Megan 545-1809

Nation shares concern for insuring disasters

By Eileen Alt Powell
Associated Press

(AP) — As New Orleans antiques dealer Bill Rau labors to rebuild his business after Hurricane Katrina, he's finding that getting insurance against future storms may be one of his biggest obstacles.

Even as he negotiates with 14 insurance adjusters over damage to his property, Rau worries that he won't be able to get affordable coverage for his shop on Royal Street, a block from the Bourbon Street bars and cafes. He's been able to get property and casualty insurance coverage only until Jan. 1, and doesn't expect his carrier to renew the policy.

"I think what's going to happen is that a number of insurance companies are going to pull out," Rau said. "Those that don't are going to be so ridiculously expensive that many businesses won't be able to afford the coverage."

Insurers' willingness to provide coverage is pivotal to how well New Orleans and other areas recover from the devastation wrought by Katrina and the hurricanes that followed. But some insurers intent on limiting future losses are considering pulling out of the Gulf Coast or reducing the number of customers they serve, just as insurers have done in Florida over the past decade.

It's an issue with implications well beyond hurricane regions — no part of the nation is exempt from the possibility of a financially devastating catastrophe, whether it be a terror attack or a killer storm.

Businesses and homeowners across the country are already feeling the impact of the insurance industry's problems, including higher premiums and deductibles while insurers recoup hundreds of billions of dollars in losses from this year's storms. Longer-term, the question is whether the insurance industry can continue to absorb such massive losses without some federal guarantees or state reinsurance pools.

It's a serious concern because insurance is critical to the functioning of the economy.

"If you can't get insurance, you can't borrow money, you can't build inventory, you can't protect your workers, you can't exist," said Mark Drennen, president and chief executive of Greater New Orleans Inc., the city's economic development group.

There are a handful of specialized disaster insurance programs available. For example, the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in New York and Washington, D.C., prompted Congress to enact the Terrorism Risk Insurance Act, which would provide funds to the insurance industry if there are devastating terror attacks in the future. But the TRIA program expires at year's end, and several congressional committees are debating terms for its renewal.

When it comes to natural disasters, there are programs such as the federal flood insurance and the California earthquake coverage, but no comprehensive backup to deal with mega-catastrophes.

To be sure, the U.S. insurance industry is not poor. The industry had a surplus of about $400 billion before Katrina struck.

But Ernie Csiszar, president and chief executive of the Property Casualty Insurers Association of America trade group, said this year's storms could wipe out one-fifth of that.

He added that estimates of the potential damage caused by a massive earthquake in San Francisco indicate "it is not beyond the realm of belief to think it would be a $400 billion catastrophe," the equivalent of the industry's total surplus.

Insurers are divided on whether the industry can — or should — shoulder all the risk.

Craig K. Poulton, whose company Poulton Associates Inc. in Salt Lake City writes flood, landslide and earthquake insurance, believes private companies should be able to handle natural disaster coverage.

But to do so, policies must be priced to reflect the real risk of potential disasters and coupled with solid building and land-use codes designed to mitigate catastrophic damage. He doesn't believe that's been the case in hurricane-prone areas.

"They haven't been charging those people enough money," Poulton said. "In effect, you and I have been subsidizing people who live in Florida and the Gulf Coast. Our premiums go up so they can rebuild their homes every nine years."

State insurance commissioners, however, say the current system isn't working. Disputes over policy coverage and delays in payouts are slowing rebuilding in New Orleans and other areas, making the region more dependent on federal emergency aid and reconstruction money. And it remains unclear whether homeowners and businesses will be able to buy adequate coverage if they do rebuild.

California Insurance Commissioner John Garamendi, who hosted a meeting in San Francisco this week to discuss creation of a national catastrophe insurance program, argues that massive disasters "cannot effectively be dealt with by existing insurance policies or federal emergency aid."

Sewage problems appear

FACTORY from page 1

country so much."

Armand Dimo, a life-long resident of Warren and director of the Warren Senior Center, said the town used to be full of factory halls and cotton mills.

"Over the past 15-20 years, they've been closing down," Dimo said.

"People have to commute to Springfield, Worcester, Framingham or Boston to find a job. How can they expect workers from Wright to commute when they just lost their job and the price of gas is so high?" asked Dimo. At the time of this report, gasoline prices neared $3 a gallon.

Businesses and residents have already begun to feel the crunch, especially in their sewage bills.

"The factory was generating a large amount of sewage, and they've slowed down now, so all the people on the sewage in this town, took the impact of that," said Dimo.

A single-family house could expect to pay $250 a year to the sewer commission, but that number has doubled already to $500 a year, and for local businesses, tripled to $750.

The Planning Board scheduled to meet in October, said Lindsay. Accomplishing anything is uncertain, he says, since so much centered round the factory.

Lindsay is also the owner of Your Village Market, a small convenience store, where many workers from Wm. Wright Co. shopped.

"I got a lot of my business through them, as they would head into work, and come home," said Lindsay. "That's 250 people that aren't going to be flowing through this town on a regular basis."

Diane, an employee of Mona's Pizza-n-More on Main Street, agreed.

"They'd order from us during their lunch breaks, and they were good customers," she said. "They've been laying people off slowly over the years, and now this happens."

The Quaboag Valley Chamber of Commerce covering 15 different towns works to notify locals of any employment opportunities.

"We're trying to get the word out about the jobs that are out there, but it's difficult for us to communicate to the 15 towns we cover across 440 square miles," said Leonard N. Weake, the Chamber's president.

There isn't need to worry just yet, Weake said, and advises Quabbin Wire and Cable, National Fiber and Accellent Orthopedic are looking to hire workers.

"The Chamber is working on ways to get the word out that there are jobs that are in manufacturing," he said.

The Massachusetts Daily COLLEGIAN

The Daily Collegian has job openings for the following positions:

-Managing Editor
-Night/Copy Supervisor
-Arts Editor
-Assistant Arts Editor
-Photographers

These are PAID positions! Applications are due before Thanksgiving break. Pick them up at the Collegian in the Campus Center basement.

Daily Collegian

PARADISE OF INDIA RESTAURANT
Lunch Buffet all you can eat!
Saturday and Sunday only
87 Main St. Amherst, MA, 01002
(413) 256-1067

Getting your degree by getting the credit you deserve.
You're beyond living the on-campus life, but you want to tap into the broad and deep resources of UMass Amherst to earn your degree. University Without Walls provides a guiding hand and gives you credit for life and work experience.
UNIVERSITY WITHOUT WALLS
www.UMassULearn.net
413-545-2414
100 Venture Way, Hadley, MA
UMass Amherst Continuing Education

Can you catch the crooks?
If you want to work in law enforcement, probation, courts or corrections, UMass Amherst offers a Certificate of Criminal Justice with a focus on criminal behavior by citizens and by government and corporate officials. Get valuable insight that'll help you advance in any area of criminal justice.
CRIMINAL JUSTICE
www.UMassULearn.net
413-545-2414
Venture Way, Hadley, MA
UMass Amherst

House Democrat calls for withdrawal from Iraq

By Liz Sidoti
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — An influential House Democrat who voted for the Iraq war called Thursday for the immediate withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq, another sign of growing unease in Congress about the conflict.

"It is time for a change in direction," said Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., one of Congress' most hawkish Democrats. "Our military is suffering, the future of our country is at risk. We cannot continue on the present course. It is evident that continued military action in Iraq is not in the best interests of the United States of America, the Iraqi people or the Persian Gulf region."

House Republicans assailed Murtha's position as one of abandonment and surrender, and accused Democrats of playing politics with the war. "They want us to retreat. They want us to wave the white flag of surrender to the terrorists of the world," Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., said in a statement.

Murtha estimated that all U.S. troops could be pulled out within six months. A decorated Vietnam veteran, he choked back tears during his remarks to reporters.

Murtha's comments came just two days after the Senate voted to approve a statement that 2006 "should be a period of significant transition to full Iraqi sovereignty" to create the conditions for the phased withdrawal of U.S. forces.

In recent days, President Bush and other top administration officials have lashed out at critics of the war and have accused Democrats of advocating a "cut and run" strategy that will only embolden the insurgency.

Vice President Dick Cheney jumped into the fray Wednesday by assailing Democrats who contend the Bush administration manipulated intelligence on Iraq, calling their criticism "one of the most dishonest and reprehensible charges ever aired in this city."

Murtha, a Marine intelligence officer in Vietnam, angrily shot back at Cheney: "I like guys who've never been there that criticize us who've been there. I like that. I like guys who got five deferments and never been there and send people to war, and then don't like to hear suggestions about what needs to be done."

Referring to Bush, Murtha added: "I resent the fact, on Veterans Day, he criticized Democrats for criticizing them."

The top Democrat on the House Appropriations defense subcommittee, Murtha has earned bipartisan respect for his grasp of military issues over three decades in Congress. He planned to introduce a resolution Thursday that, if passed by both the House and the Senate, would force the president to withdraw U.S. troops.

Murtha could not say whether his caucus supports his position. And, although he is a close adviser to House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., she was absent from his news conference.

Later Thursday, Pelosi said she supported his position that the president's policy is not working and must be changed but she stopped short of endorsing his call for immediate withdrawal. "Mr. Murtha speaks for himself very eloquently and the district he represents," Pelosi said.

For months, Pelosi has pushed for the Bush administration to outline an exit strategy, although she has stopped short of calling for an immediate troop pullout. Some Senate Democrats have called for an immediate or phased withdrawal.

Murtha voted to give the president authority to use force against Saddam Hussein in 2002 but in recent months has grown increasingly troubled with the direction of the war and with the Bush administration's handling of it.

"The war in Iraq is not going as advertised. It is a flawed policy wrapped in illusion," Murtha said.

Rep. Kay Granger, R-Texas, said Murtha's call for withdrawal was "reprehensible and irresponsible."

"It shows the Democratic Party has chosen a policy of retreat and defeatism which will only encourage the terrorists and threaten the stability of Iraq," Granger said.

First elected to Congress in 1974, Murtha is known as an ally of uniformed officers in the Pentagon and on the battlefield. The perception on Capitol Hill is that when the congressman makes a statement on military issues, he's talking for those in uniform.

Known to shun publicity, Murtha said he was standing up because he had a constitutional and moral obligation to speak for the troops.

His voice cracked and tears filled his eyes as he related several stories of visiting wounded troops, including one who was blinded and lost both his hands but had been denied a Purple Heart because friendly fire caused his injuries.

"I met with the commandant. I said, 'If you don't give him a Purple Heart, I'll give him one of mine.' And they gave him a Purple Heart," said Murtha, who has two.

Rep. John Murtha, (D-PA), ranking member on the Defense Appropriations Subcommitte, called for the immediate withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq, another sign of the growing unease in Congress about the conflict.

Lime-green $100 laptops to ship next year

By Matt Moore
Associated Press

TUNIS, Tunisia — A cheap laptop boasting wireless network access and a hand-crank to provide electricity are expected to start shipping in February or March to help extend technology to school-aged children worldwide.

The machines are to sell for $100, slightly less than its cost. The aim is to have governments or donors buy them and give full ownership to the children.

"These robust, versatile machines will enable children to become more active in their own learning," U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan told reporters.

Annan and more than 16,000 people from 176 countries were attending the three-day U.N. World Summit on the Information Society, in its second day Thursday.

Although discussions about persisting U.S. control over the Internet's addressing system have consumed much of summit, its original aim was to find ways to extend communications technologies to the world's poorest — through projects like the $100 laptop.

MIT Media Lab chairman Nicholas Negroponte, who unveiled the textbook-sized laptop on Wednesday, said he expects to sell 1 million of them to Brazil, Thailand, Egypt and Nigeria.

Negroponte did not say who would build the machine, which will cost $110 to make, but at least five are considering bids to do so. He said a commercial version may be available at a higher price to subsidize machines provided to children.

The laptop will run on an open-source operating system, such as Linux, which is generally cheaper than proprietary systems such as Microsoft Corp.'s Windows, said Negroponte.

The devices will be lime green in color, with a yellow hand crank, to make them appealing to children and to fend off potential thieves.

Also at the summit, Microsoft unveiled a new network of learning centers in Tunisia to train people to be teachers in technology. Jean-Philippe Courtois, president of Microsoft International, said the company would replicate the centers elsewhere as part of its outreach efforts.

Addressing delegates on Thursday, Pakistani diplomat Masood Khan said increasing access to communications can help improve relations between regions and religions. "Information is not just an economic tool," Kahn told delegates in the main hall. "We need its infinite power to combat the rising tide of prejudice and hatred."

Mass. Marine killed in Iraq

HAVERHILL — Lance Cpl. Nickolas D. Schiavoni was a young man who found direction in life when he got married and joined the Marines, his grandfather said.

Schiavoni, 26, of Haverhill, was killed Tuesday by a suicide bomber driving a vehicle while his unit conducted combat operations near Karmah, Iraq, the Pentagon said.

He attended an alternative high school associated with Haverhill High School, and graduated in 1997 as the most outstanding student, said his grandfather, David J. Swartz.

"He found focus when he got to be a junior, and I was so proud when he was selected as the outstanding student," said Swartz. "When he got involved with his present wife, he decided to go into the service. She was good for him. He thrived with the Marines, and the Marines were good for him."

Schiavoni died helping another member of his unit, his grandfather said. A sergeant saw a car that appeared peculiar and went to investigate. Schiavoni and another member of the unit followed in support. The car exploded, killing Schiavoni.

He was assigned to the 2nd Battalion, 2nd Marine Regiment, 2nd Marine Division, II Marine Expeditionary Force, based at Camp Lejeune, N.C.

It was his second tour of duty in Iraq. He had received a Purple Heart during his first tour, said his grandfather.

Schiavoni "was a good kid who was wrapped up in his family," said Swartz, a former state legislator and a longtime assistant district attorney in Essex County who was recently elected to the Haverhill City Council.

Schiavoni is survived by his wife, Gina Howe Schiavoni, and their children Marissa, 5, and Alex, 3. His mother, Stephany Kern, lives in Westerly, R.I., and his father, David Schiavoni, lives in Monson, the grandfather said.

Memorial and funeral arrangements are still pending, but Schiavoni will be brought back to Haverhill for burial, Swartz said.

Schiavoni is at least the 33rd Massachusetts resident to die in Iraq, according to an Associated Press count. As of Wednesday, at least 2,079 members of the U.S. military have died since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

–Associated Press

Senate bill attracts Democratic effort to squeeze oil

By Mary Dalrymple
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Senate Republicans fought Democratic attempts Thursday to use a $60 billion tax bill to pinch oil and energy companies that have been reporting record profits while consumers pay high gasoline prices.

The bill, which prevents a number of individual and business tax breaks from expiring, already levies almost $5 billion in taxes on major oil companies.

The energy amendments faced opposition from the Republican majority in the Senate and stood little chance of success, but they reflected attentiveness on Capitol Hill to high gasoline prices and fears of skyrocketing home heating costs this winter.

Some GOP senators were already unhappy with tax-writers because the bill included a change in accounting methods that would hit large integrated oil companies with $4.9 billion in taxes. Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho, said he would vote against the bill if that tax increase remained intact.

"Is it a windfall tax by another name?" Craig said.

Lawmakers were alarmed this fall when profit reports showed five major companies and their global parent corporations earned more than $32.8 billion in the July to September quarter.

Consumers saw gasoline prices soar beyond $3 a gallon in the aftermath of supply disruptions caused by hurricanes and the politicians called oil executives to Capitol Hill to explain their huge profits.

Democratic Sens. Byron Dorgan of North Dakota and Chris Dodd of Connecticut lost a bid to impose a temporary windfall profits tax of 50 percent on the sale of oil over $40 a barrel, applied to profits not reinvested in increasing domestic oil and gas supplies. They would have returned the money to energy consumers through an income tax rebate. A 35-64 procedural vote defeated their effort.

"The major integrated oil companies have all of the gain. Who has all the pain?" Dorgan asked before answering his own question: "All the American people who are trying to pay for the price of a tankful of gas or trying to figure out how they are going to heat their home in the winter."

Opponents said oil companies shouldn't be punished when lawmakers are urging them to invest in energy production. They're being made political targets, even though they aren't reporting profits as high as other industries, said Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa.

"If you have excess profits tax on Big Oil, do you soon have one on Big Microsoft?" Grassley said.

A similar amendment sought to impose a temporary windfall profits tax on oil companies and use the money to fund a low-income heating assistance program. Other proposed alterations would eliminate a tax incentive for major oil and gas companies that allows them a credit for exploration and development cost, and deny a foreign tax credit for royalties that oil companies pay to foreign countries.

Sen. Maria Cantwell, D-Wash., proposed a ban on price gouging during national energy emergencies declared by the president.

The overall bill would cut taxes $60 billion over five years, preserving many tax breaks scheduled to expire unless lawmakers keep them intact. Unlike a version passed by a House committee, the bill would not extend reduced tax rates for capital gains and dividends. Senate GOP leaders vowed to make sure the 15 percent tax rate for investment income will be in the final version of the bill.

The bill holds back the alternative minimum tax, which will reach into the pockets of millions more taxpayers next year unless Congress prevents inflation from pushing the tax into the middle class. Lawmakers instituted the tax to prevent the wealthy from avoiding all taxation.

The bill also offers $7 billion in assistance to businesses and individuals hit by Hurricane Katrina and other storms, filling in details of President Bush's proposed Gulf Opportunity Zone.

Other provisions would extend a deduction for state and local sales taxes; investment incentives for small businesses, a business research and development credit and a tuition deduction. Taxpayers would get new incentives to make charitable contributions, at the same time as tax-writers put new curbs on breaks for charity that they've deemed abusive.

Sen. Larry Craig (R-IN) speaks with Elizabeth Dole (R-NC) and Sen. John Breaux (D-LA) prior to a Senate hearing on the attempt of Democrats to pinch oil and energy companies that have been reporting record profits while consumers pay high gas prices.

Come join the FUN at the Umass Theatre Guild's
COFFEEHOUSE
Sunday, November 20, 2005
Student Union Ballroom
7:00-11:00 p.m.
Singing! Dancing! Free refreshments! Open Mic!

Hey Seniors!
Please visit the Senior Campaign table at the Campus Center Concourse Nov. 21st, 28th, 29th, and 30th to vote on the Senior Class Gift.
All members of the Class of 2006 are invited to attend.
For more information, contact Sarah Weisner, Senior Campaign Coordinator.
413.545.1466
sweisner@admin.umass.edu
University of Massachusetts Amherst
Annual Fund

D.P. Dough®
Delivers Calzones
The Pizza Alternative®
256-1616
96 North Pleasant Street
Amherst, MA 01003
Zone out at D.P. Dough!®
Monday - Wednesday 4pm - 2am
Thursday 4pm - 3am
Friday - Saturday 11:30am - 3am
Sunday 11:30am - 2am
Visa, Mastercard & OCMP accepted
coupons online @ dpdough.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Country's making a comeback

Who can get away with wearing jeans and stiletto high heels to an awards show? Gretchen Wilson, of course. She's probably the only woman who can go to an awards show and get away with anything she wants (aside from Susan Sarandon). And who is Gretchen Wilson, you ask? She's not an underground artist, or another winner of American Idol; she's a country star. She's such a huge country star, in fact, that she won Female Vocalist of the Year on the Country Music Awards show on Tuesday evening.

Jennifer Lane

This column is going to be a lesson in country music. It is my knowledge that many people think if you play country music backwards, you get your dog back and your wife will rip up the divorce papers. This is somewhat true in older country music songs, but there is a new generation of country that has been sweeping the nation.

Many of you now know who Kenny Chesney is because of Miss Renee Zellweger. Many of you now know who Keith Urban is because of his Aussie friend Nicole Kidman. Have you heard any of their music or bought any of their CDs? They're actually two of the best male vocalists in country today and they aren't just teenybopper pop country, they have deep meaningful songs.

Country is something that is associated with big hair and hicks. Jason Alden just put out a single called "Hicktown" to put a little twist on being a hick. He used real life examples of what it means to be from a small town and made it funny, but something to be proud of. If you live out in the "Boondocks," then Little Big Town has a country song you would love. It talks about what it's like to be from a small town, to make it your own and love every moment you have.

These new artists, such as Sugarland and Little Big Town are making it big because they're concentrating on their love of small towns and what it means to make it big. They're adorable because they're new to the love of the spotlight and you can understand the words they're singing. Country music has made a splash in the mainstream in the past few years. These new groups are only helping to make the splash a tidal wave.

> It is my knowledge that many people think if you play country music backwards, you get your dog back and your wife will rip up the divorce papers. This is somewhat true in older country music songs, but there is a new generation of country that has been sweeping the nation.

This summer there was a Kenny Chesney concert at Gillette Stadium in Foxboro. His opening acts were Keith Urban, Gretchen Wilson, Pat Green, Uncle Kracker and Blaine Larson – all large or up-and-coming country artists. It was the largest turn out a country music festival had ever seen in New England. There were almost 51,000 people in the audience, and the crowd was part of country music history. Country music may be up-and-coming to those who don't know a lot about it, but to those who do, you can see how amazing country music has been lately. It's been a great ride during the past year or so.

Another person who has helped country music immensely is Carrie Underwood. The adorable blonde, who won American Idol, is a country star and has a voice like an angel. Carrie Underwood already has a new single out called "Jesus, Take the Wheel." The song is a great new country song about a woman who wants to give up and let Jesus help her.

In an interview the other day Carrie said she was "excited that people are getting into country music." Someone told her they bought a Martina McBride CD because they knew Martina originally sung "Independence Day," one of the songs that won Carrie the title of American Idol. This makes me and probably a few others laugh because Martina McBride won Female Country Vocalist of the Year four years in a row. She's a legend in country music and a young, new blonde is introducing a new audience to Martina and the rest of the country music industry.

I'm glad Carrie Underwood is helping people see that country music isn't only about losing your dog and wife, it's about love and living life. So why not "Live like you were dying" and take a risk. Life is all about "Making memories of us" and having a great time getting "All jacked up." So go out and buy a Keith Urban CD, if not for any reason other than he's really hot.

JenniferLane is a Collegian columnist.

Student opposes random searches

Imagine you are sitting alone in your dorm room, watching "Family Guy" DVDs and eating ramen noodles, when all of a sudden you hear a loud knock on your door. You stand up to answer the door, but before you can get there UMass police come busting through the door and drag you out of your room. You stand in horror and embarrassment as you, and half of your floor, watch the police tear apart your room. You are never shown a warrant, and you were never told what the police are in search of. This may seem outrageous, and you may think this is unlikely to happen. However, this is not the case.

Eric Robbie

In the past week there has been a lot of discussion on campus about the possibility of implementing random bag and random room search policies. This is in fact true. The Student Affairs Judicial Issues Committee (SAJIC) has been charged by the Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life, Michael Gargano, to discuss and draft a proposal for bag searches, as well as a policy that would allow RAs to write up students for public intoxication. The room search policy is not being drafted. However, the discussion is in the works, drawing on a recently instituted policy on the University of Rhode Island campus, which allows such actions to be taken. The reality of the situation is that our rights as students and citizens of the UMass community are going to be violated by these policies.

> Think about your home away from UMass, and think about your local police searching your home without a warrant, based on suspicion. This is a violation of your Fourth Amendment rights, which require a warrant that outlines the places to be searched and/or the items to be seized. It limits the scope of police power and protects the rights of citizens.

The issue at hand is the complete lack of student input regarding what may be the greatest policy change students have ever come to face. In fact, five students sit on SAJIC, including the Student Government Association President and members of the cabinet and legislature, and among 15 or so administrators. It is uncomfortable and overwhelming for them to defend student rights when they are in such a minority. SAJIC is a closed-door, behind-the-scenes "working group," and therefore no minutes or notes are ever recorded. They issue no press releases or executive summaries of their deliberations. They make decisions and discuss this potential policy, all under the cover of darkness, hidden from the eye of public scrutiny.

Recently the Faculty Senate held their monthly meeting, which featured a panel to discuss the drinking culture on the UMass campus and community. Approximately 40 students were in attendance, and during the question-and-answer session these students raised the issue of bag and room searches. However, the Associate Chancellor of Student Affairs, Jo-Anne Venin, deflected questions and offered vague answers as to the process and content of this policy. The point was made. The administration knows that we know. Their cover is blown.

When students come from across the state, and even across the country, they are forced to live in the dormitories, and these dormitories become their homes. When discussing room searches, we must keep that fact in mind. Think about your home away from UMass, and think about your local police searching your home without a warrant, based on suspicion. This is a violation of your Fourth Amendment rights, which require a warrant that outlines the places to be searched and/or the items to be seized. It limits the scope of police power and protects the rights of citizens. The Fifth Amendment protects our right to the due process of law, and the due process of law requires a judge to sign a specific warrant to have the legal authority to perform a search.

We are now at the point where a major policy change is about to happen, and students have had little or no input. The administration has made no effort to take in student input or embrace the collective will of the student body. They have made an effort to hide their dealings, waiting only to spring their abrasive new policy on students. There has to be a change. There is no doubt that drinking on campus is a problem. However, the solution to this problem will not come from one "working group" in the administration. It should come from the useful and progressive input of students. The time to act is now. Contact Michael Gargano and other members of the administration, and tell them how you feel about this issue. Be proactive. Do you want our liberties protected, or will you accept Gargano's big brother society? The choice is yours.

Eric Robbie is a UMass student.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

UMASS CAN'T AFFORD TO LOSE US

The Mission Statement for the University of Massachusetts Amherst: "The University's mission is to provide an affordable and accessible education of high quality and to conduct programs of research and public service that advance knowledge and improve the lives of the people of the Commonwealth, the nation, and the world."

The University of Massachusetts was founded for you – to provide you with opportunities to expand your knowledge of the world, to give you the tools and skills necessary to become capable and contributing citizens. The University of Massachusetts is your university; you deserve to know what decisions those in power are making and how these decisions will affect the present and future life of the university.

As a university whose mission is to provide an "affordable education" to residents of the commonwealth, the administration's polices over the past five years have progressively made UMass less affordable. On average, states spend 15 percent of their budgets on higher education; the state of Massachusetts allocates a measly 4 percent to aid in making higher education an affordable choice for in-state students. Between 2001 and 2004, the state cut university funding by 32.6 percent at the same time the university raised tuition and fees by 50 percent. The university is progressively becoming an "affordable" option only for those students who have economic resources.

The university aims to "improve the lives of the people of the Commonwealth, nation and the world," yet over the past five years, the university policies have aimed at improving the lives of only a certain portion of the people in the Commonwealth. There are currently more than 20,000 students enrolled in the university; of these, 500 are African American, 400 are Latino and 700 are Asian/Pacific Islander. A measly 7 percent of students at UMass are students of color. While the administration boasts that it aims to "improve the lives of people in the Commonwealth," in practice, the university aims only to improve the lives of white, middle-class students.

On Wednesday, Nov. 16, the Board of Trustees for the UMass system held their annual meeting on the Amherst campus. The Board of Trustees is the executive body that sets policy for the entire Five College University system. The Board is comprised of students, alumni and private citizens. Braving the cold, rainy weather of the early morning hours, a diverse group of over 50 UMass students attended the meeting, to serve as a visual reminder of whom their decisions affect.

It is not just these 50 students who will be affected by the decisions of the board, but it is you, your friends, your TAs and your professors. The decisions that are made daily by the state government, the Board of Trustees and the UMass Amherst administration are more than just statistics – they have a real and immediate affect on who will attend the university and who will be left behind. What will you do when a decision is made that will leave you behind?

Jessica Rentsch
UMass student

DRUG USERS SHOULD GET FINANCIAL AID

It's entertaining to read your ridiculous editorial published on Nov. 16, in which they argue students convicted of drug offences ought to lose their financial aid. The Collegian's editors defend the Higher Education Act's Drug Aid Ban provision in a way that makes one think they were born from an unholy union of Pat Robertson and Rupert Murdoch – they combine reactionary preaching with "fair and balanced" reporting.

This law in question forbids financial aid from going to anyone with any drug conviction, including convictions for minor possession of marijuana. One objection to this law is it punishes former drug users who are trying to turn their lives around by barring them from entering higher education to better themselves and leave past drug use behind. It also disproportionately hurts racial and ethnic minorities, who are arrested, charged and convicted at much higher rates than whites. The same goes for hurting middle and lower income students, as these students are more dependent on financial aid than the rich. But the most ludicrous aspect of this law (that the editorial conveniently fails to mention) is that murderers, rapists, arsonists and child molesters remain eligible for federal financial aid if they are convicted while someone convicted for minor marijuana possession loses their financial aid.

It's also entertaining that the editors of the Collegian feel at least 44 percent of UMass students ought to lose their financial aid and drop out (unless mommy and daddy are rich, of course). According to a scientifically valid survey done by the Student Affairs Research and Evaluation Office in fall 2001, no less than 44.4 percent of UMass students had used illegal drugs in the 12 months prior to the survey. Your editorial should be titled: "44 percent of UMass students ought to be expelled."

The Collegian's editors have the right to publish whatever nonsense they want for the Collegian's editorials. They are rightly protected by the First Amendment. Yet, I feel confident in saying the vast majority of students at UMass support the repeal of the drug provision of the Higher Education Act by Congress.

I believe the Collegian has a moral duty to use its editorial voice to represent the opinions of the student body and not the views of its "fair and balanced" editorial board. And, it should be cognizant that when its editorial board feels free to write patronizing, demeaning and utterly ridiculous editorials like this one, there may be consequences.

For example, students should consider exercising their First Amendment right not to read the Collegian until it uses its editorial voice in a manner that represents the majority of students here at UMass and not the opinions of its "fair and balanced" editors. I personally will be exercising that right.

David Synnott
SGA Senator

ABSURD LETTERS WELCOME

My patience has ended, Daily Collegian. Please, for the sake of the readers, stop publishing Gilad Skolnick's editorials. They are absolute garbage.

I fully endorse the Collegian publishing editorials that are absurd and chock full o' humor. Gilad Skolnick's editorials almost meet that. They can definitely be absurd. Take his most recent editorial where he tears the class of 2005 a new one: "The class of 2005 brought us countless riots in Southwest, and the link between the riots and their four-year reign of disaster over UMass is clear — the first year they're gone, the riots stop. The Hobart Hoedown can be characterized by fire, destruction, panic and riots, the same words most people would use to characterize the class of 2005 who brought us this calamity."

I mean, come on. The Red Sox and Yankees didn't even make it into the World Series, the next major sports championship is months away. Isn't it also possible some rowdy students got the riots going? And wasn't the Hobart Hoedown going on before the class of 2005 came around? Those statements were after him, heck, if he asked for one cigarette, he would be given 100.

"Like if I asked someone for a cigarette, it was not uncommon for them to give me two or three." But like all true heroes, Hercules has a flaw. Yes, he is a "recovering mirror junkie." Once he glares at that piece of glass, the code for perfection is revealed. "But when you're looking at the bands of fibers pulled taut under the skin of your chest, the sinews throughout your abdomen contracting as you breathe ... you're thinking is that really me?"

Yes folks, Hercules was in shock. Those demons of insecurity run for high heil once he's glaring at his reflection. Yet here's where our hero stops and offers us some insight through personal experiences. Hercules recalls a time when he ran into his old girlfriend who had a new man in her life. At first, one wonders, how could Hercules possibly have any kind of romance when ultimately, he desires to be with himself?

But as Hercules explains, "it was easy to see why she liked him. She had a certain type, and with our blue eyes, golden hair and jagged cheekbones we could have been brothers." At first, one might ponder, is this Hercules's arch nemesis? Will there be an inevitable duel to the death because surely, their combined status of absolute perfection will cause the world to collapse?

Oh, but Hercules disappoints his audience. They actually become friends and enjoy "swapping fight stories at the DC." It's also closely related to the "dude who tries way too hard but always ends up being the butt of the joke" and in the end must resort to the sad option of picking a fight just so people will notice he exists.

But back to our flawed hero who at this point begins to rant on about how guys need to be respectful when staring at girls and that if you're gay, don't stare at Hercules in a way that might make him feel uncomfortable. I know some of you who didn't read this column are wondering if it really got this insanely ludicrous. Just trust me it did.

From here on, Hercules shamelessly attempts to cover this whole excuse to brag about himself by offering us this piece of enlightening discourse. "We're all people. None of us is a shell ... and we may relate to what we see on the outside at first. But its inner beauty, warmth, kindness and compassion that are infinitely more valuable and rare."

This guy is truly a poet. Excuse me while I wipe the tears, pal. No more Hercules anymore, here it's just Colin instructing the rest of us on the importance of life. Folks, we have a very sad, sad story on our hands. Colin is a man who through his outer shell of absoluteness is just a scared boy crying for help. He suffers terribly from being a joke, an absolute joke. So through this column, he felt the need to inform the entire school that he is second only to God. I know it's sad to know that one person can be suffering from everything that makes people utter to their buddy next to them, "Oh, who brought this guy?" Good luck Colin Jones, we're all rooting for you.

Chris Turk
UMass student

WHAT THE MIRROR REFLECTS

I was in absolute shock while reading Colin Jones' column, "Mirror, mirror on the wall." It was strange because never before have I felt motivated to respond to anything written in the Daily Collegian. For those who didn't have the pleasure to indulge in this masterpiece, allow me to explain the utter flawlessness that is Colin Jones.

Ultimately, we are dealing with a sad story here. But let's begin our journey. Oh, one other thing, Colin will now be referred to as Hercules. You'll understand soon enough.

Hercules begins his column describing his troubles as a youth; he battled a bad acne problem while struggling to discover where he fit in socially. His self-esteem was low and I'm sure he was that guy in the crowd who my buddies and I refer to as "coleslaw." You know, the kind of dude who is always there but that no one likes.

But through watching "Boogie Nights," Hercules realized his true potential. "I saw a number of parallels between myself and Mark Wahlberg's character. I saw the way everyone responded to him, which was undoubtedly related to his appearance." Here is where Hercules was truly born. He hit the gym, discovered a healthy diet and sculpted his body to the point where people actually couldn't even recognize him. Yet Hercules was still a bit naïve. He didn't understand what a menace he was to the ladies. They

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Artists' books fuse art and text at Smith

By JANA KATZ
COLLEGIAN STAFF

"The physicality of language is writing," says Steve Clay, founder and director of Granary Books, "the book is in some sense reliving and reviewing its former life like the proverbial dying person."

There is no definition of an artists' book. Clay, founder and director of Granary Books, a New York based publishing company specializing in poetry and artists' books, describes them as linking, "the verbal and the visual into a seamless hole."

Typically, artists' books are collective efforts of visual artists, writers, poets, book binders, printers and publishers.

"Too Much Bliss"
Smith College Museum of Art
Nov. 12 - Feb. 19

The Museum of Art at Smith College hosts "Too Much Bliss: Twenty Years of Granary Books," an exhibition of 40 limited edition artists' books on loan from Granary Books, until February 2006. Admission to the museum, which is open from 10 a.m. – 4 p.m. Tuesday through Saturday and 12 p.m. – 4 p.m. on Sunday, is free for Five College Students.

Some of the books on display in the exhibit are also part of the Smith College collection of rare books. All the books in "Too Much Bliss" are in display cases, but the ones in the collection at the Neilson Library can be handled.

Many of the books in the exhibit hardly seem like books at all. Pati Scobey's "The Backhand of Time" stands proudly in its case like a creature at the zoo protesting captivity. "The Backhand of Time," one book with two spines, is simultaneously captivating and repulsing. Her use of color is lively and attractive. The book's dynamic structure is unsettling and almost overwhelming. "The Backhand of Time" is a beautiful juxtaposition.

"The most successful artists' books are constructed as 'texts' that can be understood on several different levels and produce startlingly different interpretations," according to The Museum of Art.

Text-ethno-botanist, Terrence McKenna, collaborated with book artist Timothy C. Ely to create verbally provocative and visually pleasing art, "Synesthesia." Rust-colored tones and splashes of purple fade behind bizarre declarations of diverse collections of worldly concepts. A page in "Synesthesia" reads, "Beyond history lies the design of the dream world. Art is called to anticipate and transform the future. Shamanism explores the transcendental attractor object at the end of history."

On Sept. 11, 2001, after the attack on New York City, a poet and an artist both went out separately unaware of each other and documented the night. Two and a half weeks later Mimi Gross heard Charles Bernstein reading poetry at the Zinc bar. Now, Gross' sketchings of the city life illustrate Bernstein's streams of consciousness.

Critics described "Some of the Daze" as a "melding of different lived moments and memories that transcends the personal and engages a collective experience."

Two poets featured in "Too Much Bliss: Twenty Years of Granary Books" will be reading at the Weinstein Auditorium in Wright Hall at Smith College in February. Jerome Rothenberg and Charles Bernstein, "amazingly famous poets," according to Gallant, will be reading to support Granary Books and this exhibition.

In addition to the artists' books in display cases, there is also a reading room to the side with books available for perusing. Granary Books has published various anthologies and books on poetry over the years. "Swoon," by Nada Gordon and Gary Sullivan, describes itself as, "autobiography, poetry, literary essay and erotica all rolled into one."

To April Gallant, the curator of Prints, Drawings and Photographs at the Smith College Museum of Art, all books are "visual objects as well as containers of information." With the increased use of technology in society, Gallant believes artists "tend to gravitate toward the handmade."

Gallant characterizes the electronic book, known as the E-Book as "the microwave of its generation," and does not worry that humans are nearing physical books' extinction.

In today's world, as Clay describes it, "The incomprehensible era of near brutal conformity," exhibits like "Too Much Bliss" are tangible examples of the infinite potential for human creativity.

'Fit to Fight' where the weird turn pro

By NICHOLAS BIGHAM
COLLEGIAN STAFF

"Fit to Fight"
Central Gallery
Nov. 6 - Dec. 1

As we make the shift from being dependent students to independent professionals, many of us seek to express our concerns and let the world know that we are seeing things as they happen. How will we address the world that will soon be expecting us to produce something, anything, of value? Be it through our labor, our thoughts or our lives in general, we will all be expected to make a contribution to the greater, global community.

Selected works of UMass artists Brian Butler, Kendra Pfumrely, Fionn McCabe, Matt Guffre and Thorn May of the Assawn Valley (a group of young artists approaching the end of their academic careers) are being presented at the Central Gallery in Wheeler Dormitory. They have spoken loudly and clearly that they will not allow the world to pass by without hearing their voices.

Upon entering the small gallery and grazing over the collective works as a whole, it feels like walking into a Parisian café where existential ramblers are attempting to unlock the secrets of personal infinity. The talk is low but charged with excitement and serious depth. Various styles are used to embody a very personal, dream like quality. Fionn McCabe said that her work "can be read left to right, right to left, back to front, etc., with no particular beginning or end." Looking at McCabe's work feels like a dream where you can't quite remember the beginning or end but somehow know the whole story.

Some of the work looks professionally formatted and thought out beforehand. Attention to detail and presentation dominated some of the pieces. Others were on sheets of lined notebook paper, appearing to have been drawn in the middle of a lecture with a Bic pen. Such informality gives the viewer a much more honest idea of where these artists are coming from.

Sarah Fortini, who organized the show, said one theme of these artists was their emergence from the educational environment to the professional one, where works are created not for grades but for livelihood. From the dorms to professional galleries, these artists are stepping beyond the confines of western Massachusetts into the world at large. The underlying tone of the subject matter was one "of lewd humor and imaginative energy," according to Fortini. Some images are disturbing in the same way as the old FOX sitcom "Married with Children" was. It's funny not because it's absurd, but because it reflects, some of the more twisted aspects of life in the same fashion of a funhouse mirror.

Some of the work is very personal and suggests intense reflection. Guffre said "All of my work deals with my life." Other pieces are more interpretative. One of Thorn May's pieces states that "It wouldn't be a ship without a shore." The implications are that heavy but definitive conclusions could be hasty and irresponsible. Some are outright declarative. McCabe says in one of his paintings, "When the going gets weird, the weird turn pro." I believe that.

Stepping out of the proverbial nest and flying on one's own can be a frightening experience. It is one we all share. Whether you major in business or philosophy, it doesn't matter, because after college real life will smack everyone in the face. No one is safe. No matter your plans, free buses, midterms or course guides. Not only must we learn to truly take care of ourselves, in order to grow up we must learn to positively contribute to the greater experience of others.

We all have the choice to address the world with gusto or lay down quietly, brooding over our lost words. Thanks to groups like the Assawn Valley artists we can rest assured our generation of artists and poets, musicians and writers will not go unheard.

Amherst celebrates the Age of Josephine

By LEANN LEAKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

"The Empress Josephine"
Amherst College Mead Museum
Sept. 22 - Dec. 18

"We've all heard of Napoleon, no matter how much history we did or didn't listen to. Napoleon is a historical figure of mythic proportions – more books have been written on him than Jesus Christ. An incredible number of biographies and histories revisiting his life come out every year. But most people don't realize that the emperor of France who terrified Europe with his military power owed much of his power, authority and good decision-making to his first wife, the Empress Josephine. Like Napoleon, Josephine has been the subject of many, many films and books over the years, but it's only recently that historians have begun to understand her as the powerful political and cultural figure she really was. The Mead Museum's exhibit, "The Empress Josephine: Art and Royal Identity," explores this new take on the empress through an exhausting collection of paintings, prints, caricatures, sculptures and books.

Josephine was much, much more than the pretty wife of the Emperor Napoleon. To begin with, her life story is a fierce adventure that would captivate anyone: born on a French slave plantation in the Caribbean to an aristocratic family, her first husband Alexandre Vicomte de Beauharnais had originally been promised to her sister, but when she died Josephine agreed to honor the engagement. By the time the Reign of Terror imprisoned him, they'd had two children who would later be recognized as Napoleon's own when she remarried. Alexandre died in prison, and Josephine found herself, too, in the Reign of Terror's prisons, where she remained until that government fell. She married Napoleon and was crowned empress of France during his coronation ceremony in 1804. Even though Napoleon divorced her in 1809 (because she could not produce an heir), she kept that title until she died.

This is not a story the viewer needs to know anything of to appreciate this show. "The Empress Josephine" brings the viewer through the story with paintings of her early life, etchings from the press, figurines and prints of the costumes that she and her husband wore in their coronation ceremony. Signs throughout fill the viewer in on the historical context of each piece, as well as simply offer interesting facts about Josephine's life. It's an inviting, richly varied perspective – we see Josephine's life through the media that her contemporaries did. The most interesting takes on her coronation and influence on Napoleon come from British newspapers of the period, which published wildly creative and mean-spirited caricatures of her life. In their efforts to ridicule France, many of the British artists drew a skinny, hen-pecked Napoleon utterly overwhelmed and dominated by his massive wife – ironically, the only artists who recognized Josephine as the powerful figure she was.

Not all the art comes from responses to Josephine – a very interesting portion of the collection are pieces Josephine commissioned of herself, her family and her husband in an early kind of public relations. By controlling how she appeared to the people, she could solidify her place as a true and legitimate empress of France. All the title of the show implies, art shaped Josephine's identity as a public figure – some of it under her control, and

See AMHERST on page 6

UMass' Herter Gallery praises da Vinci's genius and curiosity

By Jacqueline Mercer
Collegian Correspondent

With Dan Brown's "The da Vinci Code" continuing to fly off the shelves and a movie coming soon, Leonardo da Vinci has been a hot topic recently. Suddenly, it seems everyone wants to know who the man was. "Is it true he was part of a secret society?" "Are there really intricate symbols and codes hidden in his work?" "You know, when you tilt your head to the left and squint Mona Lisa does look just like that self-portrait ..."

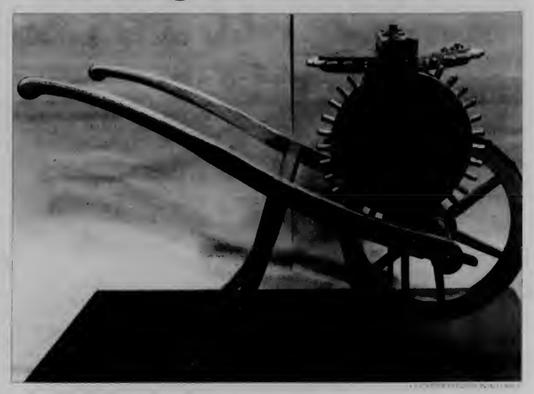
Like the rest of the world, the new exhibit located at the Herter Gallery, simply titled "The Inventions of Leonardo da Vinci," is able to address none of these burning questions. What it can do is introduce the viewer to one thing about the man that can't be disputed; his genius.

"Inventions of Leonardo da Vinci"
Herter Art Gallery
Through Dec. 11

The day after the Wright brothers' flyer lifted off the ground and traveled a shaky 120 feet down a chunk of the North Carolina coast in 1903, only four papers carried the story. It was dismissed as being simply unbelievable.

Imagine their shock if someone had told them then that the flyer was designed using the same principles of flight sketched out in detail in the journals of Leonardo da Vinci over 400 years earlier.

Hanging in one of the two rooms that make up the gallery, located near the center of campus, are models da Vinci envisioned while examining the possibility of flight back in the late 1400s. One of the models, a tiny, wooden person flanked by two bat-like wings, looks not unlike the "modern hang-glider," as a supplemental booklet located at the exhibit accurately puts it. Da Vinci firmly believed that he had to look no farther then in nature to understand and improve on the world around him. He studied the flight of birds, replicating the use of their wings in his early designs and later observing how they glided on currents to stay airborne, the main principle used in flight today, to guide his designs.



Da Vinci, a true renaissance man, didn't limit himself to the pursuit of human flight. Other featured inventions included everything from an improvement on Guttenberg's printing press that would allow it to be operated by a single person, to a steam-powered ship with a placard that invited the visitor to turn its cranks and watch the paddles operate, and an early version of the multi-gear transmission still found in most cars today.

A highlight of the exhibition was a replica of what would be the great-grandfather of the modern day tank. The wooden cone was designed to encase its passengers and shield them from danger, allowing them to cross, protected, into enemy territory. The idea behind today's armored tank varies little from da Vinci's original concept, despite the fact it was rarely used in battle before the outbreak of World War I.

In total, the exhibit featured 16 machines made from the intricate designs da Vinci left in his many notebooks, infamous for the odd mirror script he used and observations that were far beyond their time. A sign at the entrance of the gallery called the exhibit, "A tribute not only to Leonardo's unique and far-reaching genius, but also to the creative curiosity that exists in all of us."

How far da Vinci's contributions to modern thinking reach is difficult to gauge. Perhaps the full extent of his genius and accomplishments will always remain a mystery to us, who are left with only his journals and a scattering of paintings and sculptures to help us understand the full expanse of his mind. And, if his inventions are any indication, it was a stunning mind, indeed.

"The Inventions of Leonardo da Vinci" will be in the Herter Gallery until Dec. 11. Hours are Monday through Friday, 11 a.m. to 4 p.m., and Sundays from 1 p.m. to 4 p.m.

The exhibition "Inventions of Leonardo da Vinci" at Herter Gallery on campus shows the 16 machines made from the intricate drawings in da Vinci's notebook.

'Strip' pairs bodies and insects

By Pete Corbett
Collegian Correspondent

These days, Butch Hyde is making art and making statements. Or rather, doing both at once, as seen in his exhibition in Hampden Gallery down in Southwest. His art is designed to "resonate as possibilities for opening and closing, concealing and revealing fragmented images of the human body, insect and flower world. This attempt is to eliminate specific observation, or detection by virtue of abstract, film-like imagery, and determine if a single 'non-moving' image may play out freely as mental and visceral aberrations – much like film." Got that? That is a quote from the brochure to the exhibition, which runs until Dec. 4.

"Film Strip"
Budge Hyde
Hampden Gallery
Nov. 3 - Dec. 4

Apparently, Hyde views his work as a way to open the mind to another method of viewing the world. Mildly pretentious, no? And that is the feel of the whole exhibit; pretentious and self-absorbed.

Hyde goes about creating art in order to make the observer think, not creating art for art's sake. This is the sort of exhibit that belongs in a modern art museum, or to be discussed by skinny men in little black hats in a dark, smoky basement dive in Greenwich Village. For UMass, more fitting exhibits could have been chosen. This is not an art school. Although the students are educated and many do enjoy art and being challenged into changing their thinking practices, they also like their art to be, well, art.

The mixed media paintings created for this showing not only have similar themes; they are almost identical. All have big rectangles of color, separated by geometric looking lines. Opposite the rectangles there are black and white stills from films, mainly of nude bodies. These are the highlight of the pieces, as the stills are well-composed images and have good contrast. They are solid photographs. Alongside the nudes, there are large, superimposed images of cockroaches and other insects an observer would find repulsive.

The juxtaposition of the gentle human bodies against the rough, dark, serrated spines of the bugs is done quite well, and Hyde, if he was attempting to bring awareness to this difference, did a fine job.

Images of women's panties were also involved in the stills. Here Butch suggests that perhaps sex had just taken place, among the beetles and all. An interesting concept, maybe it encourages thought about the natural occurrences of things, like how life starts.

Humans evolved from bugs, and to evolve they had to procreate, so both of these ideas are combined into one image on Hyde's canvas.

In one of his works, "I Left You #A238," spectral images of children's dolls are shown, with their cheeks lit brightly and their eye sockets dark black. The dolls are also looking straight out at the viewer, and the overall effect is that of a ghost looking out from the painting. Disturbing, and also moving.

Overall, the exhibit had some interesting facets, but lacked luster. It's free, attendance is not a crime, but they aren't the most interesting works of art on campus.

The gallery is open Monday through Thursday from noon – 6 p.m., and Sunday from 2 p.m. – 5 p.m. The gallery is closed on holidays.

"Film strip" at the Hampden Gallery combines unusual objects, such as nude bodies and insects, to make very unique compositions.

Mixed media creates textures

By Ian Jones
Collegian Staff

The fourth and final installment of the Smith College Museum of Art Latin American art series is "Now It Has Stopped Raining: The Paintings of Rosa Ibarra," named after her painting "Ya dejó de llover," which is featured in the exhibit. Ibarra, a Northampton resident, was born in Puerto Rico, attended UMass and, after graduating, apprenticed in Paris with her father, Alfonso Arana. While there, Arana encouraged her to work with impasto – a technique where paint is applied very thickly to the canvas – and portraiture, and both of these are evident in all of the works featured in the exhibit.

"Now It Has Stopped Raining"
Smith College Museum of Art
Through Dec. 23

All of her paintings show an incredible amount of depth, due to the thick paint with very strong brushstrokes and her use of other media, such as beach-washed glass, paper and mother of pearl. Her colors are generally warm; she works mostly in yellows, oranges and reds with accents in light green. These techniques combine to make her portraits very emotional, and along with their subject matter – often women dancing – create a sense of happiness in the observer.

One of the most impressive of these paintings is "En mi universo (In My Universe)," which depicts the words flying off the page of a young girl's journal as she writes in it. The background is formed by squares cut out of a newspaper, and these words circle the girl's head with the words coming from the page. This, more than many of her other paintings, highlights the fantastic elements she uses. Her thick brush strokes and warm colors are more expressionistic than realistic, but "En mi universo" shows an even more fanciful portrait of someone's thoughts.

The exhibit's namesake, "Ya dejó de llover (Now It Has Stopped Raining)," is a diptych, split in the middle of the scene, of a woman holding an umbrella, with several figures walking by her. This painting incorporates a large amount of beach-washed glass, making up both the woman's umbrella and one of the figures in the background. Despite the umbrellas, the colors in this work are warm, like many of Ibarra's others, and suggest more than anything the feelings experienced after rain, rather than a realistic portrayal.

Another of her paintings, "Nino con paloma (Boy with Pigeon)," is a portrait of a young boy holding a bird. Ibarra's affinity for mixed media shows again with this painting, as the pigeon is not oil, like the rest of the painting, but marble paste. This does not show as easily as her other works with more exotic materials like mother of pearl and glass, but adds depth to the painting and subtly makes the bird a focal point.

There is also a portrait of Alfonso Arana, her father, featured in the gallery. It makes excellent use of texture, both for dramatic and realistic effects. His head is framed by block-letter words, including his name, and the background is made up of short, deep brushstrokes, featuring cooler colors than Ibarra uses in her other paintings, perhaps to accent Arana's white hair and beard.

Another interesting piece is "After the Rain," a series of four square canvases with paper and paintings of flowers on them. It strays from Ibarra's usual subject matter, people, but shows she is not limited simply to one thing, but can successfully experiment with other subjects, just as she experiments with technique and media.

The exhibit will be running at the Smith College Museum of Art from now until Dec. 23, and marks the end of the museum's Latin American art series.

Rosa Ibarra's paintings combine different art mediums to create many layers of depth in her artwork.

Smith houses French artwork

AMHERST from page 5

some of it not.

From the boost she gave to the popularity of roses to her support of the troubadour painting school, the show presents a wide-ranging view of her influence. Many of the pieces are just fun – an autobiography of a leading fortune-teller of Josephine's time has been included to show a chart of the empress' hand; toy-like tin figures of Josephine and Napoleon appear like strange action figures in the area dedicated to the coronation; each British caricature included is a magnificently strange and silly story to pick apart and laugh over (with the added boon that English-speakers can still understand the bizarre words that pool and float from the political figures' mouths). It's this irreverent touch that fills out and balances the portrait of Josephine that emerges through the show – for all the pomp and calculation, Josephine was just a really interesting person.

"The Empress Josephine" is joined now by "The Age of Napoleon and Josephine: Paintings, Prints, and Drawing," a collection of artwork from the same period. These pieces, as a matter of course, do not deal with the royal French family. Here we may see works in many different media: portraits, landscapes and still-lives. Seen on its own, the works seem to have been chosen quite at random, but with "The Empress Josephine" they give a fine perspective on what normal art was like when Napoleon and Josephine were harnessing it for their own political means.

"The Empress Josephine: Art and Royal Identity" and "The Age of Napoleon and Josephine: Paintings, Prints, and Drawings" will be at the Mead Museum of Amherst College until Dec. 28. The Mead is open from Tuesday to Sunday 10 a.m. – 4:30 p.m., and until 9 p.m. on Thursdays.

CINEMARK
CINEMARK AT HAMPSHIRE MALL
367 Russell St. 413-587-4233
Schedule for Friday 11/18 thru Tuesday 11/22 ONLY
DIGITAL SURROUND SOUND IN ALL AUDITORIUMS
Purchase Tickets Online @ cinemark.com
Harry Potter and the Goblet of Fire(PG13) 11:00 12:00 2:30 3:30 6:00 7:00 9:30 10:30*
The Legend of Zorro (PG) 11:05 4:15 7:25 10:15
Walk the Line(PG13) 11:15 4:15 7:20 10:25*
Saw 2 (R) 11:45 2:15 4:50 7:40 10:10
Zathura(PG) 11:15 1:50 4:30 7:05 9:35*
The Weatherman (R) 11:40 4:40 8:50
Dreamer(PG) 11:20 1:40 4:20 7:30 10:00*
Prime (PG-13) 2:05 7:15
Get Rich or Die Tryin' (R) 11:50 2:30 5:15 7:50 10:25*
* = no passes or supersavers
Jarhead (R) 11:25 4:20 7:15 10:00
Now Hiring-Days/Nights, Weekends, Holidays
Senior Show 12/1 - Walk the Line @ 9pm
Chicken Little(G) 11:15 11:55 1:30 2:20 3:45 4:30 5:40 7:35 8:50 9:45
Friday Night Rewind– Dec 2nd Gremlins –Midnight
• NO PASSES, NO SUPERSAVERS
Tickets & showtimes available at cinemark.com

Bio-science or compassion?
In nursing and health care, you'll need both. You need to know bio-science and technology. And you must have compassion. That's why UMass Amherst offers courses in nursing and public health that provide a full foundation for a successful and rewarding career in health care.
NURSING and PUBLIC HEALTH
www.UMassULearn.net
413-545-2414
100 Venture Way, Hadley, MA
UMassAmherst Continuing Education

NOW SHOWING at PETE'S
NEW BURGERS
CHEDDAR BLASTS - BLEU CHEESE - BUN-L TWIST
PULLED PORK - SUBSCRIBTELLA - 3-D-0 JACK L MORE
NEW MEAL DEALS
FAMOUS FOR 2 BURGS FOR 2 BUCKS
HAMBURGERS - HOT DOGS - GRINDERS
CHICKEN - SEAFOOD - FRIES
PHILLY CHEESE STEAKS
SHAKES - SMOOTHIES - FLOATS
HARD ICE CREAM & SOFT SERVE
PETE'S DRIVE-IN
287 Russell St.
Route 9 - Hadley
585-0241
petesdriven.com

LONG RADIO
Quality Sales, Service, and Installation
Audio
Video
Sattelite Radio
NAV
Remote Starter
Alarms
Radar Detectors
Laser Detectors
Performance Parts
30 Russell Street Hadley, Ma 01035 413-584-3259

Get the ballerinas on the stage and the paintings on the wall.
For the arts to thrive, it takes more than artistry -- it takes business savvy. That's why UMass Amherst offers courses in arts management that show you how to plan, program and market the arts. There's an art to raising and managing money, thinking strategically and helping the arts become a vital part of any community.
ARTS MANAGEMENT
www.UMassULearn.net
413-545-2414
100 Venture Way, Hadley, MA
UMassAmherst Continuing Education

SEVERE WEATHER OR EMERGENCY CLOSING INFORMATION UMASS AMHERST

CLOSING OPTIONS*	Delayed Opening Until 11:00am (exam period 10:30am)	Closed All Day	Closed During Day	Cancellation of Evening Activities
	Campus closure in effect until midnight unless campus officially reopens on same day
WATCH OR LISTEN...	starting at 6:00 am	starting at 6:00 am	when decided	Starting at 2:00 pm
	STAY TUNED TO YOUR RADIO FOR ADDITIONAL INFORMATION
INFORMATION	Call Emergency Closing Hot Line 545-3630, watch Housing Service Cable Network (HSCN), or go to www.umass.edu
TO RADIO/TV Stations...	Amherst (WFCR, WMUA, WRNX) ~ Greenfield (WHAI) Northampton (WHMP) ~ Pittsfield (WBEC) Springfield (WHYN, WGGB-TV, WWLP-TV) ~ Campus Dorms (HSCN) (see alphabetical listing below for frequency numbers)
WHAT WILL BE AFFECTED	Classes ~ Day Care ~ Offices ~ Activities ~ Textbook Annex ~ Meetings ~ University Store ~ Convenience Stores ~ Continuing Education ~ Bluewall ~ Hatch ~ Snack Bars at Physical Plant, Whitmore, and Hampden
WHAT WON'T BE AFFECTED (Designated ESSENTIAL PERSONNEL will report to work)	Dining Commons ~ Coffee Shop ~ Health Services ~ Police/Security ~ Hotel ~ Physical Plant ~ Conference Services ~ University Operator Other areas as pre-designated (consult your Department Head)
ATHLETICS, FINE ARTS, AND MULLINS CENTER	Athletics, Fine Arts, and Mullins Center events will take place as scheduled unless a separate announcement is made on local radio stations. Call or go on-line as follows: Athletics Information: 545-2439 or www.umassathletics.com Fine Arts Information: 545-2511 Mullins Center Information: 545-0505 or www.mullinscenter.com
BUS SERVICE	Buses will run unless announced separately on local radio stations. Call 545-1633 for recorded message or www.umass.edu/bus for details.
LIBRARY Academic Calendar & Intersession	Same as University
Exam Period	Delayed Opening Until 10:30am	The Library will make every effort to open. Call Library Hours Hot Line: 545-0414
Sat/Sun/ Holiday	Listen to radio or call Library Hours Hot Line: 545-0414

* If there is no vertical line, the information applies for each option.

AM		FM
WBEC	1420	WBEC	105.5	WHMP	99.3
WHAI	1240	WFCR	88.5	WHYN	93.1
WHMP	1400	WHAI	98.3	WMUA	91.1
WHYN	560			WRNX	100.9

WGGB – TV Channel 40
WWLP – TV Channel 22

PARKING SNOW POLICY (UMass AMHERST CAMPUS)
IN EFFECT FROM 12/01/05 TO 04/01/06

The Amherst Campus Parking Snow Policy affects OVERNIGHT parking (1:00 a.m. to 7:00 a.m.) and parking during a SNOW EMERGENCY CLOSING period.

OVERNIGHT PARKING (1:00 a.m. to 7:00 a.m.):

PARKING ALLOWED (Please park your vehicle next to other parked vehicles)

Lot 24	Lot 62	Lot 25 (north of roadway to Yellow lot)
Lot 30	Lot 63	Lot 32 (west of Lincoln Avenue only, closest to Prince Dormitory)
Lot 41	Lot 65	Lot 43 including Thatcher Way (except at meters)
Lot 42	Yellow Lots	Lot 46 (except at meters)
Lot 52

PARKING ALLOWED – ONLY WITH APPROPRIATE PERMIT (Please park your vehicle next to other parked vehicles)

Lot 21	Lot 49	North Village
Lot 22	Lot 50	Lincoln Apartments
Lot 29	Lot 54	Any posted reserved space
Lot 44

PARKING NOT ALLOWED

Lot 26	Lot 40	Lot 25 (south of the roadway to Yellow lot)
Lot 27	Lot 64	Lot 32 (east of Lincoln Avenue only)
Lot 31	Lot 66	Lot 45 (except by special permit only)
Lot 33	Lot 67	Lot 47 (park in Lot 27 or Lot 44 from 1am to 7am)
Lot 34	Lot 68	Any campus roadway (including Southwest horseshoe)
Lot 35	Lot 71	All parking meters, including Fearing Street meters

SNOW EMERGENCY PARKING – ESSENTIAL PERSONNEL - ONLY WITH APPROPRIATE PERMIT

During a snow emergency closing period, essential personnel who report to work may only park in the following areas:
- Lot 21 (west of Southwest)
- Lot 25 (west of Physical Plant and north of roadway to Yellow lot only)
- Lot 30 (adjacent to Power Plant)
- Lot 31 (north of Engineering and Lederle Graduate Research Center)
- Lot 32 (west of Lincoln Avenue only, closest to Prince Dormitory)
- Lot 34 (south of Isenberg SOM)
- Lot 62 (south of Morrill Science Center)
- Lot 63 Worcester Dining Common lot only (west of Worcester DC)

SUGGESTIONS / IDEAS FOR PARKING "SMART" ON A SNOW DAY ...

1. Park your vehicle next to other parked vehicles.
2. Use the UMass bus service.
3. Car pool rides whenever possible.
4. Walk if possible.
5. Have someone drop you off.
6. If space is not available in your assigned lot, go to either Lot 25 (north of roadway) or Yellow lot (both west of Physical Plant). During snow conditions, it is not possible to guarantee normal lot capacity will be available.
7. If you receive a parking citation and believe it was improperly issued, you may appeal it at Parking Services within 14 days from the date issued. Appeals can be submitted in writing, appealed in person to the Hearing Clerk, or emailed to https://parking.umass.edu

RESCHEDULING OF FINAL EXAMS ON OFFICIAL SNOW DAYS - FALL 2005

In order to reschedule final examinations in case of snow, two alternate exam periods have been devised. They are 6:30 p.m. and 8:45 p.m. each exam day. The use of these alternative periods in the event of closings is outlined below. This policy goes into effect ONLY if the University is officially closed. The snow day Hot Line is 545-3630. If the University is open, all exams are expected to take place as scheduled. Each faculty member should inform his or her class of the planned time and location of the rescheduled final exam in the event of a snow day. All rescheduled exams will be held in the same location as published in the final exam schedule.

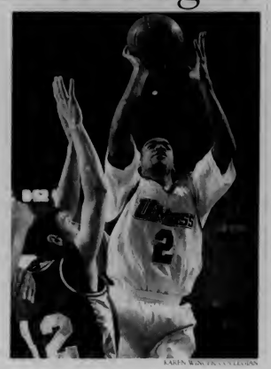
If the University is closed until 10:30 a.m.

8:00 am	rescheduled to 6:30 pm same day
10:30 am	held as originally scheduled
1:30 pm	held as originally scheduled
4:00 pm	held as originally scheduled
except:
8:00 am Dec. 22	rescheduled to 1:30 pm Dec. 22

If the University is closed all day but open in the evening:

8:00 am	rescheduled to 6:30 pm same day
10:30 am	rescheduled to 8:45 pm same day
1:30 pm	rescheduled to 6:30 pm next exam day
4:00 pm	rescheduled to 8:45 pm next exam day
except:
1:30 pm Dec. 21	rescheduled to 1:30 pm Dec. 22
4:00 pm Dec. 21	rescheduled to 4:00 pm Dec. 22

If the University is closed all afternoon and all evening:



8:00 am	held as originally scheduled
10:30 am	held as originally scheduled
1:30 pm	rescheduled to 6:30 pm next exam day
4:00 pm	rescheduled to 8:45 pm next exam day
except:
1:30 pm Dec. 21	rescheduled to 1:30 pm Dec. 22
4:00 pm Dec. 21	rescheduled to 4:00 pm Dec. 22

If the University is closed all day and all evening:

8:00 am	rescheduled to 6:30 pm next exam day
10:30 am	rescheduled to 8:45 pm next exam day
1:30 pm	rescheduled to 6:30 pm exam day after next
4:00 pm	rescheduled to 8:45 pm exam day after next
except:
1:30 pm Dec. 20	rescheduled to 1:30 pm Dec. 22
4:00 pm Dec. 20	rescheduled to 4:00 pm Dec. 22
8:00 am Dec. 21	rescheduled to 1:30 pm Dec. 22
10:30 am Dec. 21	rescheduled to 4:00 pm Dec. 22
1:30 pm Dec. 21	rescheduled to 6:30 pm Dec. 22
4:00 pm Dec. 21	rescheduled to 8:45 pm Dec. 22
8:00 am Dec. 22	rescheduled to 8:00 am Dec. 23
10:30 am Dec. 22	rescheduled to 10:30 am Dec. 23

Ford era set to begin

NEW ERA from page 10

KAREN WINCHUCK/COLLEGIAN

Junior Brandon Thomas is one of the new players expected to step into the UMass lineup this season.

that the focus is on the play of Freeman, who feels the newcomers can open up the frontcourt play for the other talent.

"The offense pretty much ran a four-out, one-in last year, and it was to give me the ball and be the scorer," Freeman said. "I think we have a lot more options than we had last year, and that's obviously going to help us."

Freeman will look to build upon his team-leading average of 15.4 points per game and 7.8 rebounds per game, as well as provide a tool for other players to be fed the ball. With one of the top threats in the Atlantic 10 at the forefront of the frontcourt, veterans such as senior Jeff Viggiano and junior Stephane Lasme make for a dangerous combination up front.

Lasme gives the Minutemen size up front and specializes in blocking shots, as he recorded a team-high 72 last season. Lasme gives the frontcourt range in the paint and an effective rebounding ability.

"So far I've been happy with the performances of everybody," Ford said. "We're going to have a very small room for error. We can't have injuries and we need to have everyone ready to go."

Viggiano is the only senior on the Maroon and White this season, making him the leader of not only the frontcourt, but also the entire team. Viggiano recovered from a sprained ankle last season and put up respectable numbers, finishing the season with an average of 4.5 points per game.

"Personally I feel really good, I feel really healthy. As a team I think we're ready to go," Viggiano said. "Everybody's ready to get the season rolling."

With the talent level on the team high, Viggiano feels the team can benefit from their ability to work the bench.

"We have a bunch of different guys that can play a bunch of different positions and that just helps out," Viggiano said. "We'll have a deep bench; we won't be playing only six guys in a game, so we'll be able to keep guys fresh throughout the course of the season."

Pittsburgh transfer Dante Milligan will be eligible to compete following the fall semester and gives the Minutemen strength at the post.

With Ford actively recruiting since arriving in Amherst, transfers Etienne Brower from Boston University, Gary Forbes from Virginia and Luke Bonner from West Virginia will all be assets for next season. Matt Pennie, who walked onto the team this season, will give the frontcourt some depth.

UMass has potential

PREVIEW from page 10

KAREN WINCHUCK/COLLEGIAN

Redshirt senior Katie Nelson will be one of the leaders of an experienced Minutewomen squad this season.

STEFANIE GERARDOT, ALISHA TATHAM

Sophomore Pam Rosanio returns to the Minutewomen this season after she led the team in scoring last year and was selected to the A-10 All-Rookie team. She will lead the Minutewomen fast break this season, as she is the first player down the floor on most possessions. Dacko is pleased to have her back.

"Pam has been working hard and is going to be a better defensive player," Dacko said. "She will be the first one out of the gate to fill the lanes on our break. She is another one of our young leaders who everyone really looks up to."

Sophomore Alisha Tatham will return this year after spending her second straight summer on the Canadian Junior National team. Dacko will look for Tatham to be a defensive force this season, pressuring the ball and forcing turnover to help trigger the UMass fast break.

Sophomore Stefanie Gerardot was a McDonald's High School All-America nominee, and came into last season in great shape. As Dacko points out, Gerardot is from Indiana, so she must be a pure shooter.

FORWARD/CENTER: KATE MILLS, WHITNEY MCDONALD, TAMARA TATHAM, PATRYCJA GULAK

Dacko wants her team to run this season, and she can't have that without strong defensive rebounding. Her four forwards will be carrying the rebounding load this season after the team graduated Brooke Campbell, one of the best rebounders in the conference.

Sophomore Kate Mills worked hard over the summer to improve her conditioning, and Dacko has made a concerted effort to make her into a rebounding presence. She scored 22 points and grabbed 11 boards in the first exhibition game, so it looks like she is well on her way to being an interior presence.

Sophomore Whitney McDonald will be called upon to shoulder more of the offensive load for the Minutewomen this season, while senior Patrycja Gulak and junior Tamara Tatham will have to work together with both McDonald and Mills on the interior to make the Minutewomen a formidable inside-outside team.

"I think that if you put Tamara with any one of the three we get a quicker defensive set," Dacko said. "If you use Patrycja and Whitney together we get a slower set. We're trying to mix it up. In order for us to be successful the four of them have to be significant contributors, both defensively and offensively."

Breaking down the women's Atlantic 10

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

As the 2005-06 women's basketball season begins, the Atlantic 10 Conference has a new look. Two teams have been added to make it a 14-team league, with the top 12 teams qualifying for the A-10 Championships in March. Those two new teams are Charlotte and Saint Louis, both making the move from Conference USA.

Three teams represented the A-10 in the NCAA Tournament last year, and with the addition of two more teams, this season looks to be just as competitive, if not more.

THE FAVORITE

Temple is once again the favorite to win the Atlantic 10 Conference in 2005-06. The Owls won their second straight A-10 Championship last season, and advanced to the NCAA Tournament for the third time in four years. They will look to thrive on their success from last season, as they are once again the favorites to be crowned Atlantic 10 Champion.

The Owls earned their first-ever national ranking in 2004-05, when they finished the season ranked No. 15 in the Associated Press Poll. The ESPN/USA Today Coaches' Poll ranked Temple No. 20 in the Nation to start the 2005-06 campaign.

All-America candidate Candice Dupree is back for her senior season, and will look to lead a veteran Temple team back to the NCAA Tournament. Dupree was the Atlantic 10 Player of the Year, Defensive Player of the Year and the A-10 Championship's Most Outstanding Player last season.

Temple went 28-4 in 2004-05 and became the first school in A-10 history to go undefeated in Conference play with a 16-0 record. As the defending A-10 Champions, the Owls are the overall favorite to continue their domination and win their third consecutive A-10 title.

THE CONTENDERS

Xavier finished their season with a strong showing in the WNIT last year, and look to be a contender once again in the Atlantic 10.

The Musketeers will be hungry going into the 2005-06 season as they have most of their core players returning. Four of their five starters will be back for another season, as the Musketeers will be led by senior All-America candidate Tara Boothe. Boothe established Xavier's single-season scoring record by tallying 659 points in 2004-05, and showed no signs of slowing down when averaging 30.3 points per game in the Musketeer's WNIT run last year.

Xavier is one of the deepest teams in the A-10, and with a majority of their starting lineup returning, the Musketeers will look to advance to the NCAA tournament for the second time under head coach Kevin McGuff.

George Washington lost to Temple in the A-10 semifinals last year, but this season they will be one of the favorites to upset the Owls.

In 2004-05, head coach Jack McKeown's team put together their 14th 20-plus win season since he took over the program in 1989. George Washington lost in the Conference title game last year, but was still selected to play in the NCAA tournament, where they lost to North Carolina in the second round.

The Colonials will be led by sophomore point guard Kim Beck. Beck was selected as the A-10 Rookie of the Year last season, and was quite the playmaker. She was the first freshman since 1988-89 to lead the league in assists, averaging 5.12 per game.

McKeown's team will have their work cut out for them, as they will have one if their toughest schedules in program history. While the Colonials will face some tough competition in Tennessee, Virginia, NC State and Villanova, McKeown's success with the program has George Washington predicted as an A-10 title contender in 2005-06.

Richmond will also be one of the top teams in the A-10 this season after advancing to the NCAA Tournament in 2004-05 for the first time in 14 years. The Spiders earned the program's first-ever at-large berth last season, after losing to George Washington in the Conference semi-finals.

Leading the Spiders will be senior guard Saona Chapman. Chapman is the team's leading returning scorer with 11.6 points per game last season. The starting point guard also led the Spiders in assists with 137, and three-point field goals with 48 last year.

Richmond will not be the team they were last year, however, thanks to the graduation of their leading scorer and rebounder, Kate Flavin. Also, it will be coach Michael Shafer's first season as a head coach, and he will face a tough task trying to replace Flavin's production. But if he can do that, the Spiders have the team to get back to the NCAA Tournament.

Charlotte will begin its first season in the A-10, and will bring a very competitive team to the table in 2005-06.

The 49ers have four starters and nine letter-winners returning, and have a new head coach in Amanda Butler. Charlotte had an impressive season in Conference USA last year, going 22-9, and earning a bid to the WNIT.

The 49ers will have a good amount of depth and experience, as they return nine players who were responsible for 89 percent of the team's scoring and 94 percent of their rebounding last season. Leading the way for Charlotte will be seniors Sakellie Daniels and Pam Brown, as they have scored over 1,000 career points each.

While they have been predicted to finish fifth in the A-10, the 49ers have the depth and experience to win the conference in their first season in the A-10. Of course, a 42-8 home record over the past four years does not hurt. Charlotte is definitely a team to look out for in 2005-06.

Last but not least, Massachusetts looks as if it will be in contention for its first A-10 title this March. The Minutewomen were predicted to finish sixth in the conference, but under the guidance of head coach Marnie Dacko, UMass looks to be in better shape than people think.

UMass has over 75 percent of its offense returning, and with a year of experience under their belt, sophomores Pam Rosanio and Kate Mills will look to be dominating forces on the court. Rosanio and Mills were members of last year's A-10 All-Rookie Team, and will play a huge role in the Minutewomen offense in 2005-06.

Four of the five top scorers from last year's UMass team will be back this season. Rosanio, Mills, junior Tamara Tatham and senior Katie Nelson all finished in the top five in scoring on the Minutewomen team in 2004-05, and senior Patrycja Gulak will return to be a major player as well.

With the core of UMass returning this season, it should be a UMass team that will succeed. While they are predicted to finish sixth, look for the Minutewomen to be a sleeper for A-10 Champion.

THE PRETENDERS

The teams listed above are the six teams that will do some damage in the re-vamped A-10 Conference, however, that leaves eight more teams left in the dust, and the season has not even started yet.

Dayton, Saint Joseph's, Duquesne, Rhode Island, La Salle, Fordham, St. Bonaventure and Saint Louis are not out of it mathematically, but keeping up with the upper-echelon teams of the A-10 may be a tough task. It should also be noted that only two of the 14 teams in the conference will not advance to the A-10 tournament in March. So that leaves some hope for most teams. After all, anything can happen in the Atlantic 10 Championships, but don't bet on it.

Dayton had the fourth-best turnaround in the country from 2003-04 to 2004-05, going from 3-25 to 12-16. The Flyers led the conference in rebounding last season with 40.2 boards per game. They will be led by senior forward Cara Wright, who was tied for the lead in the A-10 in double-doubles last season with 13.

Saint Joseph's is on the cusp of being a contender, and unless the Hawks can make a dramatic turnaround from a 7-23 record from last season, it will stay that way.

The Hawks have the recipe to make that turnaround, however. All five starters from 2004-05 will be returning in seniors Maura McBryan and Faith Schutte, juniors Whitney French and Ayahna Cornish and sophomore Erica Pollock.

While Saint Joseph's incoming class for 2005-06 was ranked the 21st best recruiting class according to Blue Star Basketball Index, it will be the Hawks' veteran leadership that will give them any shot at being a success.

Duquesne also has the possibility of being a sleeper. The Dukes have four starters and seven letter-winners returning this season. The four starters, seniors Aiga Bautre, Nicole Sinclair, Maria Stankevich and junior Loui Hall were responsible for 74 percent of the team's scoring and 64 percent of the team's rebounding in 2004-05.

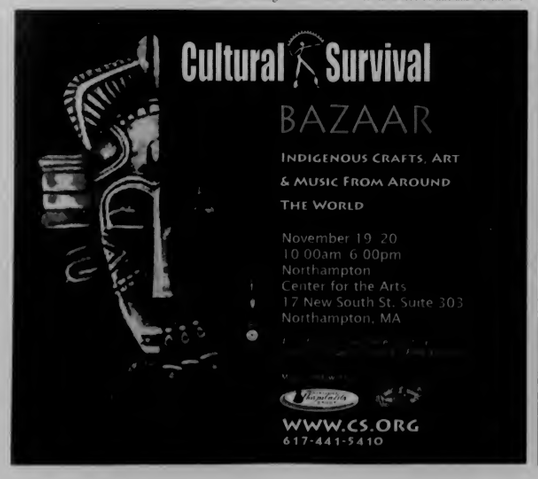
The Dukes will also welcome two Division I transfers with open arms, as juniors Carmen Bruce and Marisa Smith will be able to take the floor after having to sit out last season due to NCAA Transfer Rules.

Rhode Island will have some tough games in 2005-06, as their non-conference schedule looks just as strong as last year's, which was ranked in the top 10 nationally.

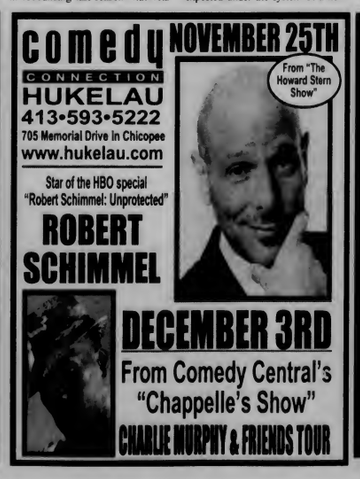
The Rams will be lead by the team's lone senior Tanya Rhodes, as she returns for her fourth year as a starter. Rhodes was named to the Atlantic 10 All-Defensive team for the second consecutive season last year, and will be the catalyst of a young Rhode Island squad.

LaSalle had a tough season in 2004-05, but that may have been expected under the system of a new head coach. Tom Lochner will be back for his second season with the Explorers, and will have to replace the production of last year's graduating class.

Senior guard Davineia Payne will be the leader of the Explorers this season. Payne is on pace to top 1,000 career points this season, as she currently has 903. While she is known more for her defensive presence on the court, Payne will have to step up offensively to replace last year's production.



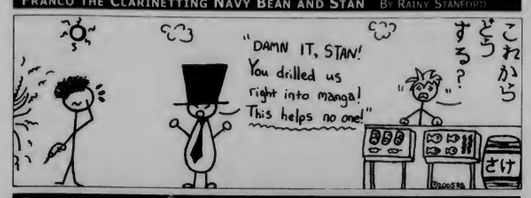
Fordham tied its best A-10 finish last season with a 5-11 conference record, and will look to add to that win total this season. The Rams will have only two starters returning from last season, and their backcourt looks to be in shambles after the loss of Monica Mack and Jade Leitao to graduation.



The Rams will need leadership from senior Jada Jefferson, who was named one of the Atlantic 10's most improved players in 2004-05.

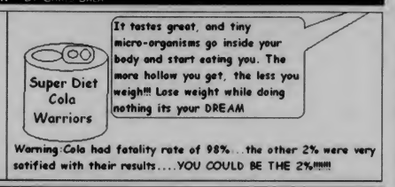
St. Bonaventure is a very young team this season, as a majority of its roster is made up of underclassmen. Despite the youth of their team, the Bonnies have 71.7 percent of their total offense returning. The Bonnies will look to their leading scorer, senior guard Stefanie Collins, to get them out of the basement of the A-10.

Saint Louis is predicted to share that basement, and with a 4-23 record last season, maybe the experts were right. Under first year head coach Shimmy Gray, the Billikens will join Charlotte as one of the new teams in the A-10.

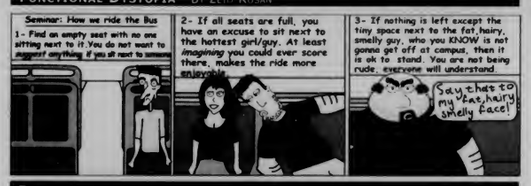


Saint Louis will have four starters returning, and lone senior Marquita McFarland is one of those veterans who will be looked upon to carry the load for a young Billikens team. McFarland finished ninth in rebounding in Conference USA last season with 7.4 boards per game. She also recorded six double-doubles in a disappointing 2004-05 season for the Billikens.

FRANCO THE CLARINETTING NAVY BEAN AND STAN By Rainy Stanford



ELSIE HOOPER By Robert D. Krycewski



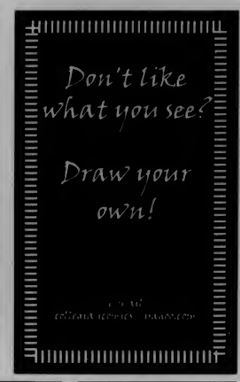
RANDOM CHATTER By Chris Sala

Diet sodas are pretty amazing. Taste like something, made of nothing. I didn't think they could improve on it, until I thought of this...

FUNCTIONAL DYSTOPIA By Zeid Rusan

PAUL By Billy O'Keefe

QUOTE OF THE DAY



"It's not how long it takes, it's who's taking you."

—Some Like It Hot

Find today's answers online

www.dailycollegian.com

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You should take up freestyling as a new hobby.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Whatever you do, always obey the five second rule.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Stay away from the fruit at the DC today.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
You really need to invest in a desk calendar.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Your new favorite day of the week is Thursday.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
You could really use a good set of crayons right about now.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Your goal for the rest of your life is to boycott sporks.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You will have a pleasant journey home next week.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
You will eat an entire pumpkin pie by yourself next weekend.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Losing caps to ink pens doesn't make anyone happy.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
You will find two quarters today, and use them to call someone who cares.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Buy some chicken noodle soup and hot chocolate with marshmallows.

★ Submit your comic ★

e-mail
collegiancomcis@yahoo.com

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ANNOUNCEMENTS

White Out Night at The Pub! Friday November 18 at The Pub HTM students are hosting an event to support the American Stroke Association. Wear White Clothing! Buy raffles for a chance to win great prizes! Come out and support the ASA while having fun with your friends!

Montreal Weekend New Years Party $129 Complete cocktail age 18 781-979-9001 Call now montrealexpress.net

Looking for GO, Baduke, Weigi Players. New players welcome. Call 339-225-0537 253-9873

APARTMENT FOR RENT

1, 2, 3 & 4 Bedroom spacious apartments, Great location, Bus Route, All utilities included No Fee Call 413-253-3000

EMPLOYMENT

Product Scanners Needed Full-Time and Part-Time positions available. Use UPC Bar-Code Scanner to scan products for busy Reclamation Center. Apply at C&S Wholesale Services, 142 Elm St., Hatfield, MA M-F 8am to 4:30pm. AA/EOE M/F/H/V

Day Bartenders Position, Mon, Weds, Fri. Local Pub. Call 548-6900

EMPLOYMENT

Rent us your ears! Listening experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu Voicemail: 545-6837.

Hurray! Today is the last day to apply to become a Legal Assistant with the Student Legal Services Office. Get hands on experience in the legal field while earning 12 undergraduate credits. No experience necessary. Stop by at 922 Campus Center or call 545-1995.

Mystery Shoppers get paid to shop! Up to $150 a day. Training provided Call 1-800-690-1273

EMPLOYMENT

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience nees. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

ROOMMATE WANTED

Apartment in Presidential looking for one or two roommates for spring semester male or female 781-608-1051

SERVICES

Legal Questions? We have answers at the Student Legal Services Office, 922 Campus Center or call 545-1995.

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance. 549-1906

SERVICES

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

TRAVEL

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

TRAVEL

ACT NOW – SPRING BREAKERS Book early & Save! Free meals/parties by 11/7. Lowest prices. Be a rep & TRAVEL FREE! Get the ultimate hookups with STA TRAVEL 413-256-1261.

WANTED

Wanted: Your ads! Whether you are selling something, looking to hire new employees, or hoping to increase your customer base, The Massachusetts Daily Collegian can help! Call 413-545-3500 to speak with an experienced ad rep or to place a classified ad. Business hours are M-F 8:30am-3:30pm.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEEKEND

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Tip-off time

UM begins new era under Travis Ford

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

March 25 is the date that it all began. Stated over and over again through the national grapevine of college basketball was the slogan: it is a new era for Massachusetts men's basketball. The buildup, which began with a simple introduction, exploded into a frenzy of press coverage, national attention and face time. A montage of signings just added to the new-fangled team that was UMass.

The bombardment of coverage, which began on March 25, was a result of the name that has had fans buzzing – Travis Ford.

When Ford was announced as the new coach of the Minuteman basketball team, the attitude revolving around the program took a different turn, and it was looked at as the beginning of a new age in Amherst.

While the face of the team went through a complete revamping, the core of the players from the 2004-05 season are still left now that the dust has settled.

Spearheading the team is Rashaun Freeman, the team's leading scorer and an All-American candidate.

"I think we've made a lot of strides to make our basketball program better," Ford said. "Some of those strides have been that our players stayed here all summer long and worked out, and went to both summer sessions of school and got ahead academically. They also got ahead in their conditioning and in getting stronger."

As memories of their 61-59 upset over Connecticut on Dec. 9, 2004, are put in the books, the beginning of the Travis Ford era officially will tip-off tonight. And with the beginning of the 2005-06 season for the Maroon and White, the hype has truly reached its pinnacle moment.

Backcourt

The story here has been the decision of which player will be the man at point guard. Junior Maurice Maxwell appears to be the frontrunner, as he has proved his worth over the past two seasons with the Minutemen.

Increasing his average of 8.1 points per game during his freshman season to 11.4 points per game during his sophomore year, Maxwell has raised his game up since his rookie season. Along with the points, Maxwell led the team in steals, with 51.

Newcomer James Life was the second recruit inked by Ford during the off-season, and was made a Minuteman because of his work ethic and his ability to shoot the ball. A transfer from Manatee Community College, Life has had a good showing in the early going, putting up 17 points in the Minutemen's 96-55 trouncing of Division II Dowling in an exhibition game on Nov. 10.

Junior Art Bowers looks to break out in his junior year and adds to the deadly shooting attack that Life provides.

Transfer Brandon Thomas brings versatility to the backcourt. With his 6-foot-6 frame, he has the athletic ability to cover multiple positions, including guard or forward. The swingman sat out last season while attending San Fe Community College in Gainesville, Fla., but averaged 12.3 points per game during his sophomore year at Long Island University in 2003-04.

Chris Lowe, out of Mount Vernon High School in Mount Vernon, N.Y., is the only true freshman on the team, as well as the only true point guard.

"I think Chris as a freshman is coming along really well," senior Jeff Viggiano said.

Lowe came in as the very first recruit signed by Ford, and although he is young, he will see plenty of playing time this season and is expected to pick up a plethora of experience from the veterans on the team.

Reserves Drew Rossi and Nana Ampim add to the depth and will contribute off the bench.

Frontcourt

There is absolutely no doubt

See NEW ERA on page 8

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Junior Rashaun Freeman and the Minutemen open their season tonight at 7 p.m. against Hartford at the Mullins Center.

Hartford poses first test for Minutemen

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

There have been multiple beginnings to the Travis Ford era as the Massachusetts men's basketball coach since he took the job eight months ago.

There was the introductory press conference on March 25 that officially began his tenure at UMass.

Then there was Midnight Madness on Oct.14, which gave fans their first chance to see Ford and the 2005-06 Minutemen.

And then there was last Thursday night's exhibition game against Dowling, a 96-55 win, which served as the first time Ford paced the sidelines of the Mullins Center.

But even as he passed all of these checkpoints, there has always only been one date that truly signified the beginning of the Travis Ford era. And that date has finally arrived, as UMass opens its highly-anticipated season tonight against Hartford at 7 p.m. at the Mullins Center.

"We're excited about it," Ford said. "We know we've got a great challenge ahead of us with Hartford, but we're excited about getting out on the court, playing in front of the fans and trying to put some of the things we've learned into use."

Friday will be the season-opener for the Hawks, as well, and Ford expects to see a team much better than the one that went 8-20 last year.

"We are playing against, what I think, will be the biggest turnaround in Division I basketball this year, as far as wins and losses," Ford said. "I predict they'll win the America East. This is a very dangerous basketball team, so we've got our hands full."

Hartford returns its entire starting lineup, as well as the top five scorers, from a year ago. Leading the Hawks' attack is senior guard Aaron Cook, who led the team in scoring with 14.9 points per game last season.

The biggest change for Hartford this year is the addition of senior center Kenny Adeleke. Adeleke transferred to Hartford after playing three seasons at Hofstra, where he amassed over 1,000 points and 800 rebounds.

"From all indications from the scouts I've talked to, he is an NBA basketball player," Ford said. "He's a proven basketball player in what was a strong Colonial League at Hofstra. He's 6-foot-9 and left-handed; he's very similar to [UMass junior] Rashaun Freeman in his game, so he's a force."

Ford plans on rotating his post players on Adeleke, with junior Stephane Lasme, the team's top low-post defender, matching-up with him to start the game.

Obviously, the Minutemen will be consumed with containing Adeleke's offensive output, but they will also have to keep him off the boards, as they struggled on the glass in the game against Dowling.

"Hopefully our rebounding will improve drastically," Ford said. "We've got to be able to rebound the basketball in order to win games. Rebounding the basketball will be a big key against Hartford."

While Ford knows it will take some time for the team to master his system, he is excited the games that count have finally arrived.

"Are we ready to play? I don't know if we're actually ready to play, but we're anxious to play," Ford said. "We still have a lot of improvement to go because this is a work in progress. The guys are still learning the system, but I have confidence we'll play hard and run our system."

Getting to the point

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

When Travis Ford took over as the coach of the Massachusetts men's basketball team eight months ago, he inherited a team with a slew of returning players who saw plenty of action during the last two seasons.

This year's squad returns all of the post players from a year ago, and Ford augmented an already strong group of wing players with the additions of junior transfers Brandon Thomas and James Life.

The only spot that sticks out as weaker than last year is the point guard position. With the graduation of four-year starter Anthony Anderson, as well as back-up Chris Chadwick, Ford was left with very few options.

Ford went out and signed freshman Chris Lowe from Mount Vernon, N.Y., to run the show, but as with most first-year players, Lowe has been up-and-down early on.

KAREN WINGER/COLLEGIAN

Junior Maurice Maxwell has made the transition from small forward to point guard this season to help stabilize the UMass offense.

Without a proven player at such a critical position, a promising season could have been set back before it even began. That is, until junior Maurice Maxwell approached Ford about moving from his natural small forward position to the point.

And while Maxwell is still readjusting to the position he played at times in high school, he has provided Ford with some comfort knowing that a veteran leader will be at the point until Lowe proves he is ready to be the floor general.

"It's a situation where Maurice is trying it out of his normal position, but because the team desperately needs his leadership, he'll be out there until Chris Lowe is ready to go," Ford said. "Maurice has done a good job, and we need his leadership out there in order for us to get off to a good start."

Maxwell played in all 28 games last year, starting 25, but saw almost all of his action on the wing. Playing on the perimeter, Maxwell's main duty on offense was to score, and he was successful, as he was second on the team with 11.4 points per game.

The move to the point brings with it a different set of responsibilities, as Maxwell now must focus on running the offense and incorporating his teammates more, while still adding the scoring punch he provided last year.

Adding to all of this, Maxwell has had to learn Ford's complex offense while making the position adjustment. This has been a lot to take in, but Maxwell feels he will be able to handle it.

"Everything was new with trying to learn a whole new offense, but I think I'm starting to get it better and better," Maxwell said. "I'm trying to learn how to score from it, keep my teammates into it and how to be a leader at the same time."

Leadership is what Ford is looking for from the position, and that is the main reason he will go with Maxwell over Lowe in the early goings.

"[Lowe's] developing, but he's still doing a lot of the same things all freshmen do," Ford said. "He's going to get more and more minutes each game, but we need leadership out of him and we need him to gain the respect from his teammates."

Being a vocal leader is not something that comes naturally to Lowe, but he realizes that in order to succeed at the college level he'll need to speak up more.

"I just have to learn to be more vocal, that's the biggest thing Coach Ford gets on me about," Lowe said. "In high school I wasn't really that vocal; I just led by example. At this level, you have to be assertive and be a leader."

Tonight will be the first test for the Minutemen with their new system, and Maxwell feels confident that he and the team will improve as the season progresses.

"I'm ready to go [tonight], but at the same time I know I still have a lot to learn," Maxwell said. "It's Game 1, and I want to show improvement by the fifth game, and the tenth game."

Veteran UMass squad enters '05-06 season with high hopes

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The temperature is dropping, football season is nearing its playoffs and the Boston Celtics are eight games into their season. Now it is time for UMass basketball to start. Both the Minutemen and Minutewomen open up tonight – the men at home and the women at Delaware – and both teams are looking to make a charge toward the Atlantic 10 Championship.

UMass coach Marnie Dacko, like any coach, wanted a couple more weeks of tuning up before her team begins its regular season tonight at 7 p.m. at Delaware.

"I would like another two weeks of practice, personally," Dacko said yesterday before departing for Delaware. "As you get deeper and deeper with things you are trying to put in, I'd like to work with the kids a little longer just to get them a little more aggressive. But the season's got to start sometime. It's here and now. We have to be ready."

UMass enters the 2005-06 season with high hopes, as the return of experienced point guard Katie Nelson, a redshirt senior, leading scorer Pam Rosanio, a sophomore, and sophomore Kate Mills on the interior should prove to be a potent nucleus for the Minutewomen this year.

UMass has three games in the next five days – Delaware, Holy Cross and Eastern Michigan – and Dacko will know more about this year's team after this stretch. The Minutewomen will play Holy Cross in their home opener on Sunday at 2 p.m. Here are the players you will see on the court for the Minutewomen this season:

Point Guard: Katie Nelson, Sakera Young

After an ACL tear during her sophomore season, Nelson sat out her junior year, but returned last season, putting up good numbers, but not up to her expectations. It will be valuable for Dacko to have a point guard with as much experience as Nelson, who can run the offense and the fast break effectively while helping the younger players along.

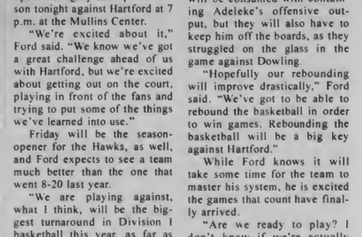
"Katie clearly has made significant progress for us in making the extra pass and really trying her best to bring the younger kids around," Dacko said.

One of the younger players is freshman Sakera Young, who has shown promising athletic ability. She has overwhelming intensity on the defensive end at times, and with her ball pressure, she will force the occasional turnover. Dacko acknowledges her potential, but believes she has a long way to go.

"She's not there yet, but she's going to get game minutes," Dacko said. "She's somebody that can be easy on herself at times. She plays like a freshman and practices like a freshman. If we can take those inconsistencies and turn them into consistent play then she's going to be great."

Guard: Ashley Sharpton, Kaylie Schiavetta, Erin Calipari

Senior Ashley Sharpton will provide valuable on-court leadership for the Minutewomen, and while some may not notice her subtle contributions, she impacts the game without being a stand-out. She does this through moving the ball and keeping the team in sync on the offensive end – something Dacko values greatly.



"She brings a knowledge of running the offense," Dacko said. "She really moves the ball well. She's a smart player. I've got to get her to be able to shoot with somebody in her face. She's got the ability to knock down shots."

Sophomore Kaylie Schiavetta played just 17 minutes in her first season, receiving a few minutes here and there throughout last season.

Freshman Erin Calipari, the daughter of former UMass coach John Calipari, walked onto the team this year but won't see much playing time because the Minutewomen are two-deep at the guard positions.

Guard/Forward: Pam Rosanio,

See PREVIEW on page 8

KAREN WINGER/COLLEGIAN

Senior Patrycja Gulak and the Minutewomen take to the road for their first game of the season tonight at 7 p.m. against Delaware.

New England's Largest College Daily · Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Monday, November 21, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXVI Issue 51

Students and officials react to ABC report

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

An ABC News report that labeled the University of Massachusetts as having the highest rate of violent crime among large-sized college campuses nationwide has some students and UMass officials outraged.

"I play sports, so I work out late at night. I walk home by myself all the time," said UMass freshman Marc Dallaire. "I feel perfectly safe on campus. I've never felt threatened in any way."

UMass spokesperson Ed Blaguszewski says ABC used "bad methodology" when calculating its crime figures. He says ABC calculated the crime rate by taking the number of on-campus crimes and dividing that number by the total number of enrolled students. If the number of on-campus crimes had been divided by only the number of students living on-campus, the number would have been more accurate, said Blaguszewski.

"Most crimes occur at night, and occur in and around residence halls," Blaguszewski said. "When these crimes occur, it affects the residence population, not everybody who's enrolled."

UMass has the eleventh largest on-campus housing system in the country. This explains why UMass was portrayed in a negative light, Blaguszewski said.

He compares UMass Amherst, which has 23,332 enrolled students, 10,890 of whom live on-campus, with the University of Michigan, which has 38,103 students, 9,579 of whom live on-campus. If both schools had an equal number of violent crimes on campus in one year, UMass would have a high-

See ABC on page 2

Activist groups band together against Wal-Mart

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

HADLEY – The Planned Parenthood League of Massachusetts joined more than 100 protesters outside of Wal-Mart yesterday to speak out against Wal-Mart's policies and expansion plans.

The Massachusetts chapter of Planned Parenthood organized a statewide protest outside of three different Wal-Marts. According to Diana Huet, a member of Planned Parenthood, these three stores are nearest to the Planned Parenthood clinics in Massachusetts. The other protests were held in Northborough and Quincy.

Planned Parenthood organized these protests in response to Wal-Mart's continued refusal to carry emergency contraception in its pharmacies. Emergency Contraceptives, also known as the "morning after pill" can be taken up to 120 hours after unprotected sex, or sex in which the couple feels their primary contraceptive failed, (i.e., a broken condom.)

Planned Parenthood members helped organize the larger-scale protest in Hadley by joining with other groups that have recently been protesting against Wal-Mart. The Hadley Neighbors for Sensible Development, who have been fighting Wal-Mart's plans to expand into a SuperCenter, along with conservationists, workers union groups including Jobs for Justice and the newly formed Coalition to Change and Challenge Wal-Mart all banded together for the rally.

Jackie Dauphinais, a unionized nurse and a member of Jobs for Justice and the Coalition helped organize the rally. They encouraged protesters to hold signs along Route 9 and to walk through the parking lot discouraging customers to shop at Wal-Mart.

Speakers such as Al Norman, an anti-Wal-Mart activist from Greenfield and Aron Goldman, a representative from stopsprawlmart.org talked about Wal-Mart's mistreatment of its workers and their failure to pay for their employees' health care.

"You want me to unveil Wal-Mart's newest health plan?" asked Norman as he held up a box of bandages. "This is it."

Huet also gave a speech about Wal-Mart's refusal to carry emergency contraceptives. She said that even those victims of sexual assault would be turned away if seeking emergency contraception from Wal-Mart because of the store's "moral issues" with the product.

"Wal-Mart is under great pressure from the religious

See PROTEST on page 2

MEGAN DALEY/COLLEGIAN

Protesters line up along rt. 9 in Hadley, outside of Wal-Mart, holding signs and drawing encouraging honks from motorists. Hundreds of people and several activist groups came together for this rally.

A group of singers called the Raging Grannies also performed at the rally. They sang several songs with lyrics such as "Look at Wal-Mart in your city, where people often shop. It's a store that sells cheap products made in terrible sweatshops," to the tune of "Clementine."

Turkey Trotters race for food bank donations

By Sesugh Nombishan
Collegian Correspondent

The third annual Turkey Trot charity race to raise money for area food banks was held on Saturday morning.

The Trot did not go as smoothly as planned. There was confusion about what time the race would start, at 10 a.m. or 11 a.m. The participants compromised and the race started at 10:30a.m., in front of the Student Union building.

The event was sponsored by Students Helping Area Reach-out Efforts (S.H.A.R.E.), a student-run organization specializing in community service awareness. The 38 participants did not signify an overwhelming turnout, but S.H.A.R.E. president Jessica Maillet stayed positive. "I think we did pretty well," she said.

"Its difficult to get college kids on a Saturday to get up at 10 in the morning and run a race but in the future we will do more advertising on campus," she said.

Maillet was content with raising money for the Food Bank of Western Massachusetts, a non-profit organization that relies on money and food donations to distribute food to needy. She and S.H.A.R.E. members organized the event with plans to donate all proceeds to the food bank.

In addition to receiving donations, the food bank "rescues" food from retail stores, farms, and restaurants. This means they get food that these owners don't want or are willing to donate. A volunteer crew organizes the food and separates what they can salvage from what they have to throw away.

The food bank distributes its food to Hampshire, Hampden, Franklin, and Berkshire counties. The food is distributed to social service programs such as shelters, food pantries, and soup kitchens.

The Food Bank of Western Massachusetts currently stores food in a 13,000 square foot warehouse, located by a farm, in North Hatfield, Mass. Food donations come in so quickly that they are expanding to improve their efficiency.

"We're stumbling on ourselves," said Food Bank director Andrew Morehouse. "We have so much food that comes in and goes out so fast that there's not enough space to store it."

Maillet, a major in nutrition, found out about the food bank on a visit. "I feel there is a real need for food in the Western part of the state," Maillet said.

"There are families that have food insecurities and the food bank needs money or donations," she said.

Most of the participants in the race were UMass students, despite the cold early Saturday morning, when most students are sound asleep. The racers were made up of mostly runners, those who you would expect to see up early on a Saturday morning jogging through campus. Most had not heard about the food bank; they were just there to run a race. The runners who knew about the food bank and where there money was going, however, got an added incentive to a brisk run.

"It gives meaning to it," said Devin Bonura, a high-school runner who came in second place in the race.

"It's a little bit more of a boost than going out there on your own steam so I guess it helps," he said.

No matter what reason the participants ran for, the money they raised — almost $400 — is going to the Food Bank of Western Massachusetts.

KATE SIKORSKI/COLLEGIAN

Participants of the 3rd annual Turkey Trot pose at the starting line after they finish their races. The Turkey Trot is a race held before Thanksgiving to raise money for the Food Bank of Western Massachusetts.

Frat no longer faces suspension

One University of Massachusetts fraternity has been placed on deferred suspension, while another has been cleared of all charges stemming from a high-profile assault last month.

According to Jo-Anne Vanin, Dean of Students at UMass, the Zeta Beta Tau fraternity has been cleared of all charges stemming from the incident, but Pi Delta Psi has received a deferred suspension. Pi Delta Psi will not be allowed to invite non-members to any of their social functions and could lose their recognition as a Greek organization if they receive one more violation.

"It's a big relief for all of us to have the facts finally known," said Todd Foster, a member of Zeta Beta Tau. "This has been a difficult time of all of us and now we can move on from this."

Both fraternities are located on the "Frat Row" section of North Pleasant Street. Two fights broke out near the frat houses in the early morning hours of Oct. 2, resulting in the stabbing of six people.

Amherst police have since arrested three people in connection to the assaults. One of the suspects, Amherst resident Cuong Ly, 18, was the brother of stabbing victim Thi Ly, 23. Police arrested an additional two juveniles in connection with the incident. It should be noted, none of the suspects have been charged with the stabbings.

Director of news and information at UMass, Ed Blaguszewski said Vanin "stands by her decision" regarding the suspension. He said she was concerned that the perpetrators of the assault were guests at Pi Delta Psi.

The two fraternities were given interim suspensions Oct. 20 by UMass Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life, Michael Gargano and ordered to cease operating as fraternities until the appeals process was completed.

No one from Pi Delta Psi could be reached for comment Sunday.

—Dan O'Brien

Groups raise laughter and funds

By Kira Glassman
Collegian Correspondent

Over 100 students squeezed into a lecture room in Herter Hall at the University of Massachusetts Saturday night and spent three hours laughing for a good cause.

It was Student Valley Productions' eighth-annual "Ham (it up) For The Holidays," a mostly comedy event held to support the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children (MSPCC).

Though the event was free through Sunday, an MSPCC volunteer collected donations. The $110 that was raised will go directly to the nonprofit organization, which feeds underprivileged children in Springfield.

"It's a great cause, and with all the disasters going on – Hurricane Katrina and the war – it's easy to forget the other charities that are out there," Nate Crawford, a UMass senior and member of Mission: IMPROVable, told the audience. It would be, he promised, "a night of laughs, donation, and good will."

The benefit show, which ran from 8 to 11 p.m., is the brainchild of Mike Carr, a UMass graduate and former IMPROVer. "This is something he believed in," said Crawford. "We're carrying on the tradition."

In addition to supporting a worthy cause, the performance showcased the talent of SVP's three troupes – Mission: IMPROVable, Sketch 22, and Improv With Attitude (I.W.A). UMass' a capella group, the Vocal Suspects, also performed.

Mission: IMPROVable opened the show. Their short, "Whose Line Is It Anyway?"-style skits, many of which were formed around frantically-shouted audience suggestions, had the crowd in hysterics. Before opening the floor to ideas, however, an IMPROVable member reminded the audience that they were watching a "family show."

"So don't say anything like, 'excrement,'" Crawford warned the audience.

I.W.A, which followed Mission, also looked to the audience for inspiration. A query for a "life-changing event" drew dozens of noteworthy responses. Though it was a tough decision – choices ranged from the obvious ("marriage") to the less obvious ("getting your tonsils removed"), but "getting a nose job" was the ultimate winner. The seven-person troupe then performed an innovative, longer scene based on this concept.

Next on the agenda was the musical duet between Nate Crawford ("Ox") and fellow IMPROVer Scott Braidman ("Bloodline".) With Braidman on the guitar, the two harmonized to original songs about overcoming relationship hurdles in "Come Between Us," (chorus: "Who's gonna sleep in the wet spot tonight?") and "Play" (chorus: "Was I not enough for you to have you replace me with Pay-per-view?").

The comedy was temporarily put on hold with the entrance of the Vocal Suspects, whose 11 members performed a cappella renditions of several popular songs, including Natalie Imbruglia's "Torn" and U2's "With Or Without You."

At the end of the evening, the audience emerged from the show with aching sides and an appreciation for the array of talent at UMass. "It was nice to have a little snippet of all the comedy troupes," said UMass junior Elena Oksanish. "Also, I had never seen the Vocal Suspects, and I was really impressed."

Sophomore Pantos Yantsides was equally wowed. "Some parts were so funny that I was on the floor with tears in my eyes," he said.

The enjoyment came from both sides of the stage. Said Junior Tyler Wolff-Ormes, a member of Mission, I.W.A, and Sketch 22: "There's nothing I enjoy more than doing this."

Mission. IMPROVable performs every Saturday in Herter 231 at 8 pm and I.W.A's next show is Friday, Dec. 2 at 8:00 pm in Herter 231. All shows are free. For more information, contact Tyler Wolff-Ormes at StudentValleyProductions@gmail.com.

Bush retracts attack on critics

By Terence Hunt
Associated Press

BEIJING — After fiercely defending his Iraq policy across Asia, President Bush abruptly toned down his attack on war critics Sunday and said there was nothing unpatriotic about opposing his strategy.

"People should feel comfortable about expressing their opinions about Iraq," Bush said, three days after agreeing with Vice President Dick Cheney that the critics were "reprehensible."

The president also praised Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., as "a fine man" and a strong supporter of the military despite the congressman's call for troop withdrawal as soon as possible.

Bush brought up the growing Iraq debate when he met reporters after inconclusive talks with President Hu Jintao about friction in U.S.-China relations. Bush ran into stiff resistance from the Chinese to his call for expanding religious freedom and human rights.

He also reported no breakthroughs toward reducing China's massive trade surplus, overhauling its currency system or protecting intellectual property rights.

The president took satisfaction simply in the fact that Hu mentioned human rights when the two leaders made joint statements to the press. "Those who watch China closely would say that maybe a decade ago, a leader wouldn't have uttered those comments," Bush said. "He talked about democracy."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice complained that "we've certainly not seen the progress that we would expect" on a months-old U.S. request for action by China on specific human rights cases. Bush said the U.S. had presented a list of "dissidents that we believe are unfairly imprisoned."

China was the most anticipated stop on Bush's weeklong visit, which has included Japan and South Korea.

Bush flies home on Monday after a four-hour stop in Mongolia, the first ever by an American president. The brief visit is a reward for Mongolia's pursuit of democracy and support for the U.S. fight against terrorism.

The president packed a lot into his Beijing visit.

In a country where the practice of religion is harshly restricted, Bush worshipped at a church and complimented the preacher on her sermon. He went mountain bike-riding with six young athletes vying for spots on China's Olympic team. "How do you say, 'Take it easy on the old man,'" Bush joked.

When a reporter suggested Bush had seemed unenthusiastic in his joint appearance with Hu, the president responded, "Have you ever heard of jet lag?"

Thousands of miles from home, Bush and other White House officials have not let a day go by without a tough counterattack against Democratic critics of the president's Iraq policies. But the president replaced the no-holds-barred approach with a softer tone Sunday.

"I heard somebody say, 'Well, maybe so-and-so is not patriotic because they disagree with my position.' I totally reject that thought," Bush said.

"This is not an issue of who's patriotic and who's not patriotic," he said. "It's an issue of an honest, open debate about the way forward in Iraq."

The Iraq war has undercut Americans' confidence in Bush's credibility and his response to terrorism and has helped drop his approval rating to the lowest point of his presidency. Nearly 2,100 members of the U.S. military have died since the Iraq war began in March 2003.

ARTS & LIVING
LATEST 'POTTER' BEST YET
'Goblet of Fire' takes the series in a darker, exciting direction.
Page 5

EDITORIAL/OPINION
IS THE NEWSPAPER ERA ENDING?
Newspaper writers continue to work without job security.
Page 4

WEATHER
TODAY Mostly Sunny, H55°
TONIGHT Rain/Wind, L40°
TOMORROW Rain, H48°, L24°

SPORTS
DOWN AND OUT
UMass football fell to Hofstra and ended any chance at a playoff spot.
Page 10

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3649 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Michael Bunack
Managing Editor Cameron J. Woods
Business Manager Hirak Shah
Production Manager Nicholas Belanger
Night Supervisor Sheryl Wolnik
Advertising Manager Kerry O'Grady
Advertising Production Lauren Egavian
Editorial Production Amanda Allen
Arts & Living Editor Matthew O'Rourke
Comics Editor Amanda Allen
Editorial Editor Allison Edles
News Editor Dan O'Brien
Photo Editor Kate Sachsenmaier
Sports Editor Jeff Howe
Circulation Manager Thomas Hecht
Distribution Manager Nick Gleason
Finance Manager Daniel Conti
Human Resource Phil Smoller
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Caren Tortorici
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Asst. Arts & Living Mackenzie Issler
Asst. Arts & Living Ian Jones
Assistant News Megan Daley
Assistant News Matt Belliveau
Assistant Photo Elizabeth Carinti
Assistant Sports Eric Athas
Assistant Sports Dan Duggan
Assistant Editorial Kristen LaCasse

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1936. Published daily since 1967, The Collegian has been broadsheet since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call 413-545-3500 between 8:30 a.m. and 3:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Cameron J. Woods
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Kate Sachsenmaier
COPY EDITOR
Dan O'Brien
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Melody Natal
PRODUCTION STAFF
Irving Mercado

Protesters call for access to emergency contraception

PROTEST from page 1

right," said Huet. "They feel they can impose their morals on others."

According to the MetroWest Daily News, Wal-Mart officials told protestors in Northborough yesterday that the decision not to carry emergency contraceptives was a "business decision," claiming that the short shelf-life of the product made it a bad investment to carry. However, when one of the protestors called a pharmacist, she was told that emergency contraceptives actually have shelf-life of two years.

Planned Parenthood believes that part of the "moral issue" that people have with emergency contraceptives is that they misperceive them to be a kind of abortion pill. According to a flyer by Planned Parenthood, however, the pill "does not work if you are already pregnant and will not harm a developing fetus."

Planned Parenthood says another mis-perception that contributes to resistance of their demands is the idea that they are "pro-abortion." They are actually pro-choice, they say, which is very different. According to the Planned Parenthood website, "pro-choice means supporting access to all reproductive options – whether it's motherhood, contraception, abortion or adoption – and supporting the right of all individuals to make their own personal decisions about when and whether to have a child."

Police were present at the rally, but needed to take no action as both the protesters and the Wal-Mart shoppers and employees were peaceful.

MEGAN TALPEY/COLLEGIAN

Protesters hold signs up as drivers pass in the parking lot outside of the Wal-Mart on route 9 in Hadley.

UMass officials feel ABC report is unfair

ABC from page 1

er crime rate by ABC's methodology because the number of crimes would have been divided by the number of total enrollment. However, if the number of crimes were divided by the number of residents who live on-campus, UMass would have the lower crime rate.

The positive news about UMass that ABC did mention — after feeling pressure from UMass officials — was the improved crime rate from 2003 to 2004. The number of on-campus violent crimes was 57 in 2002, 58 in 2003, but declined to 28 in 2004, a drop of more than 50 percent.

ABC did not use statistics after 2003 in their report, which aired on the news magazine show "Primetime" Thursday night.

The Primetime report only mentioned UMass Amherst for about 90 seconds, but that did little to ease the administration's concerns.

In Thursday's Daily Hampshire Gazette, UMass Amherst Chancellor John Lombardi said the university "may sue" ABC if its report was false. Blaguszewski would not, however, comment on possible litigation issues Friday.

"If you live and work here, the report doesn't make any sense," Lombardi said in a statement Thursday.

"I am very pleased that UMass Amherst has been able to reduce violent on-campus crime by more than 50 percent over the past year," said UMass President Jack Wilson.

UMass officials want students to know that, although it disagrees with ABC's findings, it still takes on-campus crime seriously.

UMass Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life, Michael Gargano released a campus-wide email on Wednesday informing students that a new private security team would be patrolling dormitories.

Blaguszewski said the new security team would not have the power to arrest or search students, but would serve to help in security-related issues.

In the Primetime report, hidden cameras showed an ABC producer walking past security without anyone checking his identification at two UMass dormitories: Dickinson Hall in Orchard Hill and a Southwest tower.

Two female UMass students list safety as a one of their concerns about living on campus, but don't think the campus is unsafe.

"I don't know why ABC wants to label UMass 'the most dangerous school in the nation,' [My friends and I] say 'be careful,' but still feel safe," said junior Sachie Harimoto.

"I always walk around campus, even after midnight. I do feel safe," said junior Ayumi Shimizu.

Officials from ABC could not be reached for comment over the weekend.

Drowsy drivers a concern as day of traveling grows near

By Lauren Burris
The Lariat

WACO, Texas — It's the same, familiar road home, but halfway there you suddenly realize you don't remember going through a landmark town you always pass through. You fell asleep at the wheel.

Lt. Kevin Helpert of the Baylor University Department of Public Safety said that within the past couple years, there have been incidents of students at the university getting into accidents due to drowsy driving.

With many students driving home for Thanksgiving, Helpert said students need to make sure they've had a good night of sleep the night before driving.

In 1999, six college students, four of whom attended the university, were killed in an accident when a driver fell asleep at the wheel.

Later that year, the university's Student Congress passed a bill to help Texas A&M University with the Lupe Medina Program. The program started in 1998 after Lupe Medina, a student at Texas A&M, fell asleep at the wheel and was killed in a crash.

The program allows students to stop at participating motels, show their student IDs and receive a discounted rate for a night in a motel room. Student Congress assisted by contacting hotels to participate in the program and by making students aware of the program.

"I've had friends who have gotten in accidents because they didn't stop," New Braunfels, Texas, Super 8 employee Kristen Hamilton said. "Especially if they're driving a long way, I'd tell them to stop."

There are more than 50 participating hotels in Texas and in three surrounding states. Hamilton said even if she didn't know about the program, she would give a discount to students who felt susceptible to falling asleep at the wheel.

"Hopefully, it will encourage students to stop at a local motel or hotel when they feel they're getting too drowsy to drive," senior David Jakubowski said. "In doing so, it will keep them from putting their own lives in jeopardy and the lives of others."

Jakubowski is the chairman for the student government's Community Affairs Committee. The committee is responsible for the Lupe Medina Program.

According to the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration, about 100,000 police-reported crashes are caused by drowsy driving. Fifty-five percent of drowsy-driving crashes involve people under the age of 24, according to the administration.

Jakubowski said he's personally experienced drowsy driving.

"Mine was pretty bad because I had to stop and pull over," Jakubowski said. "I swerved into the grassy area, and that woke me up. I was lucky that nobody was behind me or in front of me."

Helpert said many students rely on cranking up the air conditioning and turning the volume up on the radio, but said that is only a false sense of security.

Helpert said students feeling drowsy should "pull over in what they believe would be a safe place, a well-lit area."

"Walk around the vehicle a few times until you feel like you're awake again," he said.

He said convenience stores and shopping mall parking lots were examples of places to stop.

James Shaw, a senior, said he usually drives home to Lexington, Ky., for Christmas and summer.

For Thanksgiving, he'll be driving about eight hours to his grandparents' house in Mississippi. He said he's never felt himself falling asleep while driving. He resorts to coffee and loud music when he's driving while tired.

According to the NHTSA, common risks and causes for drowsy driving are sleep loss, use of sedating medications, untreated or unrecognized sleep disorders, use of alcohol, and an active lifestyle that restricts sleep.

"Getting drowsy – it's a horrible feeling," Helpert said. "To me, the length of the trip isn't as much (a factor) as watching medication and getting enough sleep."

Hofstra University offers you a future of excellence.

- With more than 140 unique programs in five schools, Hofstra has a program for you in:
  Frank G. Zarb School of Business: M.B.A., M.S., Executive M.B.A. and advanced certificate programs
  School of Education and Allied Human Services: M.A., M.H.A., M.S.Ed., Ed.D. and advanced certificate programs
  Hofstra College of Liberal Arts and Sciences: M.A., Au.D., Ph.D. and advanced certificate programs
  School of Communication: M.A. in Speech Communication and Rhetorical Studies
  New College: M.A. in Interdisciplinary Studies
- With an outstanding, dedicated and accomplished faculty and state-of-the art educational facilities, Hofstra's resources are among the finest in the country.
- Hofstra is ranked 14th on The Princeton Review's ranking of America's Most Connected Campuses.
- A student-faculty ratio of 14 to 1.
- New technologically-advanced facilities in Hagedorn Hall and C.V. Starr, such as SMART Board™ interactive whiteboards and wireless locations.
- And our location, 25 miles from Manhattan, affords students a suburban setting within an easy commute to the resources of New York City.

For more information, or to arrange a campus tour:
Hofstra University Graduate Admissions
105 Memorial Hall
126 Hofstra University
Hempstead, NY 11549
Phone: 1-800-HOFSTRA, ext. 657
E-mail: graddean@hofstra.edu

HOFSTRA UNIVERSITY
Hempstead, New York 11549 • www.hofstra.edu

Whole Foods tries to open on Thanksgiving

BOSTON (AP) — An attempt by the Whole Foods supermarket chain to defy the state's centuries-old "blue laws" and open on Thanksgiving has been shut down by the state attorney general, who told the upscale chain to stay closed for the holiday or risk criminal charges.

The office of Attorney General Thomas Reilly issued a legal opinion after officials at a Whole Foods competitor, Shaw's Supermarkets, wrote him a letter asking him to block the opening, The Boston Globe reported.

David Lannon, president of Whole Foods Market's North Atlantic Region, said the chain has scrapped the Thanksgiving openings at its 14 state stores.

"We're not going to break the law, he said. "If the blue law says we'll have to be closed, we have to be closed."

Many of the state's Puritan-era blue laws, passed in the 1600s to keep colonists at home or in church on Sundays, have been repealed, such as a ban of liquor sales on Sundays. But one that remains in effect requires all stores, except convenience stores and gas stations, to close on Thanksgiving, Christmas and New Year's Day.

Some state Whole Foods stores had opened on Thanksgiving Day in the past — after obtaining special permits from cities and towns — and were mobbed by last-minute shoppers. In addition, Whole Foods is open in Connecticut, New Jersey and New York on Thanksgiving, and Lannon said he figured Massachusetts would follow suit.

"It's for people after they're done shopping on Tuesday or Wednesday who say, 'Ooh, I need more butter or another bunch of celery,'" Lannon said.

But Shaw's, which has 200 stores in New England, wrote Reilly after some employees spotted a banner at a Bellingham Whole Foods advertising the Thanksgiving opening. After some investigating, the West Bridgewater-based chain discovered all but one of the state's 14 Whole Foods stores were advertising a similar opening. Shaw's legal department asked Reilly to investigate in a Nov. 4 letter.

"We believe that allowing Whole Foods to open on Thanksgiving Day will create an unlevel playing field for all other retail grocers," Shaw's legal department wrote to Reilly on Nov. 4. "Besides disadvantaging competitors, a Whole Foods opening would harm consumers, due to lack of choice in the marketplace for consumers to shop and compare prices for the best deal."

A letter to Whole Foods from Reilly's fair labor and business practices division said, "Generally, the performance of work on legal holidays is prohibited unless permitted by a statutory exemption." The letter noted Reilly has the power to bring criminal charges against anyone who violates the state's blue laws.

Nick Mesuri, chief of Reilly's business and labor protection bureau, said the blue laws sound archaic, but they protect workers from pressure to give up their holidays.

Lannon said working on Thanksgiving was voluntary and workers would have received double pay.

Jeff Orlinski, a 26-year-old Whole Foods shopper in Hingham, was irked that Whole Foods was not permitted to open on Thanksgiving.

"What if you need something at the last-minute?" he asked. "What happens if your stuffing gets burned?"

Associated Press

U.S. forces suspect death of terrorist leader

By Robert H. Reid
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — U.S. forces sealed off a house in the northern city of Mosul where eight suspected al-Qaida members died in a gunfight — some by their own hand to avoid capture. A U.S. official said Sunday that efforts were under way to determine if terror leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was among the dead.

Insurgents, meanwhile, killed an American soldier and a Marine in separate attacks over the weekend, while a British soldier was killed by a roadside bomb in the south.

In Washington, a U.S. official said the identities of the terror suspects killed was unknown. Asked if they could include al-Zarqawi, the official replied: "There are efforts under way to determine if he was killed."

The official spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the information.

American soldiers maintained control of the site, imposing extraordinary security measures, a day after a fierce gunbattle that broke out when Iraqi police and U.S. soldiers surrounded a house after reports that al-Qaida in Iraq members were inside.

Three insurgents detonated explosives and killed themselves to avoid capture, Iraqi officials said. Eleven Americans were wounded, the U.S. military said.

The U.S. soldier killed Sunday near the capital was assigned to the Army's Task Force Baghdad and was hit by small arms fire, the military said. The Marine, assigned to Regimental Combat Team 8, 2nd Marine Division, died of wounds suffered the day before in Karmah, a village outside Fallujah to the west of the capital.

Their deaths brought to at least 2,093 the number of U.S. service members who have died since the war began in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

In the southern city of Basra, a roadside bomb killed a British soldier and wounded four others, the British Ministry of Defense said. The ministry said 98 British soldiers have died in the Iraq conflict.

The U.S. military also said Sunday that 24 people including another American Marine and 15 civilians — were killed the day before in an ambush on a joint U.S.-Iraqi patrol in Haditha, 140 miles northwest of Baghdad in the volatile Euphrates River valley.

According to the U.S. statement, the attack began Saturday with a roadside bomb detonating next to the Marine's vehicle, followed by a heavy volley of fire from insurgents.

"Iraqi army soldiers and Marines returned fire, killing eight insurgents and wounding another," the statement said.

Meanwhile, four women were killed Sunday night when gunmen stormed their home in a Christian district of eastern Baghdad, police said, adding that valuables were stolen and the motive for the attack appeared to have been robbery.

The latest deaths occurred at the end of a violent three-day period in which at least 140 Iraqi civilians died in a series of bombings and suicide attacks — most targeting Shiite Muslims.

The victims included 76 people who died Friday in near-simultaneous suicide bombings at two Shiite mosques in Khanaqin and 36 more killed the next day by a suicide car bomber who detonated his vehicle amid mourners at a Shiite funeral north of the capital.

In Washington, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Sunday on ABC's "This Week" that commanders' assessments will determine the pace of any military drawdown. About 160,000 U.S. troops are in Iraq as the country approaches parliamentary elections Dec. 15.

The Pentagon has said it plans to scale back troop strength to its pre-election baseline of 138,000, depending on conditions. Rumsfeld said the U.S.-led coalition continues to make progress in training Iraqi security forces, which he placed at 212,000.

Rumsfeld also said talk in the United States of a quick withdrawal from Iraq plays into the hands of the insurgents.

"The enemy hears a big debate in the United States, and they have to wonder maybe all we have to do is wait and we'll win. We can't win militarily. They know that. The battle is here in the United States," he told "Fox News Sunday."

In Cairo, Egypt, Iraq's president said Sunday he was ready for talks with anti-government opposition figures and members of Saddam Hussein's outlawed Baath Party, and he called on the Sunni-led insurgency to lay down its arms and join the political process.

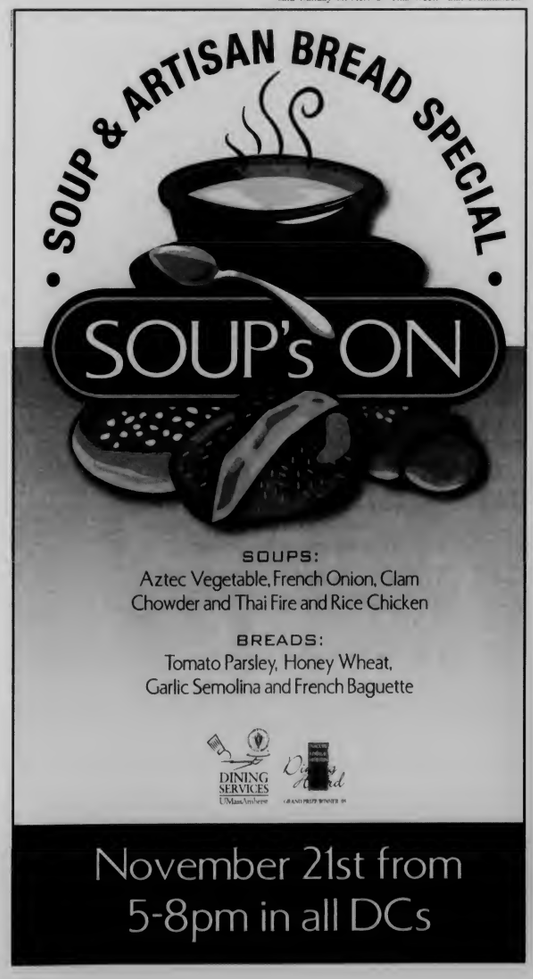
But President Jalal Talabani, attending an Arab League-sponsored reconciliation conference, insisted that the Iraqi government would not meet with Baath Party members who are participating in the Sunni-led insurgency and attacking Iraqi and U.S.-led forces in the country.

"I am the president of Iraq and I am responsible for all Iraqis. If those who describe themselves as Iraqi resistance want to contact me, they are welcome," Talabani told reporters. "I want to listen to all Iraqis. I am committed to listen to them, even those who are criminals and are on trial."

Talabani made clear in his remarks, however, that he would talk with insurgents and "criminals" only if they put down their weapons.

In Baghdad, hundreds of Sunnis demanded an end to the torture of detainees and called for the international community to pressure Iraqi and U.S. authorities to ensure that such abuse does not occur.

Anger over detainee abuse has increased sharply since U.S. troops found 173 detainees at an Interior Ministry prison in Baghdad's Jadriyah neighborhood. The detainees, mainly Sunnis, were found malnourished and some had torture marks on their bodies. Sunni Arabs dominate the insurgent ranks.



The 400 protesters carried posters of tortured detainees, disfigured dead bodies and U.S. troops detaining Iraqis as they marched for a few hundred meters (yards) through western Baghdad.

Iraq's Shiite-led government has promised an investigation and punishment for anyone guilty of torture. Attacks against Shiite civilians by Sunni religious extremists have occurred throughout the Iraq conflict but spiked since the detainees were found last weekend.

KRT

An armored crane clears rubble as the Iraqi rescue team searches for the dead from a terrorist bomb attack.

SOUPS:
Aztec Vegetable, French Onion, Clam Chowder and Thai Fire and Rice Chicken

BREADS:
Tomato Parsley, Honey Wheat, Garlic Semolina and French Baguette

DINING SERVICES UMassAmherst

November 21st from 5-8pm in all DCs

DINING SERVICES UMassAmherst

You can use your meal plan at the Bluewall Cafe on Friday, Nov. 25 and Saturday, Nov. 26, from 8:00 am to 7:00 pm.

CLOSED ON THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 24 THANKSGIVING DAY.
www.umass.edu/dimingservices

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

All we want to do is write

Alison Edles

I write for a newspaper. I have the luxury of saying what I want to say and hoping it'll interest readers and, from a tiny piece of my heart, that it will actually have them agree with my sentiments. I work off of deadlines and shorten or lengthen my comments based on how much time is left on the clock. Nowadays, the term deadline has become a more important aspect of the newspaper industry. Specifically, the root of that word: dead. It's ironic that the central feature of what makes a newspaper run smoothly houses the very word which now describes its fate.

Print media is dying. The New York Times, Boston Globe and Philadelphia Inquirer recently laid off workers, and the topic of instruction in my Media Criticism class for the first month and a half was what lay in store for the future of the newspaper industry. Well, I can't say where we'll be in five years, but I know where we are today.

We are a generation of speed and efficiency. We want our news now and current, not sitting on our desk in folded bundles with headlines that are three hours old. We want to post feedback and discuss today's events, not listen to some whiny political columnist who feels their criticism of the Bush administration is superior to others because he sees the New York Times logo on the corner of his paycheck every other week. We realize where we've been and the antiquated mediums we put up with in order to get our news, and where we're going; embracing the new blogs and polls we can participate in online.

> Working in a daily college newsroom, the most we can ever hope for is to catch our readers' attention in a special way by having color on a few select pages. But despite the black and white and the smudgy newsprint, we still write. Despite the journalism department combining with the communications department, we're still here.

Newspapers are now means of propelling image and society. It speaks very highly of you to have a paper on your coffee table, despite the fact you haven't opened it at all and already read what you wanted to read of the news while you were checking your e-mail. And if you're without a coffee table, you can always tote one around with you so people will think you can at least still tolerate the smudges of newsprint on your fingers. You stuck it out longer than the rest of us, buddy. You're a trooper.

Working in a daily college newsroom, the most we can ever hope for is to catch our readers' attention in a special way by having color on a few select pages. But despite the black and white and the smudgy newsprint, we still write. Despite the journalism department combining with the communications department, we're still here. We're slowly being weeded out by faster means of news presentation, but we don't stop publishing.

The field is extremely competitive, and more so now than it used to be. The starting jobs pay worse than a starting high school English teacher's salary, but we still bust our humps and build up our portfolios with clips so we can hope to, one day, get that job which doesn't even pay the rent. We write stories we don't want to, and deal with insults we wouldn't say to our worst enemy. We get scrutiny for every piece we write and still always show up to work the next day. We mess up, and our inaccuracies are published as a correction to the entire readership in a special gray box with a border around it, but yet we still write.

There are thousands of us out there and all we want to do is write. And for the lucky ones who actually have a paper willing to publish their works, it really doesn't get any better. Sure, over the years our words will change, our viewpoints will sway and the papers we will be writing for will vary in degree of esteem, but we'll still be there hoping they'll eventually find a way to make tahe newsprint not come off on your hands while people read your work.

The newspaper industry is dying and yet we're still here. We all still write and we all have no intention to let that go anytime soon. Our dedication to the craft serves as a tipped hat to those that came before us and as a defibrillator to those that come after us. Our jobs may be thinning and our printing presses may be tiring, but that won't stop us from writing. We will still meet our deadlines, we will still cover that story and most importantly of all, we will still be here tomorrow morning.

Allison Edles is a Collegian editor.

Nothing but the best for my dad

Jeff Howe

It's not too often I open up and show an in-depth side of who I really am underneath my top layer. It was never really my thing. But the more I think about it, the more I would be remiss if I didn't at least try to move ahead with this column, to say something I have never really had the chance to put into actual words.

On Thursday of this week, we will all have a chance to be thankful for something, or a few things, or everything – whether you're thankful for being able to gorge yourself with more turkey than you'll see all year while watching football or just something simpler, like spending a day with your family.

This Thursday marks an interesting day at my house, though, as it is also my father's birthday. Even though birthdays grow to be a little less meaningful during the age when your golf game begins to take a steady decline (had to say it), it is still the one day every year that things are supposed to be all about you.

And since my father's birthday falls on the day we are supposed to think about all of the things we are thankful for, I want to take this space to talk about how thankful I am for everything my father has done – for myself and my family.

There are things I'll always remember about my dad, like the day he came home after he bought me my first Red Sox hat. I remember being so young that I couldn't understand the concept that it came from a store, not the actual head of someone on the Boston Nine.

He is the reason that I'm the sports fan I am today. He introduced me to Fenway, to what used to be a terrible New England Patriots franchise (the first game I saw in Foxboro, they were destroyed by the legendary New Orleans 'Aints), and he took me to the Boston Garden to see my first Celtics and Bruins games.

Then, there was golf. He taught me everything about the game – mainly in terms of respecting its tradition, something not everyone cares to learn. Apparently, I paid more attention to him than I ever thought I did, as I used to hear from his friends that everything I did on a golf course – the way I carried my bag, to my swagger, to my swing – resembled what he did.

> But he is tough for a reason. He just wants to make sure I make everything out of my life that I possibly can, the way he has always done for my family. After growing up with little to nothing, he has done nothing shy of breaking his back for the well-being of my mother, my sister and me.

So when I was named captain of the Lowell High School golf team in my senior year of 2001, it marked exactly 30 years after he did the same thing, and that was something I always took with me.

And, man, that guy always kept me on my toes. My father was tough. I never got away with anything around him, even when I thought I had gained enough distance to put something by him (calling from Boston telling me he knew I had beers in my car in Lowell).

But he is tough for a reason. He just wants to make sure I make everything out of my life that I possibly can, the way he has always done for my family. After growing up with little to nothing, he has done nothing shy of breaking his back for the well-being of my mother, my sister and me.

My friends have all heard the stories, particularly the ones about the bar he runs in Boston, because they are always fun for me to tell. But not everyone knows about all of the hard work that went into the making of who Joseph Howe is today. He has been a blue collar, hard-working man throughout his entire life so he could provide nothing but the best for us. If I can grow up to become half the person he is, I think that would be an accomplishment in itself, but I know that while I am on my way to growing into the person I want to become, my drive to live up to impressing him is what keeps me motivated.

I've always considered myself to be blessed with two parents whom I have always gotten along with – and taking nothing away from my mother – I will never have the type of bond with anyone the way I have with my dad. He has always been one of my best friends and someone I look forward to having my other friends get a chance to meet.

Since I know he will be reading this on the morning of his birthday, I just want to close it out by saying – for everything I've already mentioned, to the things I forgot, and everything else down the road – thanks, Dad.

Jeff Howe is a Collegian editor.

Time to send soldiers home

You know, I thought they still had some class. I thought that the Republicans in Congress still had some integrity. For a party that still thinks it is the descendant of Lincoln and of the ideas of the founders, they sure are acting like an immature band of student councilors. After that long, cold 40 years of wandering in the wilderness without power, they just got slightly drunk with power. No worries though, after election '04, they'd sober up, focus on what needs to be done for the country and engage in civilized debate over the issues. I have to ask myself, what was I thinking? I tried so hard to be an idealist about it all too. Kerry lost but maybe, just maybe things would be OK. Wrong.

Matthew Giancola

Case in point: Congressman John Murtha, a Democrat from Pennsylvania, said on Thursday that he believed it is now time to withdraw the troops from Iraq. He served the Marines for 37 years, fought in Vietnam, was awarded two Purple Hearts and voted for the Iraq war. Not exactly a pacifist. Just three years ago, the Marines gave him the highest honor in the Corps – the Semper Fidelis Award.

> For the past few years, we have stated that once Iraq had a stable government and had a moderately strong army, we would leave. To put soldiers on every street and in every building could send the message that we have different plans for the future of Iraq; couple that with the detainee abuse photographs and you have the recipe for a disaster.

In his speech he held back tears as he recounted his weekly visits to Walter Reed to check in on the recovering soldiers. He is doing everything he can for these troops, giving them his time as well as a reliable vote. By his judgment, Iraq is now not winnable – the administration having made too many mistakes to secure the peace and to win the "hearts and minds."

Instead of saying, "You know John, that's an interesting idea. I don't agree with you, though and here's why . . ." Republicans immediately turned to their favorite tactic, smearing him. Congresswoman Jean Schmidt of Ohio and Speaker of the House, Dennis Hastert, called Murtha a "coward" and Vice President Cheney said that Murtha's speech was one of the most dishonest things he's ever heard. I'll leave it to you to insert some of Cheney's past statements here. Murtha shot back, "I like guys who've never been there that criticize us who've been there. I like that. I like guys who got five deferments and never been there and send people to war, and then don't like to hear suggestions about what needs to be done."

Now, I'm not sure whether I agree with Rep. Murtha or not. Ridding the world of Saddam Hussein was certainly a noble cause. Staying after the fall of his government to help rebuild the destroyed country was an obligation we had to the people that we would soon leave. But, we didn't leave. The president never supplied Iraq with enough troops to rebuild infrastructure and simultaneously maintain the security, making it impossible for Al-Qaeda to establish a strong foothold on the nation. Unfortunately, we never gained enough international support, and we left the border open for terrorists to drive right in.

In the present moment, I fear that a large increase in troops on the ground would infuriate moderate Iraqis, fanning the flames of the Islamo-facists. For the past few years, we have stated that once Iraq had a stable government and had a moderately strong army, we would leave. To put soldiers on every street and in every building could send the message that we have different plans for the future of Iraq; couple that with the detainee abuse photographs and you have the recipe for a disaster. But on the other hand, if we simply pull out all American forces, Al-Qaeda will look at that as a victory and continue its conquest of the fledgling country. Once Iraq is taken over, they will move on to their next nation.

The current administration has put us in a terribly difficult spot and to be honest, I don't see a complete victory at the end of the tunnel. I think that the best option for the U.S. currently is to create a timetable of goals we want to accomplish. Our goals have to be definitive, clear and specific and made known to the people of Iraq. In the coming months, we should seriously consider bringing some of our troops home.

Congressman Murtha is being a patriotic American, sharing his ideas on how best to end the situation in Iraq. Do I agree with him on every detail? Maybe not. Do I resort to smearing his name and calling him an aid to the terrorists? No, our fine, brave leaders are good enough at that.

Matthew Giancola is a Collegian columnist.

Thanksgiving brings thanks

Chris Eckel

So it's Thanksgiving time again. Inevitably, someone will write an article condemning this holiday as false worship of British colonists' imperialism. It might even be published in this paper, but I don't know about all that. Mistakes were made, yes, but let's face it: We must remember the many legacies of the holiday, but one of them is most certainly that it is a time for reflecting on those things with which one has been blessed. So with the attitude of living in the present, and since everyone loves what Thanksgiving has become, let's stay away from political gripping and stick with those things for which we are thankful.

So what are you thankful for, UMass? I'm thankful that I'm healthy: I have the body of a Greek god, and short of a burn toe and a few other ailing body parts, everything else seems to be in working order, relatively speaking. I'm thankful that I've had and continue to have wonderful professors here at UMass. I'm thankful that I still live in the finest state in the union, a state that recognizes love between two people, values education, has successful professional sports teams, produces Samuel Adams beer and of course, doesn't have a government that insists on teaching democratic "young'uns" creationism.

I'm thankful that trucker hats, the metro sexual look, boy bands and untalented lyrical Lolitas, popped collars, tricked out Civics, caffeinated beer, Paris Hilton and terrible horror movies all seem to be losing steam and slowly disappearing. Hopefully the trends that come to pass between now and next Thanksgiving are slightly less awful.

I'm thankful that I made it through several years at UMass without being shot, stabbed, beaten with a sock full of quarters or tortured. Statistically speaking, I'm one of the lucky few . . . now the whole nation knows that walking around this place is like strolling through a prison riot.

> I'm thankful that I made it through several years at UMass without being shot, stabbed, beaten with a sock full of quarters or tortured. Statistically speaking, I'm one of the lucky few . . . now the whole nation knows that walking around this place is like strolling through a prison riot.

I'm thankful that I'm one of the lucky few. I mean . . . you saw or heard about the "Primetime" episode, and the mainstream media never lies about anything – now the whole nation knows that walking around this place is like strolling through a prison riot. Now that I think about it, wasn't it after his 22-minute spring concert here that 50 Cent started wearing the bulletproof vest? I guess he's ahead of the curve-no wonder he can sell anything from shoes to video games.

I'm thankful for people who have given me chances to shine, like the editors of this fine newspaper, or my current employers. I'm thankful to people that in one way or another have motivated me to keep improving upon myself for the rest of my life. I'm thankful for the people I love, even if they don't know how I feel. I'm thankful for Fall Out Boy, Coldplay, The Killers, The Academy Is, O.A.R. and all the rest of the bands that somehow know exactly what I want to hear.

I'm thankful for Cinnamon Toast Crunch breakfast bars, rainy nights, vanilla candles, Comcast On Demand, central heating and letters from home. I'm thankful for Jonathan Harr, Ayn Rand, Bill Bryson, and Robert Kurson, authors who remind me how powerful the written word can be. I'm thankful that despite its many problems, and many critics, we still live in the finest country in the world.

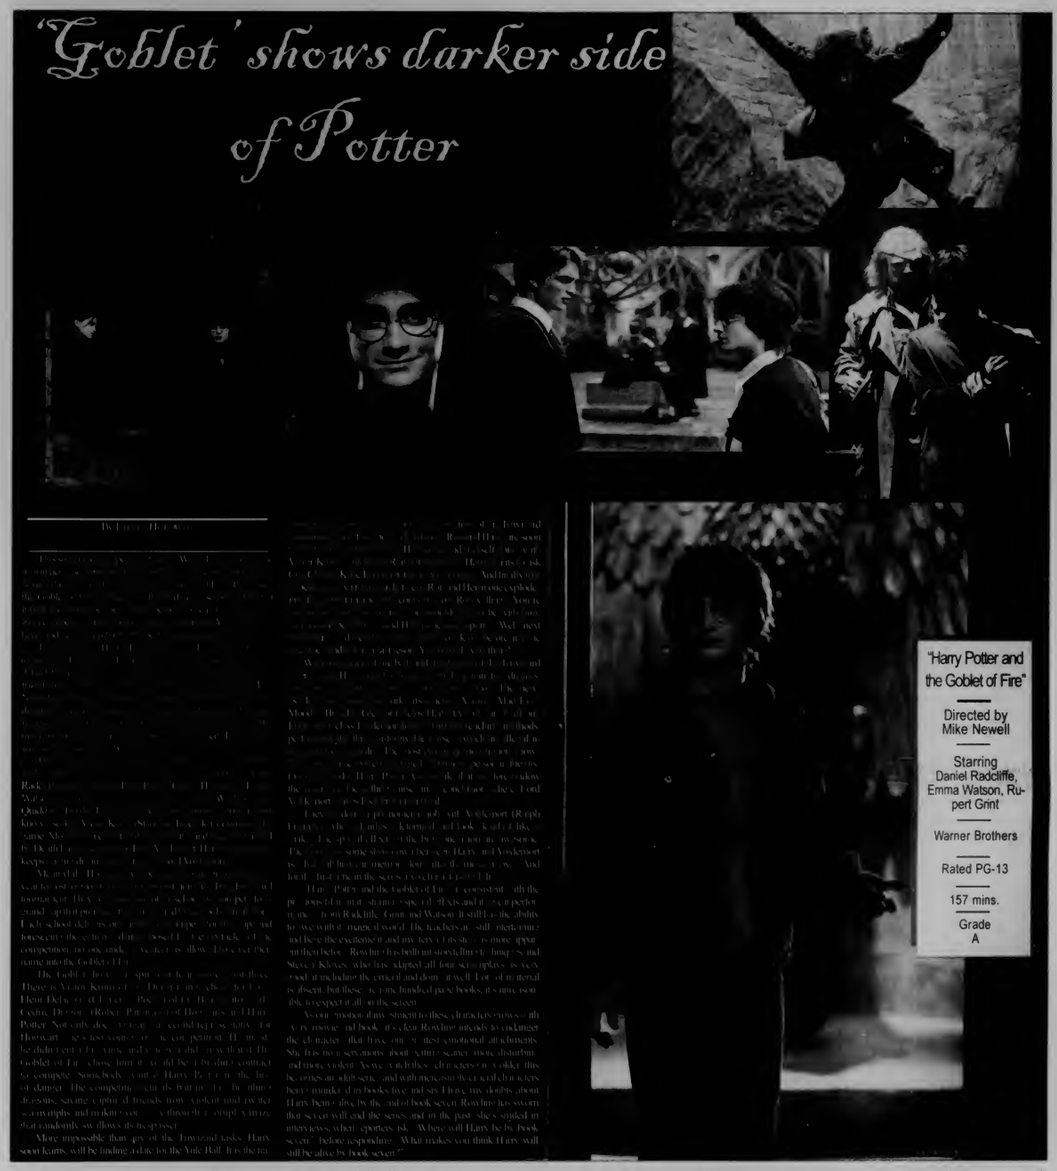
I'm thankful that "Seinfeld" is still syndicated and that "24" is coming back for another season. I'm thankful that some people never want you to change, and I'm equally thankful that there are some people and things for which it's worth changing. I'm thankful that I was born with the opportunities and the willpower to chase my dreams, no matter how impossible they might appear.

And of course, I'm thankful for my family: my brother, probably one of the few kids to play UMass rugby and still manage to preserve enough brain cells to make it into Golden Key; my sister, who, as a freshman, is starring on the soccer field and the classroom at another college down the road; and my parents, who will never cease to amaze me in some way each and every day.

Most of all, I'm thankful that life goes on: no story is every truly finished because new characters will come along, old ones will return, and the surprise happens when you least expect it; life is funny like that. So go home, be cheerful, and enjoy your Thanksgiving, UMass.

Chris Eckel is a Collegian columnist

Do you draw political cartoons? If so, contact the Collegian: editorial@dailycollegian.com



The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

'Goblet' shows darker side of Potter

"Harry Potter and the Goblet of Fire"

Directed by Mike Newell

Starring Daniel Radcliffe, Emma Watson, Rupert Grint

Warner Brothers

Rated PG-13

157 mins.

Grade A

Phoenix takes 'Walk' through covered territory in 'Line'

By Jake Monte
Collegian Staff

The elements are all there – a music legend; a business that abhors imitation; a man finding a new and different voice; a wife whom is the man's second love; his first love, his music; a love interest on the side; a drug problem; a family torn apart; a world of adoring fans; a pivotal moment when he hits rock bottom; a rebirth; a new man; an actor's performance so genuine that it is an Oscar shoe-in.

"Walk the Line"

Directed by James Mangold

Starring Joaquin Phoenix, Reese Witherspoon, Ginnifer Goodwin

Rated PG-13

136 mins.

Grade B

In its initial incarnation "Walk the Line" was called "Ray." Jamie Foxx was the actor Ray Charles was the man whom we all gave two-and-half hours of our time to. And Oscar was the seal of approval on Foxx's stellar performance. History repeats itself. This time Joaquin Phoenix is the actor. Johnny Cash is the man whom we will all give two-and-a-half hours of our time to. And Oscar will be the seal of approval on Joaquin's stellar performance.

The horns this time around is Reese Witherspoon, who plays June Carter, the woman Johnny Cash is hopelessly in love with (not his wife), and her performance is a joy to watch. Johnny meets June the first time he's backstage before a major audience. He sees her from a distance, is attracted to her immediately and collides, literally, with her on purpose. His guitar strap gets caught on her dress – she is about to go on stage – and when she is called to sing, she explains the guitar string predicament to the audience from backstage. It's a perfect introduction to her character. We see that she is fun, charming and vibrant.

For Witherspoon, it is as if she's never acting. She is so genuine it's mesmerizing.

There aren't many other notable differences between "Ray" and "Walk the Line." But there are a few. Cash's relationship with his father, Ray (Robert Patrick), is prominent in the film. In the early scenes, Johnny's brother, an aspiring preacher, dies in a carpentry accident. Johnny, being the rebel who loves music (a trait that is a joke to his father), has to endure his father remarking that the wrong son got killed. Unfortunately, this conflict is brought up twice in the span of the film and the filmmakers spend most of the film focusing on less interesting matters.

It could be argued that the conflict with the father is similar to the conflict that Ray Charles had with his mother, and that the screenwriter of "Walk the Line" simply substituted one for the other. However, it must be noted that it's probably not intentional plagiarism. "Walk the Line" was based on two books written long before "Ray": "Man in Black" and "Cash: The Autobiography."

The second notable difference between "Ray" and "Walk the Line" is that the love story in "Walk the Line" comprises most of the film. Johnny asks June to marry him about a thousand times and he's always turned down. June has gone through a recent and painful divorce and is not quick to jump into love with Johnny. The relationship between Johnny and June is only interesting up to a point. Too often, we feel we're traversing terrain that has already been covered.

Thirdly, "Ray Charles the business man" was a compelling aspect of his personality. We don't see that aspect of Johnny. Contrary to Ray Charles, Johnny conducts himself in a manner that indicates him as not being all that bright – talented, but not possessing business savvy like Charles.

The main problem with the film is that at times it feels mildly dull. There's too much music and when the audience is forced to listen to songs for extended periods of time, the songs don't serve as voice-over to more interesting images. Instead, we are simply made to watch scenes that are parts of concerts.

One time, when Johnny asks June to marry him he tells her, "Okay, but that's the last time I'm asking." "Good," she says, "I hate re-runs." Don't we all. Still, the fact that it is beautifully shot, and mostly well-executed, might be reason enough to let this re-run get by with marginal applause.

20TH CENTURY FOX PICTURES

Johnny Cash (Joaquin Phoenix) and wife June Carter (Reese Witherspoon) are the focus of the love story in James Mangold's "Walk the Line," a biopic that follows Cash's life.

311 brings energy and experimentation to Mullins Center

By Alex Butler
Collegian Correspondent

The night of November 19 started off freezing. A mass of students, all dazed and confused, found their way to the Mullins Center around 7:30 p.m. Girls were in mere t-shirts and tank tops, and some men floated in with just shorts. "What was this?" one might ask. "Why are these crazed students congregating in this loud, obnoxious, unified way?"

The answer is quite simple – and those who had been to previous 311 concerts knew it.

Alien Ant Farm opened the show a tad earlier than was expected, but no one seemed to hold much interest. There were the usual 20 or so die-hard fans that seemed as though they would have taken a bullet for Dryden Mitchell, the band's lead singer. Other than that, the rest of the crowd was somewhat apathetic, and were satisfied with just the loud guitar sounds and booming bass drum. The band had to delay one song, however, when a girl at the front of the stage seemed to have passed out from dehydration. But the band put this bad vibe behind them and decided to poke fun at the girl that had paid $38, already an outrageous amount, to see them. Classy.

The only song the band seemed to have perfected was "Smooth Criminal," because, let's face it, this is the only song the band has going for them. The band knew this and the crowd knew this. And when it finally came on, finishing their set, everyone seemed to have a good time.

At the break, there seemed to be moments of total confusion. Loud groups of male college students hooting uneasily every which way, shameless squawking plugs for the UMass radio station, fretting behind the stage to find where every piece of equipment was and even walking the band onstage via flashlights.

But when the band got up, everyone in the stadium knew it.

311 started off the set with a slow jam, but grew quite rapidly. By the second song, the spirit of the UMass crowd was almost visible. The energy that the band gives off is astonishing, and at points the crowd looked like a mere mass of arms, baseball hats and striped collared shirts. Around the middle of the show, it was questionable whether the hazy cloud of smoke hanging over the crowd was from the smoke machine or man-made, remnants of "the seven-leafed devil".

The need for noise and warmth was met with open arms. At one point, every member of the band was accompanying a drum and high-hat, and for 3 minutes, they doused the crowd with a multi-member drum solo. The focus turned from the vocals to drummer to guitarist.

Musically, when you hear one 311 song, you have basically heard their whole set. It all basically has the same rhythm, repetitive, loud beats and the same kick to it as all the rest. And if one cannot stomach the idea of two vocalists being slightly off for several songs, the idea of 311 might not be your thing.

Weird, instrumental experimenting around the middle of the show did not hit the crowd so well. A quieter 311, stranger and eerier, showed its face at points, and either caught some people off guard or hinted at spots along their new album that would be forgettable.

By the end of the night, no one was cold. The dense floor seats were the most sought-after ones, and it was obvious this was where to heart of the show lay. The show was a hit, but more for the feel of raw energy, while the music stayed much less profound.

All of the members of 311 come to the front of the stage for a full band drum solo, as they did Friday night at the Mullins Center. This was one of the many displays of their intensity and raw energy.

THE SOURCE
(the sors) n. key to discovering the weekly happenings of New England

Compiled by Monica Gleberman

Monday November 21

- Maryland Senator Paul Sarbanes will be speaking in the Isenberg School of Management in the Flavin Auditorium at 9 a.m. U.S. Senator Paul Sarbanes (D-Md.), principal author of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, will be a guest lecturer at the Isenberg School.

- UMass Photography Society Workshops will be open in Isenberg School of Management. UMass Photography Society together with the Index brings you Basic Photography Workshops. The workshop will begin at 7 p.m.

- Power Job Searching Workshop will be in Goodell starting at 12 p.m. This workshop will introduce you to the "mechanics" of submitting resumes online, getting on the interview schedules of your choice and provide helpful advice on the recruiting process.

- "Looking Forward, Looking Back: 1975 – 2005" at the University Gallery will be in the Fine Arts Center. A retrospective lecture series celebrating some of the most notable exhibitions in the Gallery's history. For more information call the FAC at 545-2511.

Tuesday November 22

- Opus One String Ensemble will be performing in the Bezanson Recital Hall at 7:30 p.m. A free concert by UMass Amherst's string chamber orchestra, with Elizabeth Chang, faculty coordinator.

- Cultural Movie Night: "Once Were Warriors" will be playing in Chadbourne starting at 8 p.m. Come join the Native students in the Josephine White Eagle Cultural Center for an evening of movie and discussion.

- Fresh & Sober will be available in the Health Center (UHS) at 5 p.m. Are you a student in recovery from drugs or alcohol? Are you a student questioning your drinking and/or drug use? Then come and check out Fresh & Sober.

- Resume Writing Workshop in Goodell starting at 1 p.m. This workshop offers techniques for developing a strong, clear and concise resume at any time in your career.

Wednesday November 23

- Thanksgiving Prayer Service in the Newman Center, starting at 7 p.m. Fr. Robert Hirschfeld of Grace Episcopal Church preaches at a Thanksgiving prayer service at Newman Catholic Center.

- Thanksgiving Recess begins

WEEKLY PINUP

HAPPY THANKSGIVING

Thanksgiving recess starts on Wednesday afternoon, so enjoy your break from class during the holiday.

Gaming does a full 360

By Steve Shinney
The Utah Statesman

LOGAN, Utah — Well, the basic of the buzz on the X-box 360 is that if you don't already know the buzz, you won't be getting one on Tuesday.

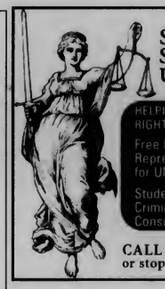
Microsoft has cut the amount that they were originally planning of shipping to each retailer. This, combined with the fact that they're giving all said retailers an order to sell out of the console on the first day, has many believing that Microsoft is trying to create an impression of success and an increased demand for their product.

However this strategy has already upset plenty of gamers who won't be able to get the machine they preordered. Time will tell if this bitterness will remain when more units become available.

For those not familiar with the new X-box, Microsoft is offering two different packages. The basic unit is available for a smaller price, which will allow users to play X-box 360 games, DVDs, CDs and that's about it. Players wanting to play games from the original X-box or play games over the X-box Live network will have to buy the more expensive package that includes a hard drive and Ethernet cable, among other things.

While the screen shots and trailers for the X-box 360 games look amazing, according to the specs, a lot of the new graphical capabilities will require a high-definition television to take full advantage of them.

Basically, if you have the money and you have the opportunity and you're OK with buying a system that has a meager supply of games, go ahead and buy. Otherwise, you might want to wait for the prices to drop or the Nintendo Revolution to hit the shelves.



The Massachusetts Daily COLLEGIAN

The Daily Collegian has job openings for the following positions:

-Managing Editor
-Night/Copy Supervisor
-Arts Editor
-Assistant Arts Editor
-Photographers

These are PAID positions! Applications are due before Thanksgiving break. Pick them up at the Collegian in the Campus Center basement.

Daily Collegian

STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE UMASS, AMHERST

HELPING STUDENTS PROTECT THEIR RIGHTS FOR 30 YEARS

Free Legal Advice, Referrals Representation and Counseling for UMASS Students

Student & Workers Rights, Family & Criminal Law, Landlord/Tenant & Consumer Disputes

CALL 545-1995
or stop in at 922 Campus Center

Delivery:
413.549.0077
Tel: 413.256.8923
413.256.8924
Fax: 413.253.1173

103 N. Pleasant St.
Amherst, MA

Panda East
Fine Chinese & Japanese Cuisine

Featuring:
- Vegetarian options
- Lunch Specials
- Sushi Bar
- "Light and Healthy" entrees

~ We Bring China Town to you ~
Semester Special

Bring in this ad and receive 10% off your total

*Cannot be combined with any offers, coupons or OCMP.

visit us at: www.pandaeastamherst.com

O.A.R. 'Conquered' the Mullins Center on Thursday night

By Allie Roth
Collegian Staff

Smoke rose up from the Mullins Center Thursday night as O.A.R. performed with special guest Mr. North.

First, the lead singer of O.A.R., Marc Roberge, introduced Mr. North, an Irish rock band who was reminiscent of Incubus. They played a 45-minute set and the crowd reacted aptly to their often danceable tunes.

As Mr. North's set was finishing up, the Mullins Center started to fill with last minute stragglers. When it was time for O.A.R. to come on stage, the entire arena was filled with college students and other local fans. They played a two-hour set filled with old songs and new songs. With each song, the crowd sang along. The Mullins Center truly erupted in the positive energy that O.A.R. employs in their live show. Everyone danced along and sang in unison. There were times of jam-like rhythm guitar and bass solos. The band often handed the lyrical responsibilities to the audience because it seemed clear that they knew all the words. There were a few sequences of slower songs that prompted swaying and lighters and cell phones to be taken out. There was something for everyone, and that is where O.A.R. always succeeds during their live shows.

During their set, they played such favorites as "Black Rock," "Delicate Few," "Conquering Fools," "Hold on True," "Night Shift" and other songs. O.A.R. employed their rock image and sound by playing songs from their new CD, "Stories of a Stranger," and often going into electric guitar solos. Most noticeably, the crowd erupted in cheers during the opening riff of "Love and Memories." They sang to every single word and members of O.A.R. almost seemed surprised that everyone knew the words to their new single that had come out only a few weeks before. The same reaction occurred during other new songs, like "Wonderful Day" and "Dakota."

In typical O.A.R. fashion, they played a cover of U2's "Sunday Bloody Sunday," which was up to par with the original recording. It was prefaced by Marc saying something to the effect of, "Every time we come to New England, we always feel as if we need to play this song, even though it isn't even recorded by us."

Most exciting was their performance of "That Was a Crazy Game of Poker" that lasted longer than most songs could last without getting boring. It was met with loud cheers and perfectly unison singing along. Lead singer Marc got a chance to take a break when he was able to hand the spotlight to the audience who sang a whole verse accompanied by the rest of the band. In addition, the band departed from the song in order to go into an interlude of the song "No Woman, No Cry," by Bob Marley. The vibe of this song fit the atmosphere that was contained in the Mullins Center perfectly.

After what seemed like their last song, the band left the stage but came back when the crowd started to chant, "O-A-R. O-A-R." They played "Dakota" and then ended with "Hey Girl." The band thanked everyone for coming and then left the stage. The crowd felt fulfilled and tired after an intense, two hour set.

It seems obvious that many of the non-fans became fans after their energetic set. It seems even more obvious that, on the way back to their dorms, the UMass students would sing the words to the songs that would be stuck in their head all night long. Further, many of the kids surely planned to be "that guy" and wear the O.A.R. shirt that they bought at the concert to class the next day. As everyone was leaving the venue, the happiness on the faces of everyone coming out pointed to the fact that the concert was something of a revolution and the perfect Thursday night unwinding activity. Observable smiles and O.A.R. t-shirts everywhere, the fans really did "hold on true."

O.A.R. played at the Mullins Center on Thursday night to promote their newest album, "Stories of a Stranger."

A mature Arnold

By Daniel Fienberg
Zap2it.com

Pop Doppler
Jacqueline Ronan

LOS ANGELES — On the surface, Frank McKee, the character played by Tom Arnold in Don Roos' "Happy Endings," looks like a bit of a chump. A wealthy widower, Frank lavishes gifts on young, attractive women hoping for companionship, or even love.

"It seemed to make perfect sense to me why somebody would do that," says Arnold, who freely admits that he took his current wife to Gucci on their first date. "To normal people, it would be like 'What is he trying to do? Is he trying to show off? Is he trying to buy somebody's affections?'"

Arnold insists that Frank isn't supposed to be a victim, even if he falls head over heals into the clutches of Maggie Gyllenhaal's Jude, a grifter who thinks nothing of bedding both Frank and his gay son Otis (Jason Ritter). While the relationship between Frank and Jude develops into something deeper, it begins with that most rare of cinematic moments, a sex scene featuring Tom Arnold.

"Don's a prude," notes the "Soul Plane" thespian. "He writes the stuff and says, 'Oh boy, you guys figure it out.' I said, 'Well, here's how it's going to go, I'm gonna be on the bottom, because of my stomach.' And Maggie's like, 'Don't worry. I'm in charge. My character's strong in this scene, my character's a pursuer.'"

The result is a sequence that's ultimately more intimate than graphic, though Arnold warns that it could have been worse.

"He shot it a little more graphically, but the movie did not require as much nudity, which is good for me."

For filmgoers accustomed to seeing Arnold as a loud-mouthed goofball or a wisecracking sidekick, "Happy Endings" suggests a different side. Like his other 2005 release, the semi-autobiographical "The Kid & I," "Happy Endings" finds Arnold skipping the shtick in favor of an underplayed Everyman persona.

"Nothing is really calculated," claims Arnold of his recent career choices. "I think you just do your best and show up and meet directors. I know that nobody can get me jobs. I have no control over the results of things. But to be in a position to do something different, the people around you have to believe that it's possible for you to do something different."

Of course, when you pair Arnold up with Steven Seagal ("Exit Wounds") or Arnold Schwarzenegger ("True Lies"), box office sometimes follows. The same could not be said for "Happy Endings," a bittersweet dark comedy.

"It's a movie about relationships," Arnold says. "It's not a movie about the future, there's no warlocks and witches, there's no special effects. It's not what they call a tentpole movie. There's no superheroes. There's a bunch of sort of gray characters — they're not black and white."

Released as a midsummer alternative to the Hollywood blockbusters, "Happy Endings" never really caught on, taking in just over $1.3 million and never playing in more than 75 theaters. If patriotism is the last refuge of the scoundrel, Arnold knows that DVD can be the last refuge for mature movies about relationships.

"It's funny how this business is," he says, not laughing. "You just have to accept that if you want a lot of people to see you in a movie, there are different kinds of movies to do. I think a lot of times the best, the more intimate stuff, is the stuff that maybe not a ton of people will see. That's why I'm glad the DVD is coming out."

"Happy Endings" is now out on video and DVD.

Is innocence being sacrificed for entertainment?

Very few movies have the ability to be enjoyed by a wide range of audiences. When many different members of society can appreciate the same film, it usually is a mega hit. Those who hate violence and crime make an exception for "The Godfather," people who can't stand sci-fi love "Star Wars" and folks who cringe at the idea of sitting through a period drama own a copy of "Titanic."

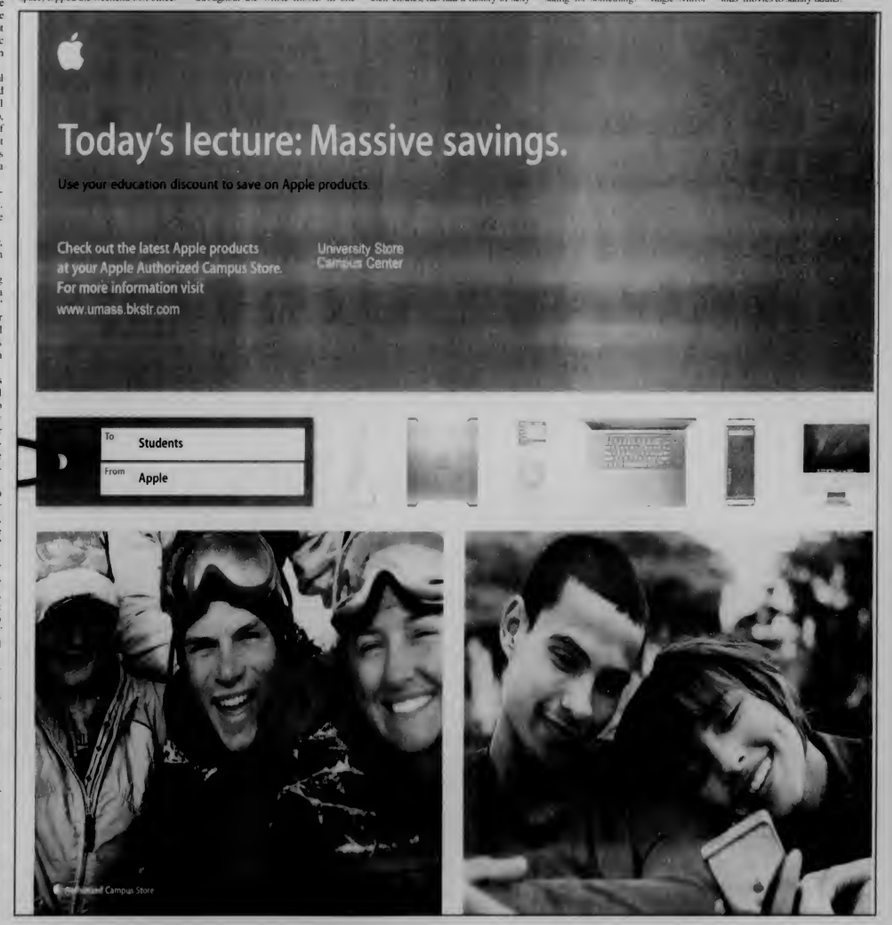
But movies that most often reach the widest audiences are family films. Last year, five out of the top ten movies were rated PG. According to the Internet Movie Database, "Shrek 2" is the second highest grossing movie of all time. This week "Chicken Little" (a revamped CGI version of the childrens' classic) and "Zathura" ("Jumanji" in space) topped the weekend box office.

Many parents have complained that "Chicken Little" features far too much violence for a G-rated movie. The movie features aliens with "death ray" guns that maliciously vaporize townsfolk. Later in the film, it is revealed that everyone is okay, but the idea of killing characters off (especially in an animated movie) upset many theatergoers.

But this is not an isolated incident. A series of Harvard studies found that sex, violence and profanity steadily increased in children's movies from 1992 to 2003. Other taboos, like alcohol and tobacco products, have been featured in more than half of all G-rated movies. Subjects that would have pushed a movie up one rating twenty years ago now slip past the Motion Picture Association of America more and more often.

Last year's "The Incredibles" featured a body count higher than most action movies. There are over 90 explosions and almost 650 gunshots fired throughout the whole movie. In one scene, the "Incredible" youngsters have to battle the evil and indistinguishable henchmen whose orders are to kill. Young Violet and Dash end up using their superpowers to violently kill them instead. Another scene features the villain shooting down an airplane with the full knowledge there are children on board.

But violence in cartoons is nothing new. Elmer Fudd shot Daffy Duck on a regular basis. He did not just hit him over the head with a frying pan or throw him off a cliff, but shot him with a double-barrel shotgun in the face. At the very worst, Daffy simply readjusted his beak and wiped off the gunpowder. Not many survive that particular injury — human or duck.



Sex, as well, has also crept its way into animation. Betty Boop may have sported a short skirt, but today female characters are practically required to show their navel. Disney, when not writing the letters S-E-X in a dust cloud or asking good teenagers to take off their clothes, has had a history of sexy leading ladies. "The Little Mermaid's" Ariel was decked out in a clamshell bikini top while "Aladdin's" Princess Jasmine wore a bra and low-cut pants, which is such an accurate reflection of her Arab/Muslim culture.

Sexual innuendo has also been "popping up" in kids' movies in recent years. Studios make sure that they are way over kids' heads and that there's no way they could get them. In "Toy Story 2," Buzz Lightyear's wings erect open after seeing a female character.

This year's "Robots" features a scene in which the robot dad misses the literal delivery of his new son through the mail. The robot mom, however, tells him, "Making the baby's the fun part," referring to the actual construction of the baby, but adult viewers caught the other reference.

But by far, the "Shrek" franchise is packed with sexual innuendos along with profanity. After approaching the villain's very large castle, Shrek utters, "Do you think he's maybe compensating for something?" Magic Mirror says, "Although she lives with seven other men, she's not easy," to describe Snow White. Pinocchio secretly wears lacy thongs. Small World-style puppets gleefully sing, "Please keep off of the grass/Shine your shoes/Wipe your ... face." Before going to rescue Donkey, Shrek yells out, "Well, I have to save my ass."

They may be over their heads, but should erection jokes really need to be slipped into animated movies? Furthermore, why do there have to be explosions and gunfights to heighten the excitement? Filmmakers do this because they want to sell tickets to kids, as well as adults. They know that parents are more likely to bring their children to family movies that interest and entertain them also. That's why no one saw "Barney's Great Adventure." No parent could stomach a 20-foot Barney for an hour-and-a-half. Sure "Shrek" and "The Incredibles" are great movies, but is it fair to sacrifice innocence in kids' movies to satisfy adults?

Season comes to a halt

FOOTBALL from page 10

the second half, and it was a big play that shifted the momentum their way.

On third down and nine yards from the Hofstra 42-yard line, Clarkson stepped back and used the protection to launch a 51 yard bomb to Colston, who was streaking down the right sideline.

Two plays later, Crenshaw took the ball to the left side and cut up for the five yard TD. The Pride opted to go for two points and got it with a Crenshaw run up the middle. The score put Hofstra up 14-7, and was not what UMass coach Doon Brown wanted to see after the halftime break.

"The reality was it was 7-6 at the half, we needed to finish the game and execute in the second half and we didn't do it," Brown said.

The Minutemen threatened with a 23-yard field goal by Armando Cuko, which cut the Pride lead down to 14-10, but on the very next series, the Hofstra passing game proved to be too much.

Clarkson threw a pass 64 yards down the left sideline to Colston, who caught his seventh pass of the game and Crenshaw ran for the TD, giving Hofstra a 21-10 lead.

A potential comeback by UMass was cut short, and so was its season as time expired on the clock.

KAREN WINGER/COLLEGIAN

Freshman Armando Cuko kicked a 23-yard field goal during the UMass football team's 21-10 loss on Saturday.

The game was owned by Hofstra throughout the afternoon, but London was able to keep the contest close, and tied a record in the process. His 13 catches were the most in UMass history, and his 122 receiving yards led the team.

Coen, who left the game due to injury, was the one who connected with London during the game, and finished completing 19-of-30 passes for 204 yards.

The game marks the last one for the seniors on the team, and while the underclassmen have next season to look forward to, the seniors will remember this game as the final one of their college careers.

"I feel really bad for the seniors, cause we thought this was going to be the year, but we fell up short," Cobbs said "[The seniors] accomplished some things and got some things done, but we also wanted to end it on a good note."

Minutewomen keep control

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

More than any other sport, basketball is dictated by momentum. Success on the hardwood can be attained by having intensity, and talented teams can be overcome by the ones who are first to hit the floor after a loose ball.

When the Massachusetts women's basketball team played Holy Cross yesterday at the Mullins Center, it was a battle for control of the game, and while it swayed between the two teams often, UMass had a handle on the game from the start.

The Minutewomen jumped out to a 15-3 lead on the backs of some lights-out shooting by redshirt senior Katie Nelson and senior Ashley Sharpton (who had nine points on three treys in the first half).

UMass was getting whatever shots it wanted, executing perfect sets and getting easy baskets off the fast break.

But that all changed after Holy Cross coach Bill Gibbons called timeout with his team down 12 points early in the first half.

The Crusaders came out of the timeout a different team, pressuring Nelson in the backcourt, switching defenses and trapping players in the corners. They forced a lot of turnovers and – with the help of prolific fouling by the Minutewomen – went on an 11-1 run to cut the UMass lead to three.

The Minutewomen then went on a 5-0 run, followed by an 8-0 run by the Crusaders.

UMass led 21-20 with less than five minutes remaining in the first half, and the Minutewomen had a tenuous hold on the lead for the rest of the game.

UMass coach Marnie Dacko commented on UMass' struggle to pull away from the Crusaders.

"They picked up the defensive heat and we're more reluctant to attack," she said. "We're a young group and we're still trying to find our identity. We've got to learn to manage the game, manage the clock, manage the score. We have some leadership that can build on that and they have to work it out on the floor."

"We were so pumped and ready to go and then we saw that we had lead I feel like we just relaxed a little bit to try and ease into our game," sophomore Pam Rosanio said after playing 39 of 40 minutes. "But then [Holy Cross] picked it up so we were caught off guard."

The Crusaders hung with the Minutewomen for the whole 40 minutes, and there wasn't a point in the game when it seemed that UMass would pull away.

But whenever the game got tight, the Minutewomen came up with the big play that kept the Crusaders from pulling even and tipping the momentum over to their side.

"I felt that if we had tied them or if we had went ahead then we would have won the game," Gibbons said. "It takes so much to come back that it's hard to [keep coming back]. We just expended so much energy."

It didn't help Gibbons' cause that the Minutewomen got a favorable home court bounce down the stretch.

UMass was ahead by two points after two fortunate defensive sequences, where Holy Cross had two open three pointers to take the lead. After the second of the two threes missed, the Minutewomen set up on the offensive end.

They ran a broken play that ended with a shot from sophomore Alisha Tatham from 12 feet out on the left side of the court.

The ball hit the left side of the rim and was clearly short, but, miraculously, it bounced straight up and went in, giving the Minutewomen a four-point lead and taking the air out of Holy Cross' comeback.

"I had turned and thought we were breaking and somehow it went in," Gibbons recalled. "Maybe that's a home court roll."

It was deflating for the Crusaders, and a bounce that couldn't have come at a better time for UMass, as it effectively took away any momentum that Holy Cross had built up over the last minutes trying to tie the game.

It seemed that UMass had come up with those plays, whether intentional or unintentional, throughout the game, featuring charges taken by junior Tamara Tatham and Sharpton, and hustle plays (T. Tatham diving on the floor for a loose ball down the stretch and calling timeout to save the possession) that kept the Crusaders from tying the game.

Freeman leads the way for UM

HOOPS from page 10

last season after transferring from Hofstra.

With 7:56 remaining and the game tied at 49, UMass went on a 13-3 run that ended with Maxwell's three. Lowe played a big part in the spurt, hitting a tough leaner as the shot clock wound down on one possession, and then driving and kicking the ball out to Maxwell for the trey on the following possession.

"Coach just told me to play my game and play defense, and everything else would fall in place," Lowe said.

Lowe finished the game with eight points, five rebounds and four assists.

While the Minutemen were able to muster enough offense to get the win, it was the defense that carried them, as starters Maxwell, Art Bowers and Brandon Thomas combined for just nine points.

"Right now we need to hang our hat on defense," Ford said. "Our offense can come and go, but defense is something we can play every night."

For Ford and the Minutemen the focus is now on tomorrow's game at Davidson, but they were able to savor Friday's win briefly.

"We still have a long way to go," Ford said. "It's one win, but we enjoy every win because they're so hard to get."

UMass victorious at Mullins

W. HOOPS from page 10

Minutewomen back to the .500 mark.

The Maroon and White came out strong, going on a 15-0 run after Holy Cross opened the game with a quick three-pointer.

As much as Dacko may have wanted her team to build on an early 15-3 lead, Holy Cross came back late in the first half with a 7-0 run to bring the Crusaders within one point of the Minutewomen with 3:16 to play until the half.

The Minutewomen went into halftime with a 29-24 lead over the Crusaders thanks to a deep three point field goal by senior guard Ashley Sharpton with 29 seconds remaining.

UMass was able to survive a late first half comeback by Holy Cross, as well as a brief power outage during halftime.

Dacko addressed her team at the half, and the Minutewomen were able to retain their focus.

"We want to run," Dacko said. "We want to keep running. Our team is good if we are getting transition baskets, and then we will focus on getting the ball inside. They were just showing a zone, and were going right into man-to man coverage every time. We just needed to get the ball inside, and try to get some post presence and get to the foul line."

Dacko's halftime speech must have worked because the Minutewomen came out with 16 points in the paint in the second half. Unlike their first game, it was the turnovers that benefited the Minutewomen. Turnovers forced, that is.

UMass had 20 of its 64 points off of turnovers, and Dacko could not have been happier.

"I am thrilled," Dacko said. "I wanted to change it up. I wanted to put a half-court press on them. I wanted to mix it up into a zone, but why change something that is not broke. If we are converting off of an open floor, then we are doing our job."

The Crusaders stayed in the game throughout the remainder of regulation, but the Minutewomen were able to hold-on to win the game, while never losing the lead once they got it early in the first half.

Leading the way for the Minutewomen in their first win of the season was sophomore Pam Rosanio, who finished the game with 15 points, 9 rebounds and 4 assists.

Rosanio played 39 minutes in yesterday's win, but she knows how to handle the pressure of being looked upon to step up in a big-game situation.

"I knew I just had to keep going," Rosanio said. "For the minutes that I get, I have to pace myself sometimes so I do not go crazy and keep playing. If we need a rebound, I want to be the person to get that rebound. If we need a bucket, I want to make sure that I can get one for the team."

While Dacko would like to find some time to rest Rosanio, her presence on the court is much-needed for the Maroon and White.

"She is a gamer," Dacko said. "Pam is a gritty player. I want the rest of the team to pick up on her grittiness and toughness because when it comes down to game time, she is somebody that puts it on the line and is willing to go. She works hard. She is not a pretty player by any stretch. She is not finesse, but she gets things done."

Swim teams record first loss

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

After starting off the season with a bang, the Massachusetts swimmers and divers arrived at West Point Friday night and met boom.

Facing two squads that matched up differently to the Maroon and White talent-wise, the Minutemen suffered a 178.5-64.5 loss to the Army Cadets while the women fought neck-and-neck with Army and in the end just barely faltered, losing 123-120.

Army's men remain unbeaten in the 2005-06 season at 4-0 (3-0 Patriot League), while UMass' men fall to 3-1. For the women, both Army and UMass stand at 3-1.

In spite of a loss, Newcomb was pleased with the performance of his girls, who were upended in the second-to-last meet of the day.

"I was very pleased with the way we performed," he said. "We raced well, the meet was back and forth whole time, they finally pulled out the win on that last relay. We just couldn't pull out the win."

Army's women won the last two events to come from behind in the victory. Erin Hanley took the 200 yard breaststroke and Kim DeFiori placed in second to give the Cadets 13 points in the event, compared with the Minutewomen's six points on laps by Jackie Porter, Melissa Stango and Corey Tawczynski.

Then in the last event for women on the day, the 400-yard freestyle relay, the Cadets pulled out the victory after being down several points to UMass. Army placed first and third in the event, garnering 13 points, while the foursome of Liz Lovejoy, Allison Volpe, Nicole Lebarge and Aimee Bourassa came in second – good enough for four points.

"I'm confident in our performance," Newcomb said. "You do your best and do everything you can. You can't control what anybody else does. That's way we approach meet, just go in and do your own business. You can't do anything more than that."

A week after racking up Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week honors, Karen Upperco followed up with yet another win in the three-meter dive. The freshman and New Jersey native took up a score of 270.75 for first place in the event. She also placed second in the one-meter dive with a score of 241.8.

The men, however, were not so fortunate. Only one event was won on the entire day by the Minutewomen, the one-meter dive. An event that he has won at every meet this season, R.J. Rappe outlasted Ryan McDaniel by a score of 248.03-241.33. Rappe placed in second in his other forte, the three-meter dive, falling to Doug Klein 281.03-270.38.

"R.J. stayed up here all summer so he could train," UMass coach Russ Yarworth said. "I can't say enough about him, he's so dedicated."

Yarworth credited the depth of Army, and their different level of training, to the dominance displayed by the Cadets. "They were a little more prepared," Yarworth said. "They definitely had more depth. They are in their rest period getting ready for Navy, so they're in a different part of their training cycle. With me having very young team, the kids are very tired right now."

Minutemen place 19th overall

By Joey White
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's cross-country team ended its season Saturday at Van Cortlandt Park in New York, as it placed 19 out of 20 teams in the IC4A Championship.

There were up to 43 division one schools in the Bronx for the meet, which were broken down into two divisions. The Minutemen were in the top division, which was won by Duke University with 98 points, followed by Cornell (112) and Notre Dame (127). The Maroon and White with 505 points only defeated Maryland (554). The last time UMass ran this meet was in 2001 where it placed third in the second division.

This meet was brought back into the schedule, along with others like the Paul Short and Penn State invitationals, to strengthen the schedule and to get the runners to start aspiring to higher competition.

"We had a veteran group and a young group," UMass coach Ken O'Brien said. "This team was ready to take a step towards a higher level of competition. And you wouldn't want to bring younger kids into a schedule like that without the leadership that we had."

The Minutemen were without its top-runner, sophomore Nils Fischer, who suffered an ankle injury earlier in the week.

"When you lose your number one runner, you lose at least 20 percent of your scoring," O'Brien said.

Filling in Fischer's shoes and crossing the line first was freshman Jesse Regnier, this marks the first time in his career that he has finished first among UMass runners as he finished 71 out of 174 runners scoring a time of 26:21. Second for the Minutemen was senior John Korhonen, who missed most of the season battling mononucleosis, but was able to grab the 97 spot.

"Korhonen had a great race, coming from being our eighth runner to our second runner," O'Brien said. "Losing our number one runner [Korhonen] was a big blow when he was diagnosed with mono week before school started."

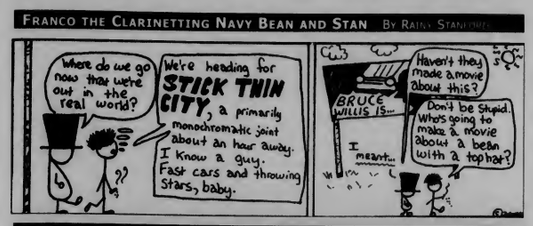
In the 126 overall spot, and third among the Minutemen, was junior Aaron Strellner with a time of 26:59. O'Brien said that Strellner "came on very well in the last month of season."

Rounding off the top runners for the Maroon and White were seniors Ryan Corbett and Andy McCarron who finished 132 and 133, respectively.

As for the season as a whole, O'Brien said that they had a lot of potential to be a good team, but they had to readjust their goals when realizing that they had to run their season without their number one runner. O'Brien stated that Korhonen was the one guy on the Minutemen squad that couldn't be replaced.

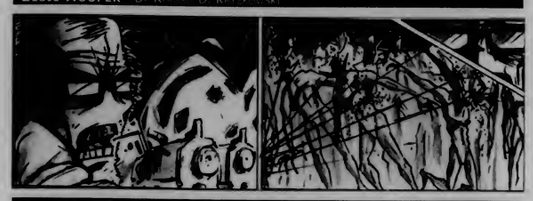
"[We are] disappointed that we weren't able to realize our preseason goals, but [we] did a great job with the goals we had to readjust," O'Brien said. "I think we made big steps. We were a better team this year than last year, and a better team at end of season than we were last season."

Regency Hair Stylists
"Get a new look for fall"
$ 5.00 OFF a haircut
Monday - Thursday
Bring this ad
and your Student ID.
Call for an appointment or stop by the salon
253 - 9526
189 N. Pleasant St
Amherst, MA 01002



If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!
POTTERS AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL
Insurance Replacement Rates
FREE PICK-UP
• Direct Billing to Insurance Company
• Locally Owned & Operated
• 7 & 15 Passenger Vans
• UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates
North Amherst Motors
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
(413) 549-RENT (7368)
www.northamherstmotors.com
(One mile North of UMass - on bus route)
Collision Repairs & Glass Replacement

Monday-Friday 7:30-6
Thursday 7:30-8
Saturday 7:30-4
SATURN.
Saturn of Hadley
40 Russell St, Route 9
Hadley, MA 01035
(413) 584-6066
Our service center repairs all kinds of cars...not just Saturns.
Oil & Filter Change Only $19.99
Includes topping off all fluids, adjusting tire pressures, Check antifreeze for winter protection.
FREE wash & vacuum. FREE 27 point inspection.
• Mass State Inspection Station
• Free shuttle service to & from UMASS
• Located directly on bike path & PVTA stop.
No Appointment Needed
10% off mechanical repairs
Late hours on Thursdays



BOSTON BARTENDERS SCHOOL of AMERICA
WANT A HOT JOB?
Learn to be a Professional Bartender!
Classes Starting Now!
Boston Bartenders School
218 Memorial Avenue • West Springfield
1-800-357-3210
www.bostonbartender.com

ROADHOUSE C•A•F•E
"WHERE BAY ROAD MEETS ROUTE 9"
A Healthy Place To Eat!
The Roadhouse Cafe features
· Organic fruits and vegetables
· Healthy and nutritious homemade meals
· Custom-baked cakes
Mention this ad and receive $1.00 off a breakfast special!
Sit by our cozy fire, enjoy great food, relax, and catch up on some reading. We are happy to serve you. The sky's the limit!
OPEN: Monday-Friday 6 to noon; Sat.-Sun. 7 to 2 p.m.
BELCHERTOWN, MA • 323-6175

FRANCO THE CLARINETTING NAVY BEAN AND STAN By Randy Stanzione

ELSIE HOOPER By Robert D. Kirkowski

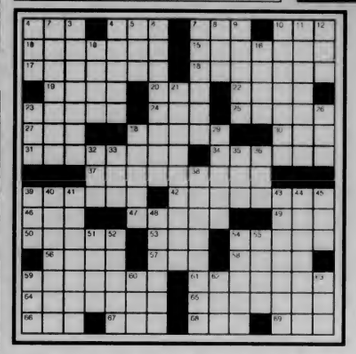
JACK DOGG By Xander Rhodes

PAUL By B... O'Kelley

THE ZOO By Gabe Strine

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"When you think about it, what did I really do? I crossed an imaginary line with a bunch of plants."



—Blow

Find today's answers online

www.dailycollegian.com

Submit your comic!
e-mail
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You will be very unhappy when you realize you don't own a pencil sharpener.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
You are quite generous when it comes to skittles.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Instead of doing homework, decorate your room with magazine cut-outs.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
You should really cut back on your use of incense.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
You are having an excellent hair day today.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
You will get a good night's sleep tonight.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You would probably enjoy piano lessons.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
It might be worth it to spend a little extra time on that paper.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
You would do much better academically if you didn't own a TV.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You would be happier with a nice set of scented markers.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
You will feel better if you drink water instead of soda today.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Don't forget your snowsuit when you return on Sunday.

New in Town?
Amherst' Hairstylists
Caren's Place
You can trust us with your hair.
40 Main St.
Downtown Amherst
(Next to Newbury Comics)
413 253 1200
Mon-Fri 10-6
Sat 10-4
Visa/MC/JS
This Ad Will Run Mon & Thurs
•Haircuts & Styling
•Hair Coloring (Free Highlighting Consultation)
•Multi-Color Highlighting
•Body & Facial Waxing
•For Both Men & Women
•Walk-Ins Welcome!
Get it done right the first time!
Fall Semester Coupon Specials!
1/2 price facial waxing on Wed through December.
$1 off any service with this ad until 12/05
Only with this coupon
www.carensplace.com

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Montreal Weekend New Years Party $129 Complete cocktail age 18 781-979-9001 Call now montrealexpress.net

APARTMENT FOR RENT

1, 2, 3 & 4 Bedroom spacious apartments, Great location, Bus Route, All utilities included No Fee Call 413-253-3000

EMPLOYMENT

Mystery Shoppers get paid to shop! Up to $150 a day. Training provided Call 1-800-690-1273

EMPLOYMENT

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

Rent us your ears! Listening experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu Voicemail: 545-6837.

ROOMMATE WANTED

Apartment in Presidential looking for one or two roommates for spring semester male or female 781-608-1051

SERVICES

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance. 549-1906

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

TRAVEL

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

ACT NOW – SPRING BREAKERS Book early & Save! Free meals/parties by 11/7. Lowest prices. Be a rep & TRAVEL FREE! Get the ultimate hookups with STA TRAVEL 413-256-1261.

WANTED

GET PAID VIEWING ADS ON THE INTERNET: $6,000/mo. Potential. START TODAY!! www.ezmoney.FindHere.org

WANTED: YOUR ADS!

Whether you are selling something, looking to hire new employees, or hoping to increase your customer base, The Massachusetts Daily Collegian can help!

Call 413-545-3500
to speak with an experienced ad rep or to place a classified ad.

Business hours are M-F 8:30am-3:30pm.

WANTED

WANTED: COLLEGIAN EMPLOYEES

The Collegian is hiring paid positions for the spring semester.

Open positions include: Managing Editor, Night and Copy Supervisor, as well as positions in Arts and Living, Editorial and Opinion, photography and graphics.

Come to the Campus Center basement to apply, or call (413) 545-3500.

Applications close November 23, 2005.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTSMONDAY

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Minutemen down and out

UMass playoff hopes dashed

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

The clock hit 0:00 as junior receiver Brandon London was tackled on the sidelines and the Hofstra Pride football team (7-4 5-3 Atlantic 10) erupted with elation.

Running onto the field following the end of the contest, the Pride had beaten the Massachusetts football team (7-4 6-2 A-10) 21-10, and consequently prevented it from reaching playoff contention on Saturday.

This dramatic ending to the Minuteman season, which took place at Shuart Stadium in Hempstead, N.Y., was a result of a fired up Hofstra team that was able to contain UMass enough to edge the tournament hopeful squad.

"It's very frustrating, especially for me right now as a senior," UMass tailback R.J. Cobbs said. "Knowing that's my last game and knowing that we'll never be able to make the playoffs, it's very frustrating."

With a victory, the Minutemen would have earned a spot in the Division I-AA playoff bracket, which was released yesterday, along with a share of the Atlantic 10 championship. The Minutemen will have to pack it up and look towards the 2006 season.

Although the contest resulted in an 11-point advantage for Hofstra, the game was tight throughout the majority of the afternoon.

The Pride came out on top to begin the game, but it wasn't before the UMass defense stole points away from them first. Driving on its opening possession after UMass went three and out, the Hofstra offense moved into Minuteman territory on a 27 yard run by Terry Crenshaw.

Following a false start penalty, quarterback Anton Clarkson decided to take a shot at the UMass secondary with a heave into the endzone, but junior Tracy Belton read the play perfectly and stepped in front of the receiver and picked the ball off.

The Pride regained possession after UMass was unable to progress past the Hofstra 48-yard line, and put together the first full drive of the game, which was capped off by a 42 yard field goal by kicker Rob Zarrilli.

Another field goal by Zarrilli partway through the second quarter left the Minutemen with a 6-0 score, and the UMass offense walked onto the field after the kick-off looking to get anything going.

On the first third down of the series, quarterback Liam Coen dropped back and threw a designed screen pass to London, who zipped up the sideline 11 yards for the first down.

Two rushes by junior tailback Steve Baylark left the Minutemen with another third down and they brought in multifunctional tailback Cobbs prior to the start of the third down play. Coen threw to Cobbs, who was running an out route, and as the Hofstra cornerback tried to jump the pattern, Cobbs caught the pass and took it 22 yards down the right sideline.

Baylark received the hand-off on the next two plays and picked up a total of 14 yards, and a quick pass to tight end Chris Hopkins brought up a third down and five from the Pride 14-yard line.

With Coen calling an audible at the line of scrimmage, he dropped back and lofted a pass to 6-foot-4 London, who leapt into the air to snag the pass at the 5-yard line of Hofstra.

On the very next play Batlark was given the handoff up the middle. As the hole quickly closed up, Baylark bounced it out to the right side and found enough room to cut up the middle and into the endzone, giving UMass the 7-6 lead.

That was the final time the Minutemen would see the lead, however, and despite Hofstra going into the locker room down, it came out in the third quarter without wasting any time.

The Pride were able to take the lead right back from the Minutemen during their opening drive of

See FOOTBALL on page 8

KAREN WINGFIELD/COLLEGIAN

Senior R.J. Cobbs played his final college football game on Saturday as UMass fell to Hofstra 21-10. The Minutemen needed a win to advance into the playoffs, but fell short to the Pride.

UM opens up season with win

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

Travis Ford was hired as the coach of the Massachusetts men's basketball team to do one thing – win. And despite a shaky start, the Minutemen were able to hold off a pesky Hartford squad 67-62, and deliver a win in Ford's first game.

Rashaun Freeman's 25 points and solid contributions off the bench from Jeff Viggiano and Chris Lowe put UMass (1-0) in position to pull out the hard-fought victory in front of 6,488 fans at the Mullins Center on Friday night.

UMass appeared to be in control when Maurice Maxwell drained a three-pointer with 2:29 left, giving UMass a 62-52 advantage, but Hartford (0-1) responded with a 7-0 run to pull within three points.

A Stephane Lasme block on a dunk attempt by Hartford's Kenny Adeleke with 25 seconds left, and free throws by Maxwell and Lowe down the stretch enabled the Minutemen to escape with the victory.

"I'm glad it's over," Ford said. "We survived. I thought we came out very tense, and I was probably one of the leading candidates for being the most tense."

All of the Minutemen looked tense early on, as first game jitters and Hartford's zone led to a slow start.

While UMass struggled through a 5:49 scoring drought midway through the first half, Hartford opened up a 20-12 lead that would have been worse for the Minutemen if not for Viggiano's (nine first half points, 14 total) contributions off the bench.

"We could have been down 12 or 14 if it wasn't for Jeff," Ford said of the team's lone senior. "He gave us some energy, he scored around the basket and he was rebounding. He acted like a guy who was going out there with something to prove."

Lowe also helped bring UMass back, as the freshman point guard provided a defensive spark in his first collegiate game.

"I think everybody else fed off of Chris' energy," Ford said. "He had to earn respect from his teammates and tonight I think he earned some respect."

Lowe's steal and feed to James Life for an open three-pointer capped off a 10-0 UMass run, and gave the Minutemen a 22-20 lead with 3:50 remaining in the half.

The teams traded baskets for the remainder of the half, with Hartford taking a 31-29 lead on Aaron Cook's desperation three off of the glass just before the halftime buzzer.

In the second half, Freeman began to make his presence felt, as he scored eight consecutive UMass points in a three-minute span, en route to a 17 point second stanza.

"I was a little too amped up and there were a couple of shots [in the first half] that I usually make easily," Freeman said. "At halftime I was anxious to go back and do some work. We knew we had to think about what we did and go into the second half focused and ready to grind."

It appeared that UMass would finally pull away, but Adeleke kept the Hawks in the game. The senior center, considered by Ford to be an NBA prospect, scored 20 points and pulled down 10 rebounds in his first game in over a year, as he sat out a three pointer by Viggiano less than a minute later tied the game at 37-37.

KAREN WINGFIELD/COLLEGIAN

Jeff Viggiano, the only senior on the UMass basketball team, contributed 14 points during the Minutemen's 67-62 win over Hartford at the Mullins Center on Friday night.

See HOOPS on page 8

Viggiano sparks his team off the bench

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

Senior leadership is hard to come by when the roster of that particular team consists of just one name. In the case of the Massachusetts men's basketball team (1-0), senior Jeff Viggiano, the lone senior member, did exactly what he needed to do as a veteran during Friday's 67-62 win over Hartford.

With the team beginning its first game of the season with anxiety and a level of stress, Viggiano came off the bench and displayed a little bit of senior swagger, scoring a total of 14 points throughout the contest.

"I was just trying to come with some energy," Viggiano said. "We seemed a little flat, and, as a senior, if I don't come out and do that, there's no reason anyone else should. I took it upon myself to do just do something. That's my role. I'm not a very vocal person, but if I can come off the bench with energy and help the team that way, that's about all I can do."

With the team uneasy about the season-opener, Viggiano loosened things up and his three-pointer after a rebound by junior Stephane Lasme in the first period cut the Hartford lead to 20-19.

With Hartford maintaining that lead when the teams went into the locker room, Viggiano stepped it up again at the start of the second period.

An assist to junior Rashaun Freeman accounted for the first points of the second period, and

That shift in momentum drove the Minutemen to shake off the tense feelings and gave them the ability needed to knock-off Hartford.

"He played like he wanted to have a great senior year," UMass coach Travis Ford said.

Since Viggiano is the only senior on the team, he is put in a position in which he must be a model for the underclassmen especially the newcomers.

Ford attributes the seniors hard work to his success and looks at that as something for the younger players on the team to appreciate.

Friday's game outlined that concept.

"He doesn't always make those shots and he doesn't always score the points like he did tonight, but he always works hard. He does the right things on and off the court all the time," Ford said. "There's no inconsistency from Jeff Viggiano in that area."

Along with his 14 points, Viggiano added two assists, two steals and four blocks.

Although he is the only senior, other veterans on the team also contributed to the victory. Namely Rashaun Freeman, who scored 25 points, and Stephane Lasme, whose late game block was instrumental in the win.

Viggiano and company will look to add to their first win of the season when they head down to Davidson, N.C. to take on Davidson College tomorrow.

Minutewomen split openers

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team began its 2005-06 campaign with a split-decision over the weekend.

The Minutewomen (1-1) began their season on the road as they suffered a 71-44 loss to Delaware (2-0) on Friday night, but were able to put the opener on the backburner when they came home to defeat Holy Cross (1-1) by a score of 64-55 yesterday afternoon at the Mullins Center.

Although the Minutewomen did not get off to the positive start they had been looking for, UMass Coach Marnie Ducko was pleased with the way her team rebounded from a disappointing loss in the season opener.

"I am happy with the way our team came out in the first half," Ducko said after yesterday's win. "After returning from a Delaware team that just took it to us right from the start, our team responded very well coming out of the gate."

UMass will be back in action tomorrow on the road when they tip-off against Eastern Michigan at 7 p.m.

The Minutewomen committed 24 turnovers and were 14-for-43 from the field in Friday night's loss to the Blue Hens. UMass held it to a close 15-13 Delaware lead midway through the first half, but Delaware headed into halftime with a 16-2 run and a 31-15 lead.

Sophomore Pam Rosario had a game-high 18 points, but that was not enough to get a win. The Minutewomen had more free throws than field goals, and were just 1-for-14 from three-point range.

Delaware was able to hold onto a lead after a 9-2 UMass run early in the second half, and went on to defeat the Minutewomen, giving the Maroon and White its first loss of the year.

Senior point guard Katie Nelson knows that her team did not play up to their potential on Friday, and with that, made the necessary adjustments to come out on top in their home opener.

"Delaware got us out of our game," Nelson said after yesterday's win. "We were not executing like we should, and today we just made sure that we played our game and did not let [Holy Cross] dictate what we were going to do on the court."

UMass defeated Holy Cross 64-55 in their home opener at the Mullins Center yesterday afternoon to bring the

See W HOOPS on page 8

Find out about
The Score
Dec. 10 before t
ass-B.C. hockey g

New England's Largest College Daily · Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Tuesday, November 22, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXVI Issue 52

Fair trade Pura Vida coffee comes to UMass

By Hannah Leung
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts Amherst has joined the Fair Trade coffee movement in its quest to ensure that coffee growers receive a fair price for their goods. UMass Amherst has adopted Pura Vida, a fair trade coffee provider, as one of the coffee suppliers in on campus retail outlets.

A grand opening celebration was held on Nov. 3, 2005 for the introduction of Pura Vida in the Blue Wall Eatery in the Campus Center.

The Fair Trade coffee movement was started to ensure that a reasonable price was presented to the majority of the world's coffee farmers. Fair Trade guarantees a living wage to poor farmers organized in worldwide cooperatives.

Pura Vida Coffee, 100% charitably owned, sells Fair Trade, organic coffee throughout the United States. The founders of Pura Vida, John Sage and Chris Dearnley, believed that the principles of capitalism could be applicable in non-profit organizations. Pura Vida Coffee was thus created to help support the charitable programs of Pura Vida Partners, a non-profit organization.

Pura Vida's specific mission is to help poverty-stricken children in coffee-growing countries. Economic fairness, environmental sustainability, and philanthropy are the emphasized points in the Pura Vida business model.

This compassionate view of capitalism will serve to empower producers, motivate consumers, inspire business leaders, and ultimately serve the poor.

Pura Vida's headquarters is stationed in Seattle, Washington.

Ken Toong, director of University dining and retail food eatery, says, "We saw Pura Vida at a trade show at a National Conference and discovered that not only did the coffee taste good, but it was also for a good cause."

The dining services have been considering using Fair Trade coffee for some time now. For the past two months, the Franklin Dining Commons has been testing Fair Trade coffee provided by New England Coffee. It is the goal of dining services officials to have Fair Trade coffee implemented in all dining commons in the next few weeks.

Marketing research conducted by Dining Services estimated that 59 percent of students concurred that they would like to see Fair Trade coffee available on campus.

"I like knowing that I'm supporting a charitable cause rather than a large chain," says Evan Tuckerman, a freshman Communications major who downs a cup of coffee every day.

Dining services will still provide coffee from other suppliers. This includes coffee from Rao's, a popular Amherst hang-out center, served in the library and Fletcher café. Starbucks, another favorite, is served in the Campus Center. New England Coffee is served in the Blue Wall, Whitmore Face, and the dining commons.

KAREN WINGFIELD/COLLEGIAN

Students visit the new Pura Vida station in the Blue Wall. Pura Vida Coffee sells Fair Trade, organic coffee throughout the United States and recently came to the University of Massachusetts.

RIAA battles illegal music downloads

By Daniel Terk
Collegian Staff

With the Supreme Court's actions this past summer, filing more John Doe lawsuits and now finally the shutting down many peer to peer (p2p) networks such as WinMX and i2hub, it seems that the Recording Industry Association of America (RIAA) is winning the battle against illegal music downloads.

"The U.S. supreme court has ruled unanimously ... that not just individuals but businesses that encourage illegal file sharing can also be held accountable for their actions," said Cary Sherman, president of the RIAA, "marking an important milestone in the transformation of the online marketplace."

This "milestone" came when Grokster, a file-sharing system similar to i2Hub, agreed to settle with major record companies, movie studios, and publishers after being sued in what can now be considered the landmark case of MGM vs. Grokster.

This settlement was followed soon after by the shutdown of the very popular file sharing system i2Hub used by many students on the University of Massachusetts campus, as well as countless others nationwide.

This is a large step in the right direction, according to Sherman, because "when you download a song illegally and burn a copy for everyone in your dorm, you are undermining the ability of music companies to invest in the next great up-and-coming band you have yet to hear about."

In addition to the assaults on the file-sharing systems, the RIAA has also continued to pursue individuals for their illegal downloading activities. According to the

See RIAA on page 2

Holyoke Care Center assists pregnant teens

By Eva Piccuzzi
Collegian Staff

HOLYOKE — "I'm struck by the stories," said Laurie Herrick, director of donor relations at the Care Center in Holyoke, MA.

"We had this one student who was asked to speak at a fund-raiser after her graduation from here. She was from Lawrence. After she got pregnant, she couldn't live at home anymore because there was subsidized housing and it would be two families in a household. She couldn't keep her baby there." The forced commute between Lawrence and Holyoke became this teenage girl's reality after she was turned away from the over-crowded shelter in Lawrence.

Here in Holyoke, high-school dropout and teen-pregnancy rates are higher than literacy rates, an issue familiar to other low-income communities like Lawrence and Springfield. Faltering education and the escalation of youth violence and drug infestation on the streets has consumed the attention of the media and politicians alike. While theories are devised and fingers are pointed, one program in Holyoke is taking action and changing the lives of teenage women. The Care Center will be celebrating its 20th anniversary of providing counseling and support to pregnant and parenting teens in the city of Holyoke.

"Its not like it seems, that they get pregnant and they drop out of school; what happens is they drop out of school and get pregnant," said Herrick.

Holyoke Public High School is averaging a class size of 40 students, classroom materials are substandard, and teachers are counting down calendar days until more students drop out to assuage their stress level. Herrick believes this is why the drop-out rate is escalating.

"The biggest hurdle is that they haven't had any sort of a good experience as learners," says Herrick describing the lack of reinforcement the women experience at home and in school.

The program was established in Holyoke Hospital, where counsel was given to young mothers about prenatal care and providing information about birth control. Soon after, a GED program was added and the program has grown and evolved to continue to meet the needs of teen mothers in the city.

The Care Center now includes four main programs: The Care Center Education Program for Pregnant Teens; Rowing Strong, Rowing Together; The Clemente Course in the Humanities; and The Teen Resource Project. Under the leadership of Executive Director Anne Teschner, The Care Center Education Program took on a new model called New Directions, which adopts the best practices of the most effective prep schools in the country.

"Anne's focus has been life-altering for the students here. Her philosophy is that a GED or a high school diploma doesn't buy you much in earning power. Instead of having the highest possible bar be the GED, let's have the bar be higher; let's have it be going to college," said Herrick.

The New Directions program structured its curriculum around what private prep schools and liberal arts colleges offered that public schools did not. They all had arts, humanities, athletics and small class sizes.

The progressive rocket launched by the Care Center sets goals that tired public schools preach indifferently. Here, teenage mothers are given the chance to take college-level philosophy, American history, art history, literature, poetry, and critical writing. The objective of New Directions is "based on the belief that by studying the humanities, those who are economically and educationally disadvantaged can acquire the cultural knowledge and conceptual skills to improve their personal and social situations and become active participants in civic life."

See CARE on page 2

Students learn about life in CHOICES classes

By Hannah Drake
Collegian Staff

There is a well-kept brick building that sits at 247 Cabot Street in Holyoke. Inside, the sing-song chatter of Spanish girls fills one of the third-floor classrooms as the students wait for their instructor to start the day's lesson.

The teacher walks in and tells the young women to take out a pamphlet called "Whole Grain Twist." Today's lesson, part of the CHOICES curriculum at Holyoke's Care Center, is about whole grains: what they are, all of the terminology used in the food process, why it's an important part of the diet, and how to know if a food item is whole grain or not.

The next hour and a half is surprisingly quick. The interactive teaching process asks that the young women come up to a board and imitate the bread making process. The germ of the bread is taken out, and the instructor, Arlene Iraola, explains to the young women that white bread products are stripped, like the girl stripped the Velcro wheat germ off of the board. Then, she has another girl take the same piece and put it back on the grain of wheat.

"This is what 'fortified' means," she explains. "Companies take the vitamins and minerals and put them back in the foods."

The CHOICES program that gives lessons such as this one is part of the University of Massachusetts Amherst's Nutrition Extension Program (NEP).

"The Friday morning class is our pregnant teen's class," explains Pat Harmsen, program supervisor. "We work with pregnant teen programs and shelters, rehab, recovery shelters, schools, community agency, shelters, domestic violence, employment programs, GED programs, ESL programs, correctional facilities [and] Hamden county's sheriff's department."

The Care Center, established in 1989, has three classrooms, a library resource room and a licensed infant day care facility. The CHOICES program is used as part of a GED program for the pregnant teens, some of whom are already mothers. It makes it easier for the girls to complete their high school education; in a normal high school atmosphere, child care isn't offered for the young women's children, and they may be ostracized by other students for being pregnant. The Care Center offers its students job training, job placement, personal and career counseling, arts programming and athletics.

Massachusetts, the state that first implemented the Nutrition Education programs, has field offices all over the state. Participants in the EFNEP program must complete seven workshops. At the end of the program, participants receive a certificate from the USDA.

Iraola is bilingual, which helps the students to be comfortable with English. A translator sits at the back of the classroom if she needs help.

"Our educators are hired to fit in with the participants, from similar backgrounds. They don't have college degrees, I don't want to give the wrong impression, but then it's someone who really understands," said Sullivan-Werner.

Half-way through the class, Iraola brings out a life-size replica of the human digestive system, made out of common materials. The digestive system is represented by a cut-out of a human mouth, followed by a short, white piece of rope, connected to the stomach, which is symbolized by a medium-sized plastic milk bottle, which, she explains, is the size the human stomach can stretch to. The stomach is connected to a long piece of braided white rope, which represents the small intestine, which is connected to a pink scrunched-up piece of fabric surrounding the rope: the large intestine.

Sullivan-Werner also explained that since many of the participants are low-income, there's also a high illiteracy rate, so the hands-on, discussion-based style works well.

"[Participants] may not have the best experiences with formal learning situations, so we try to make it fun," she said.

The class ended with a low-calorie, low-fat dessert that used two percent milk, crushed graham crackers, vanilla pudding and a tiny bit of pumpkin filling.

In a post-class interview, Iraola said that the purpose of the class isn't necessarily that the students become perfect eaters.

"Our success isn't that when people are finished the program that they're eating perfectly, our success is that when they finish the program they've tried some new foods, set goals for themselves, and they feel good that they can do that."

Cheney lashes out at critics of War on Terror

By Douglass K. Daniel
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Vice President Dick Cheney on Monday said he strongly disagrees with a battle-tested congressman who advocates quickly pulling all U.S. troops from Iraq, calling such a proposal "a dangerous illusion."

Cheney stopped short of joining those Republicans who have questioned the patriotism and courage of Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., calling him "a good man, a Marine, a patriot." Cheney's subdued comments about Murtha followed those of President Bush and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Cheney pressed the administration's high-voltage attack on war critics, particularly Senate Democrats who voted in October 2002 to give Bush authority to go to war in Iraq and who now oppose his policy, calling them "dishonest and reprehensible."

"The flaws in the intelligence are plain enough in hindsight. But any suggestion that prewar information was distorted, hyped or fabricated by the leader of the nation is utterly false," Cheney said in a speech to the American Enterprise Institute.

As to proposals for a rapid pullout of U.S. troops, Cheney said, "It is a dangerous illusion to suppose that another retreat by the civilized world would satisfy the appetite of the terrorists and get them to leave us alone." Nearly 160,000 U.S. troops remain in Iraq.

Cheney ticked off a long list of terrorist attacks on American interests going back more than the two decades that preceded the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, including the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks and earlier ones in Beirut, Saudi Arabia and Africa.

"Now they're making a stand in Iraq, testing our resolve, trying to intimidate the United States into abandoning our friends and permitting the overthrow of this new Middle Eastern democracy," Cheney said.

He said he respected the right of Murtha to form his own opinion. Murtha has served in Congress for three decades, is a decorated Marine combat veteran from Vietnam, the top Democrat on the House Appropriations defense subcommittee and has long been an ardent defender of the armed forces.

"Nor is there any problem with debating whether the United States and its allies should have liberated Iraq in the first place," Cheney said. "Nobody is saying we should not be having this discussion."

Cheney added, "Those who advocate a sudden withdrawal from Iraq should answer a few simple questions," including whether the United States be "better off or worse off" with terror leaders such as Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, Osama bin Laden, or Ayman al-Zawahiri in control?

KRT

Vice President Dick Cheney delivers remarks on "Iraq and the War on Terror," in a speech to the American Enterprise Institute in Washington.

ARTS & LIVING
BRIGHT EYES RELEASES NEW ALBUM
Their newest release features live recordings
Page 4

EDITORIAL/OPINION
PRIMETIME REPORT INACCURATE
ABC portraying UMass as violent was not factually based and was intentionally demeaning.
Page 3

WEATHER
TODAY Rain, H44°
TONIGHT Rain, L35°
TOMORROW Flurries, H41°, L20°

SPORTS
MINUTEMEN HEAD SOUTH
UMass looks to improve to 2-0 tonight at Davidson
Page 8

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Michael Busack
MANAGING EDITOR Cameron J. Woods
BUSINESS MANAGER Hetak Shah
PRODUCTION MANAGER Nicholas Belanger
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Sheryl Wolnik
ADVERTISING MANAGER Kerry O'Grady
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Lauren Egavian
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Amanda Allen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Matthew O'Rourke
COMICS EDITOR Amanda Allen
EDITORIAL EDITOR Allison Edles
NEWS EDITOR Dan O'Brien
PHOTO EDITOR Kate Sachsenmaier
SPORTS EDITOR Jeff Howe
CIRCULATION MANAGER Thomas Hecht
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Nick Gleason
FINANCE MANAGER Daniel Conti
HUMAN RESOURCE Phil Smoller
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Caren Tortorici
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Nathan Chomsky
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Mackenzie Isler
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Ian Jones
ASSISTANT NEWS Megan Daley
ASSISTANT NEWS Matt Belliveau
ASSISTANT PHOTO Elizabeth Caristi
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eric Athas
ASSISTANT SPORTS Dan Duggan
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Kristen LaCasse

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1903, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1936. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Cameron J. Woods
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Julie Teece
COPY EDITOR
Meghan Murray
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Nick Belanger
PRODUCTION STAFF
Jeston Sussman, Tiffany Van Lansing

police log

Friday November 18

There was a disturbance at the Survival Center in Amherst. The police arrived at 1200 North Pleasant St. at 12:20 p.m. Someone had been reported as causing a disturbance, but when the police arrived he was sitting down quietly and finishing his lunch.

On Friday night, there was a liquor law violation outside of Barnes. The police arrived at 43 North Pleasant St. at 11:16 p.m. Leslie Wagner, 19, of Amherst, Emily Phillips, 20, of Rosindale, and Tara N. Gibney, 20, of Succasunna, NJ. were arrested. Each one was charged with underage possession of liquor and possession of a fake ID.

Saturday November 19

On Saturday morning, a fight broke out at 778 North Pleasant St. The police arrived at 1:12 a.m. There were about 20 people involved. Some people were throwing a party and the residents wanted some party-goers to leave. A fight broke out as a result.

Later on Saturday morning, there was a noise complaint from Orchview 308. The police arrived at 1001 North Pleasant St. 308 at 2:27 a.m. A warning was issued for breaking the town by-law by causing excess noise in the area.

On Saturday morning, an act of vandalism was reported at a residence in Amherst. The police arrived at 29 Colonial Ct. at 8:23 a.m. At the residence, a basketball hoop was knocked down and the backboard was shattered. There was $200 worth of damage.

Later that morning, another vandalism was reported at Puffton Village 316. The police arrived at 1040 North Pleasant St. 316 at 10:38 a.m. The vandalism was done to a black 1999 Ford Explorer.

Sunday November 20

Early Sunday morning, there was a liquor law violation at 50 Meadow St. The police arrived at 12:44 a.m. Ian David MacFarlane, 19, of Plymouth, and Dominic Stanton Grasso, 18, of Kingston, were arrested and charged with underage possession of liquor.

Early Sunday morning, there was a liquor law violation at 50 Meadow St. The police arrived at 12:44 a.m. Ian David MacFarlane, 19, of Plymouth, and Dominic Stanton Grasso, 18, of Kingston, were arrested and charged with underage possession of liquor.

About a half hour later, there was another liquor law violation. The police arrived at 53 Fearing St. at 1:09 a.m. Matthew Sullivan, 21, of Amherst was arrested and was charged with having an open container of alcohol outdoors.

Later on that morning, there was a fight at 151 College St. The police arrived at 2:36 a.m. The fight dispersed as soon as the police arrived.

About an hour later, another fight broke out. The police arrived at 18 Shumway St. at 3:44 a.m. There was a party and uninvited guests were told to leave. After that, a fight broke out. There was damage to the interior and exterior of the home.

On Sunday afternoon, an act of vandalism was reported. The police arrived at 143 Fearing St. at 2:07 p.m. When police went to check out what it was, he saw a plexi-glass window shattered.

—Arke Seri

Holyoke Care Center provides teens classes

CARE from page 1

Students can receive up to six credits at Bard College Clemente Course.

Herrick discusses that the Care Center provides essential support services that public school fails to offer teenage mothers; such as on-site child care, transportation, counseling, job placement and academic classes in English and Spanish. In the last three years more than 85 percent of Care Center graduates have gone on to college.

Classes start at 9 a.m. and end at 2:30 p.m., Monday through Friday. In the morning students study vigorously for the GED exam which Herrick says takes an average of six months preparation. In the afternoon students are exposed to electives like yoga, golf, and rowing.

The Rowing Strong, Rowing Together program works in collaboration with the athletic department of Mount Holyoke College, giving the students a college campus experience. According to the program's results, there has been a significant improvement in the rowers' self-esteem, attendance and ability to focus on academics.

Right now there are 150 students with about 50 that are active at one time with an open enrollment throughout the year, according to Herrick. Out of 30 staff members, only two are men. The Care Center abides by the attendance requirement set by the Department of Transitional Assistance (DTA), the state agency responsible for administering public assistance programs for needy citizens in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. In order for the women to receive their welfare checks, it is mandatory for them to attend programs like the Care Center, job services, or high school.

Taking steps towards teen pregnancy prevention is yet another strategy the Care Center advocates. The Teen Resource Project (TRP) is designed to motivate young people to stay in school and build for a positive future. The Teen Resource Project theater troupe New Visions has between 20 and 25 members presenting original work to hundreds of teens throughout the city and region. One of these performances, "Imagine the Angels of Bread," brought to life, through spoken word and hip-hop, the prose of University of Massachusetts Professor Martin Espada.

"We spend $5,000 per student here at the Care Center. We have books, activities, a beautiful computer lab and classrooms that don't look lacking. I think now have what we need to do the job here," said Herrick.

Affordability is no excuse to steal music

RIAA from page 1

RIAA there have been 635 lawsuits filed against students on 39 different campuses this year alone. Most of these lawsuits are considered "John Doe" lawsuits because the RIAA only has an internet protocol (IP) address and has to subpoena the individual's internet service provider (ISP) to obtain the person's name. There were 81 lawsuits filed against named defendants last month after their ISP identified them.

There have been a total of 50 individuals sued on the UMass campus, nine of which have been settled. Amherst College and Mount Holyoke College each had one student sued; both have been settled.

Many college students justify downloading music because they feel that they cannot afford to purchase music and that buying music will only give the "ultra-rich megastars and big record labels" even more money.

There is an answer to both of these misconceptions, explained Sherman. "Behind the artists you have heard of there are countless others attached to that recording," people like the background vocalists, studio engineers, producers and publishers who are also banking on the profit of the record.

Sherman also pointed out that not being able to afford to buy the music "is no excuse, any more than it would justify stealing the actual CD from a record store. And for generations students have spent their hard-earned dollars on the music they love in the local college record store." It was then noted that not too many of these record stores exist, which is just another impact of the illegally downloading music.

Language immersion classes demanded at more colleges

By Maura O'Keefe
Cavalier Daily (U.Virginia)

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. — Student interest in residing in language houses at colleges across the country is on the rise, according to an article in The Chronicle of Higher Education.

Randolph Pope, Chair of the Department of Spanish, Italian, and Portuguese, cited immersion in the language as the main advantage of living in language houses.

"It brings a language to life and I think that is absolutely crucial to discover that the language is useful in daily exchange with people," Pope said. "Language needs reinforcement. You can learn something and believe you know it but unless you use it in different situations, you don't really know."

Third-year college student Andy Nosal agreed that immersion is invaluable when trying to master a language. "Nothing's better than actually speaking it, it's great practice," he said.

Nosal added that for students who are not able to live abroad, the language houses are "the next best thing."

Nosal said he believes that the application process for becoming a resident of a language houses has become more competitive in recent years.

"It's pretty competitive to get it. This year 25 people applied, and probably less than half will get in," said Nosal.

According to the Chronicle article, some colleges have reportedly asked the Modern Language Committee to establish a committee dedicated to helping colleges and universities expand such residential language programs. This increased interest in language houses has been accompanied by increased enrollment in some foreign language courses, as well.

"In Spanish, there has been an increase across the nation," Pope said. "There has been an increase in the number of students taking Italian. In Spanish we are always adding sections and would love to add more."

German Prof. Benjamin Bennett said that the language houses at the University were first created by students who wanted immersion in the language, and that students continue to govern the way the houses are run.

"We try not to run the language houses, we try to leave them in the hands of students," Bennett said.

Pope added that besides offering immersion in the language, language houses offer immersion in different cultures.

"Studying language isn't just studying languages, we're studying different cultures. If you aren't switching cultures, you aren't really getting into the languages," Pope said.

First-year college student Marta Cook cited both immersion in language and culture as her main reasons for applying to the French House.

An apology to our readers:

We at the Massachusetts Daily Collegian would like to issue a formal apology to our readership concerning a column published on April 7, 2005 by Ben Feder, a former Collegian columnist, titled "A day in the life ..."

It has recently come to our attention that this column was plagiarized. The original column was titled "The mind of a single guy" and written by Justin Rebello, a Northeastern University student. The article was posted as an online column on the Web site pointsincase.com, for which Rebello is a staff writer.

On Nov. 20, Rebello wrote a rebuttal column to Feder's copy in which he outlines in detail all the similarities between his original column published in November 2003 and Feder's plagiarized column. Feder's column contained word for word replications of Rebello's original piece.

The Daily Collegian was in no way aware of the plagiarism at the time of the column's publication and is deeply apologetic to all those who read this newspaper. As a printed publication, we strive to uphold the highest standards of journalistic practice and integrity. We would also like to reassure our readers that we will be taking more than adequate measures to correct the situation and ensure this does not happen again.

- The editors of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian

LOOKING FOR A JOB?

★Go to e-Recruiting★
We bring employers to you through job postings, interviews, and career fairs.

Search for up-to-the minute info on interships and jobs!
★
Look for specific positions related to your interest and qualifications!
★
Job postings added every weekday!

Register at www.umass.edu/careers and click on "eRecruiting"

phone: 413-545-2224
fax: 413-545-4426
www.umass.edu/careers
CareerServices
Career Services Office
UMass Amherst
511 Goodell Building
a division of Student Affairs & Campus Life

The Massachusetts Daily COLLEGIAN

The Daily Collegian has job openings for the following positions:

-Managing Editor
-Night/Copy Supervisor
-Arts Editor
-Assistant Arts Editor
-Photographers

These are PAID positions! Applications are due before Thanksgiving break. Pick them up at the Collegian in the Campus Center basement.

Daily Collegian

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

ABC's 'Primetime' report epitomizes bad journalsim

Many students are flaming about ABC's "Primetime" special which premiered last Thursday. Why, you might ask? Well, in case you haven't heard, the University of Massachusetts Amherst is the most dangerous university of its size in the nation.

"ABC spokeswoman Alyssa Apple said, 'We are reporting numbers that we received from the Department of Education … We gave all schools an opportunity to respond to our reporting,'" wrote Sarah Schweitzer in the Boston Globe. According to Dan O'Brien, a Collegian editor, UMass officials did respond and pressured ABC into at least admitting during the special that our crime rate has improved from 57 violent crimes in 2002 and 58 in 2003 to 28 in 2004. Even so, everyone in the nation who tuned in to "Primetime" on Thursday could have made false assumptions that our school is unsafe.

The information used by ABC was old, according to UMass officials, but was it accurate? Apple said, "Among schools of more than 11,000 students, UMass Amherst had the most violent crimes per student." These findings were "based on 2002 and 2003 data provided by the U.S. Department of Education, which culls the figures from reports from the schools. Apple said all the schools had not reported 2004 crime data when the news program conducted its reporting and analysis." Is that reason enough to bad-mouth a college that relies on reputation for its high admission rates?

If ABC had included the 2004 statistics in their Primetime special, UMass Amherst could not have possibly been viewed as dangerous. The school tried to keep the special from airing to no avail. "The school also contends that the news program improperly calculated the rate of violent crime by dividing the number of crimes by the total enrollment rather than by the number of on-campus residents," wrote Schweitzer.

A good deal of UMass students are not on-campus residents, so how could such an important factor be overlooked by ABC? "Just as you would not include visitors, commuters, and tourists to calculate the crime rate among a city's population, neither should an aggregate number including off-campus students be included in a calculation of an on-campus crime rate," wrote Terence O'Malley, the university system's general counsel, to ABC News.

All schools that are slandered by the media suffer from negative effects because no one wants to go to a school that is unsafe. Those currently attending UMass know it is for the most part secure, but the hundreds of students across the country who are interested in UMass might not be so interested anymore. That is damage UMass might not be able to repair.

Since this report could have a significant effect on the reputation of UMass Amherst, ABC should have reworked their report to include more updated information. To say UMass is currently the most dangerous school of its size in the nation when it is not is poor journalism. UMass is not being rewarded for the efforts it has made to make this campus a safer place. Instead, the University is getting bad publicity that could potentially damage its high standing and appeal.

Reports like this have the potential to damage a school's credibility. With so much at stake, ABC should have made its report as accurate as possible, even if it meant delaying their broadcast. Who knows what school is really the most dangerous? Maybe if ABC had done their job, America would know the truth instead of pinpointing our fine institution.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board

Archaic law must go

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz

The matter of the Higher Education Act (HEA) is a serious one. It goes right to the heart of the ousiai, or essential purpose, of our university and of higher education in general. Let us suppose the ultimate purpose of higher education is to better the quality of life and perceived dignity of society. At the most fundamental level, education in the West is a process whereby the learner undergoes a transformation of mind and soul, eventually emerging as an enlightened member of society prepared to engage in citizenship and teaching. At universities such as the University of Massachusetts, students select from a wide variety of intellectual subjects so there is a high amount of individual control in the improvement of minds.

Ideally, everyone would encounter this mental and spiritual metamorphosis. Yet here there are two issues: the first is many do not desire a scholarly education, and the second is there is a stated need by individual institutions to rule out certain applicants in order to maintain the quality of the atmosphere and education offered. Without getting into the problem of incoherent and biased admissions standards – a problem for which UMass is deeply implicated – there is an underlying assumption of pure meritocracy determining access to tiers of quality in education.

The ostensible goal for everyone is free higher education for all; the inability to provide this is rationalized with the insufficient availability of funds. In fact, eliminating financial concerns would likely go a long way in rectifying the merit-based access in higher education. The shortcomings of the economic-tainted meritocracy are glaring and well-documented by writers on both the right and the left of the political spectrum, who mostly point out society and colleges fail to distinguish between wealth and merit. There are a number of reasons for this, including outdated admissions tests that reflect socio-economic class and the fact that most qualified potential applicants do not apply to top-notch schools because of their astronomical cost.

> The ostensible goal for everyone is free higher education for all; the inability to provide this is rationalized with the insufficient availability of funds.

So we have a situation in which higher education fails its ousiai. Society is not transformed by our higher education system; even willing minds are tumed away by high costs and a host of other "unfair" pressures. Rather, there is a growing gap, a conspicuous deficit, between the formally educated and the not. There is no mechanism to correct this contradiction and certainly no mechanism to reach out and begin bridging the gap. This is at least partially the result of well thought-out initiatives by politicians, particularly those on the right who seek decreases in federal expenditures, at least for public works and services. Strict conditionality for financial aid is among the factors that lessen the money doled out for higher education. The drug provision contained in the HEA is clearly another effort to restrict this funding.

The difference here is the drug provision makes the university system function as a punitive component of the justice system. Whereas the actual public interest lies in the "rehabilitation" and societal productivity of criminals (even the non-violent criminals that consume or deal insignificant amounts of drugs), the HEA does just the opposite: it refuses public assistance to so-called criminals who are actively seeking reform. The problems of crime and poor education in this country are therefore not only perpetuated, but exacerbated.

It is also important to note since the lower classes are more susceptible to drug convictions, whether because they are more highly policed or because economic deprivation creates need for clandestine economics, they are disproportionately affected by the HEA. This is a strong yet doubly unjust reaffirmation of the economic meritocracy that corrupts higher education today. It deprives not only the affected individuals, but society as a whole, of any sort of desirable future.

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz is a Collegian columnist.

Listen up!

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is looking for editors and columnists for the spring semester. Apply today in our offices located in the Campus Center basement.

Paid editor positions are available. Apply before Thanksgiving break.

Search and debate ignores issue

Mike Sances

"Let me state from the beginning, please take the time to read this communication in its entirety."

I usually don't have much to say regarding the administration at this school, but when I read Vice Chancellor Mike Gargano's e-mail Wednesday night, sent out to all University of Massachusetts students, two thoughts came to mind, as they always do when the issue of alcohol abuse on campus is raised.

First: Maybe if there were more alternative activities on campus, students would drink less.

Second: Maybe if people felt they were here to actually learn something, as opposed to just to train for a job, there would be less of a drinking problem.

These speculations are worth elaborating upon and debating; they both could be incredibly off the mark. But what separates them from the Vice Chancellor's response to campus drinking is they at least try to identify some underlying issues that lead to alcohol abuse. Mr. Gargano, in contrast, makes no such attempt, choosing instead to focus solely on only the most immediate effects, but especially property damage.

Why are students at this campus, and across the country, abusing alcohol so much, damaging themselves and their lavatories in the process? The Vice Chancellor doesn't bother with such trivialities. Instead, he seems to think he can solve everything with some vague "increased security measures." While his e-mail message doesn't specify what these actually are (instead he just lists existing policies), we learn from an article in Thursday's Daily Collegian that "Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano had instructed the Student Affairs Judicial Issues Committee (SAJIC) to determine how to implement searches of the personal effects of all students entering the residence halls on campus."

The SGA has faithfully revolted, condemning the prospect of searches in a unanimous resolution last week. Nevertheless, Mr. Gargano claims in his message "the majority of students support stricter sanctions for repeat offenders and for alcohol-related violence." While curious as to how and when this poll was conducted — for surely this assertion must come from some kind of poll — I have to say I really don't care what the popular sentiment is, simply because my protection against unreasonable search and seizure is outlined in the Constitution, among other places.

> While curious as to how and when this poll was conducted … I have to say I really don't care what the popular sentiment is, simply because my protection against unreasonable search and seizure is outlined in the Constitution, among other places.

That's one of my civil rights, in other words. It's not negotiable, and it's not subject to change because of popular passions.

It's also enshrined in the Residence Hall Contract, if anyone cares. "The University will not intrude into a student's personal effects or otherwise search a room except with the permission of the student," it reads, "or by appropriate legal authorities with a search warrant."

The administration wants to violate that contract and your civil rights. And it's a policy as expensive as it is misguided. According to an article in Friday's Springfield Republican, "the University has contracted with Securitas Security Services USA Inc. About 14 guards will be on duty Thursdays-Saturdays, mostly from 3 p.m. to 2 a.m., but later in some cases." That's money that could have been spent on — well, you name it.

But this whole discussion is itself a waste of time. If incidents of violence and alcoholism are on the rise at this school, it is likely something more troubling is going on beneath the surface. What could it be? Your employees, the administration, don't seem to care. Like all politicians — for let's face it, that's all they really are — they have no interest in your well-being unless you give them a reason.

Some express bewilderment that today's college students lack the political commitment of those who attended college during the Vietnam War. Whereas the students of the 1960s put their lives on the line to protest racial discrimination and a criminal war, our generation gets drunk and riots over baseball games. I don't think there's any real mystery to it. When you factor in the privatization of universities that's been going on for years now, the growing burden of student debt, the fiscal war on the humanities, the increasing emphasis on vocational training as opposed to intellectual development, the ubiquity of advertisements posted on bulletin boards intended originally for student organizations — when you consider all this, is it really so mysterious that students spend more time drinking and less time protesting, or otherwise participating constructively in student life? I think not.

They'll get away with random searches only if the student body lets them by remaining silent. But it can't stop with this one policy. Even if it's prevented, the conditions that led to it will still be in place. It is those conditions that will need to be addressed if we want to make this campus a better place.

Mike Sances is a Collegian columnist.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Class of 2005 speaks out

WE ARE NOT FORGETTABLE

We are the class that saw the horror and tragedy of Sept. 11 from our dorm rooms. The class of 2005 was also the one that saw the travesty of George W. Bush being elected again, since for most of us, this was the first presidential election we were eligible to vote in. Not to mention everything that happened on campus: budget cuts, the introduction of SPIRE and the chaos that was caused by it, mid-semester tuition increases, cutting various classes and cutting sports teams. The University took away these various opportunities from the class of 2005 and beyond, and we have every right to be upset. I love UMass and everything it provided me. It not only allowed me to get a higher education and move on in the "real world," but it also provided me the chance to grow as a person and meet some of the greatest people I've ever met in my life. Skolnick's "opinion" piece is about as tasteless and unprofessional as it can get.

Who his he to say we were forgettable? He can do himself a favor and apologize to the class of 2005 for his ignorance. He's an embarrassment to the University of Massachusetts faculty who provided us the tools we need to succeed in the work force, the staff who many of us worked with while undergrads, current students who were friends with people of our class and most importantly, alumni who are proud to wear the Maroon and White, proud to cheer UMass athletics and proud to have come from UMass. You think we didn't care before? Your little column there might be more harmful to an Alumni department that's already struggling to bring in support.

Jacob Tarabar
UMass alumnus

CORRECTIVE SUCCESSES OF 2005 GRADS

I am writing to you all in regard to the Gilad Skolnick column, "A Class to Forget." As a proud graduate of the class of 2005, I am disgusted and ashamed the Daily Collegian would run a column that is false and most of all hurtful to the graduates of 2005.

Gilad is entitled to his opinion, but when it comes down to criticizing the students of '05 for being "lazy and pompous," he is just flat out wrong. He clearly has no idea of our accomplishments since graduation nor the contributions we made while on campus the years we were there. The graduating class of 2005 is full of individuals who are motivated and who are using the degrees from UMass (that mean something) to our full advantage.

It is ridiculous to link and blame the riots of World Championships and Superbowl victories solely to the class of 2005. This year, there was no Championship — there are no riots. Wait until the next round of Championships come along — will you be blaming the class of 2009 for that? Unfortunately, bad behavior and bad choices from a few 2005 grads does not reflect the class as a whole. I'm also pretty sure there were other classes taking part in riots and other celebratory events — maybe even a few of your fellow classmates from '06 played a part in them?

Skolnick writes, "The class of 2005 has set a new low in pathetic-ness. Yet we must remember not every member of the class of 2005 has been responsible for this — just most of them. Now, how many of them are lawyers, doctors or professors? These UMass graduates are disturbingly virtually nonexistent in these professions, unlike the UMass alumni from previous years." I was just wondering how can we become lawyers, doctors and professors within seven months of graduation?

I personally know so many who have started wonderful careers, including myself, individuals who are attending prestigious medical, law and other professional schools since May. So, talk to us in three years, when our law students are lawyers, 10 years when med students are practicing physicians and you are writing editorials in a local townie newspaper.

So, quite frankly, you do not know what you are talking about or anyone who graduated in 2005. I'm sorry, Gilad, that you apparently had a bad run-in with a graduate(s) of '05 and you are obviously very bitter about it. I think you need to get off your high horse and stop being "pompous." Stop acting like you are going on to do big, great things within seven months of graduation, i.e. practicing law or medicine. The column you wrote was a disgrace and I am very disappointed in the editorial staff for allowing something of this nature to be published in our school paper.

Lisa Nims
UMass alumna

SHAMEFUL ACTS OF A COLUMNIST

Gilad Skolnick's column, "A Class to Forget," in the Daily Collegian on Nov 18 is a disgrace and should be humiliating for him as a student and a writer. Not only does it anger our class that he can be so disrespectful, but as a writer for our university, he should be ashamed of himself for stereotyping and calling us a "horrid class" and saying that a "UMass degree will now mean something; no longer will it be diluted by the class of 2005 hooligans."

He states in his embarrassing column, "Now, how many of them are lawyers, doctors or professors? These UMass graduates are disturbingly virtually nonexistent in these professions, unlike UMass alumni from previous years." First of all, to be a lawyer, doctor or professor involves one to go to graduate school and since we graduated not even seven months ago, this is impossible. But don't you worry, many of us will aspire to become doctors and lawyers and not to mention worthy columnists.

Gilad, do not put the class of 2005 to shame by your ridiculous theories and assumptions, because you are the one that sounds pathetic. As a proud member of the class of 2005, you do not have any right to bash my entire class in the way you did. The world would be a better place if people like you had respect and admiration for others, especially your fellow classmates and friends. How dare you write a column like that in my college paper?

Mollie Asen
UMass student

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS&LIVING

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Bright Eyes' newest album goes live

Bright Eyes

8/10

Motion Sickness
Saddle Creek

After releasing two separate albums in 2005, the next step for Bright Eyes, the singer-songwriter persona of Conor Oberst, was to release a live album. It is called "Motion Sickness" and it includes 15 songs as performed during his touring schedule this past year in support of "I'm Wide Awake, Its Morning." It contains such new favorites such as "Train Under Water," "Landlocked Blues" and "We're Nowhere, and It's Now." It also contains some rare tracks and some covers, all done in true Bright Eyes fashion.

It may be true that we're all so sick of mopey singer-songwriters with mop-top hair and a drinking problem. But this album goes beyond it all. It allows for comfort in the sadness that Oberst experiences. This album contains the songs "Method Acting," "Make War" and "A Scale, A Mirror, and Those Indifferent Clocks" (the former two are from "Lifted or the Story is in the Soil, Keep Your Ear to the Ground" and the latter is from "Fevers and Mirrors"). It contains a cover of the late Elliott Smith's song "The Biggest Lie," which is almost as sad as the original. The quiet guitar riffs in the background paired with Oberst's vocals are suggestive of the late Smith's original recording that is almost as sad as his untimely death in 2003. The CD also contains the song "True Blue" (originally a B-side on the single for "Lua") which is comforting in the fact that it expresses the importance of being honest, or "true blue." The lyric "I don't know much about you/but I like you because you're true blue" is honest in that all that we ask for in sincerity in every relationship that we dive into.

A moment of fun arises when track 12 comes on. It is a song called "Mushaboom," originally recorded by Canadian singer-songwriter Feist. The tambourine in this song relieves a fun dance-like side of Oberst that few get to see. And then the tone goes right back into gloom as the song ends.

The whole album has an obvious political theme. In many of the songs, he changes the lyrics to fit his severely anti-President Bush attitude. For example, in the song "At the Bottom of Everything," he changes a verse to say, "We must hold up in the bunker where the dying solider laughs." Further, he prefaces the song "When the President Talks to God" by saying "This next song is for our ignorant, arrogant, and most of all, incompetent president." Throughout this track, the crowd expresses their agreement with Oberst and his anti-Bush attitude. It prompts Oberst to put more and more of his enraged attitudes into the song. By the end, it almost seems like Oberst is going to head a riot against the government and its policy-making leaders.

The key to Bright Eyes is that he doesn't have to be perfect in order to be amazing. Oberst is off-key at times. He messes up the lyrics. Often, the guitar solos are not consistent. This album does not sound beautiful. It sounds raw and unrefined. But it captures the tone of a Bright Eyes live show where the only thing that really matters is the emotion that fills each song. You can almost smell the alcohol under his breath. It is somehow comforting and makes you want to tip the bottle yourself.

BY ALLIE ROTH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

COURTESY AND ©2005 CAPITAL CITY SHOWTIME/FRONTLINE MANAGEMENT GROUP, INC./SCHISM MAG.COM

Northampton dances the night away to Sharon Jones and co.

BY BRADLEY FARBERMAN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

One would have been hard-pressed to find a still booty at the Iron Horse Friday night because everyone was shakin' it to Sharon Jones and the Dap-Kings. Fresh off a trip to Canada and having spent most of the year touring the United States and Europe (including a stop at Late Night with Conan O'Brien back in January), Jones and co. were in rare form this weekend, tearing the roof off of Northampton's best venue with their vintage funky soul.

In the tradition of groups like the Funk Brothers, the Stax Cats and the JBs, the Dap-Kings, from Brooklyn, NY, are carrying the torch for soul music into the new millennium. The octet, comprised of bass, drums, two guitars, trumpet, tenor sax, baritone sax and tambourine, can pump out grooves all night long, each one funkier than the last. And, as their sound is supernaturally tight, they're fit to back vocalists of the highest caliber.

In the tradition of a James Brown or Aretha Franklin-type, Sharon Jones is a vocalist on that level and once she fell in with the Dap-King crew, the deal was sealed. The rest is history: two records (2002's "Dap Dippin'" and 2004's excellent "Naturally") in the bag and countless shows beneath their belts, Jones and the Dap-Kings were poised to take Northampton.

And take it they did. Following a mellow solo set by the talented Julian Velard (also from New York City), which included a take on Michael Jackson's "The Way You Make Me Feel," the Daps took the stage, fronted by band member Binky Griptite, for a few of the Dap guitarist's original tunes.

This allowed the sizable audience to whet their appetites. But the real sparks flew when Ms. Jones, introduced as "110 pounds of soul," took the stage. Pint-sized, dynamic and brimming with energy, Jones held the audience in the palm of her hand for the duration of the performance.

Running through tunes off both of her albums, the band never let up for a second, and the audience was transported to a sweaty dive bar in Georgia sometime in the early '60s. The grooves grew hot, the floor grew crowded, the band was surrounded by chicken wire, and the night stretched on, bolstered by Jones' powerful voice and incomparable stage presence. Burners like "Your Thing is a Drag" and "Pick It Up, Lay It In The Cut" even featured audience members up on stage, dancing with Jones (the latter song featured dance moves by local talent Sonya Kitchell, who played earlier in the night).

Other tunes had more of an agenda. A funk version of fellow Brooklynite Woody Guthrie's timeless "This Land Is Your Land," featuring an intense horn intro, sprung up midway through the set (following a rant on Bush) to remind everyone in attendance of the situation our country is in and that funk isn't all fun and games.

But, as is customary at a Dap-Kings show, no one stopped dancing. And, as the evening grew to a close, Jones and co. treated the Iron Horse to one more number before heading back to Brooklyn, where they had a show the next evening at Park Slope's Southpaw. The audience was returned to a late fall night in western Massachusetts, feeling much funkier than before.

COURTESY PUNCH

Sharon Jones and the Dap-Kings performed Nov. 18 at the Iron Horse in Northampton. Jones and co. are well known for their version of retro Southern soul.

New Music Tuesdays

"An ounce of image is worth a pound of performance" -David Lee Roth

Week 8

Silver Jews

5.5/10

Tanglewood Numbers
Drag City

Four years in the making, "Tanglewood Numbers" is the type of record that seems destined to be picked apart and debated. The Silver Jews were often regarded as a Pavement side-project due to Stephen Malkmus and Bob Nastanovich's membership, but as the years progressed and Pavement became more time-consuming, it became clear the band was led by singer/guitarist David Berman. As such, Silver Jews tended to focus on lo-fi country-influenced rock and Berman's literate, beat-down storytelling became the focus. On "Tanglewood Numbers," Berman is found emerging from a particularly dark period in his life, one of deep substance abuse and depression, bringing with him a slightly more rocking album than previous efforts while retaining the qualities that his fans have come to expect.

"Punks in the Beerlight" opens with Berman trying to find a bag to vomit in and when his wife and fellow Silver Jew Cassie Berman sings the open-ended line, "If it ever gets really, really bad," Berman can only reply with, "I.et's not kid ourselves, it gets really, really bad." While some songs are less subdued than others, Berman keeps the lyrics downtrodden and whiskey-soaked. In "K-Hole," he willingly offers, "I'd rather live in a trash can than see you happy with another man" over a spacey guitar line.

As on many Silver Jews albums, Malkmus and Nastanovich show up on a few tracks to contribute, and a lot of the songs have their stamps all over them – particularly the numerous instances of trademark Malkmus guitar. "I'm Getting Back Into Getting Back Into You" is dominated by slide guitar which more than makes up for the slightly lackluster performance by Berman. The epic "The Farmer's Hotel" is one of the best tracks on the album and finds the Silver Jews as tight as ever, if not more so.

Still, though, "Tanglewood Numbers" leaves a lot to be desired. Berman has a knack for painting desolate portraits of people and places, but a lot of the songs seem as go-nowhere as the characters described in the lyrics. "Sometimes a Pony Gets Depressed" is as bizarre as the title indicates, but it's not particularly engaging. Similarly, Berman's strong country leanings on songs like "Animal Shapes," which features the irritating chorus, "God must be carving the clouds into animal shapes," are bound to be a turn-off to many.

"Tanglewood Numbers" is interesting and will certainly please long-time fans, but isn't exciting enough to bring in new fans, nor does it raise the bar for Silver Jews. After four years "Tanglewood Numbers" is a welcome return, but it's not Berman's finest.

Blanketeer

7/10

Blanketeer
Self-released

There are numerous moments on Boston-based Blanketeer's self-titled EP where the band's combination of rich textures and big hooks make them sound like they are bursting at the seams, and that's a good thing. The EP is the first thing that Blanketeer has released but the band sounds like the type of aged and matured band that could do well on the national scene.

With more heart then most pop/rock bands and better hooks and vocals than emo bands, Blanketeer has hit upon a striking, ear-grabbing sound. Layered with distorted guitar and piano and keyboards that add something to the sound – unlike some bands who use keys to create a thin façade of maturity – Blanketeer has a vaguely spacey feel that takes off when the group explodes into huge choruses, such as on "Passing Cars." The band maintains a similar big, sweeping sound throughout the whole EP – which only runs a tight 20 minutes with six tracks – while singer Adam Cooper's excellent falsetto and knack for writing melodies glide through.

Blanketeer has an addictive sound, the opening track "Excuses" is an immediate grabber and the EP barely lets go of the listener after that. The six tracks breeze by like a warm gust of wind and the band maintains a mood that is just as affable. The acoustic guitar strums of "Hit From a Miss" shimmer nicely above the heavily distorted electric and the rhythmic riff that kicks off and propels. "Who Wants You Then" also stands out.

Blanketeer could definitely make an impact based on this EP; they are a very talented band and they have hit upon a type of music that is effective and very likeable. With songs like the ones on this release the band has marked themselves as a local act with a lot of promise for the future.

BY NICK ROMANOW
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Toothfairy

5/10

Formative
Hush Records

Slowly following the release of The Postal Service's debut album, indie kids came stumbling out of their basements thinking they too could recreate what Ben Gibbard and Jimmy Tamborello made. One of these kids is Chad Crouch. Crouch created a side project from his day job, Blanket Music, and called it Toothfairy.

Besides being in two different music projects with bad names, Crouch has a lot going for him. Toothfairy's debut album "Formative" is at times a successful spin off The Postal Service. The music has its own original moments and its own unique samples and beats, but it also has its flaws.

While The Postal Service has a louder sound with guitar and sometimes drumming, Toothfairy doesn't ever get too loud. This could come in handy when you want music to listen to while your roommate is sleeping. Oh, now Crouch's band names make sense...

With another different twist than The Postal Service, Toothfairy refers back to the earlier songs in later ones on the album. This makes the album confusing because you think the album is skipping (the beats to the music don't help that, either).

Unfortunately, the album gets boring after five songs. Maybe an entire album of a new side project for Crouch was too much; an EP would have been fine.

The lyrics are fine in small doses since they are about him as if he is still in high school trying to make his favorite girl swoon. Crouch is too old for this tirade, but he knows that since he mocks himself in the first song of the album.

Luckily for us, the album is only nine songs long and they aren't that long so perhaps you could just fall asleep and miss the entire second half of the album. But if you don't, the album isn't really that bad after all, it is only a side project. But again, so is The Postal Service.

Crouch is not the first indie kid to take his laptop out of the basement and into the studio and he will definitely not be the last.

Madonna

7.9/10

Confessions on a Dance Floor
Warner Brothers

Back in 1985, the year when Marty Mickfly went back to the future in a Delorean and the Boston Celtics were in between NBA Championships, a young woman named Madonna took the world by storm.

Twenty years later, Marty Mickfly is on DVD and the Celtics can't win two games in a row, but Madonna is still around. Actually, more or less she is back with the release of her new album, "Confessions on a Dance Floor."

"Confessions on a Dance Floor" is the follow-up to "American Life," Madonna's 2003 album – to make a long story short, it was below average for someone of her caliber.

"Confessions on a Dance Floor," unlike "American Life," is a return to form for the material girl – the 1980s material girl, that is.

The album is full of retro-sounding dance beats with plenty of loops and samples. Each song on the album even loops to the next, making it feel as if the 12 songs are really just one long song. Fortunately there are 12 different songs on the album. Who would really want to listen to one really long song like that or better yet, who could dance that long to one song?

One of the best things about Madonna is that she actually writes her own songs, unlike her clones that the '90s spawned. Despite the fact that her songs lyrics are simple, they do carry weight. Especially the song "I Love New York," which talks about Madonna's love for America but hatred for President Bush. This love is kind of ironic since she no longer lives in the United States; she now lives in Europe.

One of the best things about 2005 is the fact that politics can easily be found and heard in pop music regardless of what direction the artist or musician favors.

Another standout song is "Isaac." "Isaac" could be more controversial than "I Love New York." Since it carries a spiritual vibe and has Jewish chants throughout the song, many people have started complaining about it. These complaints are useless in the end; the song is actually good and Madonna loves controversy so they won't get much accomplished.

"Confessions on a Dance Floor" is one of Madonna's top five albums of her career and might just revive her career with yet another generation of pop music fans.

BY TIM MCCALL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Beware of the Freshman 15

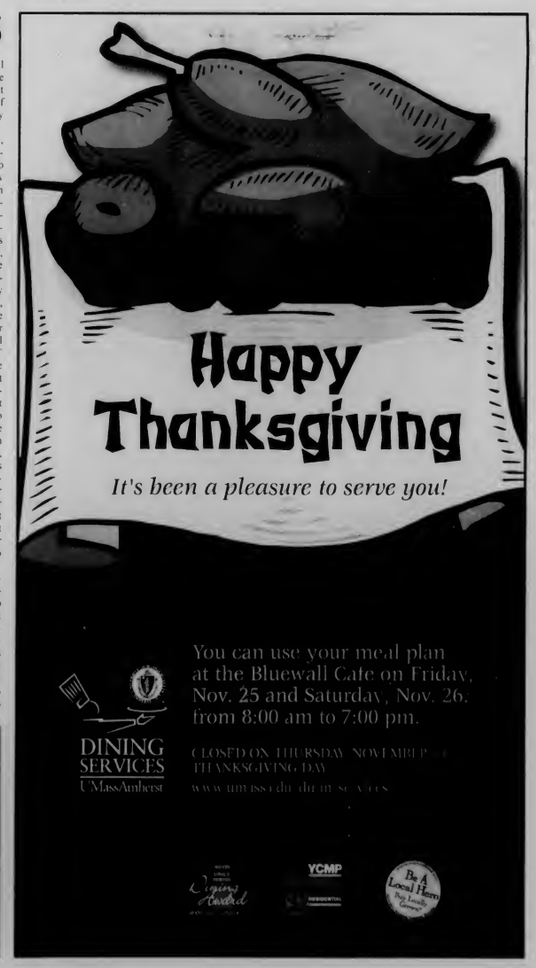
Toast to your Health

Mindy Jitmanoowan

All prospective college students are terrified of it and all current college students have seen it – we have all known or at least heard stories of a freshman, or even any college student, suddenly finding that they are no longer fitting into their once baggy clothes. It might have been your roommate, an old friend from home, or even you, but take a look around UMass – chances are good that the person sitting next to you in class or walking by you has gained some weight since attending college. These mysterious pounds, most likely gained during freshman year, are commonly called the Freshman 15.

Many students ask why this is. UMass is all about walking 20 minutes to get to class and not being able to eat breakfast or lunch due to the work load in your schedule. That is the problem. Since you spend all day walking and not eating, the first thing that you do when you come back home for the day is stuff yourself with food. This is what causes weight gain, since most people end up binge eating because they feel as if they need to make up for lost time and food. But everyone can avoid this by eating a breakfast to start their day. Breakfast is truly the most important meal of the day as it recharges your body after a night of fasting. As busy or tired as you are, take 10 minutes out of your sleep time to wake up and at least prepare a small breakfast. For a quick and healthy fix, try cereal with milk, a bagel, or a breakfast bar to start your day out right. Try to eat within an hour of waking up, as doing this will boost up your metabolism, wake your brain up to prepare it for the day and help control pigging out later in the day.

With breakfast, students are less likely to pack in one sitting when they come home for the day. Clinical studies have actually shown that teenagers who eat breakfast every day are thinner overall than those who don't. Caren Weiner from the University Health Services Nutrition Department also suggests that students should snack healthy foods all throughout the day. "I like to see students snacking every 3 to 4 hours," she says. "The last thing you're going to want to do is dump the food on you all at once." So put that energy bar or banana in your bag, because constant healthy snacking will help you control your hunger later on in the day.



A healthy diet is also maintained by a steady amount of exercise. Incoming freshmen, who once were active in high school sports and PE, realize it is hard to find time to exercise between classes, studying and socializing. Many college students do not have enough time in the day to go out to a gym to get exercise. But who needs an expensive gym when UMass is the perfect playground? Instead of hopping on those buses to get around campus or even to the town of Amherst, think again. Put on those sneakers and treat yourself to the beauty of our college and town. Also, stop taking the elevator and use the stairs – chances are by the time you get an elevator, you will already be up or down those stairs and feeling good. Just remember the principle rule of exercising – any kind of activity is better than nothing at all.

When first coming to college, freshmen are also struck by sudden freedom. New friends, no parents and chances of new experience can really pack on those pounds. Students are bombarded with the countless choices of foods, snacks and beverages. No longer are parents there to tell their children what, how much and when to eat. The UMass dining halls provide students with an amazing variety of food choices – with pizza, pasta, and ice cream right at the tips of their fingers, no wonder college students are gaining all this weight. For overexcited DC enthusiasts, Weiner has some advice: "Be choosy with what you put on your plate. For buffet-styled meals, walk around first and look at what they have to offer. Pick up a good portion size and if you are still hungry when you're done with the first plate, remember that you can always go back for more." Alcohol consumption is also a large factor in college weight gain. A beer has about 150 calories and light beer has 100 calories. And just because wine and hard liquor seem lighter, the calories are no less than light beer.

Although frustrating, remember that weight gain during college is a common response to adjusting to a new environment and that you're not alone in trying to squeeze into those suddenly tight jeans. For questions or concerns about any nutritional issues, contact the Nutritional Department at Health Services or the UMass Dining Services Nutrition.

Write for Arts!!!

Paid editor positions also open. Apply today at the Collegian in the Campus Center basement.

A look back on 2005

AWARDS from page 8

KAREN WINGER/COLLEGIAN

Junior tailback Steve Baylark led the Minuteman offense this season, rushing for 1,057 yards and nine touchdowns. Baylark also had two TDs receiving.

tied for third.

Runner-up: Brandon London, junior wide receiver: After changing his number to 81 prior to the season to honor his favorite player, Terrell Owens, London one-upped the displaced Philadelphia Eagles wideout. While T.O. isn't going to play the whole NFL season because of what could be listed as an injury to his mouth, London stepped up his game by a few levels this year and played through a broken bone in his right hand during the last few weeks of the season.

Actually, he didn't just play – he tied J.J. Moore's school record with 13 receptions against Hofstra on Saturday. His 60 receptions this season more than doubled the total of any other player on the roster, and they were a huge improvement over his 34 as a sophomore.

Defensive Player of the Year

James Ihedigbo, junior strong safety – It's scary to see that a member of the secondary can lead his team in tackles for loss with 12 and in sacks with 7.5. His 33 solo tackles were second best on the Minutemen, and his 58 total takedowns were good for third.

He is the best blitzer on the team, and he is probably the last person in the league who an opposing player wants to get hit by. Just ask UNH quarterback Ricky Santos, who was rung up by Ihedigbo on the first play of the game on Oct. 29.

The Amherst native – who also intercepted two passes, broke up another three and forced a fumble – could be the most fun player on the defensive side of the ball to watch in the whole league.

Runners-up: Jason Hatchell, sophomore linebacker – After seeing limited action on defense in 2004 and tearing his ACL last spring, it was fair to say that Hatchell came out of nowhere this year to record 107 total tackles, 45 more than Brad Anderson, who was second on the Minutemen.

Shannon James, senior free safety: It would have been easy to give this award to James, the biggest football superstar the Pioneer Valley has seen in quite some time, but he'll get his due from plenty of other places. James' 20 career interceptions lead all Division 1 active players. He has a nose for the ball, picking off four of those passes this season, and he also scooped up three fumbles. Of those seven turnovers, he took two of them to the house.

Special Teams Player of the Year

Christian Koegel, junior punter – He was as much of a weapon on this team as anyone they had. Every single time the Minutemen were in a battle for field position late in the game, Koegel came through, and he was especially key for this reason in the 10-7 thriller over James Madison on Oct. 15.

His 43.0 yards per punt were tops in the A-10 by nearly three full yards, but it was his accuracy and ability to float punts inside the 10-yard line that made him so fun to watch. He dropped 18 punts inside the opponents' 20-yard line and only let five sail into the end zone – all season.

Rookie of the Year

Liam Coen, freshman quarterback – After Tim Day went down in the second game of the year, Coen stepped in and proved he was deserving of the starting job. He almost rallied the Minutemen from a 17-0 fourth-quarter deficit against the Raiders that day and went on to win his next five games. In the nine games he started this season, UMass went 6-3, and two of those losses were within a touchdown.

He completed 175-of-274 passes for 2,175 yards and 10 touchdowns, and his seven interceptions were tied for the third-fewest picks in the A-10 among quarterbacks who played in at least 10 games.

Breakout Performer of the Year

Rasheed Rancher, sophomore wide receiver – It was only a matter of time until the 6-foot-5 wideout made his presence felt in the UMass offense, and though it appeared he would have an extended role this year as opposed to last, he became extremely important in terms of the emergence of Coen after J.J. Moore was lost for the season.

When Rancher and London were on the field together, they proved to be almost unstoppable for opposing defensive backs because of their size and speed. He had three touchdown grabs on the year, but two of them should stick out for awhile. He caught Coen's second touchdown pass against Colgate on a five-yard inside slant to cut the margin to 17-14, but even more impressive was his 84-yard score against Delaware, the second longest scoring play in school history.

Twelfth Man of the Year

Tim Day, senior quarterback and wide receiver – This could be renamed the "Tim Day Award" after what he did for the team this year. After losing his job to Coen, he could have destroyed the locker room if he wanted to, but he chose to help Coen and later the offense by stepping in as a wide receiver.

Day made two significant relief roles as a quarterback, but the most significant was in the comeback win over defending national champion James Madison. Trailing 7-0 in the fourth quarter and with Coen on the sidelines after suffering a concussion, Day led the team to 10 points and the win.

Again, after Coen took his job back the following week, Day never complained.

Jeff Howe is a Collegian Columnist. He can be reached at JeffHowe@DailyCollegian.com.

Minutemen looking to carry momentum into tough week

HOCKEY from page 8

KAREN WINGER/COLLEGIAN

Senior forward Jamie Solon has a goal and an assist for a total of two points this season. Solon and UMass face No. 5 Vermont tonight.

Colorado College visits Amherst as one of the best teams in all of college hockey. This past weekend the Tigers were able to sweep Michigan Tech by way of two consecutive shutouts. On the weekend the Tigers outscored their opponent 8-0.

This season the Tigers are led by star senior Brett Sterling. The veteran leads the CC pack with 22 points on 12 goals and 10 assists in the 14 games he has played in this season. He is one of four Tigers to have recorded 10 points this season.

Also, CC's net is guarded by one of the nation's top goaltenders in Matt Zaba. His 1.69 goals against average and .936 save percentage are good for fifth and ninth, respectively, in the nation.

The Tigers' Colorado companion, the Denver Pioneers, will be the worst team the Maroon and White will face this week. That statement is, however, relative in this case because they are still very good.

The Pioneers will be the fourth consecutive ranked opponent the Minutemen will face. They make the trip to Amherst fresh off of a heartbreaking defeat at the hands of No. 10 Minnesota Golden Gophers by a count of 4-3.

In that game, the Pioneers were in control 2-0 early but couldn't fend off the Gophers' comeback attack.

Denver returns 13 letter-winners from last season's championship club including pre-season All-American selections Gabe Gauthier and Matt Carle.

Gauthier enters his senior campaign fresh off his best season in Denver. Last year he scored a career-high 57 points (26 goals and 31 assists), and so far in 2005 he has 14 points on five goals and nine assists.

Carle returns as one of the top defensemen in college hockey. The co-captain (along with Gauthier) has once again not disappointed for the Pioneers. He is fourth on the team this season in points with 13, just one behind Gauthier.

After this weekend the road doesn't get any easier for the Minutemen. After Denver leaves town, UMass will host Merrimack on Dec. 6 then play a home-and-home series with Boston College on Dec. 9 and 10.

Belichick coaches with heavy heart

By Matt Cohen/Collegian Sentinel

Steve Belichick (seen here celebrating with his son Bill after the Patriots' Super Bowl win last year) died on Saturday night.

FOXBOROUGH, Mass. (AP) – Steve Belichick, the father of New England Patriots head coach Bill Belichick, died Saturday night of heart failure. He was 86.

"I coached this game with a heavy heart," Bill Belichick said after Sunday's 24-17 win over the New Orleans Saints. "My dad passed away. I found out about it the middle of last night."

The Patriots' coach learned his meticulous game preparation by watching his father, an assistant coach at Navy for 33 years.

"Obviously, he had a tremendous influence on my life personally, and particularly in the football aspect," Bill Belichick said. "It was great to be able to share the tremendous memories with him and some of our recent successes."

Patriots owner Robert Kraft presented Belichick with the game ball after Sunday's game in honor of his father's memory.

"I know how important his father was to him, having him [Steve] here at training camp every year," quarterback Tom Brady said. "And he was a great man and he raised a great son."

Steve Belichick was a familiar face around Gillette Stadium, and was the first person Bill Belichick embraced after New England's 24-21 win over Philadelphia in February's Super Bowl, the team's third championship in four years.

Linebacker Tedy Bruschi doused the duo with a container of icy-cold liquid.

"I was coming up with the bucket and I saw Bill embracing his father. I thought, "What a sweet moment. Aw, I'll get them both,'" Bruschi said Sunday.

"[Steve Belichick] was around a lot, but you had to sort of twist his arm to get a lot of words out of him. ... Like father, like son," Bruschi said.

The elder Belichick, a Struthers, Ohio native, played football and basketball at Case Western Reserve University, graduating in 1941.

He played fullback with the Detroit Lions for a year, where he was a teammate of Byron "Whizzer" White, who went on to become a Supreme Court Justice.

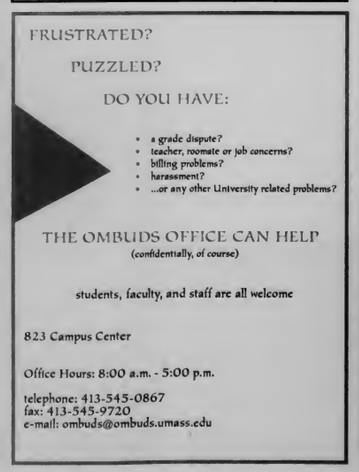
The elder Belichick served in the Navy during World War II. After the war, he was head football, basketball and track coach at Hiram College for three years. He was an assistant football coach at Vanderbilt and North Carolina, before moving to the Naval Academy in 1956.

He served under seven head coaches, helped coach two Heisman Trophy winners, and helped lead the Midshipmen to seven bowl games. He was also an associate professor of physical training.

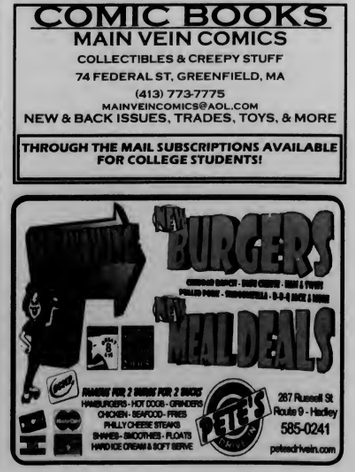
"The Naval Academy suffered a great loss today with the passing of Steve Belichick," Navy athletic director Chet Gladchuk said. "He has been a part of the fabric of this institution for 50 years and has touched the lives of thousands of Midshipmen, staff, alumni and friends."

Bill Belichick said his father watched Navy's 38-17 win over Temple at Annapolis, Md., on Saturday afternoon then watched more college football on television that night.

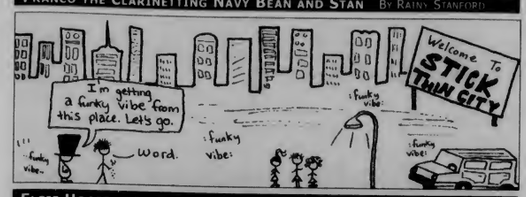
"He went peacefully," his son said.

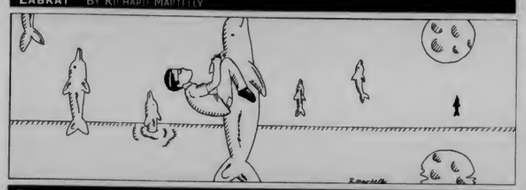


In addition to his son, Steve Belichick is survived by his wife, Jeannette.



– Associated Press





FRANCO THE CLARINETTING NAVY BEAN AND STAN By Rainy Stanford

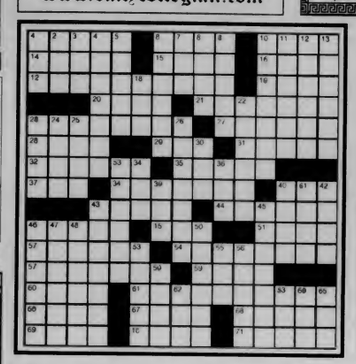
ELSIE HOOPER By Robert D. Krzykowski

LABRAT By Richard Martelly

PAUL By Billy O'Keefe

THE FAMILY MONSTER By Josh Shaler

Quote of the Day



"I'm never gonna survive unless I get crazy like Seal."

—Fugees

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

ACROSS
1 Decorative pitchers
6 Witty remark
10 Frame for panes
14 Virtuous
15 Jazz singer Fitzgerald
16 Slender woodwind
17 Ho-hum
19 Niagara noise
20 March 15
21 Signal silently
23 Pretender
27 Rocks
28 Get-out-of-jail payment
29 Squishy grp
31 Red-faced
32 Out of the cold
35 On the up-and-up
37 Aegean or Adriatic
38 Oxide in pigments
40 Ripen
43 Perking attendant
44 Hamburg native
46 Dirt gunk Jenny
49 Court
51 Surrounded by
52 Port
54 Helpings of food
57 Everlasting
59 Fresh residence
60 Sicilian spouter
61 Cotton plant
66 Bench or bucket
67 Words of understanding
68 Derisive
69 Scottish Gaelic
70 Ruby and Sandra
71 Tarnish

DOWN
1 Ostrich relative
2 Came in first
3 Before, in verse
4 Italian dish
5 Sliding vehicles
6 TV Space Age family name
7 Christmas helper
8 Bullet
9 Whoppers
10 Put in order
11 Occur in great numbers
12 Flew high
13 Controversial doctrine
18 Bottom line
22 Long step
23 Nile bird
24 Stable locks
25 City on the Arno
26 Desk type
30 Very small
33 St. George's monster
34 Slippery catch
36 Comedic jest
39 Lawn moisture
40 Bullets, for short
41 Put on weight
42 Conclusion's
43 Fluctuate
45 Apparel
46 Cheddar, e.g.
47 Working call
48 Scenes of activity
50 Scads
53 Fanatical
55 Line of seats
56 Lock of hair
58 Fail to win
62 Peggy or Pinky
63 By way of
64 Brutal Amin
65 Author Deighton

THE HARP
NEW!! Wireless Internet
OCAPS & All Credit Cards accepted
Irish Pub
November Special!
$1.50 PBR Bottles; Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 A pint / $6.50 a pitcher
Tonight: • TRIVIA NIGHT!
Wed. • Cold Duck Complex
"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments

Submit your comic!
e-mail
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You have difficulty counting past five when you are intoxicated.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
You should have a spin-the-bottle party in your room tonight.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You could really use a mint right about now.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
You will go horseback riding at some point this week.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Your fear of polar bears indicates a severe childhood trauma.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
You are capable of eating an enormous amount of eggs.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Those gloves look absolutely ridiculous on you.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You will come back to school on Sunday ten pounds heavier.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
You need to not take such long naps if you want to fall asleep tonight.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Your new laundry detergent has done wonders for your clothes.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
You should really cut back on your use of duct tape.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You will buy something hot pink tomorrow.

★ Submit your comic ★
e-mail
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Montreal Weekend
New Years Party $129
Complete cocktail age 18
781-979-9001 Call now
montrealexpress.net

APARTMENT FOR RENT

1, 2, 3 & 4 Bedroom spacious apartments, Great location, Bus Route, All utilities included No Fee Call 413-253-3000

EMPLOYMENT

Rent us your ears! Listening experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu Voicemail: 545-6837.

EMPLOYMENT

November 30th is the last day to apply to become a legal assistant with the Student Legal Services Office. Earn 12 credits while gaining valuable experience. Hurry! Contact us at 545-1995 or stop by at 922 Campus Center to pick up an application.

Mystery Shoppers get paid to shop! Up to $150 a day. Training provided Call 1-800-690-1273

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

ROOM FOR RENT

413-335-5226 Mo. to mo. $325 inclusive 20 min to campus

ROOMMATE WANTED

Apartment in Presidential looking for one or two roommates for spring semester male or female 781-608-1051

SERVICES

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

SERVICES

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance. 549-1906

Did you know your rights as a student, tenant, worker and consumer? The Student Legal Services Office can help with your questions. Stop by at 922 Campus Center of call 545-1995.

TRAVEL

ACT NOW – SPRING BREAKERS Book early & Save! Free meals/parties by 11/7. Lowest prices. Be a rep & TRAVEL FREE! Get the ultimate hookups with STA TRAVEL 413-256-1261.

TRAVEL

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

SPRING BREAK FROM $569 BAHAMAS, CANCUN, ACAPULCO, JAMAICA! FREE PARTIES, FREE DRINKS. Sign up early and save. Organize a small group and you travel FREE. Or become a CAMPUS REP and GET PAID COMMISSION on each trip sold. Call today and get started 1-800-GET-SUN-1

WANTED

WANTED: COLLEGIAN EMPLOYEES

The Collegian is hiring paid positions for the spring semester.

Open positions include: Managing Editor, Night and Copy Supervisor, as well as positions in Arts and Living, Editorial and Opinion, photography and graphics.

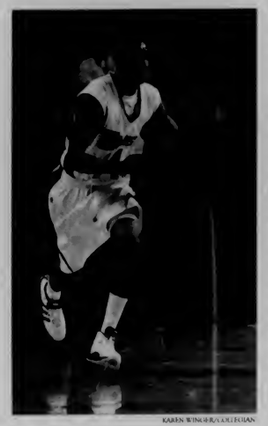
Come to the Campus Center basement to apply, or call (413) 545-3500.

Applications close November 23, 2005.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS TUESDAY

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM



UMass heads south

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

In an attempt to build up a wave of momentum, the Massachusetts men's basketball team (1-0) will look to leave the south with a win as it takes on Davidson College (0-1) in Davidson, N.C. This marks the first road game for the Minutemen, as they beat Hartford 67-62 on Friday night in their season-opener at the Mullins Center.

Davidson is coming off its first game of the season as well, an 84-55 loss at No. 1 Duke on Saturday.

Coach Bob McKillop and the Wildcats are a team that has proven to be a postseason tournament contender, making it to the NIT and NCAA tourney twice. Davidson entered this season after advancing to the third round of the NIT last season.

KAREN WINSER/COLLEGIAN

Freshman point guard Chris Lowe and UMass will be looking to improve to 2-0 tonight at Davidson.

The story for the 2005-06 season is that one of the team's deadliest shooters, who is third on Davidson's all-time three-point list, also happens to be the coach's son. Matt McKillop is the senior leader on the team, and the Minutemen will look to stop him on the perimeter.

With UMass coach Travis Ford viewing his team's defense as its strength, he will look to shut down the Wildcats on that end.

"Right now we've got to hang our hat on defense. Offense can come and go at anytime, especially with our team," Ford said. "Defense is something we can play every night and, luckily, it has been what we've been good at."

UMass is coming off of the win against Hartford, in which defense played a major role for the Minutemen. Junior Stephane Lasme is one player that Ford seeks to utilize as a defender, as he was effective on Friday.

"[Lasme] plays defense and he plays hard. He's got to start scoring around the bucket a little better, but we need him on the court as much as possible," Ford said.

On the offensive end, junior Rashaun Freeman is the one who gets it done for UMass. The team's leading scorer during the 2004-05 season put up 25 points in the Hartford win and continues to be one of the top threats in the Atlantic 10.

Freshman Chris Lowe stepped it up in his first college game on Friday, playing 25 minutes and scoring eight points. Senior Jeff Viggiano is a player that Ford sees as the main leader of the team, and since his performance on Friday certainly displayed that, he will look to take his team back to Amherst with a 2-0 record.

One aspect the Minutemen will have to fix is its play early in games. Against Hartford, UMass stepped onto the court at the Mullins Center with shades of anxiety and tenseness, before loosening up and taking the win.

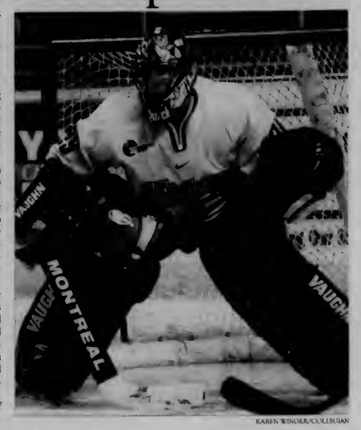
The Minutemen cannot be tense if they want to shut down the likes of Southern Conference Player of the Year Brendan Winters, who has the type of versatility to hurt a team offensively and defensively.

The 6-foot-5, 205 pound senior from Denver, Colo. has shooting ability, averaging 16.7 points per game, as well as a knack for the ball on defense, with 76 career steals. Winters was able to score 17 points against the Blue Devils, despite going against the top team in the nation.

UM faces top teams

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

This year's Thanksgiving holiday may not prove to be too kind to the Massachusetts hockey team (2-7 1-5 Hockey East). Beginning tonight at Vermont and continuing this weekend in Amherst, the Minutemen are set to face three of their toughest opponents of the season.



UMass will travel to Burlington tonight for a mid-week match-up against the No. 5 Catamounts (8-2 3-2 HEA) then will return home on Friday and Saturday nights to welcome No. 3 Colorado College (11-2-1 6-1-1WCHA) and back-to-back national champion No. 13 Denver (5-5-2 3-3-2 WCHA) to the Mullins Center.

This week's triple threat of the Catamounts, Tigers and Pioneers share a combined 22-9-3 record in 2005. Also, the Maroon and White have seen little success against these opponents, having a combined 9-27-4 all-time record against them, including a 9-23-4 mark against UVM.

They are, however, coming off of a shocking upset of the No. 14 Boston University Terriers on Nov. 12. The Minutemen downed the Terriers, 4-2, at the Mullins Center.

In that game, senior co-captain Stephen Werner scored two goals (one shorthanded and one empty-netter) to lead UMass to victory. This came one night after Werner was forced to miss the Minutemen's trip to Northeastern because of the flu.

It was the first victory for the Minutemen in league play and the first win for freshman Jon Quick in HEA competition. The rookie stopped 39 BU shots and was named both the Hockey East Defensive Player of the Week as well as the UMass/Dinn Brothers Athlete of the Week.

KAREN WINSER/COLLEGIAN

Freshman goalie Jon Quick was named the Hockey East Defensive Player of the Week last week following UMass' 4-2 win over BU on Nov. 12.

Werner, Quick and the rest of the Minutemen will have to play as well as they did against the Terriers – and then some – to be successful this week.

The Catamounts enter tonight's game as one of the hottest teams in the conference. The newcomers to the league have proven early that they belong in one of the best conferences in the nation.

UVM is coming off a 3-0 shutout of Merrimack last Friday night. The win was sophomore Joe Fallon's seventh career shutout, which lands him third all-time in school history.

So far this season the Catamounts have thwarted 56 of their opponent's 61 power play opportunities, which is good for second in the country. That number should improve tonight as one of the glaring weaknesses of UMass has been with the man advantage.

As for Friday's opponent,

See HOCKEY on page 6

Handing out some hardware

Jeff Howe

The shock that blindsided the Massachusetts football team on Saturday won't go anywhere for awhile. Neither will the depression, the thoughts of "what if" or the frustration of missing out on the playoffs when teams like Richmond, Lafayette and Colgate all got in.

There was a boatload of anticipation heading into the 2005 season for the Minutemen, feelings in training camp that this group wouldn't just make it to the Division 1-AA postseason – they would make a solid run at the national championship.

But after UMass waltzed into Newark on Nov. 5 and left with the most resounding thumping any team had ever given to coach K.C. Keeler and his Fightin' Blue Hens, everything just went sour.

No one could argue that the Minutemen should have beaten Army the following week; the Black Knights simply played better football, and it took a few gigantic plays, like a blocked punt and forced fumble that both resulted in Maroon and White touchdowns, to keep UMass within striking distance at the end.

KAREN WINSER/COLLEGIAN

Redshirt freshman quarterback Liam Coen took over the starting job in the second game of the season and led UMass to a 6-3 record in his nine starts.

At the time everyone was leaving West Point on that Saturday the 12th, the UMass camp knew what it needed to do at Hofstra: Win. That was it. There was no need for a huge win, or the combination of a win and another team's loss; the Minutemen just needed to win the game, and they could ride their coattails straight into the playoffs this weekend.

But the Army loss beat them up – a lot worse than anyone outside the team on a day-to-day basis could have ever imagined – and the speedy Pride were able to do just enough on their home turf to wear down the visiting Minutemen.

And just like that, the season was lost. Seven wins and four losses have never been enough to deserve an at-large bid in the tourney, no matter how much talent or how good the coaching staff is, especially when a team drops three of its last four games.

Everything just ended so quickly.

When spring ball rolls around, and it comes time to prepare for next fall, the what-ifs will begin to fade, and in five years when people look back at the 2005 Minutemen, there will be a lot to reflect on – the raw talent, endless potential and a few individual stars who could be on their way to breaking into the big show on Sundays.

Shannon James will be there next year; R.J. Cobbs might get his shot, too. In two years, Brandon London will get some consideration, and if someone like Liam Coen can refine his game over his last three seasons in Amherst, he's got a shot, too.

But this isn't about five years from now, or next year or even spring practice – it's about what just happened in the Pioneer Valley over the last three months. There were some individual players who broke out through the team philosophy of play, and for the second year in a row, I will hand out some Collegian Sports hardware to those who outshined the rest.

Offensive Player of the Year

Steve Baylark, junior tailback

He was the catalyst of the offense for the third year in a row, and he is now a repeat offender for this award. When he went, the offense went. It was as easy as that.

The powering runner loved to punish defenders who tried standing in his path, and they were often left standing in his wake. His most amazing run of the season proved to be the only offensive touchdown UMass scored against Army. After breaking out to the left side, it appeared Baylark wasn't going to reach any further than the 10-yard line, but he broke tackle after tackle after tackle – seven of them in all – on his way to a 17-yard score.

Baylark amassed 1,057 rushing yards this season, and if he crosses the 1,000 yard plateau again next year, he will become just the second player (former UNH Wildcat and current Chicago Bear Jerry Azumah is the other) in NCAA Division 1-AA history to do so in all four years of eligibility.

He was third in the Atlantic 10 in rushing yardage, and his nine rushing scores marked him

See AWARDS on page 6

Minutewomen looking to run

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team will hit the road one more time before Thanksgiving, as they travel to Ypsilanti to face Eastern Michigan (1-0) tonight at 7 p.m. at the Convocation Center.

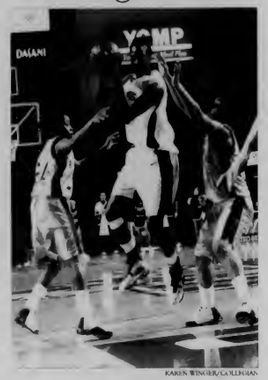
The Minutewomen (1-1) are coming off of an impressive 64-55 win over Holy Cross on Sunday and will look to gain their second consecutive win tonight.

Eastern Michigan's best player, senior Ryan Coleman, has been out of the lineup so far this season, but that does not make the game a cakewalk for UMass.

"They [Eastern Michigan] are an extremely physical team," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "They are very aggressive, and they are rough in the paint. Our kids are going to be in for a rude awakening if they are not ready to go."

The Eagles are coming off of a victory of their own, as they opened their season with a win over Central Connecticut State on Friday night. The Eagles were the preseason favorite to win the MAC West.

Eastern Michigan returns nine letter-winners from last season, including four starters. Eagles' senior forward Nikki Knapp and junior Sarah VanMetre were the team's leading scorers in the opener.



UMass will be facing an Eastern Michigan team that has won its last nine games at home and has a 40-10 record at home over the past five seasons.

The Minutewomen are a team still looking to find their identity in the early-goings of the new season. Dacko has made it clear that she wants a running team, and although they had 20 points off of turnovers in their last game, the Minutewomen have not yet reached perfection.

"I want a team that is very competitive on the floor," Dacko said. "[I want] a team that knows that they can go out there and leave it all on the court and play as hard as they can, and respond to somebody being aggressive with them. Right now, we're not there yet. We have to be able to give back what people are doing to us."

The Minutewomen are still trying to see who is going to be that aggressive force as they move forward and get into the full swing of things in 2005-2006. And as they head into Eastern Michigan, the Minutewomen will have to focus on their transition defense and aggressiveness if they want to come back to Amherst with a 2-1 record.

"Whether we get points off the fast break or turnovers, we want to run," Dacko said. "We're not going to stop running. We have got to get these kids in better and better shape. The key to that is keeping our post players on the floor to get the rebounds."

KAREN WINSER/COLLEGIAN

Junior forward Tamara Tatham and UMass will travel to Eastern Michigan tonight to face the Eagles.

Sophomore Pam Rosanio and senior Katie Nelson combined for 79 minutes on Sunday against Holy Cross, and while Dacko does not want them to have to play all those minutes, Rosanio and Nelson will be running the floor all game until somebody steps up to help.

"I don't want them to play as much," Dacko said. "I look for Sakera [Young] to step it up a little more. I would like to see Alisha [Tatham] step up even more, and I would also like to see Stefanie [Gerardot] step up."

While Rosanio and Nelson are looked upon to lead the team with so much playing time, Nelson does not mind it one bit, even if it means staying out there for the whole game again tonight.

"Being a fifth-year senior, I definitely feel more aches and pains than I have in past years," Nelson said. "But I have been playing a lot of minutes since I was a freshman, so I am used to it. It is not something I really think about, so it doesn't affect me negatively."

What's the SCORE?
Find out Dec. 10th!

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Wednesday, November 23, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXVI Issue 53

Airlines await Thanksgiving travel increase

By Andrew Shapira
The Daily Free Press (Boston U.)

Boston—With Thanksgiving two days away, aviation officials expect an increase this week in airline traffic nationwide, including heavier volume at Logan Airport.

Phil Orlandella, a Logan spokesman, said airlines have told the airport they expect their flights to be 90 to 100 percent full this week.

On an average day at Logan, 77,000 people fly in and out, and Orlandella estimated that this number would increase by about 3,000 per day during the holiday season.

Sunday will be the most heavily trafficked day because people will need to return from Thanksgiving vacations in time for work on Monday, Orlandella said.

"That's our biggest day, probably, of the year," he said.

To accommodate the greater volume of travelers, more airport employees, including security officials, will be on hand, Orlandella added.

"Every agency has more people on board this week," he said.

While Orlandella said he was not in a position to comment on the recent radar malfunctions at Logan, which the airport addressed by installing a software patch on Nov. 11, Federal Aviation Administration spokesman Paul Turk said he has heard no safety concerns expressed about Logan's radar.

"We are in the safest period in aviation history," Turk said. "We'd like to continue that pattern."

The properly functioning radar system will make the airlines run more efficiently, Turk said.

"If the radar is performing up to standard, that reduces the potential for delay," he explained.

Turk estimated that nationwide, 21.7 million passengers will board airlines between last Saturday and next Tuesday, noting that the total number of flights will likely be higher than usual levels.

But Turk also said this year's traffic levels may be slightly lower than last year's, due to airlines reducing their capacity with smaller planes.

Turk advised passengers to allow themselves plenty of time before flights and to help security screenings go as smoothly as possible by having photo identification and boarding passes ready, making sure baggage is unlocked, leaving presents unwrapped and being patient.

House rejects higher education spending bill

By Robert Faturechi
Daily Bruin (UCLA)

LOS ANGELES—In a surprising move, the U.S. House of Representatives rejected a major higher education spending bill last week that would have frozen federal student aid at 2005 levels.

Critics say a freeze on aid, combined with inflation, would take a big hit on college students in the new fiscal year.

Twenty-two House Republicans broke ranks and voted Thursday against the legislation, marking the first time this measure – an annual bill that is extremely important for higher education – has been rejected since the Republicans took control of the House nearly a decade ago.

The bill was rejected 224 to 209, with 22 Republicans and all Democrats voting against the measure.

The bill's failure came as a shock to many on Capitol Hill, given the Republican Party's reputation for unifying its rank and file in support of legislation supported by party leadership.

Many students and college officials breathed a sigh of relief as the bill's passage was blocked – at least for now. But congressional leaders now have to develop a revised version of the bill, and some worry that the new bill may hurt students more than the rejected version.

"It's disappointing that the federal government isn't prioritizing higher education and the needs of students," said Jeannie Biniek, external vice president of the Undergraduate Students Association Council. "They're bouncing all of the different problems that the federal government has on the students."

The legislation finances education and health care for the 2006 fiscal year, setting funding levels for the Department of Education and the Department of Health and Human Services.

Though college students across the country dodged the potentially damaging measure, some experts say cuts to higher education aid are still looming as elected officials hash out a revamped spending bill.

Maurice Salter, president and CEO of School Loans Corporation, said he believes congressmen may have rejected the bill because they want to reduce aid from 2005 levels in order to cut spending.

"Congress is looking for ways to cut their budget," Salter said. "And when they want to do that, there are straightforward ways they can do that."

Though Congress may be looking to reduce its budget, Salter said the details of reauthorization bills can change right up until Congress votes on the bill.

"The thing about reauthorization is that whatever happens, happens at the last minute," he said.

"There's a message in this," Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., said of the House vote, "and that's that the people of America are only going to accept so many cuts in health care, in Medicaid, in Medicare, in transportation and other vital areas."

Many of the Republicans who voted "no" on the bill – which also includes health care spending – regularly do not support spending on social service programs.

A tweaking of the bill to freeze all spending, including the social service programs affected by the legislation, might tip the balance in favor of passage.

Had the bill passed, and federal funding were frozen at 2005 levels, some higher education aid programs would likely have been cut because of inflation.

"It's really a cut to student aid because there are more students who are going to be eligible (to go to college) plus inflation," said Biniek, who also sits on the board of directors for the United States Student Association. "The average student is going to be stretched a little tighter."

Another aspect of the bill to which some college officials objected was its handling of the Pell Grant program.

Though the federal grant program will likely have a surplus of $500 million by next year, according to the Chronicle of Higher Education, the grants would have remained at a maximum of $4,050 for the fourth straight year, had the bill passed.

Biniek said ebbing college aid would limit students' opportunities during their schooling and in the future.

"After college, students feel like they're less able to go to lower-paying jobs that provide services we need in our community," Biniek said. "And while we're in school, it limits our abilities to take advantage of the many opportunities we have."

The National Institutes of Health would have received a small boost in biomedical research funding for next year, with the bill's passage.

The increase, however, would have been minimal, as the NIH would have received a budget boost of about 0.5 percent, the smallest yearly increase in almost four decades.

House majority leaders extended the vote last week by more than 20 minutes in a failed attempt to persuade the bill's Republican dissenters to support it.

A revamped version of the legislation is expected in December, after a committee made up of senators and congressmen hash out a compromise measure.

Until Dec. 17, nearly three months after the end of the 2005 fiscal year, federal funding for programs affected by the bill will remain at 2005 levels.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., claimed the rejection of the republican's higher education spending bill was a sign of Americans fighting back against cuts in health care and student aid.

Universities monitor Facebook posts, photos

By Sarah J. Augustinas
Northern Star (Northern Illinois U.)

DEKALB, Ill.—Universities across America have found a new way to identify university code violators using only a computer and time.

The online "social network" known as www.facebook.com, which was founded by three Brown College students in 2004, has fallen into a pocket of political controversy.

Several colleges and universities have begun to monitor the Web site, which allows students to post personal information and pictures on a profile. Some students have posted images or statements which implied their involvement in illegal activities.

Students cited the First Amendment right of free speech and the right to privacy as reason for fighting the judicial panels' actions.

"I was surprised because I was not aware that the First Amendment was limited; that [the university] is able to restrict my right, especially on Facebook, which is a separate entity," said Ryan Miner, a Duquesne University sophomore, in an article published by the Duquesne Duke.

Miner was punished by the university for posting a comment perceived to be homophobic and ordered to write a 10-page essay, which he refused to do.

"Assuming they are being punished for the conduct itself, then I don't see a First Amendment problem," said Mark Cordes, a Northern Illinois University law professor.

Cordes said if an illegal activity has occurred, proper action may be taken.

"If someone conducted illegal activities and wrote a newspaper article about it, you would expect them to be punished," Cordes said.

Additional posts and pictures have led to investigations going so far as to include the Secret Service.

Secret Service agents came to a University of Oklahoma freshman's residence hall March 1 in response to a post which suggested the university's president be replaced with a fish.

"I think we should replace him with your pet fish," the post said. "Or, we could all donate a dollar and raise millions of dollars to hire an assassin to kill the president and replace him with a monkey."

The agents proceeded to ask questions which pertained to the student's medical and criminal history, as well as to ask if he was "obsessed with assassination," according to the Cavalier Daily, the University of Oklahoma campus newspaper.

The University of New Mexico has banned Facebook from campus computers and networks, citing security as its primary reason.

Facebook.com founder Mark Zuckerberh says that despite huge strides in communication technology, young people can still find it hard to meet people.

Additionally, four students from the University of Northern Kentucky received notifications of violations for posts of pictures showing minors consuming alcohol.

Northern Illinois University students were split on how heavily their school should monitor Facebook.

"I think that it's the university's prerogative to decide what to do with those kind of pictures; you're putting them out there," said Sarah Roman, a sophomore political science major.

Grace Rybicki, a junior nursing major, disagreed.

"I think it's a bad thing," Rybicki said. "We're paying to go to school there and I don't think they have a right to invade our privacy."

The 'Super' Gas Gauge

With the recent increase in fuel costs, The Collegian has compiled a list of the area's cheapest gas stations. This week's update is as follows:

"Gas Gauge" prices current as of Monday, Nov. 21, 2005 at 5 p.m.

Lowest:

7-Eleven/Citgo — 1.93
689 Rockland Ave, New Bedford

Pride — 1.95
Chicopee Falls Bridge, Chicopee

BJs — 1.95
360 State Rd, Dartmouth

Cumberland Farms — 1.95
148 Dartmouth St., New Bedford

Global Energy — 1.95
Route 27, Whitman

[illegible] — 1.95
[illegible] Highway, East [illegible]

Tom Energy — 1.95
Route Road, Billerica

Sun — 1.95
192 Boston Rd., Billerica

[illegible] — 2.59
[illegible]

[illegible] — 2.59
[illegible] Ave, Boston

[illegible] — 2.39
[illegible] Tyngsboro

Mobil — 2.39
[illegible] Haverhill

[illegible] — 2.36
[illegible]

Sunoco — 2.35
69 Main St. Sheffield

Mobil — 2.35
147 S Main St, Pittsfield

President George W. Bush pets Star, the national turkey, as he gives it and companion Stripes, Presidential pardons for Thanksgiving. At left, is Tom Fix who raised the turkes.

Chicopee mayor pleads not gulity

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — Chicopee Mayor Richard Goyette pleaded innocent in federal court Tuesday to two counts of exorting $10,000 in campaign donations.

Goyette, 36, was arrested earlier this month and released on personal recognizance. He twice said "not guilty" when the charges were read aloud at his arraignment in U.S. District Court.

Goyette dropped his bid for re-election after his arrest just a week before Election Day. He remains free and is due back in court Jan. 10 for a pretrial conference.

Prosecutors say Goyette took $5,000 cash payments from two city businessmen. In exchange for the money, Goyette allegedly promised one man a city towing contract. Prosecutors say the other man was guaranteed help with a development project that faced hurdles with some city departments.

Goyette has refused to step down before his term expires in January, despite pressure from some residents and elected officials. Michael Bissonnette, Goyette's challenger in this year's mayoral campaign, easily won the Nov. 8 election.

ARTS & LIVING
MERRY CHRISTMAS FROM LEARY
Denis Leary's irreverent Comedy Central special attacks the holiday.
PAGE 3

EDITORIAL/OPINION
MEDIA IS CHANGING
Taking a look at UMass and the use of Tasers by the police force.
PAGE 4

WEATHER
TODAY Flurries, H35°, L24°
TOMORROW Snow/Rain, H48°, L17°
FRIDAY Partly Cloudy, H38°, L17°

SPORTS
KOEGEL HONORED
UMass punter was named A-10 Special Teams Player of the Year
PAGE 8

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3499 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Michael A. Busack
MANAGING EDITOR Cameron J. Woods
BUSINESS MANAGER Hirak Shah
PRODUCTION MANAGER Nicholas Belanger
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Sherri Wolnik
ADVERTISING MANAGER Kerry O'Grady
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Lauren Egavian
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Amanda Allen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Matthew O'Rourke
COPY EDITOR Amanda Allen
EDITORIAL EDITOR Allison Edles
NEWS EDITOR Dan O'Brien
PHOTO EDITOR Kate Sachsenmaier
SPORTS EDITOR Jeff Howe
CIRCULATION MANAGER Thomas Hecht
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Nick Gleason
FINANCE MANAGER Daniel Conti
HUMAN RESOURCE Phil Smoller
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Caren Tortorici
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Nathan Chomsky
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Mackenzie Isler
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Ian Jones
ASSISTANT NEWS Megan Daley
ASSISTANT NEWS Matt Bellivau
ASSISTANT PHOTO Elizabeth Caristi
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eric Athas
ASSISTANT SPORTS Dan Duggan
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Kristen LaLiase

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS ALGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE NEWS IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL 413-545-3500 BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

Campus Perspectives

What are you doing over Thanksgiving break?

Senior

Eat Turkey.

Christopher Ryder

Freshman

Hang out with my firends that I haven't seen in a long time. Watch movies, eat.

Bonnie Solomon

Sophmore

Pick out my X-mas tree, decorate, and hang out with my friends and family.

Greer Gilchrist

Sophmore

I am morally opposed to Thanksgiving, so I'm not doing a whole lot.

Michael Tsapatsaris

UMass Police log

Saturday, Nov. 19

Amanda Paige Boc, 18, of 18 Bravender Road in Duxbury was charged with assault and battery after police responded to calls of a fight in a dormitory. Officers arrived on the fourth floor of Pierpont dormitory in Southwest at 2:45 a.m. on a report of a fight between a male and female. Officers arrived to find a male subject with a bloody nose. Witnesses claimed Boc, the victim's girlfriend, had assaulted him.

Colin R. Bentley, 21, of 396 Highland Avenue in Fitchburg, was arrested at 7:37 p.m. after police found him in possession of a white powdery substance, believed to be cocaine. Three plain-clothed officers were on patrol outside the 311 concert at the Mullins Center when they observed Bentley in a car with four other individuals. Officers noticed that the five people stayed inside the car once it was parked, and described the individuals as "looking nervous." Police allege one of the passengers bent down on the passenger seat and wiped his nose when he came back up. As officers approached the car, Bentley stood up and a bag containing a white powdery substance allegedly fell from his pants.

At 8:03 p.m. a resident of the Van Meter dormitory in Central reported a breaking an entering at her dorm room. She told police she left her door unlocked and returned to find her wallet dumped on the floor. Credit cards, identification cards and $200 cash were missing.

Friday, Nov. 18

At 1:39 a.m. officers on patrol in purple Lot 44 behind Sylvan heard a car alarm, then observed three subjects starting to run away. The officer noticed a Honda Prelude's windshield smashed. The officer caught up with one of the subjects, who was summonsed to court.

Police reported a car window smashed in yellow Lot 11 behind Southwest at 3:05 p.m. The owner of the vehicle was notified.

Jillian Leigh Vest, 19, of 168 Brook Street in Hudson; Timothy Morel, 18, of 366 Main Street in Hudson; Edward F. Igl, of 5 Courtland Avenue in Hudson were all arrested at 7:22 p.m. and charged with underage possession of alcohol and one man was summonsed to court for distributing alcohol to minors. Officers in plain clothes on patrol in red Lot 43 behind Leach dormitory in Northeast observed a car pulling into the lot with individuals who appeared to be under 21-years-old. A female, identified as Vest, walked toward the car carrying an empty bag. The individuals exited the car and began filling the bag with several items of alcohol. Vest was confronted by officers, who confiscated the alcohol.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Michael A. Busack

PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Kate Sachsenmaier

COPY EDITOR
Dan O'Brien

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Amanda Allen

PRODUCTION STAFF
Matthew Fox, Allie Mamone

Hofstra University offers you a future of excellence.

- With more than 140 unique programs in five schools, Hofstra has a program for you in:

  Frank G. Zarb School of Business: M.B.A., M.S., Executive M.B.A. and advanced certificate programs

  School of Education and Allied Human Services: M.A., M.H.A., M.S.Ed., Ed.D. and advanced certificate programs

  Hofstra College of Liberal Arts and Sciences: M.A., Au.D., Ph.D. and advanced certificate programs

  School of Communication: M.A. in Speech Communication and Rhetorical Studies

  New College: M.A. in Interdisciplinary Studies

- With an outstanding, dedicated and accomplished faculty and state-of-the-art educational facilities, Hofstra's resources are among the finest in the country.
- Hofstra is ranked 14th on The Princeton Review's ranking of America's Most Connected Campuses.
- A student-faculty ratio of 14 to 1.
- New technologically-advanced facilities in Hagedorn Hall and C.V. Starr, such as SMART Board™ interactive whiteboards and wireless locations.
- And our location, 25 miles from Manhattan, affords students a suburban setting within an easy commute to the resources of New York City.

For more information, or to arrange a campus tour:
Hofstra University Graduate Admissions
105 Memorial Hall
126 Hofstra University
Hempstead, NY 11549
Phone: 1-800-HOFSTRA, ext. 657
E-mail: graddean@hofstra.edu

HOFSTRA UNIVERSITY.
HEMPSTEAD, NEW YORK 11549 • WWW.HOFSTRA.EDU

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Season's Greetings from Denis Leary

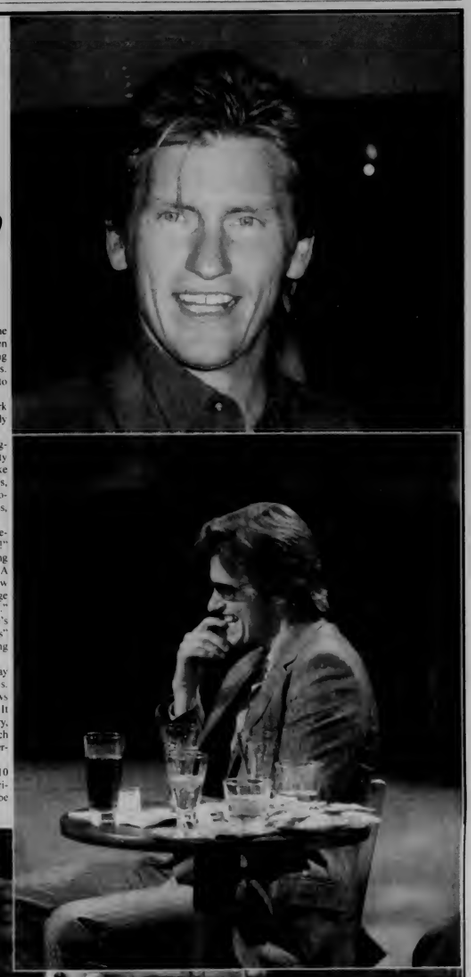
By MATT BASKIN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Denis Leary is not a jolly man. The comedian, who once gave a recovering alcoholic a bottle of whiskey for Christmas, is often described as a curmudgeon, though a certain curse word might be a better fit. While he claims that the gift was an accident, the incident reflects Leary's biting sense of sarcasm and irony, both of which will be on full display Nov. 27 when his aptly titled Christmas special, "Merry Fing Christmas," premieres on Comedy Central.

The forty-eight year old native of Worcester, who attended Boston's Emerson College before making his way into showbiz, has appeared in numerous movies and television shows over the course of his career, dating back to the game show "Remote Control," where he served as a writer. Since then, he has appeared in movies such as "The Ref," "A Bug's Life" and "The Thomas Crown Affair." As a comedian, his famed song "I'm an Asshole" from his "No Cure for Cancer" album is a frequent staple of his stand-up routine, which features cynical, sardonic and hilarious commentary on all aspects of life. In recognition of his illustrious career, he was treated in 2003 to his own roast by the legendary Friar's Club, an honor reserved for the best in the comedy business.

Outside of his professional career, Leary is a dedicated champion of charity work, forming the Leary Firefighter's Foundation in the wake of the Worcester warehouse fire of 1999 to support firefighters from Worcester and beyond. Benefits for the foundation include "The Celebrity Hat Trick," in which celebrities gear up and hit the ice against legendary members of the Boston Bruins. It comes as no surprise that Leary is a hockey fanatic. He also produces the annual Comics Come Home gala, in which comedians descend upon Boston to perform stand-up for charity. The gala has included comedians such as Conan O'Brien, Jon Stewart and Janeane Garofalo.

Less charitable is Leary's take on Christmas, particularly Christmas specials. "Merry Fing Christmas" originated as a card Leary sent out to friends and family for the holidays. "Everyone thought it was funny," he says. "Then came the idea for the video. We decided to make it using claymation, to parody all the traditional Christmas specials. And so we decided to make it an anti-Christmas special, to kick Christmas around the room."



Such an idea sounds like it would send any network running the other way, but according to Leary, "Comedy Central loved the idea, so we ran with it."

When asked to go into specifics, Leary described a segment in which a benevolent Carmen Electra, taking pity on preteen girls and their lack of bosom, decides to take matters into her hands. "The segment is called Tits for Tots, like toys for tots," he says. Though breast implants for adolescents would seem radical enough for most comedians, this is not the case for Leary.

He goes on to mock the war on terror and Christmas specials alike in a segment called "It's Jihad, Charlie Brown!" in which the title character, tired of relentless mocking at the hands of his peers, becomes a suicide bomber. A giddy Leary described it with glee. "And you know how in 'Charlie Brown' all the adults speak in that strange voice? When he goes to heaven, Allah speaks like that." The special also includes Charlie Murphy, of "Chappelle's Show" fame, reading "'Twas the Night Before Christmas" aloud and William Shatner, of "Star Trek" fame, appearing in commercial parodies.

While he realizes that such controversial segments may lead him into trouble, Leary welcomes it with open arms. "I want negative responses from the media ... it draws more people in. I want the Catholic church to ban it." It should make for an interesting holiday season for Leary, who plans to spend Christmas at home with family, which he describes as "very Irish," hinting at their holiday beverage of choice.

"Merry Fing Christmas" premieres Nov. 27 at 10 p.m. on Comedy Central, and if Denis Leary's past contributions to comedy serve as any sort of indicator, it will be well worth watching.

Remember, in relationships, you have to sacrifice to earn the title

Lovers Only
Hannah Drake

Last week, I was informed that my '95 Honda Accord needed another $1000 of work done. That was it. It was time to get another car. If any of you have ever had to do this, then you know it requires hours of test driving and schmoozing with sales people. Some are honest, some help you out and some give car salesmen the reputation that they have. Test-driving and stress took up most of my weekend. My boyfriend came with me. I asked him to come because he's a smart guy and I value his opinions.

Little did he know that a day of test-driving would turn into a weekend, including a fruitless trip to a Greenfield Ford dealer during one of his beloved Sunday Giants football games. How was I supposed to know the dealer wasn't open on Sundays? He missed the whole game, when he thought he was only going to miss the first half.

After his anger subsided, we took my car to a Honda dealer in Northampton to get a trade-in value. Then we schmoozed with the sales person a little more. The last time we were there, my boyfriend didn't say anything. This time, he said a lot, and by the time we walked out of there, none of the salespeople at Honda liked us, because they realized they weren't going to mess with a 21-year-old college girl. They had to contend with her future-lawyer boyfriend.

After we left, he had more ideas. We checked out edmunds.com to find out what people were paying for my chosen car, a 2006 Honda Civic sedan, in this area. Then we e-mailed several Massachusetts Honda dealers with the offer on the table, asking who could beat it. The first person who responded ended up being the guy I leased my new car from. That particular dealership is located in Norwood, which is two hours away.

"Are you sure I have to go?" my boyfriend asked me, realizing that his Monday afternoon and night would be entirely gone. "I have things to do!"

I told him he didn't have to, but I would really like it if he did. He came. With his pounding headache. He was not a happy guy. "I hope you realize I'm sleeping all the way there," he said. I said nothing, but pointed out that I had brought him some snacks, trying to make him forget that we had a two hour drive ahead of us. It didn't work.

He ended up helping me a lot. He basically negotiated the entire deal himself. He will be a good lawyer. The salesman only made $100 profit on the deal.

Despite his unhappiness at spending most of three days helping me work out a car deal, we had some great conversations on the long ride to the dealership. He gave me hugs when he saw I was stressed by the fact that I'd soon be making the largest purchase of my life. He jokingly emphasizing what safety features were available on the car, gently teasing me about my sometimes risky driving.

On the way back, it was late. We were just listening to the radio, and I said, "Thanks so much for all of your help with everything." He simply replied, "Gotta earn the title."

Confused at what he meant, he explained that he couldn't just BE my boyfriend; he had to maintain the title by doing things like sacrificing his free time in order to help me lease my first car, since I had said I wanted him to be there.

I think everyone could learn a lesson from his four little words, "gotta earn the title." It's about not taking your relationship for granted. Girls and guys, remember the things you did before you were official, in order to show the person you'd make a good boyfriend or girlfriend. Keep doing them. Many times, people forget that having the title isn't permanent. People do notice if you start to take them for granted, or if you treat them a little worse.

The little acts of kindness don't go unnoticed. Girls, if he asks you to get him a glass of water, do it (unless he bosses you around all the time.) Guys, same goes. But don't forget that the person doing these things, specifically to make you happy, does want some thanks. A simple "thank you" goes a long way. When we first started dating, my boyfriend was shocked by how often I thanked him for simple things he did for me. He said his ex never thanked him for anything. He told me to stop, that I deserved whatever it was he was doing. I said, maybe, but you also deserve a thank you. He would just smile.

So guys and girls, remember: you gotta earn the title. And James, thank so much for all your help this past weekend.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Newspapers here to stay despite changes in media

The increasing popularity of using the Internet has many saying newspapers are "terminally ill." Many speculate news in print will die out completely, but does this possibility deserve significant attention? Many newspapers have conducted lay-offs recently, and it has us all wondering how much more the owners can cut before they cut the newspapers all together.

According to an article in the New York Times written by David Carr, "The Los Angeles Times announced cuts of 85 newsroom employees, while The Chicago Tribune said it was cutting 100 jobs across all departments." Newspapers are cutting jobs left and right, all across the nation. Some speculate layoffs at some newspapers are replaced by new hires in other departments, but that may not be true in all cases. Most reporters are in constant fear of losing their jobs, and it looks like it will only get worse.

Carr wrote, "Google, the search engine company that wants to be the wallpaper of the future, [is] going live with Google Base, a user-generated database in which people can upload any old thing they feel like." Instead of the local classified section, consumers now have the option of posting on the Internet for free. It looks like newspaper income source is in serious trouble.

"Newspapers ... owe about a third of their revenues to classified advertising," Carr informs us. He goes on to say, "Large national newspapers like USA Today, The Wall Street Journal and The New York Times have already absorbed a big hit as advertising categories like travel and automobiles have moved online. According to estimates cited by The Associated Press, newspaper advertising revenues will grow less than three percent in the current year while online revenue ... will jump by more than 25 percent."

"Happily, newspapers have been there to greet them with Web sites of their own, but owning consumers online is not quite the same as dropping a product they pay for on their doorstep," wrote Carr. The appeal of "free news" is great, but that cost does not disappear. Good reporters are being fired from their jobs and they are the ones who ultimately pay the price. Carr feels that, "...Somebody has to do the reporting, to make the calls, to ensure that what we call news is more than a press release hung on the Web." He feels journalists provide a greater service than the Web can provide. Real issues are revealed because reporters work hard to uncover deep, dark secrets. No "blogger" can replace that kind of high-quality correspondence.

The Internet cannot replace what newspapers do for us. This country needs reporters to report on the issues at hand in order to serve the interest of the public. Sure, people will still read the news online, but it won't be the same. Not everyone has a laptop so not everyone can take the news with them unless they have a newspaper.

Newspapers have survived throughout history, even when radio and television came on the scene. People back then were just as worried about the demise of newspapers as they are now. Newspapers need to find a way to evolve with the times. If there is a will, there should be a way.

Maybe it is unrealistic to ask consumers to pay for a newspaper when they can look up the same information online for free, but it should be asked of us anyway. The general opinion will not be that we need reporters unless readers start to believe it. There is a definite difference between the reports found online and the reports found in newspapers. Even though some newspapers have their own Web sites, the real thing is still the best.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

Violence in our culture

Andrew Freeman

As I began to read the comic book, I knew I would either love it or hate it. It had a controversial premise, excellent artwork, a fast pace and a complete absence of restraint. By the end, I was disgusted.

In "Wanted" by Mark Millar, a young man named Wesley, who despises his miserable life, learns the world is really run by super villains.

His morals and ethics are progressively stripped away, until he becomes an utter sadist, murdering and raping at will. On the final page, scores of bodies later, the protagonist shouts insults at the reader, a triumphant monster. The message of the comic is casting aside your inhibitions and embracing a life of brutality is a positive, liberating experience.

I do not believe media representations of violence will "make" people commit such crimes. However, the glamorization of violence, in which it becomes an act of emancipation or a form of art, is extremely distressing to me. There may not be a causal relationship between watching violence in the media and committing it, but a continuous diet of violent images can nonetheless be harmful.

For most of my life, I have consumed media violence. Even today, many of the movies, comics and computer games I enjoy feature copious amounts of violence. I am not a violent person, by any means — the last fight I got into was in seventh grade, and I avoid confrontations whenever possible. Yet there are times I fantasize about violence. I imagine a person attacking me, and I strike back. There ought to be nothing glamorous or appealing about violence, yet it is portrayed in exactly those ways in popular culture.

Many young people, men specifically, seem to embrace media violence. Last semester, when I saw the movie "Sin City," based on a series of violent graphic novels, much of the audience applauded the violence. The dramatic justifications for the brutality were largely ignored while the cruelty itself was reveled in. In horror movies such as the "Saw" series, the plot seems largely a pretext for slaughter, and the slaughter serves no greater purpose than to please the audience.

There is a profound element of dehumanization in these works. Victims are reduced to little more than livestock, while inhuman butchers cut them apart. In

> Many young people, men specifically, seem to embrace media violence. Last semester, when I saw the movie "Sin City," based on a series of graphic novels, much of the audience applauded the violence. The dramatic justifications for the brutality were largely ignored while the cruelty itself was reveled in.

"Wanted," ordinary people are preyed on by the main character, first in revenge for minor slights, but ultimately to satiate his boredom, such as when he attacks a police station and kills the people inside. There is no rhyme or reason to this chaotic orgy of destruction — instead it is meant to represent the character's newfound freedom.

Violence is occasionally portrayed as an act of liberation or self-assertion in popular culture. In "The Matrix," the protagonist Neo learns the world he inhabits is false, and he need not respect its laws — later he attacks a military facility and kills the troops in his way. This transformation is analogous to that in "Wanted," with the main character rebelling against the dictates of society. However, neither character is ultimately freed in any way, with Neo bound by fate to sacrifice himself and Wesley still lost and purposeless. Embracing violence does not liberate you, it only debases you.

Furthermore, cultures bent on violent liberation ultimately turn to suicidal behavior. Today, this is most obvious in the suicide bombers in the Palestinian territories and in Iraq, but there are parallels in history as well. Communist China set upon itself in the Cultural Revolution that began in 1966, with students torturing teachers and killing each other. The motivation for this chaos was the message, propagated by Mao Zedong that it was right to rebel, and revolution ought to be violent. That China had been a Communist state for 17 years, and had long since overthrown the landlords and capitalists, was of no concern. Violent liberation often does not end with the defeat of the enemy, because new enemies are constantly being created.

Thankfully, American culture as a whole does not emphasize violent liberation, and the majority of people are not violent and will not act out the violent fantasies they see or read. Indeed, there is a wide segment of society that is very concerned about violence. That does not make violence any less of a problem. We should be skeptical of media products that appeal to our basest instincts. Works that glamorize violence, without illustrating its consequences, should not be accepted, let alone applauded.

Andrew Freeman is a Collegian columnist

Oprah Winfrey for president

Sanam Hakim

Last week, when I went home to visit my family, my mother told me a story about how Oprah Winfrey organized a project to open and finance a school in Africa to educate the children, because all they wanted was a chance to learn, and told me about other things Oprah has done. Then she looked at me, in all seriousness, and said, "I think Oprah Winfrey should run for president." I shook my head and laughed, then I told her I think she should get on a plane and fly out to major American cities with a big wooden sign that says "Vote Oprah" and get her elected in the 2008 election. She playfully smacked me and walked away.

Afterward, I actually sat down and thought about it. Why shouldn't we elect Oprah to be the President of this country? What qualifications has this country outlined for the leader of our nation Opera Winfrey does not have?

Section One of Article 2 of the U.S. Constitution states the President must be a natural-born citizen of the United States, be at least 35 years old and must have been a resident of the United States for 14 years. Opera Winfrey was born in Kosciusko, Miss., she is 51-years-old and she has lived in the United States for all 51 of those years. According to the Constitution, she is a completely eligible presidential candidate.

On top of the three prerequisites for ruling our nation, there is one major factor that needs to be considered to make someone a legitimate candidate for presidency: experience. The president of our country must have experience. This "experience" is split into three different categories: education, career and public service. According the 2004 election results, our current president, George W. Bush demonstrates such experience.

After researching President Bush, I have come up with a short summary of his education, career path, services he has done for our country. Basically, Bush grew up in a wealthy family. He attended Yale University and graduated with a Bachelor of Arts in History in 1968. After he graduated, he joined the Texas Air National Guard for about five years. In 1973, he asked if he could leave early so he could go to Harvard, where he earned his Masters of Business Administration in 1975.

After Harvard, he flew back to Texas, entered the oil business, married Laura and helped his daddy get elected as president in 1988. In 1989, he basically bought the Texas Rangers. Public service? He became the Governor of Texas in 1994 for two consecutive four-year terms and is currently in his second term as president of the United States. He is the first president to have twin daughters. According to the official White House Web site, "President Bush believes the strength of America lies in the hearts and souls of our citizens" and "has supported programs that encourage individuals to help their neighbors in need." That pretty much sums him up.

> I'm not suggesting Oprah will lead us to victory and my mother should travel the country and organize a grassroots campaign for her. I'm suggesting, as a country, we should begin re-evaluating the qualifications we have outlined for the president of our country.

What about Oprah?

Oprah was raised in a very poor family and struggled for most of her life. She attended the University of Tennessee and graduated with a Bachelors degree in Speech and Performing Arts as an honors student. After she graduated, she became the first African American TV correspondent and the youngest person to co-anchor the news for WTVF-TV in Nashville, then moved to Baltimore to co-anchor the 6 o'clock news on WJZ-TV. This show was later renamed "The Oprah Winfrey Show," which later entered national syndication, and was named the People's Choice Awards' Favorite Talk Show Host in 1988.

Public service? In 1991, Oprah initiated the National Child Protection Act, signed by President Clinton, which later became known as the national "Oprah Bill." In 1998, she established a public charity called Oprah's Angel Network, which supports women, children and families with educational and empowerment initiatives.

So what are the differences between the two? Bush came from a life of luxury, Oprah came from poverty; Bush went into oil, Oprah went into the media; Bush became Governor of Texas; Oprah has her own TV show and book club; Bush is the president; Oprah wins awards.

I'm not suggesting Oprah will lead us to victory and my mother should travel the country and organize a grassroots campaign for her. I'm suggesting, as a country, we should begin re-evaluating the qualifications we have outlined for the president of our country. We've gotten ourselves trapped in a bipartisan system, which pushes people to either the right or the left of the spectrum, leaving us with only two choices at the end of the day: Democrat or Republican. In reality, our choice is not even really a choice at all: conservative white male or a little bit less conservative white male. In reality, our presidents don't win awards and our presidents don't inspire us.

Oprah Winfrey has won Humanitarian awards, opened an Academy in South Africa for the children, has taught leadership courses, set up and financed public service programs to advance our country, was named one of TIME Magazine's 100 Most Influential People of the 20th Century. Shouldn't someone like that be our president? Shouldn't our president relate to us, influence us, help us, lead us? The presidents we choose merely "support" people like her; send her a pat on the back or a little piece of paper that says, "Way to go." All I can really do is write columns complaining about it and hope someday the president of our country will be in TIME Magazine's 100 Most Influential People and maybe even win a humanitarian award or two.

Sanam Hakim is a Collegian columnist.

Race portrayal in the media

Asif Khan

A friend and I watched "Derailed" last night. We were originally going to watch "Jarhead" but both of us changed our minds last minute as my frustration with this so-called war has reached a pinnacle and I just wanted to watch something "light and relaxing." Derailed was far from that. But it was a very good movie, with not a single boring moment. This is not a review singing praises for this movie but about representations of people in the media.

The movie was pretty generic in its casting. Clive Owen plays an ad executive living in a wealthy Chicago suburb with a blonde wife and a young daughter. His friend at work happens to be a black, ex con who is the mail-boy at the firm. He meets Jennifer Aniston on the train and they start an affair until the bad guys come in the picture who happen to be French and black. There are also several jail scenes in the movie where the majority of the men are either black or brown.

Now when I was watching that I commented to my friend when they are shooting "Friends" and "Sex and the City" which are supposed to take place in the very ethnically diverse New York City there is always a dearth of non-white faces not just in the cast but also in the general public. However, when it comes to shooting jail scenes there is an ample supply of those people, complete with tattoos and scary scowls.

> Being someone who is not white it is sometimes really frustrating to see my skin color represented by a taxi driver, janitor or a murderer.

The choice of villains was also very interesting. Very rarely do I come across a movie with a white American as the "bad guy." The large majority of them are usually foreigners with thick accents. This depends interestingly enough from the region of the world the United States is at that point in time not happy with or attacking, which means villains have often been Arabs, East Asians, South Americans, Russians and now the French seem to be making the list as well.

Now the United States does not exactly have a very low crime rate and a lot of those who commit these crimes are white males. Is it really that hard to show that on TV once in a while? Because being someone who is not white it is sometimes really frustrating to see my skin color represented by a taxi driver, janitor or a murderer. This does not reflect real life at all (not that movies reflect real life much anyway) as men and women originally from the South Asia, the Middle East and other parts of the world excel in many other professions as well which do not include carrying a broom or a gun. Not that being a janitor is bad in any way, but that is not the profession taken up by every non-white person in this country.

I personally am very comfortable with myself in all senses of the word but there are many who are not. If I had grown up in the United States surrounded by images of Brad Pitt and Richard Gere as the epitome of male beauty and perfection maybe I would not be so comfortable. And I notice many people who do not fit those standards suffer from low self esteem and emotional issues (the majority happens to be female but also includes many males).

In one scene of "Derailed," a cop after lighting a prostitute's cigarette in a street corner insults Owen for not partaking in her services and asks him what is wrong with her, after which Owen gives her some money and drives away. This cop happens to be black. Apparently cops in Chicago (with one of the nation's highest crime rates) are that lenient. Now my argument is not that movies should reflect real life and everything should be la dee dah. What I am trying to say is there is an important connection between media and people's lives, more so in the United States but increasingly so in the rest of the world.

For example, most Americans' image of Turkey is what they saw in "Midnight Express" (a movie which director Alan Parker had to apologize for). This movie is about an American who gets caught smuggling drugs in Turkey and is in an awful prison and subjected to inhuman treatment. Interestingly enough it features no real Turkish people but has others playing them. One of my favorite quotes from this movie is, "All foreigners are 'ayip,' they're considered dirty. There are about a thousand things that are 'ayip,' for instance, you can stab or shoot somebody, that's what they call Turkish revenge. I know it must all sound crazy to you, but this place is crazy." Having lived in that country for a year as a foreigner, never have I experienced such warmth and hospitality in my life. And the same is true for many of my white American friends who were there. In most parts of the world race is a complete non entity.

Asif Khan is a Collegian columnist.

Judicial review: law or policy?

Greg Collins

What do you think is the political ideology of a judge who favored the right of Muslim police officers to grow beards? How about a justice who supported the right of a couple to grow marijuana for medical purposes?

The first decision is by Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito, the second by Justice Clarence Thomas. Alito and Thomas are accused of being driven by a conservative ideology, yet one cannot necessarily discern the political leanings of a judge or justice based on the outcomes of their legal decisions. Both are motivated by a desire to achieve sound decisions based on principled legal reasoning rather than on personal policy preference.

Under a principled approach, a judge interprets the provision of a statute or law at issue in accordance with the judge's good faith conclusion as to what its meaning was intended to be by the framers of the provision. For instance, interpretation of the U.S. Constitution should be based on the meaning of its words as understood by the Founding Fathers and their constituents at the time the document was written. Under the alternate interpretative approach, a judge applies Constitutional meaning but also takes into account the changing societal values at the time the case is decided.

> It is impossible to determine, and wrong to label, whether judges or justices are "liberal" or "conservative" based on their legal conclusions because political preference should be completely independent from constitutional interpretation.

It is hard to imagine someone like Thomas would advocate the use of marijuana, but he concluded the Constitution's commerce clause did not give the federal government power to regulate a drug that had never crossed state lines. While he may have personally opposed the use of such a drug, this individual judgment was irrelevant when evaluating the legality of the particular action. It is impossible to determine, and wrong to label, whether judges or justices are "liberal" or "conservative" based on their legal conclusions because political preference should be completely independent from constitutional interpretation.

Sound legal reasoning does not constitute establishing the intended outcome of the decision and then manipulating interpretations of the Constitution in order to fit this conclusion. This process undermines not only law-making and law enforcement but also democratic ideals by substituting a judge's policy preferences for those preferences expressed by the legislative bodies that drafted and amended the Constitution.

The trouble comes when efforts are made to change the meaning of the Constitution through undemocratic methods. The fundamental tenets of classical liberalism – liberty, freedom not curtailed by corrupt, unelected officials – directly contradict the stance of many current liberals when maintaining the Constitution should "change" with the times. The theory that powerful individuals (the justices) who are not elected by people should decide pressing social and economic issues regardless of constitutional limits is in stark contrast to classical liberal thought, which holds elected representatives, not judges, should decide public policy matters. Congressional members are representatives elected by citizens and thus are held directly accountable to these constituents. The only constituent of Supreme Court justices should be the Constitution.

Perhaps the most important reason why the United States has been the most successful functioning democracy in the history of the world is because government officials, whether elected or appointed, closely adhere to the documents which outline what they have and don't have the authority to do. In "The Road to Serfdom," Friedrich Hayek observed,"... [The Rule of Law] means that government in all its actions is bound by rules fixed and announced beforehand — rules which make it possible to foresee with fair certainty how the authority will use its coercive powers in given circumstances and to plan one's individual affairs on the basis of this knowledge."

Consider the case of a student conduct code. How would UMass-Amherst students feel if administration officials holding a university disciplinary hearing interpret the matter by applying their own policy judgments rather than by reading the code based on a good faith attempt to ascertain what the drafters of the code intended?

The recent Supreme Court case Kelo v. New London was a classic mistake of muddling policy predilection with principled constitutional reasoning. The five justices who chose to allow local governments to take private property for public use were thinking cities would benefit if their economies are revitalized through the development of previously privately-owned land, yet did not consider the Fifth Amendment's "public use" clause may have been intended only to allow for construction of dams and roads. However a particular individual may come out on the policy issue, establishing this result through judicial fiat rather than through the Constitutional amendment process undercuts democratic procedure and harms us all.

Greg Collins is a Collegian columnist.

'Primetime' misses real story

S.J. Port

One can only assume the purpose of ABC's "Primetime" news segment about which schools report the highest violent crime rate that aired last Thursday evening was an attempt to warn students and parents of the safety risks involved in student-life on campuses across the nation. However, instead of discussing the issues, the contexts that drive criminal activity, or whether this is even a new trend, the program effectively singled out several colleges and universities as "unsafe places" to send your children. The final university singled out: The University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

Primetime reported that during the years 2002 and 2003 our university had the highest rate of on-campus violent crimes nationwide. During these years I was a News Editor at the Massachusetts Daily Collegian; I saw it, covered it and lived it — yet, I have always felt as safe here as I do in my hometown. Moving from a safe Boston suburb with enviously low crime rates to UMass just as the university moved into two very dark years of violence, riots and the most severe budget cuts the university had ever suffered was an education in itself. Part of my education here has been to look at all the facts, not just a single set of data diagnosed through one questionable formula: a lesson ABC's journalists have yet to learn.

Right off the bat the numbers mean nothing: ABC divided the number of on campus crimes committed each year by the total number of students to reach a percentage of violence: UMass earned the highest violent crime rate among large-sized universities. Large schools were categorized by anything over 11,000 students. Never mind that of the approximately 24,000 UMass students enrolled, according to Housing 10,666 (not including resident life staff) actually live in dormitories, which are part of one of the largest on-campus housing systems in the nation, according to UMass spokesman Ed Blaguszewski. This didn't matter to ABC, who compared UMass with other campuses on which only 2,000 of the 11,000 plus students lived on campus.

The poorly organized and unfocused report spent too much time telling three sad stories and no time discussing what tactics schools have successfully employed to hinder crime. At one point the report mentioned while attempting to enter three of the dorms visited (each on a different college's campus) they were stopped by security; they did not go on to explain discuss this topic any further, instead focusing their energy on proclaiming how they had slid into the other 80 percent of college dorms they tried to enter without ID — never taking the time to examine why they were successful at some schools and not at others or what types of security system at a dorm entrance works best to deter non-students from entering.

> Promoting the statistics alone without further study into what this university has done to change those statistics — and they have changed, dropping from 2003 to 2004 by an incredible 50 percent — or what other colleges and universities can do has no societal value.

Promoting the statistics alone without further study into what this university has done to change those statistics — and they have changed, dropping from 2003 to 2004 by an incredible 50 percent — or what other colleges and universities can do has no societal value. Furthermore, there might be an explanation for why certain college's rates of on campus criminal activity jump up or down in certain years, yet ABC never discusses this.

As mentioned earlier, budget cuts at the University of Massachusetts in 2002 and 2003 struck down programs left and right: including safety-related programs like late night escorts from the library, and a lower number of campus police available for patrol, etc. These programs all saw cuts at the exact same time the number of criminal activity on campus saw an increase: ABC didn't bother to make the correlation, instead of complimenting UMass on its success in bringing down the crime rates, we were highlighted as a crime capitol.

The only thesis the report seemed to have was, "colleges are not a safe haven" and school officials are "not taking violent crimes seriously enough." At UMass this isn't true: violent crimes are not tolerated, read the reports and you'll realize these criminals, whether they are students or visitors, feel consequences. (It is non-violent crimes that are not taken seriously enough.) The only ones not taking violent crime seriously enough on this campus (and likely all campuses) are students living in the dormitories: by letting people follow you in, disrespecting security guards by not allowing them to do their job, signing-in rowdy friends to visit and not making sure they act appropriately. You want to let your peers in, but the safety of those in the dorms has to come first. Stopping to give an ID is not an invasion rights, of any kind.

All that dormitory residents have is the security of their door — once you step inside that door you have their home at your fingertips. Look at the police reports and you'll realize a large percentage of violent crimes committed on this campus are by non-students — some signed into dormitories by friends, others not, either way: don't let them ruin our school's reputation; you might as well commit the crime yourself.

The media's primary function in our society should be that of a watchdog: schools and students are already well aware of their crime rates and are working hard to reduce if not eliminate crime on campus. ABC's report added nothing to the conversation that wasn't already on the agenda. "Primetime," you have the rights awarded you in the first amendment, but with every right comes responsibility, and you have neglected yours: If you're going to tell a story, tell the whole story.

S.J. Port is a former Collegian columnist

Liberals, get your facts straight

Ben Duffy

At Elmendorf Air Force Base, President Bush fired back. After two years of not responding directly to his critics, he accused some anti-Iraq War Democrats of "rewriting the past" and "playing politics."

"Some Democrats who voted to authorize the use of force are now rewriting the past," Bush said. "They're playing politics with this issue and they are sending mixed signals to our troops and the enemy." Bush was not suggesting all people who question the war are traitors, although prominent liberals spun it that way, because they revel in victimhood. "Reasonable people can disagree about the conduct of the war but it is irresponsible for Democrats to now claim that we misled them and the American people," Bush said.

I, for one, am glad Bush has finally decided not take this lying down.

Indeed, the history of this war has been rewritten before our very eyes. If you haven't been paying close attention since the beginning of the War in Iraq, it's easy to become confused. Let's look at two of the Left's most blatant liars. One of them is a U.S. Senator, and the other is a disreputable filmmaker who was awarded the "Palm D'Or" despite his obvious aversion to truth.

On Jan. 18, 2005, while Condoleezza Rice was the nominee for Secretary of State, she sat for an intense round of confirmation hearings. Her harshest critic was Senator Boxer, a California Democrat, who repeatedly alleged Rice had been dishonest in her role as National Security Advisor. "Well, you should read what we voted on when we voted to support the war, which I did not, but most of my colleagues did. It was WMD, period."

Liar, liar, pants on fire. The resolution, Joint Resolution to Authorize the use of United States Armed Forces Against Iraq (or H.J. 114, for short), was not "WMD, period." The document contained 22 clauses, each of which was a reason to go to war with Iraq. WMD was indeed an issue, as it should have been. At the time, Iraq had been playing games with U.N. weapons inspectors for 12 years, and had not complied with sixteen separate U.N. Resolutions. But to say that H.J. 114 was about "WMD, period" is a lie.

Among the reasons given for invading Iraq were, the 1990 invasion of Kuwait (true), supporting and harboring terrorist organizations (true, including Abu Nadal and the 1993 WTC bombmaker), repressive treatment of its citizens (true), the 1993 assassination attempt on President Bush the elder (true), thousands of instances of Iraqi military fire on United States and coalition military forces who were enforcing Saddam's 1991 surrender (true, coalition planes were shot at almost daily in the 1990s) and to "promote the emergence of a democratic government to replace [Saddam's] regime."

> I believe helping Iraqis achieve democracy is a noble goal worth struggling for. Anti-war liberals do not.

The last one is the kicker. I believe helping Iraqis achieve democracy is a noble goal worth struggling for. Anti-war liberals do not. When I point out the quickness they want to abandon the first democratic country ever to sprout up in that region, their answer is always the same. They're anti-democracy, it's just Bush is using a "bait-and-switch" technique, trying to use democracy as a new justification for war after all others collapsed. Nice dodge, but it isn't true. Previous justifications have not collapsed, and democracy in the Middle East has been a justification since the beginning. If you don't believe me, read H.J. 114, or Bush's 2002 National Security Policy.

In Michael Moore's "Fahrenheit 9-11," there is a short clip of Condoleezza Rice testifying that "Oh indeed, there is a tie between Iraq and what happened on 9-11." Moore uses this to prop up the argument that Bush "hijacked catastrophe," told the public that Iraq was behind 9-11 and then used it as pretext to attack poor Saddam. But Moore forgot to mention the rest of Rice's testimony: "It's not that Saddam was somehow himself and his regime involved in 9-11, it is the rise of ideologies of hatred that lead people to drive airplanes into buildings in New York ... and Iraq is a central front, because, if and when, and we will, we change the nature of Iraq to a place that is peaceful and democratic and prosperous in the heart of the Middle East, you will begin to see change in the Middle East."

There goes the Bush cabinet again, with all of that silly "democracy" jibber-jabber that supposedly played no role in the Iraq War decision. Rice was expressing the idea that the best way to defeat terrorism is to help Middle Easterners throw off their shackles of oppression and taste the freedom that westerners enjoy. Iraq was to be their model. What she was not saying was what Moore insinuates: that Saddam was the architect of the Sept. 11 attacks. Actually, she testified to the exact opposite.

These are only two examples of the historical rewrites President Bush was talking about. There are more. Dissent may be the highest form of patriotism, but lying to undermine your nation's war effort is not. If you need to lie to make your case, it's probably pretty weak. So protest the war if you want, but get your facts straight. I assure you, if you put down Chomsky and pick up a copy of U.N. Resolution 1441, H.J. 114, or the 2002 National Security Policy, you will find it much harder to claim Bush lied.

Ben Duffy is a Collegian columnist

Cultural pride gone unnoticed

Brian Acevedo

On Nov. 17, 2005 I went to the panel discussion pertaining to the Independence Movement of Puerto Rico, right here at the University of Massachusetts. First of all, when I found out this event was going to be given, I was amazed. After all, UMass is not exactly a haven of Puerto Ricans (not to mention Hispanics in general). Also, many of the Puerto Ricans here have little care for the political situation of their homeland. They are mainly concerned with the daily affairs of the neighborhoods they come from like, Holyoke, Springfield, Boston, New York and others. So, through all this I wasn't expecting many people to attend. But I was pleasantly deemed wrong by the dozens of people that attended the event. Not only students, but staff as well. Not only Puerto Ricans, but other Hispanics, whites and blacks. It made me happy to see all those people there. And to see such a beautifully diverse and enlightened group there was truly refreshing.

> Coming here, and being away from my people even more has shown me how much I am part of that culture. I don't belong to the mainstream American culture so many UMass students belong to.

But I must say I didn't go to that event thinking about other people. I didn't go hoping there would be a lot of people or the group would even want to be there. I went there to enlighten myself about the sacrifices my people did — and are doing — to give our homeland a freedom it has sought for a century. Now, I was not always a proud Puerto Rican. At one time, I hated who I was and I hated where I came from. I grew up in the ghettos of Hartford, Conn. where crime is a daily thing. My family was robbed at least five times and a young gang member died right in front of my apartment building. I didn't know anything else but this violent world. I didn't see the beautiful culture I came from; the real culture of my people. And it was right in front of my eyes all along, in the dances my mother danced, in the songs my grandmother sang, in the foods they cooked and in the language we spoke.

When I came to UMass, I would have never imagined I would ever have a pride in my homeland my older family members had. I thought it was just a blind, zealous pride they had. But coming here, and being away from my people even more has shown me how much I am part of that culture. I don't belong to the mainstream American culture so many UMass students belong to. I am from a beautiful island in the Caribbean, whose people speak Spanish, who love to talk and dance and laugh (all a lot). I belong to Puerto Rico. It is my patria — my homeland.

After the event was over, I felt more pride in being Puerto Rican than I have ever felt in my whole existence. The people who spoke had such a love of Puerto Rico. They had such a fiery passion to see their homeland free and I could not suppress that in myself. I now know I never lost that pride; I never forgot about it. It was there the whole time, waiting for the right time to come back. And even if I didn't want to be Puerto Rican, I would always and forever be Puerto Rican. It's in my blood and in my heart. My people's pride in their country isn't blind and zealous; it is loving and embracing. Loving Puerto Rico is like loving a mother: she'll love you even when you're mad at her.

To close, I want to appeal to all the Puerto Rican students at UMass.

Look at where you come from, look to the island of your people. We aren't just centered in the Northeast United States, living in ghettos and listening to reggaeton and rap music. We come from an island alive with culture and the arts. Read about our history, aim to become fluent in Spanish and share your parent's love in their homeland. And most of all research the political situation of Puerto Rico and try to understand why freedom for Puerto Rico is best for our people. Only through understanding can we achieve freedom.

Brian Acevedo is a UMass student.

The Collegian is hiring an assistant Ed/Op editor for the Spring semester.

Come down to the Collegian newsroom to apply!

Beckett and Lowell newest Sox

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

BOSTON — Shopping for a premier pitcher, the Boston Red Sox put together a deal to acquire Florida ace Josh Beckett and didn't even need a general manager to do it.

The Red Sox and Marlins reached a preliminary agreement Monday night on a trade that would send Beckett and third baseman Mike Lowell to Boston for three prospects.

Florida would get touted shortstop Hanley Ramirez and minor league pitchers Anibal Sanchez and Jesus Delgado in the deal, which was pending physicals, according to a baseball official who requested anonymity because the trade was yet to be finalized.

The Red Sox are still searching for a new GM after Theo Epstein's departure at the end of last month but that hasn't stopped them from doing business.

Beckett was the MVP of Florida's 2003 World Series win over the New York Yankees and went 15-8 with a 3.38 ERA last season, when he had problems with his shoulder and recurring blisters on his right middle finger.

A three-time All-Star, Lowell slumped to .236 with eight homers and 58 RBIs with the Marlins last season but won his first Gold Glove. He averaged 24 homers and 94 RBIs in each of the previous five years.

The Marlins called a news conference for Tuesday afternoon, but said the subject would be the team's pursuit of a new stadium, and general manager Larry Beinfest would not be available.

Red Sox president Larry Lucchino and assistant general manager Jed Hoyer declined to comment on a possible deal in e-mail responses to The Associated Press on Monday night. Hoyer remains in his position three weeks after Epstein's contract expired – the former GM did not reach a new agreement with the team.

Coming off a third-place finish in the NL East, the Marlins apparently are looking to shed salary. Florida had an opening-day payroll of $60 million last season, while Boston began the year at $121 million.

The 25-year-old Beckett, eligible for salary arbitration, is expected to earn between $4 million and $5 million next year and can become a free agent after the 2007 season. Lowell, 31, is owed $9 million each of the next two seasons.

After winning the World Series in 2004, the Red Sox were swept by Chicago in the first round of the AL playoffs last month and want to improve their starting pitching this offseason.

Curt Schilling struggled all year following ankle surgery. Matt Clement had a poor second half and Bronson Arroyo was inconsistent. Tim Wakefield will return, but David Wells reportedly requested a trade after going 15-7 in the first season of a two-year contract.

Lowell could fill a vacancy at third, where the Red Sox are not expected to re-sign Bill Mueller. Kevin Youkilis, who had been the heir apparent to Mueller, could move to first because Boston is expected to let free agent Kevin Millar go.

Ramirez, considered the team's top prospect, hit .271 with six homers, 52 RBIs and 26 stolen bases at Double-A Portland last season before going 0-for-2 with the Red Sox during a September call-up.

Sanchez went 6-1 with a 2.40 ERA for Class-A Wilmington and 3-5 with a 3.45 ERA at Portland. Delgado was 7-3 with a 3.50 ERA at Class-A Greenville. Both are 21-year-old right-handers. Ramirez will turn 22 next month.

The Texas Rangers were interested in Beckett, but their pursuit ended Monday despite the team's apparent willingness to trade All-Star third baseman Hank Blalock and a top pitching prospect.

New Rangers general manager Jon Daniels said he received a call Monday afternoon from Marlins GM Larry Beinfest, who told him "the Marlins are going to go in another direction with their trade."

"The longer this went on, and the more time between when we indicated we'd meet what was ultimately their asking price, it was clear that other teams were involved," Daniels said.

While Daniels wouldn't be specific about what the Rangers offered, he didn't dispute several reports that he was prepared to give up Blalock along with John Danks or Thomas Diamond, both pitchers who were recent first-round picks.

As for the Red Sox and their GM search, they interviewed Jim Bowden for a second time on Monday but no decision was imminent.

Bowden, GM of the Washington Nationals and former GM for the Cincinnati Reds, met with Red Sox officials in Boston. The team also conducted a second interview last weekend with Jim Beattie, former Baltimore Orioles executive vice president.

The Red Sox said more interviews will be held, but no decision on Epstein's replacement is expected before Thanksgiving. Boston would like a new GM in place before baseball's winter meetings

KAREN WINSKOWSKI/COLLEGIAN

Moning ahead
The UMass women's basketball team will take on Hartford on Saturday at the Mullins Center. The Minutewomen will look to build upon their first win at home on Sunday, when they beat Holy Cross 64-55.

MNF approaches its final broadcast

By Gordon Wittenmyer
Knight Ridder

ST. PAUL, Minn. – It was a family tradition growing up for its currently sidelined sideline reporter. It represented a dream job for its current producer. And it was considered for decades a quicker way to fame, if not fortune, for football players.

Now, 35 years after the television program that most industry executives originally rejected began to transform the very industry, few would argue against "Monday Night Football's" place among the most influential concepts in television history – alongside CNN and the infomercial.

"It really sort of spawned the proof that sports is entertainment," NFL spokesman Seth Polansky said.

"The last broadcasts are going to be difficult," said Michele Tafoya, MNF's sideline reporter from Edina, Minn., who is expected to return from maternity leave in time for ABC's final Monday broadcast, Dec. 26, and ABC's Super Bowl XL broadcast Feb. 5. "I've talked about going out with the Super Bowl. I think that adds to the greatness but also to a bittersweetness when we come to the emotional cliff on the other side."

Turn out the lights, the party's over.

"Dandy Don" Meredith, one of Monday Night Football's original broadcast crew, made that phrase famous in the 1970s and '80s by singing it when the result of a game appeared clinched. That phrase might as well be the theme song for this year's 36th season on ABC – the program's final season before moving to cable and sister network ESPN.

Only five MNF over-the-air broadcasts remain – a five-game fade to black of a 36-year phenomenon of American sports and television that has transcended both.

"It's been on as long as I've been alive," Tafoya said, "and provided many happy memories for me and my dad and family watching it.

"That was the overwhelming part of joining this crew – John Madden, Al Michaels and Monday Night Football. For a sideline reporter it doesn't get any better than that. It is because it has that iconic place in our sports culture and in American culture in general."

MNF's shift to ESPN, as NBC picks up ESPN's current Sunday night prime-time game, doesn't mean MNF is dead or even dying. When the decision was announced, network executives suggested ESPN might offer a better chance for growth of the program after a generally steady decline in ratings since the 1990s.

But the show's departure from prime time on one of the major general-entertainment networks means it has lost the very thing that made it a perception-shifting cultural influence in this country to rival cell phones and Viagra.

Consider that the concept of sports during the week – not to mention in prime time – was considered foolish business and rejected by most networks before NFL Commissioner Pete Rozelle sold the idea to ABC sports director Roone Arledge before the 1970 launch season.

"ABC finally signs up, and Monday Night Football becomes an instant cultural phenomenon," said Michael MacCambridge, a St. Louis-based author of several sports and sports media books, including "America's Game: The Epic Story of How Pro Football Captured a Nation."

"Howard Cosell becomes an icon. Dandy Don Meredith becomes more popular retired than he ever was as a player. Within a few years after this, we see the World Series move to prime time, the Olympics are in prime time for the first time, we see the championship game of the NCAA basketball tournament going to prime time.

"A case can be made that what Rozelle accomplished by getting Monday Night Football on was pave the way for all of American sports to move to a more central role on the American cultural landscape. I think the effect is as profound as that."

Along the way it has become the second-longest running program in television history (behind CBS' "60 Minutes") and consistently drawn an audience that survey's have shown cuts across most age, race, economic and gender demographics.

In fact, by 1980, the show was so well-established and popular that the first presidential debate between Democratic President Jimmy Carter and Republican candidate Ronald Reagan was rescheduled from a Monday date to the next day to avoid the schedule conflict and potential lost audience.

"That's the best example of the ultimate power of Monday Night Football," MacCambridge said. "It altered the course of a presidential debate."

Few NFL insiders even seemed to see that coming.

"We didn't know what to think," said Gil Brandt, one of three major architects – along with Tex Schramm and Tom Landry – of the great Dallas Cowboys teams during MNF's first decade. "We had no idea, absolutely no idea, of the magnitude that it would be."

Coaches and other team officials often viewed the Monday night schedule as a nuisance, at least in the early years of the program, Brandt said.

"What happens with coaches is, 'We've got a routine, we've got a routine and this puts us out of our routine,' " he said. "Yeah, it put them out of their routine, but it was a good thing."

Vikings coach Bud Grant even went so far as to slam the locker-room door in the face of Cosell and the rest of the crew before they could pick the coach's brain before a Monday night game at old Metropolitan Stadium.

"Bud puts his hand across the door, and these guys are talking and Bud's not saying much of anything," said Fred Zamberletti, the Vikings' trainer from 1961 to '98. "Finally, Bud says, 'What do you want?' They said, 'Well, we're here to wish you good luck.' He says, 'You did,' and slammed the door in their face."

If the concept was not always popular with coaches, that didn't seem to be the case of players, who almost immediately saw the personal value of center-stage in prime time.

"Having a great game on Monday night was a way to get Pro Bowl votes," said Zamberletti of the election process in which players vote on the league's all-stars.

Vikings Pro Bowl safety Darren Sharper, a former Packer who was with Green Bay for 21 Monday night games, said that even in its 36th year and with the addition of Sunday night and occasional Thursday night games, MNF has not lost its luster with players.

"Oh, man, it's huge," he said. "I mean, Monday Night Football is closer to playoff atmosphere and playoff intensity than you'll get in any game that's not a playoff game because of the fact everybody's watching. All the guys around the league are watching."

Polansky said the success of Monday Night Football in the face of initial widespread skepticism has been used repeatedly in pitches with league officials over the years regarding other new concepts such as satellite-radio deals, DIRECTV Sunday Ticket and initial deals with then-second-tier networks Fox and ESPN.

FRUSTRATED?
PUZZLED?
DO YOU HAVE:
• a grade dispute?
• teacher, roomate or job concerns?
• billing problems?
• harassment?
• ...or any other University related problems?
THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP
(confidentially, of course)
students, faculty, and staff are all welcome
823 Campus Center
Office Hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.
telephone: 413-545-0867
fax: 413-545-9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

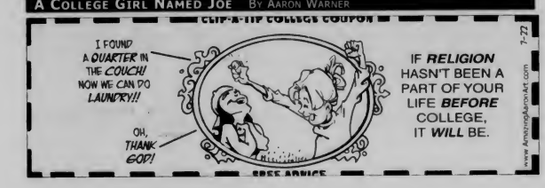
The Massachusetts Daily COLLEGIAN
The Daily Collegian has job openings for the following positions:
-Managing Editor
-Night/Copy Supervisor
-Arts Editor
-Assistant Arts Editor
-Photographers
These are PAID positions! Applications are due before Thanksgiving break. Pick them up at the Collegian in the Campus Center basement.

Watroba's Liquors
79 Sunderland Road North Amherst (liquor store 11:00 AM - 11:00 PM)
Just before the Harp!
Watroba's Market
Red Bull 4 - Pack $7.29 plus deposit
• Corona and Corona Light Loose Case Bottles $20.99 + dep
• Jim Beam Kentucky Whiskey $19.99 1.75 ml. Btl
• SKYY Vodka $14.49 750 ml. Btl.
• Svedka Vodka $17.99 1.75 ml. Btl
• Mirassou Assorted Wines $7.99 750 ml. Btl
• Pabst Blue Ribbon 30 Pack $13.99 + dep.
• Genny Light 30 Pack $12.99 + dep
• Vast array of HUGE Deli Sandwiches
• Coke 12 Pack Cans and Coke products 2 for $6.00 + dep
Jagermeister $20.99 750 ml. Btl. With FREE T-shirt or FREE shot glass
KEG SPECIALS
Bud & Bud Light $63.99+
Michelob Lager & Ultra $63.99+
"Natty" Light & Ice $59.99+
Miller Lite $59.99+
Pabst Blue Ribbon $44.99+
Try our selection of European and Micro Brew Beers

comedy CONNECTION
HUKELAU
413•593•5222
705 Memorial Drive in Chicopee
www.hukelau.com
THIS FRIDAY NIGHT!
From "The Howard Stern Show"
Star of the HBO special "Robert Schimmel: Unprotected"
ROBERT SCHIMMEL
DECEMBER 3RD
From Comedy Central's "Chappelle's Show"
CHARLIE MURPHY & FRIENDS TOUR

LABRAT By Richard Martens

FRANCO THE CLARINETTING NAVY BEAN AND STAN By Rainy Stanford



PAUL By Billy O'Keefe

THE FAMILY MONSTER By Josh Shalek

A COLLEGE GIRL NAMED JOE By Aaron Warner

Quote of the Day

"Faith is believing when common sense tells you not to."

—Miracle on 34th Street

ACROSS
1 English dynasty
6 Help a yegg
10 Shrek, e.g.
14 La Scala offering
15 Cauterize
16 Well-behaved
17 Cooing birds
18 Withered
19 Expands a pit
20 PAT value
21 Kind of school
23 Street crosser
25 Surgeon's device
27 Casey of baseball
28 Composer Stravinsky
30 Taken without permission
32 Least green?
34 Write-offs
38 Goodnight girl
40 Pose for shots
41 Flyers' or Isles
42 Bestride
44 Tranquil
45 Facing the day
47 Was in the red
48 Blamed
52 Dame University
54 Brothers in arms
55 Sort of sitter
56 Computer acronym
59 Some NCOs
60 Now! Said resident
62 Revolutionary patriot Thomas
64 Lemony
65 Daring Knievel
66 Utopias
67 Sailors and Sargasso
68 Fixed charge
69 Apothecary measures

DOWN
1 Fuss
2 On top of
3 Real estate professional
4 Vein of iron
5 Coarse files
6 State positively
7 Horn signal
8 Head feature
9 Paid for
10 Winter Nash
11 On the way
12 Scoundrel
13 Fool's folly
22 Take ten
24 Buyer
26 Boxing venue
27 Crib part
28 Author Murdoch
29 Encircle
31 Theater awards
33 Tranquilize
35 Bonehead play
36 Beer paints
37 Sound quality
38 Luge
40 Finished a steal
43 Chest of drawers
44 Enlist
46 Empower
48 Periods of self-denial
49 Pond scum
50 Far beyond the norm
51 Itemized accounts
53 Used a keyboard
55 Author Easton Ellis
57 Bancroft or Boleyn
58 Disorderly situation
61 Uncle Tom's charge
63 Bother

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

THE HARP
NEW!! Wireless Internet
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted
Irish Pub
NOVEMBER SPECIAL!
$1.50 PBR Bottles; Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 A pint / $6.50 a pitcher
Wed. • Cold Duck Complex
Thurs. • Happy Turkey Day!
Be much to party with us when you return!
Fri: • Irish Session
Sat: • Dan Daniels and your no good buddies
"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments

Submit your comic!
e-mail
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You will catch a nasty cold over the holiday weekend.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
You have a non-sketchy, very attractive secret admirer

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You are not the type of person who needs a palm pilot.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
If your CDs are alphabetized you have too much time on your hands.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
You could use more chocolate in your diet.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Your mom has taken up knitting and has made you a lovely pair of gloves.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You would make a good children's book author.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Stock up on snacks for your journey home today.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Make sure to leave leftovers to bring back to school.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You should go see The Nutcracker with your grandparents.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Don't wear your new sneakers outside today. They will be ruined.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Get some window markers and write messages to people walking by.

★ Submit your comic ★
e-mail
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

ANNOUNCEMENTS
Montreal Weekend
New Years Party $129
Complete cocktail age 18
781-979-9001 Call now
montrealexpress.net

APARTMENT FOR RENT
1, 2, 3 & 4 Bedroom spacious apartments, Great location, Bus Route, All utilities included No Fee Call 413-253-3000

EMPLOYMENT
Rent us your ears! Listening experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu Voicemail: 545-6837.

EMPLOYMENT
November 30th is the last day to apply to become a legal assistant with the Student Legal Services Office. Earn 12 credits while gaining valuable experience. Hurry! Contact us at 545-1995 or stop by at 922 Campus Center to pick up an application.

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

HAPPY BIRTHDAY
If you see Jackie Mellin, wish her a Happy Birthday and wonderful Thanksgiving! Happy 23rd, Jack! love, Anne

ROOM FOR RENT
413-335-5226 Mo. to mo. $325 inclusive 20 min to campus

SERVICES
PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

Questions about your lease/security deposit? Questions about subletting/assigning leases? Questions about the condition of your apartment? Contact the Student Legal Services Office at 922 Campus Center or call 545-1995.

SERVICES
Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance. 549-1906

TRAVEL
SPRING BREAK FROM $569
BAHAMAS, CANCUN, ACAPULCO, JAMAICA! FREE PARTIES, FREE DRINKS.
Sign up early and save. Organize a small group and you travel FREE. Or become a CAMPUS REP and GET PAID COMMISSION on each trip sold. Call today and get started 1-800-GET-SUN-1

TRAVEL
Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

ACT NOW – SPRING BREAKERS Book early & Save! Free meals/parties by 11/7. Lowest prices. Be a rep & TRAVEL FREE! Get the ultimate hookups with STA TRAVEL 413-256-1261.

WANTED
WANTED: COLLEGIAN EMPLOYEES

The Collegian is hiring for paid positions for the spring semester.

Open positions include: Managing Editor, Night and Copy Supervisor, as well as positions in Arts and Living, Editorial Opinion, photography and graphics.

Come to the Campus Center basement to apply, or call (413) 545-3500.

Applications close November 23, 2005.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Thanksgiving is a football celebration

Eric Athas

In a conversation with one of my friends, which usually is somehow intertwined in sports, we began to think back on our high school football days.

Now that I am simply a college sportswriter, talking about my high school athletic career is pretty much what I will be doing for the next 30 plus years of my life. Future kids: be prepared for some tantalizing stories.

In speaking to my friend, who is from Long Island, N.Y., he mentioned that his high school only played eight games during the regular season. Eight? I was confused, because 11 was the minimum in my neck of the woods.

And then he went on to say that the season ended early November. My bewilderment and mystification was at its peak at this point.

But then I promptly remembered that the New England tradition, the one which encapsulates cities and towns, a tradition which stands as the epicenter of football in this region, does not exist anywhere else in the nation.

High school Thanksgiving Day football games are without a doubt the life of the party when it comes to high school football in Massachusetts and beyond. And while I am not gloating to other parts of the country about this rich tradition, I sure am glad to have it at my disposal.

The fact is, any former, or current student in the Bay State will brag about how heated their Thanksgiving rivalry is. And when 176 teams hear the pre game talk before kick-off tomorrow, only those players can illustrate what it is like to play on Turkey Day.

In my hometown, the small suburb of Weston, Mass., football is not supreme all year long. The number of students is not massive, and the football team is still trying to regain the luster it had during the mid-1990's. With that entire facet aside, one aspect is still breathing — the Thanksgiving Day football game against the big, bad Wayland Warriors.

That's the way I always saw them anyways, and it is a rivalry that stands as one of the oldest in Massachusetts history, as tomorrow's contest is the 70th meeting between the two teams.

And with that much history behind one game, there is some kind of tension that has built between the two teams over the past seven decades.

More than tension actually, more like a way of life. And I can only speculate, but I'm pretty sure it's the same way over in Wayland.

With that in mind, when you align 22 of these guys across each other — 11 from Weston and 11 from Wayland — put helmets on them and tell them to play football, it can make for quite the clash.

And that brings us back to the tradition. Rivalry of that nature makes Thanksgiving more than what you read in a text book or eat off of the table. It has become — much to the historians dislike – a holiday of football.

And in Massachusetts, the Thanksgiving football game is untouchable, and will always be the cornerstone of athletics. Playoffs, Super Bowls and all-star games are beyond my recognition, but the contest tomorrow between Weston and Wayland is a free-for-all for pride and the ownership of a longtime rivalry.

And that one day signifies a year of satisfaction.

—Eric Athas is a Collegian Columnist

Koegel honored by A-10

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

KAREN WINGER/COLLEGIAN

UMass punter Christian Koegel was recently named the Atlantic 10 Special Teams Player of the Year. Koegel averaged 43 yards per punt in 2005, which was the best in the A-10 and fourth in the nation.

Although the Massachusetts football team's season ended with heartbreak as the team missed the playoffs, the talent level of individuals was clearly displayed as the Minutemen were recently honored with several awards to cap off the 2005 regular season.

Junior Christian Koegel was named the Atlantic 10 Special Teams Player of the Year for his punting performance in 2005. Koegel's booming punts were vital to the success in 2005, and his ability to get the UMass offense out of dangerous situations put the Minutemen in position to finish 7-4. The Deerfield Beach, Fla. Native averaged 43 yards per punt, which was good enough for best in the entire conference, and fourth in all of I-AA football.

Koegel's punts appeared to have a mind of their own at times, bouncing and rolling out of bounds, and pinning the opposition against its goal line. Koegel's ability to pooch punt the ball and hit the coffin corner did not go unnoticed, as he was able to punt 18 balls inside the 20-yard line of the opponent.

With that A-10 honor, Koegel was also placed on the A-10 First Team, along with numerous teammates: junior tailback Steve Baylark, senior safety Shannon James, senior defensive end Keron Williams and junior center Alex Miller.

Baylark posted his third straight 1,000-plus yard season, carrying the ball 255 times for 1,057 yards and nine touchdowns, while holding an average of 4.1 yards per carry. On Oct. 22 in a win against Maine, Baylark had a career day, rushing for 198 yards and one TD and catching six passes for 64 yards and two scores.

Paving the way for Baylark all season was center Alex Miller, who was one of few offensive linemen on the team to not sustain injury. The center led the team in the huddle and at the line of scrimmage and was able to break redshirt freshman quarterback Liam Coen in as a new starter.

Shannon James, who is viewed as a top I-AA prospect for the National Football League after his stellar senior season, was a magnet for the football. He had a team-high four interceptions and was fifth on the team in total tackles with 55. James found the end zone twice this season, once off of an interception return against Northeastern on Oct. 8 and once after picking up a fumble and running it for the TD against Army on Nov. 12. his 20 career interceptions were more than any active player in college football in 2005 and are the most in UMass history.

Keron Williams was fourth on the team in total tackles with 56 and third on the team in sacks with four. Williams also registered one forced fumble and 10.5 tackles for a loss. His ability to rush the quarterback assisted in making UMass the most deadly defense in the A-10.

Junior receiver Brandon London, senior offensive tackle Brent Caldwell, sophomore linebacker Jason Hatchell and senior linebacker Serge Tikum were all named to the A-10 Second Team, while junior safety James Ihedigbo was named to the A-10 Third Team.

KAREN WINGER/COLLEGIAN

Season underway

James Lite, a junior transfer member of the UMass men's basketball team, will head to Springfield to take part in the Tip-Off Classic against UAB on Friday at 1 p.m.

KAREN WINGER/COLLEGIAN

Mullins showdown

Senior captain Stephan Werner and the UMass hockey team will take on Colarado on Friday at 7 p.m. in their return to the Mullins Center.

Fischer improving after collapse

By David Rusk
Associated Press

DETROIT — Detroit Red Wings defenseman Jiri Fischer was "doing very, very well" Tuesday, a day after he collapsed on the bench during a game and a defibrillator was used to help revive him.

"It's been a tough 12 hours for our organization," Ken Holland said at a news conference at Joe Louis Arena. "The great news is that Jiri Fischer is doing very, very well."

Holland and team physician Tony Colucci — who performed CPR on Fischer on the bench Monday night – said the player was "in good spirits."

Fischer, 25, was in good condition after he began having convulsions on the bench late in the first period of a game against the Nashville Predators. Colucci wasn't able to detect a pulse after Fischer collapsed, and an auto defibrillator was used on Fischer.

After performing CPR, Colucci said he detected a good pulse and Fischer was taken out of the arena by ambulance to Detroit Receiving Hospital. Colucci said Fischer's heart might have stopped, but he didn't know for how long.

Fischer's blood pressure and heart rate were stable by the time he got to the hospital.

"There's no way to speculate on what triggered it," Colucci said. The team had announced to the crowd Monday night that Fischer had a seizure, but Red Wings coach Mike Babcock later said Fischer's heart had to be restarted. "His heart was stopped," Babcock said.

On Tuesday, when asked how long Fischer's heart had stopped, Colucci said: "Sometimes when you're feeling for a pulse you can't really say did it stop, or does he have a very weak, thready pulse."

Colucci said he didn't know when Fischer could play again or how long he will remain in the hospital.

"We're going to evaluate him on a daily basis," he said.

The Red Wings practiced Tuesday ahead of Wednesday's home game. Afterward, players and Babcock said their thoughts remained with Fischer as they prepared to play the Colorado Avalanche.

Find out what The Score is on Dec. 10th

Before the UMass - B.C. hockey game

New England's Largest College Daily · Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Monday, November 28, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXVI Issue 54

Saddam Hussein's trial set to resume tomorrow

By Hamza Hendawi
Associated Press

KRT

Iraqi men search for relatives' bodies at the site of a Shiite mass grave. Saddam Hussein is on trial for various charges that include the murder of those found in mass graves such as this one.

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Iraqi police arrested eight Sunni Arabs for allegedly plotting to kill the judge who prepared the indictment of Saddam Hussein, authorities said Sunday, the day before the ousted leader's trial for crimes against humanity resumes.

Former U.S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark arrived in Baghdad to help the defense but might not be allowed in court Monday when the first of up to 35 prosecution witnesses take the stand.

Tight security surrounds the proceedings, which are resuming after a five-week recess in a specially built courtroom in the heavily guarded Green Zone. The precise starting time was not announced due to fear of attack by both Saddam's supporters and opponents.

The eight alleged plotters from Iraq's Sunni Arab minority were apprehended Saturday in the northern city of Kirkuk, police Col. Anwar Qadir said.

He said they were carrying written instructions from a former top Saddam deputy, Izzat Ibrahim al-Douri, ordering them to kill investigating judge Raed Juhi, who prepared the case against Saddam and forwarded it to the trial court in July.

Al-Douri is the highest ranking member of the Saddam regime still at large and is believed to be at least the symbolic leader of Saddam loyalists fighting U.S. forces and Iraq's new government.

"As an Iraqi citizen and a judge, I am vulnerable to assassination attempts," Juhi told The Associated Press. "If I thought about this danger, then I would not be able to perform my job ... I will practice my profession in a way that serves my country and satisfies my conscience."

Saddam and seven co-defendants are charged in the killing of more than 140 Shiite Muslims after an assassination attempt against the former president in the Shiite town of Dujail in 1982. Convictions could bring a sentence of death by hanging.

Insecurity from the predominantly Sunni insurgency has complicated efforts to put Saddam on trial and forced draconian measures. For example, names of four of the five trial judges have been kept secret and some of the 35 witnesses may testify behind curtains to protect them from reprisal.

Defense lawyers had threatened to boycott the proceedings after two of their colleagues were slain in two attacks following the opening session Oct. 19. However, lawyer Khamees al-Ubaidi told the AP on Sunday that the defense team would attend after an agreement with U.S. and Iraqi authorities on improving security for them.

On the eve of the hearing, Clark and former Qatari Justice Minister Najib al-Nueimi flew to the capital from Amman, Jordan, to lend weight to the defense team.

Both have been advising Saddam's lawyers and support their call to have the trial moved out of Iraq because of the violence.

However, neither Clark nor al-Nueimi has been officially recognized by the court as legal counsel. U.S. and Iraqi officials said Saddam's chief lawyer, Khalil al-Dulaimi, did not officially request permission for any foreign attorneys to attend the trial.

Iraqi law permits foreign lawyers to act as advisers but requires that those arguing cases in court must be members of the local bar association.

Clark, who served as attorney general under President Johnson, wrote last month that Saddam's rights had been systematically violated since his December 2003 capture, including his right "to a lawyer of his own choosing."

Clark and others say a fair trial is impossible in Iraq because of the insurgency and because, they argue, the country is effectively under foreign military occupation. U.S. and Iraqi officials insist the trial will conform to international standards.

Still, the trial has unleashed passions in an Iraqi society deeply divided in its judgment of Saddam and his rule.

See SADDAM on page 2

Man still in custody after crash

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

An Amherst man remained in police custody over the weekend after being charged in a hit-and-run crash that resulted in one fatality on Interstate 91 Wednesday night.

Nathan D. Pederizzni, 26, of 398 State Street in Amherst was arrested Thursday morning at his home, after allegedly slamming the utility truck he was driving into the back of a 1987 Chevrolet Cavalier and leaving the scene of the accident.

A toddler, Jose Candelaria, 2, who was securely strapped into a car seat, died in the crash, said Northwestern District Attorney Elizabeth D. Scheibel. The boy's parents, Ann Marie Candelaria, 36, and Raymond Masso, 38, both of Greenfield were injured in the crash.

Candelaria was taken to Franklin Medical Center in Greenfield with serious injuries before being released. Masso was airlifted to Bay State Medical Center in Springfield with critical injuries. He was listed in critical condition Saturday night.

Pederizni is charged with motor vehicle homicide, leaving a scene of personal injury or death, and operating on a revoked license as a habitual traffic offender among other offenses. A plea of not guilty was entered on his behalf Friday morning in Greenfield District Court, Scheibel said.

See ACCIDENT on page 2

Harm-reduction is the goal of needle exchange

By Brian Duffey
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — The Northampton Needle Exchange program will be 10-years-old this December, but it still faces opposition from those who feel the program shouldn't have been established.

Since Massachusetts has the highest rate of heroin usage in the country, Assistant Regional Manager of Substance Abuse Services in Western Massachusetts Benjamin Cluff, asks, "How [can] we take a dangerous situation and make it less dangerous?"

Cluff is a strong proponent of harm-reduction programs, such as needles exchanges. This relatively new approach to drug recovery has drawn heavy opposition since those opposed to it see it as a tactic that enables addicts to continue their drug-use.

Cluff, who has worked in the substance abuse field for over 20 years, says his organization takes, "baby steps in the way of health."

Tim Purrington, the program director of the Needle Exchange in Northampton says harm-reduction has become a "dirty word." Purrington explained that many view harm-reduction as being soft on drugs and addiction.

However, Purrington says that the Needle Exchange in Northampton has been effective in reducing the spread of communicable diseases, as well as in helping to find treatment and help for drug addicted individuals.

The Needle Exchange in Northampton opened in December of 1995. It is one of four needle exchanges in Massachusetts. The other exchanges are located in Boston, Cambridge and Provincetown. The state of Massachusetts is allowed to have up to 10 needle exchanges.

Funding for needle exchanges comes exclusively from state money. The federal government does not fund needle exchange programs. Because of their controversial nature, city and town governments are hesitant to allow needle exchanges in their communities. With the exception of the Boston location, Purrington says there are at least nine other locations in the state more deserving of needle exchange. After the Boston and Cambridge sites first opened, researchers found that there was no link between needle exchanges and an increase in crime and drug use in those areas.

The Needle Exchange in Northampton is part of Tapestry Health. Tapestry was established over 30 years ago as a family planning clinic. Today, Tapestry has numerous locations throughout Western Massachusetts that assist with family planning, sexually transmitted disease testing, substance abuse and mental health screening and treatment, case management, and HIV prevention services.

Purrington says the needle exchange compliments these other services. Despite convincing evidence that needle exchanges in Springfield and Holyoke would reduce the spread of communicable diseases in those communities, both cities have rejected the creation of needle exchanges. Holyoke has the second highest rate of HIV infection per one hundred thousand people, falling only behind Provincetown.

"We view ourselves as part of the substance abuse treatment system. Probably about 80 percent of the work we do is to try to help people figure out what they can do about their problem," Purrington said.

Despite his commitment to help addicts recover, he does not believe in forcing treatment and recovery on those that come to the needle exchange. "If they don't come in the door, we can't help them," Purrington said.

The needle exchange works hard to build trust with their clients. Purrington explained that all of these individuals are engaged in an illegal lifestyle. As a result, Purrington said, they are often treated as second class citizens by many doctors and

See NEEDLE on page 2

10 killed in Iraq's weekend car bombings

By Bassem Mroue
Associated Press

KRT

U.S. soldiers look at the wounds of a young boy who was hurt in one of the bombings in Bagdhad. Car bombings over the weekend killed and injured several people in the city.

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Car bombs killed 10 people Saturday in Baghdad and elsewhere in central Iraq, while gunmen opened fire on campaign workers putting up posters in the run-up to next month's parliamentary elections.

Also Saturday, the U.S. military said it has received information that a top aide to the leader of al-Qaida in Iraq, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, was killed last month in Ramadi. The death of Bilal Mahmud Awad Shebab was confirmed by a close relative and "coalition sources," the military said in a statement.

The violence came two days before Saddam Hussein's trial resumes after a five-week break.

The first prosecution witnesses are expected to testify before the five-judge panel, offering accounts of the deaths of more than 140 Shiite villagers following an assassination attempt against Saddam in the town of Dujail in 1982.

If convicted Saddam and his seven co-defendants could be sentenced to death by hanging.

Six people were killed and 12 wounded when a suicide car bomber struck in Samarra, 60 miles north of Baghdad, police Lt. Col. Mahmoud Mohammed said.

Four other people died when a car bomb exploded in western Baghdad as two armored cars passed by, according to police Lt. Thaer Mahmoud said. Nobody in the convoy was injured, but one of the armored cars was damaged and removed by U.S. forces, Mahmoud said.

More than 270 people have been killed since Nov. 18 in car bombings and suicide attacks in Iraq.

Elsewhere, the U.S. military said an American soldier assigned to the 2nd Marine Division was killed Friday when a roadside bomb exploded near his vehicle in Hit, 85 miles west of Baghdad.

The latest death raised the number of U.S. service members to die since the Iraq war started in March 2003 to at least 2,105, according to an Associated Press count.

U.S. and Iraqi officials have warned of an upsurge in insurgent attacks ahead of the Dec. 15 elections, in which voters will choose the first fully constitutional parliament since Saddam Hussein's rule collapsed in April 2003.

American authorities are hoping for a big Sunni Arab turnout, a move that could produce a government that would win the trust of the religious community that forms the backbone of the insurgency.

Many Sunnis boycotted the January election, enabling rival Shiites and Kurds to win an overwhelming share of power and worsening communal tensions. A government trusted by Sunni Arabs could help defuse the insurgency and enable U.S. and other international troops to begin heading home next year.

However, insurgents opposed to the election are expected to step up their campaign of intimidation as the ballot approaches.

On Saturday, gunmen opened fire on four people as they plastered campaign posters for the biggest Shiite party on walls in western Baghdad, killing one person and wounding three, police said.

In Mosul, gunmen fired on members of the Iraqi Islamic Party, the country's largest Sunni Arab political movement, while they were putting up campaign posters, wounding one person, police said.

A statement posted on an Islamist Web in the name of al-Qaida in Iraq also claimed responsibility for killing a Kurdish election volunteer in Mosul. The statement said Miqdad Ahmed Sito, 28, was seized in the city's Shifaa neighborhood.

A friend of Sito, who spoke on condition of anonymity out of fear for his own safety, said Sito worked for the Organization for Development and Democratic Dialogue, a non-governmental organization that lectures voters about elections and the country's new constitution.

Iran shaken by earthquake; at least 10 dead

By Nasser Karimi
Associated Press

KRT

Homes were destroyed, at least 10 people were killed and 70 more were injured in the earthquake that struck Iran over this weekend. Rescue teams have already been deployed and people from the villages have been moved to safety.

TEHRAN, Iran — An earthquake with a magnitude of at least 5.9 shook a sparsely populated area of southern Iran on Sunday, flattening seven villages, killing 10 people and injuring 70, officials and state-run television said. The temblor was felt as far away as Oman and the United Arab Emirates.

Heidar Alishvandi, the governor of Qeshm, was quoted by state television as saying rescue teams were deployed to the affected area, and people in the wrecked villages moved quickly to safety.

Another provincial official, Ghasem Karami, told The Associated Press that high casualties were not expected because the area was not heavily developed.

Tehran's seismologic center said the quake was of magnitude 5.9, but the U.S. Geological Survey in Golden, Colo., said it had a magnitude of 6.1. A magnitude-6.0 quake can cause severe damage.

Iran's seismologic center said the epicenter was in the waters of the Persian Gulf between the port city of Bandar Abbas and Qeshm Island, about 940 miles south of Tehran. The USGS said the quake was 35 miles southwest of Bandar Abbas, which has about 500,000 residents.

Masoud Dalman, head of Hormozgan province's emergency affairs, said several buildings on Qeshm Island were damaged. The island has about 200,000 residents.

State-run TV reported that Qeshm Island's airport sustained minor damage and part of a major hospital collapsed from the force of the quake. No further details were provided.

Shahram Alamdari, head of Iranian Red Crescent's rescue unit, said two helicopters were evacuating the injured from Qeshm to Bandar Abbas.

Iranian television ran video from Qeshm showing minor damages to some buildings and a few injured people being taken to hospitals. The report said the villages of Karavan and Kousheh were worst hit, but no footage was shown from those sites.

ARTS & LIVING
'HARVEST' DISAPPOINTS
"The Ice Harvest" offers little in the way of comedy from Billy-Bob Thornton and John Cusack.
PAGE 4

EDITORIAL/OPINION
COURTEOUSNESS VS. SAFETY
Increased campus security brings the question: should 'tailgating' in dorms be permitted?
PAGE 3

WEATHER
TODAY AM Showers, H50°
TONIGHT Cloudy, L45°
TOMORROW PM Showers, H59°, L52°

SPORTS
UPSET AT MULLINS
UMass hockey stuns No. 3 Colorado with a 4-3 victory on Friday night.
PAGE 8

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3499 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Michael A. Busack
MANAGING EDITOR Cameron J. Woods
BUSINESS MANAGER Hirak Shah
PRODUCTION MANAGER Nicholas Belanger
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Sherel Wolnik
ADVERTISING MANAGER Kerry O'Grady
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Lauren Eguvian
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Amanda Allen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Matthew O'Rourke
COPY EDITOR Amanda Allen
EDITORIAL EDITOR Allison Edles
NEWS EDITOR Dan O'Brien
PHOTO EDITOR Kate Sachsenmaier
SPORTS EDITOR Jeff Howe
CIRCULATION MANAGER Thomas Hecht
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Nick Gleason
FINANCE MANAGER Daniel Conti
HUMAN RESOURCE Phil Smoller
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Caren Tortorici
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Nathan Chomsky
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Mackenzie Issler
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Ian Jones
ASSISTANT NEWS Megan Daley
ASSISTANT NEWS Matt Bellivean
ASSISTANT PHOTO Elizabeth Caristi
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eric Athas
ASSISTANT SPORTS Dan Duggan
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Kristen LaCasse

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Michael A. Busack
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Kate Sachsenmaier
COPY EDITOR
Dan O'Brien
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Melody Natal
PRODUCTION STAFF
Jackie Ronan, Irving Mercado

Saddam's trial for 'crimes against humanity' to resume

SADDAM from page 1

Many of the Sunni Arab insurgent groups include Saddam loyalists, including members of the former ruling Baath party and veterans of both Saddam's personal militia and the Republican Guard.

The ousted leader, meanwhile, is vilified by Iraq's Shiite Muslim majority and its Kurdish community, which were oppressed during his rule.

On Saturday, hundreds of supporters of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr rallied in Baghdad to demand Saddam's execution.

Separately, the leader of the biggest Shiite party, Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, accused the court of "weakness" for not having sentenced Saddam to death already. He also complained that media attention over allegations of torture by the Shiite-led security services had belittled Saddam's alleged crimes.

"The court will need all of its strength to resist the pressure," said Miranda Sissons of the International Center for Transitional Justice, an observer at the trial.

In an interview with a German magazine, chief judge Rizgar Mohammed Amin said he pondered moving the trial to Kurdish-controlled northern Iraq because of poor security in Baghdad. Iraqi law provides legal steps for moving the court elsewhere in the country.

However, Amin, a Kurd, said he decided the capital was secure enough for "regular and fair proceedings," even if "they are admittedly difficult."

KRT

Former Iraqi President Saddam Hussein speaks to Awad hamad al-Badar at his trial in October. He and other men are charged with ordering the killings of 143 people in the Shiite village of Dujail.

Fatal accident still under investigation

ACCIDENT from page 1

Pedrizini was to be arraigned Friday, but a judge postponed his arraignment because Pedrizini was not able to contact his mother. He has been held without bail over the weekend until a bail argument is made in court this morning.

State Police investigators told the District Attorney's office that Pedrizini was traveling north on Interstate 91 at a high rate of speed when it struck Candelaria's vehicle just below exit 26 between 8:30 and 9 p.m. Wednesday on the boarder of Deerfield and Greenfield.

The utility truck that Pedrizini was driving "struck the '87 Cavalier from behind and continued northbound to hit a [separate] pick up truck. He continued going northbound after that and left the scene," Scheibel said.

The man driving the pick up truck, Paul Thibodeau of Gill was uninjured. The truck was a Ford F-150.

Scheibel says a witness called police with the license plate number of the utility truck, a Ford F-550, which was owned by Pedrizini's employer.

Scheibel would not comment on whether drugs or alcohol were factors in the crash.

The State Police Reconstruction Team is still investigating the accident. The weather was fair and the roads were dry at the time of the crash.

Pedrizini reportedly worked for a local cable company. However, the information could not be confirmed as of press time.

Program to exchange needles brews controversy in NoHo professionals. Because of this they are reluctant to trust people.

NEEDLE from page 1

The enrollment process at the needle exchange is done anonymously. Each client is asked to answer some detailed questions about ethnicity, sexuality, and drug history. A client will not be refused services if he or she refuses to answer these questions. Purrington said most people answer the questions.

Once the client has completed the questions, their information is entered into a database and they are given a confidential ID code. As trust is established between clinician and client, the client is given information about possible treatment options.

"A vast majority meet the criteria for drug addiction," Purrington said, adding that many people are "poly-drug users," meaning they use a variety of illegal substances. The needle exchange has close relationships with detoxes and rehabs in the area.

"Forty to 50 percent of the people we see end up in treatment," Purrington said. Despite these promising figures, Purrington confessed, "Addiction is a chronic relapseable condition. It's really the exception for people to get out of treatment and stay sober." Most people who come to the needle exchange have a number of other issues. Clients are always able to speak with a clinician, he said.

"We do exchange, not distribution," said Purrington. The policy is one to one, plus one. A client can receive one needle if they do not have a syringe to return. "We want people to properly dispose of needles."

He said there is an underground market for syringes on the street. Very few people come from Holyoke and Springfield, because they can buy a needle on the street. However, they are not granted the services that the needle exchange offers. Dirty needles are not disposed of properly. Massachusetts is one of only three states where syringes cannot be bought over the counter.

In 2004, the needle exchange saw 686 different clients. Over 70 percent of those people were white. Nearly seventy-percent are male, most heterosexual. Almost half of the clients were between the ages of 20 and 29.

Experimental plane crashes; pilot killed

WEST TISBURY (AP) — A single-engine experimental plane crashed on takeoff Sunday at Martha's Vineyard Airport, killing the only person on board.

The Lancair 360 crashed into a wooded area at the end of a runway at about 12:10 p.m., Federal Aviation Administration spokeswoman Arlene Murray said.

There was no immediate information on the cause of the crash.

The pilot's identity was not immediately released. Murray said the kit-built plane was registered with the FAA on Jan. 20 to an Oak Bluffs resident named James R. Rogers.

Murray could not confirm whether Rogers was piloting the plane when it crashed, and other authorities did not return phone calls.

Associated Press

Springfield men arrested in city's largest ever seizure of heroin

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — Two men were arrested and charged with drug trafficking after authorities made what they are describing as the largest seizure of heroin to date in this city.

Miguel A. Sanchez, 33, of Hartford and Rubin Mendoza, 27, of Middletown, Conn., were arrested Friday night in the city's South End after police seized the equivalent of 10,000 bags of heroin with an estimated $100,000 street value.

The men were expected to be arraigned Monday on charges including trafficking heroin, possession of a firearm without a license, possession of ammunition without a firearms identification card, and carrying a firearm in the commission of a felony, the Republican of Springfield reported.

Police confiscated 2,360 individual packages of heroin ready for sale, 100 grams of pure heroin and a loaded 9 mm handgun, said Springfield Police spokesman Sgt. John Delaney.

"It's one of the largest heroin seizures to date in the city," Springfield Police spokesman he said. "It should set back the heroin trade for at least a few days."

Associated Press

IMPORTANT HOUSING INFORMATION

ATTENTION: Resident Students

Cancellation Fee Schedule

Any student planning to cancel their Spring 2006 Housing Assignment please follow this timeline to avoid getting a cancellation fee.

Cancellation of Application/Assignment - Spring 2006:

November 1st through 5:00pm on December 9th:
No Cancellation Fee

5:00pm December 9, 2005 through 5:00pm December 30, 2005:
$200 Cancellation Fee

5:00pm December 30, 2005 through 5:00pm January 13, 2006:
$300 Cancellation Fee

5:00pm January 13, 2006 through Spring Semester:
$400 Cancellation Fee

Residence Hall Closing

Residence Hall Closing Date and Time:

All Residence Halls (except Brett, Lewis, Crampton and Prince) will close at 6:00pm, on Thursday December 22, 2005. All students must be checked out of their rooms by then.

Please note: The Residence Hall Manual incorrectly lists the snow day for exams as the closing date.

This notice contains the correct information.

We apologize for any inconvenience.

UMASS AMHERST
HOUSING ASSIGNMENT OFFICE

Invest in your future.

Earn 1, 2, or 3 credits in less than a month

Classes begin January 4

English Comp I and II
Intro to Dance
Intro to Ethics
Modern Physics
Psychology
Public Speaking
Self Defense for Women
Spanish Skills
French Skills

CLICK or CALL
gcc.mass.edu
(413) 775-1801

GREENFIELD Community College

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." - Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Hold the door, please

Jackie Hai

Like many, I tuned in a couple weeks ago to ABC's "Primetime" report on violent crime on college campuses and, likewise, shared in the general indignation at their unfair singling out of UMass. There has, since then, been a good deal of discussion surrounding the issue, but rather than retread what has already been said, there's one aspect in particular I wanted to talk about.

A lengthy portion of the "Primetime" segment focused on a practice called tailgating; that is, interlopers sneaking undetected past security into residence halls by closely following a group of students through the entrance. This was pointed out as supposedly a large security risk, and I've heard some well-meaning people around campus suggest in response that we should stop letting strangers into residence halls when we enter.

It would be a good idea if there really were hordes of malicious non-residents chomping at the bit to tailgate into the dorms with criminal acts on their minds, but I wonder at the statistics of how frequently this actually occurs. It would be a shame if we lost that simple act of common courtesy, holding open a door for someone, just for a dubious increase in security. On more than one occasion I've misplaced my student ID during the day, and would have been quite out of luck trying to get back to my room if not for the kindness of my hallmates.

> Of course, I don't claim to personally know everyone who lives in my building, so a lot of the people I hold doors open for are indeed strangers. I just assume that they do live here. Unfortunately, now we're made to believe that we could be abetting a criminal with our unquestioning generosity.

This is general reciprocity (what some would call karma) at work here; an unwritten rule of sorts that if you lend a hand to the student behind you fumbling with their wallet or purse, someone else will repay the favor by helping you out the next time you're scrambling in from the rain with a stack of library books in one hand and a grab 'n' go lunch in the other. Of course, I don't claim to personally know everyone who lives in my building, so a lot of the people I hold doors open for are indeed strangers. I just assume that they do live here. Unfortunately, now we're made to believe that we could be abetting a criminal with our unquestioning generosity. This would be a non-issue if everyone knew everyone else in their hall, but from what I've experienced so far residence communities are generally tenuous, certainly not as close-knit as they could be.

We can see this paralleled in the nation at large, as well. People often live in bubbles, ignoring their neighbors, keeping their kids safely at home, speeding past hitchhikers on the road. What's created is a tradeoff between security and community: Largely gone are the open, friendly neighborhoods of generations past, and in their place are insulated pockets of individuals looking out for themselves. This kind of response can backfire, however, as the lack of a "neighborhood watch" makes it easier to get away with crimes.

Which brings us to a chicken-or-egg question: Is it an increase in crime that breaks down the ties of community, or is it the breakdown of the community that leads to an increased opportunity for crime?

When we translate this back to our own microcosm of life here in college, we find that we actually have a slight upper hand over the deadly cycle. Or we should, at least, in theory. As students, we should have an easier time building community than adults who have to worry about full-time jobs, traveling, and raising families. We live in tightly packed clusters, and see each other day in and day out. So despite these advantages, why is it that most dorm-run social events have such a low turnout? I think the main reason is apathy – people are content with whatever group of friends they have, and so choose to pass up on the chance to be better acquainted with their neighbors. This is a challenge faced by RA's, RD's, and CL's with no easy solution and an entire topic in and of itself for another column.

It's self-defeating when we only address the symptoms of a problem and not the underlying causes. True, over the last few years the university has cut down on violent crime by more than 50 percent by instating a heavier security policy. But with diminishing returns, it's probably going to take a lot more resources to wipe out that remaining half, if it's even possible. Stepping up police patrols, introducing random searches, and slamming doors in our peers' faces might help a little in the short term, but not nearly as much as fostering a stronger community where its members look out for each other.

Jackie Hai is a Collegian columnist.

Walking by empty shoes

Debbie Friedman

This country is numb to numbers. We have to be. If we were able to grasp the magnitude behind the numbers being fed to us today, people would be moved to action. For instance, we are in an $8 trillion deficit right now. Can you even comprehend how large a number that is? The government should be glad that we cannot, otherwise people would be storming the black iron gates of the White House demanding some financial competence. Once you get over a billion, people seem to lose all interest. Eight trillion is just two little words that do not hold as much weight as they should, and it's sad.

What is sadder however, are the numbers of caskets coming home from Iraq. The ones we don't get to see because our media is coerced into babying the American public's innocent, naive little minds.

While walking by the campus pond a few weeks back, I stumbled across some numbers that I could not ignore. It was a traveling exhibit of soldiers boots used to represent the 2,000 some odd deaths that have occurred from the war in Iraq. Each boot had a nametag with the age and state of each fallen soldier along with flowers and notes from family. It littered the lawn between the campus pond and the library. It caught my attention from very far away because I saw the usually empty grass filled with debris.

Two thousand, two hundred sixteen was the number of boots lying on the ground and for the first time I saw that number in the way it is meant to be seen. It was no longer a neat little combination of symbols on a piece of paper or a television screen. This time it was as if 2,216 bodies were lying on our campus. This time it was so much more real.

It was boots that used to be filled by a living body. It was boots attached to a name, a family and a life now gone, and it was horrible.

As I turned to walk away I realized that to my left there were more shoes, but they were not boots. They were the flip-flops, sneakers and loafers that represented the innocent, harmless Iraqi men, women and children who lost their lives for no reason what so ever. Of course this was only a small sample of the Iraqi civilian casualties because if they were to represent every one, the campus would be filled with shoes from the Mullins Center to Orchard Hill.

> I am worried that everyone is so desensitized to numbers that the higher they go, the less it means. When the first 20 soldiers died, people were talking about it because you could grasp that amount. Yet as it leaps into the thousands, does anyone really understand it?

I bent down and looked closely at a tiny purple Velcro shoe that had a tag attached reading, Nahir, age two. At that moment I couldn't help but think about how many little children would never get to grow up, partly because of the boots sitting across from them. Partly because of the people who were walking all around me, and partly because of me.

I know that no one wanted any of those shoes to be lying there. But they were there, and everyday there are going to be more piling up until someone yells, stop. I wonder, who will be the one to yell it or if anyone ever will? I am worried that everyone is so desensitized to numbers that the higher they go, the less it means. When the first 20 soldiers died, people were talking about it because you could grasp that amount. Yet as it leaps into the thousands, does anyone really understand it?

Maybe it does not matter how you come to understand the numbers, so long as they don't directly affect you. If you lost a loved one in the war, that one is going to carry the weight of a million strangers. If you lost $1,000 of your own money, it's going to sting a lot worse than hearing about how the government lost eight trillion. I guess I can't speak for everyone, but it sure seems like numbers are all relative.

What I liked about this shoe display was that it took these distant numbers and put them right in everyone's faces. It made people notice them and relate to them. It stopped people dead in their tracks and gave people a mental idea of what it would be like to step into the shoes that were lying all around them. It made me realize that those empty shoes also meant empty seats at Thanksgiving dinners all around the country.

The most important thing that this exhibit gave to me was the ability to know exactly what I was most thankful for this year. While I deeply sympathize with the people all over this world who are dealing with empty shoes and seats in their life, I am so thankful for the fact that all of those things are full in my life.

Debbie Friedman is a Collegian columnist.

SGA leader accused of cheating

Jeff Napolitano

– In my last column, I wrote about the problems of diversity at this school. I wrote about the disregard and ignorance of the Chancellor and Vice Chancellor on this matter, and how unlikely it is, with them in charge, the current state of affairs will improve.

I would like to now turn my focus toward another prominent member of the University, on a slightly lighter note. To those who read my column with any expectation of solemnity, I'll get back to serious business in a couple of weeks. Right now, I'd like to tell you a few things about the SGA President, Pavel Payano.

But first, to put things into perspective, you should know that for the first time in six years, I'm getting a new computer. A beautiful machine – an Athlon 64 2800+, with half a gigabyte of memory, and an ATI Radeon 9600 Pro 3D video card, with 256MB of RAM. 256MB of RAM on a video card, that's insane. It isn't the top-of-the-line, but after six years of a video card with 16MB, it's going to be one hell of a change.

To top off this wonderful machine will be two 200GB Seagate hard drives, running in a RAID 0+1 configuration. For those who aren't familiar with the terminology that means everything is going to run super fast, and I'll never run out of disk space. Every game in the civilized world will be on this computer, and it will be a sight to see.

This leads me to my next point: games. President Payano and I share an affliction, an unbridled affinity to lose ourselves in the fraudulent world of electronic gaming. It is almost officially a disease, with studies that came out last week placing gaming addiction on par with narcotic drugs. It is with pride (and a hint of shame) that I respond "Start up Age of Empires III and call me a crack head."

This is where President Payano comes in. This summer, we were amicably playing a multiplayer role-playing game, "Dungeon Siege," fighting off goblins and wolves and all sorts of the traditional RPG "nasties." I played a warrior-class, and Payano was playing a spellcaster-class. This meant, of course, that I did all the fighting, while Payano's magician stood a good distance away while my character suffered all the slings and arrows from all the Phrak Piercers, Krug Dogs, and Skeleton Captains. And after most enemies were destroyed, an item or, more commonly, a few pieces of gold would replace their lifeless corpses.

> President Pavel Payano is a filthy gold bandit, who will not hesitate to poach as much treasure as he possibly can. And I promise you all, if his magician should ever meet my warrior again, he'd better be higher than level 37, or his fancy rings and expensive shaft will find a place in my pockets.

But here's the real kicker: Nearly every time I would vanquish a foe, with or without Payano's help, he would instantly scoop up all the gold. In the midst of battle, with 10 creatures pounding on me, it was hard to keep track of where all the booty went. But after awhile, I noticed that nine out of 10 times, after the smoke had cleared, the battlefield would be clear of loot.

At first, I thought Payano was just holding onto the gold, making sure that we didn't lose track of our prize. In the 3D-rendered brush of the forest, and the drifts of the snowy mountains, it is sometimes hard to identify every item on the ground. At first, I thought Payano was going to wait until we took a break from battling, and then split the gold with me. I waited a long, long time for this to happen, and it never did.

This means, ladies and gentlemen, fellow students and scholars, that we have a scoundrel amongst us. This thief, no less, is our very own student government president. President Pavel Payano is a filthy gold bandit, who will not hesitate to poach as much treasure as he possibly can. And I promise you all, if his magician should ever meet my warrior again, he'd better be higher than level 37, or his fancy rings and expensive shaft will find a place in my pockets.

Now, with my kick-ass new computer, not only will I destroy Payano in Dungeon Siege I, but also in Dungeon Siege II (which I hear his paltry two-year-old HP desktop can't even run). I will destroy him in every game in which his path and mine shall cross, be it Quake IV, Doom III, Counter-Strike II, or the pinnacle of tactical battle, Age of Empires III. Oh, and Pavel – you'd better pray that we don't log onto the same World of Warcraft server. As soon as I get my computer, I'll have a level-20 Rogue Night-Elf by the end of the first day.

I will teach our fair president a lesson, one he will not forget anytime soon: Steal my gold, suffer my wrath.

Jeff Napolitano is a Collegian columnist.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

STUDENT LACKS DESIRE TO ATTEND FOOTBALL GAMES

I wasn't going to say anything the first time. I really wasn't. But then, I'm reading the newspaper, and along came a second editorial lamenting student attendance at football games. For some, football games are a great time. They're a chance to socialize, yell without others giving you dirty looks or posting on LiveJournal about you, and, united, cheer on your team. That's fine, for you.

It's not that I don't enjoy this school (I do), it's not that I don't understand football (I follow the Patriots religiously) and it's not that I don't want our team to win. I'm happy for them any time I hear of another victory. It's just that I have no real desire to be there when it happens.

There are several things I would rather be doing on any given game night, and I don't feel any of them should be viewed as less valid. And what about the students who don't even like football? Do you want to be chided for missing a UMass event that you don't enjoy?

Jon Brandt mentions that perhaps we can counter our bad reputation as a party school with a good reputation as a sports school. It's likely that some, including me, would view this as a negative when looking to UMass. Sports and arts are often at odds, and it would have felt like continuing high school, with the emphasis not on what I was interested in.

Speaking as someone from a high school with virtually no room for creativity but always a football team, it can get annoying to constantly hear about how sports need more attention. So only a couple thousand students go to the games. Can non-sports groups even realistically expect that? The a Capella Festival that I attended last semester seemed pleased with a turnout of around 100, most not even students. I don't see them complaining about attendance.

Fortunately, UMass is large enough and diversified enough to accommodate both. This isn't high school. Let's get some perspective and let people choose to attend or not attend activities as they see fit, according to their own interests.

I would like to see UMass counter its negative party reputation with a positive, academic reputation. Isn't that why we come to college? Sure, it's not the only reason. But for those of us who choose schools with little or no consideration of the sports, hearing about how we should be going or we don't have spirit (as per the first editorial) gets old fast and certainly doesn't make me want to start attending.

To each his own, as they say. Publicizing a sporting event, fine. Trying to create interest with lively game accounts, or getting groups of your friends to go, sure. Writing editorials lamenting attendance or attacking spirit? Not so good. I can do without the subtle (and sometimes blatant) insinuations that football or sports in general should be higher on my list of non-academic priorities.

Whether we attend the games or not, I'm sure no one actively wants our team to lose. So keep encouraging your friends, keep publicizing it, but please stop with the chiding if every student isn't there. I still love the Minutemen. I'm just cheering from the FAC.

Ellen Cunningham,
UMass student

EDITORIAL OPINION EDITORIAL OPINION EDITORIAL OPINION EDITORIAL OPINION EDITORIAL OPINION EDITORIAL OPINION

SHARE YOUR THOUGHTS. SHARE YOUR OPINIONS.

WRITE FOR EDITORIAL OPINION

EITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Always practice safe sex

By Heather Grantham
Cornell Daily Sun (Cornell U.)

ITHACA, N.Y. – Did you know that the average speed of a man's ejaculation is 28 miles per hour? Did you know that a woman's clitoris has 8,000 nerve endings – twice as many as a man's entire penis? The health conscious among you will be interested to learn that sex burns about 360 calories per hour, and a teaspoon of semen is comparable in nutritional value to a breath mint. On a more sobering note, you may be unaware that Chlamydia, one of the most common and easily-transmitted STIs, is asymptomatic in 75 percent of cases.

These fun facts and many others are available from the members of SHAG, Cornell University's Sexual Health Awareness Group. SHAG was originally formed to educate the greek community about such important but commonly taboo topics as genital anatomy, sexually transmitted infections, contraception and sexual assault, but the group has recently expanded and estimates that their hour-long presentation will reach more than half of the undergraduate population this year.

I'm plugging SHAG, because, as peer educators, they provide a valuable service to the Cornell community. Too many times, my inquiry, "So, when was the last time you got tested," has been met with, "Huh? Tested?" and I once watched the man I was dating hook his fingers into a condom and stretch it over his penis like a latex beanie hat. I have girlfriends who still have never been to a gynecologist and insist on vaguely referring to their sexual organs as "down there." It makes logical sense that the majority of new sexually transmitted infections [illegible] are freed of some [illegible] education.

Let's begin with sexual health maintenance. Women over the age of 18 and women of any age who are sexually active need an annual gynecological exam to screen for STIs, cervical cancer and an array of other abnormalities. To recap, every single one of you should have an annual exam. While lying on your back with your feet in stirrups may not be your idea of a good time, it's quick and painless and critical to taking care of your body. College-aged men should also have a general check-up each year, and you should use this opportunity to ask about a routine STI screening.

At Gannett, a test for HIV is free, and results come back in two weeks but you have to make separate appointments to have the test and to pick up your results. It's a pain, but the bright side is the mandatory counseling is a perfect opportunity to ask your burning sexual health questions in a confidential setting. Testing for other STIs can be incorporated into your annual exam, and student health insurance subsidizes the cost. Bacterial infections like Chlamydia and Gonorrhea are easily cured with oral antibiotics, and viral infections, like Herpes, HPV and even HIV can be controlled with treatment. Yeah, STIs suck, but you have a responsibility to yourself and your partner(s) to get tested.

STIs are spread through contact with the semen, vaginal secretions and/or blood of an infected person. So, unfortunately, for all you smug virgins, you don't have to have intercourse to contract an STI. Many sexually transmitted infections can be spread orally as well, and you can even get Gonorrhea in your throat.

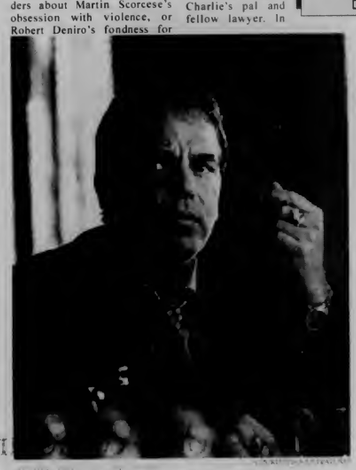
While STIs are not transmitted by saliva, they can enter your bloodstream through tiny cuts in your mouth, and viral infections that cause sores, like Herpes, are communicated by skin-to-skin contact. This is why flavored condoms and dental dams are a brilliant invention, and you should utilize them to protect yourselves. In a pinch, plastic wrap can be substituted for latex, for a fraction of the cost. (Please note that dental dams and plastic wrap should only be used for mouth-to-vagina or mouth-to-anus contact. Guys, you cannot wrap your tool in Glad Clingwrap.)

If you can't or won't use a barrier method for oral sex (and I must confess that even I don't), there are other risk-reduction strategies you can employ. For example, limit your contact with the semen or vaginal secretions of your partner. I'm all for swallowing, but if you're giving oral sex to a man of questionable status,

See SEX on page 5

'Ice Harvest' fails to bring laughs

By Jake Monte
Collegian Staff



Billy Bob Thornton likes to play characters that are self-ish, and comically unheroic. In "Bad Santa," he played a drunk who was so full of self-centered apathy that he ruined many a child's Christmas. In "Bad News Bears," he almost fell out of his coaching chair with a bad hangover after a night of beer drinking and wearing a T-shirt that read "She looked good last night." His characters make one wonder about his inclinations as a person the same way one wonders about Martin Scorcese's obsession with violence, or Robert Deniro's fondness for playing psychos.

What does Billy Bob really see in these characters who are the brunt of bad screenplays? Perhaps his newest film, "The Ice Harvest," holds the answer. Thornton plays Vic Cavanaugh, whose friend Charlie Arglist (John Cusack) and he have just embezzled $2,147,000 and change. Oliver Platt plays Max, Charlie's pal and fellow lawyer. In the course of the film, after the money has been stolen, Charlie finds time to go to a strip club, see his ex-wife and children, go out to dinner with Vic and meet up with Max at a bar. Why Charlie and Vic dilly-dally for so long after the crime of a lifetime is more the screenwriter's decision than it is theirs. They believe Charlie's boss, Bill Guerrard, whom they stole the money from, isn't onto them, but if they were smart they would get out of Wichita, Kansas, as soon as possible. To add insult to injury, Charlie isn't exactly a model father. He spends most of his time at a strip-club, and when he and a very drunk Max go home to visit his family on Christmas Eve, his son expresses outright hatred for him, and his daughter expresses disappointment. Charlie has a lot of obstacles to overcome, but the screenwriter simply forgets about them. The family conflict is not dealt with.

"Ice Harvest"
Directed by Harold Ramis
Starring John Cusack Billy Bob Thornton
Focus Features
Rated R
88 mins.
Grade D+

As you can tell, it's not much of a plot and the screenwriter will be hard pressed to fill up two hours with these meager ingredients. The film meanders, therefore, like a drunk man wandering around Wichita, Kansas, searching for something entertaining to do. But there's not much to find in Wichita. The script is only sporadically funny and interesting so it's up to John Cusack, Oliver Platt and Billy Bob Thornton to bring this film to life. Cusack does a fine job with his role. There are some laughs in the "Ice Harvest," though not enough. Most of them come from Oliver Platt, who plays a wonderful drunk. Thornton isn't funny, which seems to be part of the theme. He wasn't funny in "Bad Santa" or "Bad News Bears," either. In one scene, they have one of Gerard's henchmen, Roy Ellis, locked in a trunk and Thornton suddenly begins hitting the trunk with a golf club. The scene seemed improvised by Thornton, and it made sense all at once. Thornton loves acting because he likes to be the one making us laugh. He's a performer. Playing these low-life characters allows him to truly showcase his comic side. But it's time for him to go down a different avenue. It's just not working.

"The Ice Harvest" is thoroughly depressing, pointless and aimless. It feels as if the screenwriter was suffering from a case of severe blues, and didn't have enough energy to come up with a story that had any verve. The only lines that allude to any kind of statement are: "In this country all that's left for men is money and pussy." Or, "It's futile to regret. You do one thing, do another, same results" – not exactly inspiring or life-changing words. The film is as barren, as a snow-covered field sprinkled with blood on a cloudy winter day. It is there to remind us of the bleaker parts of life, but not worth two hours of our time to do so.

Billy Bob Thornton stars as Vic Cavanaugh in "The Ice Harvest."

John Cusack plays thief Charlie Arglist in Harold Ramis' latest film.

Portable music players gaining popularity in bars

By Martha Irvine
AP National Writer

CHICAGO (AP) – The jukebox at the bar Brian Toro manages isn't gathering dust just yet – but it may only be a matter of time.

The popular nightspot is among a growing number of places across the country where people can bring their iPods and other portable music players and, for as long as the bartender allows, share their personal favorites with the crowd.

"Everybody wants to be a DJ," says Toro, a 29-year-old Californian who recently moved to Chicago and now manages Bar Louie in the city's Gold Coast neighborhood. "People enjoy having a little control in their lives."

Even Toro now brings in his music player so he can crank up rock and punk tunes for customers. He'll also let others play just about anything - "even if it's country" – as long as the music is upbeat.

The trend, which is catching on from Washington, D.C., to San Pedro, Calif., is a reflection of just how portable music has become – and how sharing it with others is becoming easier than ever, partly due to new products aimed at amateur DJs.

Numark Industries, for instance, is out with a mixing device that allows users with two iPods to segue one song into the next. It's fairly basic stuff – and not something necessarily aimed at professional DJs.

Some professional DJs say they're waiting for technology that would enable them to perform on a single portable player all the creative mixing and "scratching" they do with vinyl albums.

Already, many do so using software and a laptop, or larger MP3/CD player consoles made by such companies as Denon. But in the era of rapidly shrinking electronics, people want their gear as portable and lightweight as possible.

For amateurs, a basic iPod or other small portable player – and a simple hookup into a bar's sound system – suffices.

That's how it works at the Common Ground Bar and Grill in the Allston section of Boston, where amateurs can sign up to play 15-minute sets during "mp3j night" every Wednesday.

Depending on the crowd, it might be a "chill night," with customers playing mellow jazz or obscure electronica, says Shannon Bullard, a 22-year-old Emerson College student who can often be found at the bar with her iPod.

Other times, someone might be inspired, as her boyfriend was recently, to play a high-powered rock mix with everything from Bon Jovi to Journey.

"I've been here some nights when people dance. It's always something different," says Bullard, who also heard the crowd groan one night when someone played a cheesy remake of a popular tune by The Smiths.

"It's still one of those things where if you play the latest song, you're cool – and in the know," she says. Experts who track technology trends say they're not surprised people are sharing more music in public.

"It's the same thing as sharing a hot new 45 or tape or CD," says Susan Barnes, associate director of the Lab for Social Computing at Rochester Institute of Technology in upstate New York.

She also sees it as more proof that – while some have accused a new wave of music listeners of shutting out the world with their headphones – technology is actually encouraging people to socialize.

"All this stuff is set up for people to meet other people – not isolate," Barnes says.

John von Seggern, a laptop DJ and producer in Los Angeles," also sees DJing as part of an overall movement toward decentralizing control of many forms of media – whether it be through podcasting, blogging or musicians and authors offering their work direct for downloading on the Internet.

And that, he says, creates even more need for self-appointed reviewers and content editors – DJs included.

"It becomes more and more of an art form to select out what is good – because a lot of what's out there is not good," says von Seggern, author of the book "Laptop Music Power: The Comprehensive Guide."

Often, it's not about the technology, professionals say.

"You can have the fanciest gadgets and gizmos, but if you don't get your crowd, there will still be nobody on the dance floor," says Patrick Kowalczyk, a 37-year-old New Yorker who works in public relations and DJs during his off hours.

But, while they're waiting for technology that will make iPods and other small MP3 players even more useful on the club scene, he and many other DJs already see some advantages to carrying one along.

"It's MUCH lighter than hauling around vinyl," says Kendra Borowski, a 26-year-old New Yorker who got an iPod 10 months ago and now uses it at her DJing gigs at bars and nightclubs.

She's also gotten a kick out of impressing friends by using an adapter with a built-in FM transmitter to play tunes from her personal library on cab radios as they ride through the city.

Portable players also provide an easy way for professionals to expand their musical library in a pinch.

Kenny Ulansey, who leads a self-titled ensemble in the Philadelphia area, finds it handy to use a player to supplement the songs his band performs at weddings, as well as bat and bar mitzvahs for Jewish teens.

"We'd go bonkers learning too many awful songs," the 53-year-old sax player says, referring to requests they get from the younger crowd for alternative rock, hip-hop songs "or the latest teeny-bop sensation."

In that regard, he calls his portable music player "a savior."

Numark Industries' newest mixing device allows DJs to segue from one song into the next using iPods instead of turntables.

Rap examines prejudice

French rappers speak out on social issues

By John Leicester
Associated Press

PARIS — The beat is infectious, the music sensual. But the words are acid, a rapped cry of wounded pride from the heart of France's ghettos.

"Whatever I do, in France's mind I will always be just a kid from the projects," raps Disiz La Peste on his new album. "I know that I fascinate people, because where I come from, succeeding is not easy, and I still bear the stigma of this environment, of my olive skin."

Three weeks of riots, arson and attacks on police ripped the cover off problems that French hip-hop artists like Disiz have been rapping and raging about for years.

Racism, despair, anger, drugs, crime, hostility against police – issues now thrust to the top of the national agenda by France's worst civil unrest in four decades – have been grist for these urban social commentators for years.

In an interview, Disiz, whose real name is Serigne M'Baye, said it is too simplistic to say that French politicians now accused of having ignored the ghettos' problems for decades need only to have listened to rap to learn that the lid was ready blow.

Instead, everyone needs to examine themselves, their prejudices and their country, he says. That includes both youths from poor suburbs who are too quick to write off their own futures, telling themselves "there is no point in fighting," and white French he says must ask themselves "Do we really accept immigrants who are French?"

"We speak in France of liberty, equality and fraternity. Liberty exists. No doubt there. Everyone can speak out. But equality and fraternity do not exist. We have to fight for them, but we have to fight together," he told The Associated Press.

Hip-hop crossed over to France from the United States in the 1980s. It quickly became a vehicle of expression for suburban youths, some of whom wove in musical and lyrical elements from their own North and West African backgrounds, and helped make France a vibrant center of hip-hop culture.

Like other French artists, rappers benefited from legislation that obliges radio stations to broadcast a certain proportion of French songs to ward off English-language dominance. As in the United States, French rappers appeal as much to white rich kids as they do to French-born children of immigrants.

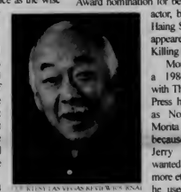
French pioneers included Supreme NTM. Their song "What are we waiting for" ("Qu'est-ce qu'on attend"), from the 1995 album "Paris bombed" ("Paris sous les bombes"), seems, in light of recent riots, like an early warning sign that was ignored.

"What are we waiting for to set everything aflame? What are we waiting for to no longer follow the rules of the game?" NTM rapped. "We have nothing to lose because we had nothing to start with. I wouldn't sleep soundly if I were you. The bourgeoisie can quake, the scum are in town."

Scum. That word, used by French Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy two days before the rioting erupted Oct. 27, has been much in the news lately. Sarkozy was referring to toughs and criminals who terrorize marginalized housing projects.

But his comment was taken by many youths as a blanket slur. Sarkozy's critics accused him of sparking the violence that only abated last week after President Jacques Chirac declared a state of emergency.

"Of course, the word 'scum' is used by rappers. But it all depends on who uses it," Olivier Cachin, author of "The Rap Offensive," told the daily Le Monde. "Hearing it from the lips of an interior minister is as incongruous as a rapper using a pluperfect subjunctive."



Disiz, 27, echoes the feelings of marginalization – of being caught between two worlds – expressed by many youths in the projects. Born in France to a Senegalese father and a Belgian mother, he raps on his album "the extraordinary stories of a kid from the projects" of being stuck "between two chairs."

"The idea is to re-humanize people from the suburbs and to stop always stigmatizing them as fundamentalist Muslims or delinquents," he told the AP. "It is not an illness to come from the projects and you can make something of yourself."

Actor Pat Morita dead at 73

By Tim Molloy
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES – Actor Pat Morita, who offered the famous advice "wax on, wax off" to a young karate student in his performance as the wise Mr. Miyagi in "The Karate Kid," has died. He was 73.

Morita died Thursday at his Las Vegas home of natural causes, said his wife of 12 years, Evelyn. She said in a statement that her husband, who first rose to fame with a role on "Happy Days," had "dedicated his entire life to acting and comedy."

His role in the 1984 film defined his career. As Kesuke Miyagi, the mentor to Ralph Macchio's "Daniel-san," he taught karate while trying to catch flies with chopsticks and offering such advice as "wax on, wax off" to help Daniel improve his skills while doing his chores.

"It was both my honor and privilege to have worked with him and create a bit of cinema magic together," Macchio said in a statement. "My life is all the richer for having known him. I will miss his genuine friendship."

"Forever my Sensei," Macchio added, referring to Morita's role in "The Karate Kid."

The role earned Morita an Academy Award nomination for best supporting actor, but he lost to Haing S. Ngor, who appeared in "The Killing Fields."

Morita said in a 1986 interview with The Associated Press he was billed as Noriyuki (Pat) Morita in the film because producer Jerry Weintraub wanted him to sound more ethnic. He said he used the billing because it was "the only name my parents gave me."

For years, Morita played small and sometimes demeaning roles in such films as "Thoroughly Modern Millie" and TV series such as "The Odd Couple" and "Green Acres." His first breakthrough came with "Happy Days," and he followed with his own brief series, "Mr. T and Tina."

"The Karate Kid" led to three sequels, the last of which, 1994's "The Next Karate Kid," paired him with a young Hilary Swank.

Morita was prolific outside of the "Karate Kid" series as well, appearing in "Honeymoon in Vegas," "Spy Hard," "Even Cowgirls Get the Blues" and "The Center of the World." He also provided the voice for a character in the Disney movie "Mulan" in 1998.

Born in northern California on June 28, 1932, the son of migrant fruit pickers, Morita spent most of his early years in the hospital with spinal tuberculosis. He later recovered only to be sent to a Japanese-American internment camp in Arizona during World War II.

"One day I was an invalid," he recalled in a 1989 AP interview. "The next day I was public enemy No. 1 being escorted to an internment camp by an FBI agent wearing a piece."

After the war, Morita's family tried to repair their finances by operating a Sacramento restaurant. It was there that Morita first tried his comedy on patrons.

Because prospects for a Japanese-American standup comic seemed poor, Morita found steady work in computers at Aerojet General. But at age 30 he entered show business full time.

'Syriana' offers fierce intelligence

By David Germain
Associated Press

Writer-director Stephen Gaghan has a full tank of ideas in "Syriana," a tale of oil-industry corruption and conspiracy whose story is almost too dense and taxing for the average guy at the pumps.

The filmmaker applies the multiple story lines, far-flung locations and detached-observer perspective he used in Steven Soderbergh's drug drama "Traffic," whose screenplay earned Gaghan an Academy Award.

The effect may not be as sharp and street-level emotional as "Traffic," yet "Syriana" weaves powerful moments of pathos, compassion, and cross-cultural insight into its lesson on the realities of greed in international commerce.

Anyone who grouses that Hollywood dumbs everything down should check out "Syriana," a fiercely intelligent thriller that puts audiences through a challenging mental workout to decipher and digest its intricate ideas and dialogue.

It's impossible to absorb it all in a single viewing, and so much is packed into such a tight space that "Syriana" occasionally feels too truncated, like a two- or three-night miniseries clipped to fit a movie-of-the-week time slot.

Still, Gaghan injects so much personality into his characters – and the cast led by George Clooney, Matt Damon, Jeffrey Wright, Chris Cooper and Amanda Peet embody them so richly – that a great deal of humanity shines through in what otherwise could have been an academic exercise.

As "Traffic" did with drug smugglers and government enforcers, "Syriana" wanders among the shadowy parties that open or tighten the spigots on petroleum running to the refineries, from corporate board rooms to federal agencies to the palaces of Arab royalty.

Anchoring the story is Clooney as CIA career man Bob Barnes, a character inspired by intelligence agent Robert Baer and his memoir "See No Evil: The True Story of a Ground Soldier in the CIA's War on Terrorism" (Clooney and Soderbergh turned Gaghan on to the book, and their production company helped produce the film).

Barnes is a dutiful trooper and supremely competent in often dastardly undercover missions in the Middle East, where he seems more at home than among the Washington political tricksters who pull his strings.

His seen-it-all demeanor is balanced by the naivete of young energy analyst Bryan Woodman (Damon), who takes his wife (Peet) and family along on a trip to pursue a Mideast business opportunity. Woodman forges an unexpected bond with a reformist Arab prince (Alexander Siddig) seeking to put his country on a progressive economic and social footing.

Swirling through this world are the special interests – Cooper as the head of a Texas oil company about to consolidate with a global rival, Wright as an attorney trying to maneuver the merger to federal regulatory approval, and Christopher Plummer as his boss, a slick lawyer manipulating international Mideast politics to the advantage of U.S. business interests.

Plummer is simply chilling in a relatively small role as a corporate predator who comes bearing a soft smile and a handshake, while William Hurt as a shady Clooney ally and Tim Blake Nelson as an oil-industry sleaze make strong impressions in even more fleeting roles.

Behind a bushy, grizzled beard, Clooney is a gripping presence despite his character's utter lack of showiness. Clooney plays him as the stoic opposite of his P.T. Barnum ringleader in the "Ocean's Eleven" movies, a workmanlike believer who goes about his job as a matter of philosophical conviction.

Wright delivers the most well-rounded performance, subtly capturing the inner conflict of a man trying to reconcile personal ambition with distaste for the world in which he thrives.

Sony announces parental controls

By May Wong
Associated Press

SAN JOSE, Calif. – Sony Corp. has become the latest of the video game console makers to announce parental controls in it newest machine, according to the Entertainment Software Association.

Now, all three major console makers are promising parents the means to help restrict their children's access to violent video games.

Sony will place the controls on its forthcoming machine, PlayStation 3, according to the ESA. Users of PlayStation 2 could limit access, but only to movies, not games.

The company wasn't immediately prepared to comment.

Microsoft Corp. had already placed parental controls in its new Xbox 360, which debuted last week. The machine lets users restrict access to video games and DVDs that carry certain ratings, such as "T" for "teen" or "M" for "mature." It also offers parental controls on the company's Xbox Live online gaming service, limiting who their children can interact with.

Earlier this month, Nintendo Inc. announced similar plans for its next-generation machine, Revolution, due out in 2006.

Sony, which leads the worldwide market with more than 102 million PlayStation and PlayStation 2 consoles sold, also introduced parental control for games in its PlayStation Portable, launched earlier this year. The video game industry has been under tougher scrutiny in recent years as lawmakers enacted legislation restricting sales of violent video games to minors. Industry groups have so far successfully challenged the laws in court, citing violations of the First Amendment.

"With the average age of game players now 30, our industry naturally creates content appropriate for a wide range of audiences, just as there are TV shows, films, music and books for people of all tastes, interests and values," said Doug Lowenstein, president of the Entertainment Software Association.

Lowenstein commended the game console makers for voluntarily applying parental control technology that is not yet found in other media devices, such as DVD or music players.

Safety should come first with sex

SEX from page 4

it's not a good idea to let him come in your mouth. Also, if you plan to perform oral sex, don't brush or floss your teeth right before you go out. Brushing creates tiny cuts in your gums that can ease STI transmission, so brush earlier in the day, and freshen your breath with mouthwash or gum.

For people who are sexually active, the easiest method of protecting yourselves from sexually transmitted infections (and pregnancy) is condom use. When used correctly, condoms are very, very effective, and SHAG has created "10 Steps to Putting On a Condom" – which you can find on their website. Remember that it is not cute or funny to use your teeth when opening the wrapper, and pay attention to which direction the condom rolls, so you don't put it on inside out.

I realize that things can get tricky when you're fumbling in the dark, but taking a few extra seconds to properly "outfit" yourself is a lot less inconvenient than dealing with breakage later. When you unroll the condom, leave about half an inch of space in the tip. Those of you who complain that condoms reduce sensation should note that leaving this extra space also increases friction during sex, which increases pleasure. Never "double-bag;" two condoms rubbing against each other are more likely to break. Further, flavored condoms shouldn't be used for penetration, because they irritate delicate skin. Spermicidal lubricant is also a bad idea, because it contains a chemical so toxic that it can actually increase STI risk. However, either of these options is always better than no condom at all.

Write for Arts & Living today!
ARTS@DAILY-COLLEGIAN.COM

If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!
Insurance Replacement Rates
FREE PICK-UP
POTTERS AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL
• Direct Billing to Insurance Company
• Locally Owned & Operated
• 7 & 15 Passenger Vans
• UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates
North Amherst Motors
Collision Repairs & Glass Replacement
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
(413) 549-RENT (7368)
www.northamherstmotors.com
(One mile North of UMass - on bus route)

Today's engineers aren't driving trains. They're driving technology.
That's why UMass Amherst offers courses in computer science, electrical engineering and all things digital. Get the skills you need to advance in today's technology-driven economy. You can even get credit for work-related projects.
ENGINEERING AND APPLIED SCIENCES
www.UMassULearn.net
413-545-2414
100 Venture Way, Hadley, MA
UMass Amherst Continuing Education

Could you make the Wizard of Oz on your laptop?
What once required a lot of heavy equipment can now be accomplished with lightweight, lightning-fast digital technology. If you have the know-how. That's why UMass Amherst offers a Certificate of Digital Media Production that'll give you the skills to produce the next Star Wars, eBay or Odeley.
DIGITAL MEDIA PRODUCTION
www.UMassULearn.net
413-545-2414
100 Venture Way, Hadley, MA
UMass Amherst Continuing Education

STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE UMASS, AMHERST
HELPING STUDENTS PROTECT THEIR RIGHTS FOR 30 YEARS
Free Legal Advice, Referrals, Representation and Counseling for UMASS Students
Student & Workers Rights, Family & Criminal Law, Landlord/Tenant & Consumer Disputes
CALL 545-1995
or stop in at 922 Campus Center

Monday-Friday 7:30-6
Thursday 7:30-8
Saturday 7:30-4
Saturn of Hadley
40 Russell St, Route 9
Hadley, MA 01035
(413) 584-6066
SATURN.
Our service center repairs all kinds of cars...not just Saturns.
Oil & Filter Change Only $19.99
Includes topping off all fluids, adjusting tire pressures, Check antifreeze for winter protection. FREE wash & vacuum. FREE 27 point inspection.
• Mass State Inspection Station
• Free shuttle service to & from UMASS
• Located directly on bike path & PVTA stop.
No Appointments Needed
10% off mechanical repairs
Late hours on Thursdays

UAB gets most of UM

M hoops from page 8

Junior James Life and the UMass men's basketball team were unable to get past UAB on Friday, but will return to the court tonight against Savannah State.

UAB coach Mike Anderson was impressed with UMass' top guns, and was happy to escape with a win.

"I thought Brandon really stepped up for them," Anderson said. "He played extremely well and he was the reason they really got back in it. I'd like to have him on my team. And Freeman's a beast.

"Jasme just controlled the paint. We were attacking, but our attacking was like a turnover when we went in there. He just changed the whole complexion of the game. But we were able to make adjustments, and we hung in there and pulled out the win."

While UAB is more well-known for its high-flying attack, it was UMass' Thomas who turned in the most athletic play of the day.

Midway through the first half, Thomas stole the ball from UAB's Paul Delaney at half court, and took off on a breakaway. Delaney recovered and cut Thomas off at the block, but Thomas wasn't deterred, as he skied over Delaney and threw down a tomahawk jam, bringing the majority of the 6,105 in attendance to their feet.

Although the dunk, which gave the Minutemen a 20-18 lead, ignited the UMass fans, it was the Blazers who responded. UAB went on a 13-2 run following the play, and never relinquished the lead.

The Blazers continued to expand their lead and took a 46-34 advantage into the locker room. UMass came out energized early in the second half, sparked by a flurry of blocks by Lasme, going on a 14-4 run to pull within two points with 16:09 remaining.

UMass cut the lead to two again two minutes later, as Thomas connected on consecutive three-pointers, but once again the Minutemen were unable to even the score. With the margin again cut to two, at 60-58 with 12:20 left in the game, UAB went on a 14-2 run to take control.

UMass chipped away, but was unable to get within six points the rest of the way.

"I thought we played hard, and really played in spurts," Ford said. "Every time we would make a run we would make a few turnovers that really negated those runs. A lot of mental errors caused that."

The UAB pressure (35 points off of 23 UMass turnovers) caused problems for the Minutemen, and freshman point guard Chris Lowe in particular. Lowe turned in an uneven performance, committing five first half turnovers, but responded with a better second half, committing only one turnover. Lowe finished the game with seven points.

Lawrence Carrier, who will see more playing time in Bowers' absence, provided some life off the bench, recording seven points and five rebounds in nine minutes of action.

Colorado stunned by Minutemen

HOCKEY from page 8

the special teams game, and that turned out to be the difference."

A one-time blast from Lee Sweatt with just over five minutes remaining in the game cut the deficit to 4-3, setting the stage for a wild flurry in front of Winer in the final seconds of the game, but Sweatt couldn't knock home his second goal after his shot with five seconds left made it through Winer's pads and clanged long off the left post.

"We threw everything at them, and they didn't buckle," CC coach Scott Owens said. "They're going through a good run right now, and they just didn't buckle."

Things didn't turn out as smoothly for the Minutemen on Saturday night when Denver, which won the Northeast Regional at the Mullins Center in March, returned to familiar territory.

Following a frustrating 1-0 defeat at the hands of Boston University the night before, the Pioneers came out of the gates strong with three first-period goals in a five-minute span from Gabe Gauthier, Matt Carle and Ryan Helgason to put DU ahead 3-0. Adrian Veideman capped off the offensive showcase in the second period with a wrister from the right point that made it past UMass goaltender Jon Quick.

"We weren't as ready as we needed to be," Cahoon said. "It was very disappointing for us that we didn't come out here as competitively as we have over the past couple of weeks and seemed to play as if we're just satisfied with what has happened up to now. Well, I don't think you can do that with a twice-defending national champion who just lost a tough game [Friday] night.

"I'd suggest that, at best, this was a great learning lesson for us. It wasn't a good response to the challenge, that's for sure. We're not happy with it at all."

Freshman defender Topher Bevis and the UMass hockey team made history on Friday night at the Mullins Center, but were unable to keep their three-game winning streak alive as they fell to Denver on Saturday.

Minutewomen drop two in a row

W hoops from page 8

game, and young, inexperienced players coming off the bench, Dacko will have to find a way to balance her playing rotation.

Rosario scored 15 points on 5-for-11 shooting in the game and was the silver lining for UMass from the free-throw line, going 5-for-8 in the game.

Against Eastern Michigan on Nov. 22, the Minutewomen were buried from the start, missing 17 of their first 18 shots and falling behind 31-13 by halftime. Sophomore Kate Mills scored 14 points in the game, and added six rebounds and three blocks.

Eastern Michigan began the game with a 13-2 run, and built the lead to 17-2 by the 11:42 mark. The next UMass score came with a pair of free throws by junior Tamara Latham. It was more carnage after that for UMass, as Eastern Michigan scored seven straight points to build the lead to 24-4 with 8:51 left in the first half, forcing Dacko to call her second time-out of the game.

Mills scored at the 5:02 mark of the first half to snap a 6:40 scoreless drought for UMass, and Rosario followed that with a steal and a lay up, causing the Eagles to call a timeout.

Nelson hit a three-pointer before halftime to get the UMass point total to 13, but an 18-point deficit was too much to overcome for the Minutewomen, and UMass would not get closer than 16 points the rest of the way.

The Minutewomen had 20 turnovers and shot just 19 percent from the field. Rosario and Nelson finished with nine points and Mills had four blocks for the second straight game.

Goaltending helps UMass define history Friday night

HISTORY from page 8

third period efforts when junior Chris Capraro netted the game-winning power play goal. "They still came at us pretty good but what was significant about that was the power play. We were one for five on the power play but we got something out of the power play. We didn't lose the special teams game and that turned out to be the difference."

Cahoon also gave praise to his senior netminder who, by all accounts, was in playing because freshman phenom, Jon Quick, didn't dress because of illness.

"Its funny because Gabe had a great first few weeks to the year, he looked really terrific, then he got himself into a little bit of a malaise and kind of lost his rhythm a little bit," Cahoon said. "But I think what I think has happened is that he's so much bettered conditioned that he's been able to rebound. Tonight you saw late in the game he was alert, quick, active and as fresh as he was at the start of the game."

Winer is the key to whether or not the Minutemen can continue to play to the level they have been these past few weeks (minus the DU game). This season Quick has shown the potential to be a top-tier goalie having already won Rookie of the Week and Defensive Player of the Week in the conference. Winer has also shown in the past that he too can be a premier netminder when he is focused and on top of his game.

Cahoon knows and has commented on the importance of his two goaltenders.

"Goaltending is huge. We're getting good goaltending and all the good teams get good goaltending," Cahoon said. "What I'm tickling myself about is that I've got two guys that are pretty darn good. So that gives us a good feeling that, hopefully, we'll always have one guy with a hot hand."

After a 10 day lay off, the Minutemen are back in action next Tuesday when they take on Merrimack at the Mullins Center.

Florida State drops out of poll

By Ralph D. Russo
Associated Press

NEW YORK — First Oklahoma fell from the Top 25, then Michigan was gone. Tennessee dropped out a month later and now Florida State.

The Seminoles became the latest Top 25 fixture to fall from The Associated Press poll this season, dropping out on Sunday after losing their third straight game.

Florida State is unranked this week for the first time since late November 2001.

With much of the Top 25 idle last weekend, and no big upsets in the limited schedule, there was little movement in the media poll.

Southern California, which was off this week, is No. 1 for a record 32nd straight poll. USC finishes its season Saturday against UCLA.

Texas is No. 2, but the Longhorns lost four first-place votes this week to USC after a tougher-than-expected 40-29 victory at Texas A&M. Texas plays Colorado in the Big 12 title game. If USC and Texas stay undefeated, they'll play in the Rose Bowl for the Bowl Championship Series title.

No. 3 LSU, No. 4 Penn State and No. 5 Virginia Tech held their places in the latest rankings.

Florida State is the seventh team ranked in the AP preseason top 15 to fall out of the rankings at some point this season. The others are Tennessee, Michigan, Oklahoma, Iowa, Louisville and Purdue.

Oklahoma was preseason No. 7 but lost two of its first three games and has been unranked since. The Sooners had been ranked in every poll since 2000.

Two weeks later, Michigan fell out of the AP Top 25 after a 2-2 start, ending a streak of 114 straight weeks in the rankings. It was the longest streak in the nation at the time and dated to Oct. 18, 1998. The Wolverines, ranked fourth in the preseason, have since started a new streak.

Last month, Tennessee dropped out for the first time in three years after the third of what turned out to be four straight losses. The Vols began the year ranked third.

In Sunday's poll, idle Ohio State jumped to No. 6, slipping past Notre Dame, which dropped a spot to No. 7 after needing a late touchdown to beat Stanford 38-31 and become eligible for the BCS.

Injury-ridden Pats fall to Chiefs

By Doug Tucker
Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. – It's time for people to start taking notice when Greg Wesley makes bold predictions.

Right before a game against Miami in 2002, Kansas City's free safety said he would get three interceptions, and did. Then Sunday he picked off three of Tom Brady's passes after telling teammates he would, and Sammy Knight grabbed a fourth in a 26-16 victory over the injury-tattered New England Patriots.

Larry Johnson, with his fourth straight outstanding game, ran for 119 yards and a touchdown as the Chiefs (7-4) stayed within two games of Denver in the AFC West. The Patriots (6-5) remained two games ahead of Buffalo in the less-competitive AFC East.

"Maybe I should do it more often," said Wesley. "I had three the other time, but it doesn't compare to this."

He had tight end Tony Gonzalez to verify his prediction.

"I said, 'How many are you going to get for me?' " Gonzalez said. "He said three."

Brady was high on many throws. Three of the interceptions were deflected, including Knight's, which he when it bounced off Tim Dwight's hands after the Patriots pulled within 10 points.

The four interceptions tied Brady's career-high and his quarterback rating of 42.5 tied for second lowest in the career of the two-time Super Bowl MVP.

"Tough day," said Brady, 22-for-40 for 248 yards and one TD. In the first 10 games, he'd been intercepted only six times.

"We didn't execute. It's tough when you spot a good team all those points. I just threw it high," he said.

An aggressive defense also kept pressure on him.

"We got some hits on him and hands in his face," said end Eric Hicks. "When you do that to any quarterback, he's going to become very average."

Two of Wesley's interceptions set up field goals by Lawrence Tynes, who tied an NFL record with four 3-pointers in one period.

Running behind an offensive line bolstered by the return of Pro Bowl left tackle Willie Roaf, Johnson pounded New England inside and out, displaying a Priest Holmes-like patience behind his blockers that was missing his first two years.

Johnson, who had a franchise-record 211 yards rushing against Houston the previous week, has 462 yards in three games since three-time Pro Bowler Holmes went on injured reserve.

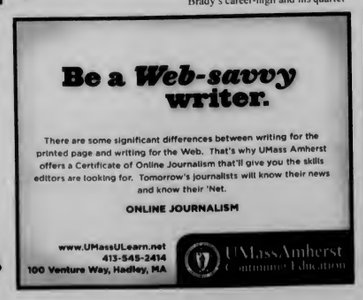
He had a 1-yard TD plunge in the first quarter and also caught five passes for 53 yards, including a 30-yard gain on a screen pass. He declined to speak with reporters.

"He has a passion to play the game," said coach Dick Vermeil. "He didn't want to come out. He thinks Priest is still sitting on the bench. He's a tough, tough guy. He's been around football all of his life, so he understands all the concepts."

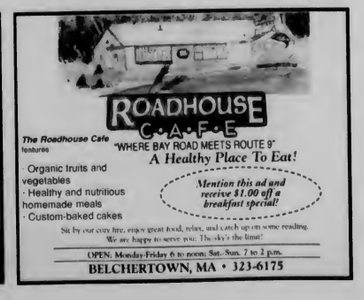
The Chiefs scored on five of their first six possessions, including Tynes' 12 points in the second period. He hit from 25, 30, 33 and 47 yards in the quarter.

New England coach Bill Belichick, who missed two days of practice attending to family business and funeral services for his father, Steve, watched his two-time defending Super Bowl champions dominated in almost every phase.

"That is a lot to make up against a team like this," said Belichick. "We didn't play well enough. I think that goes across the board."

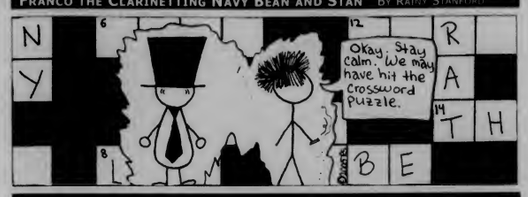


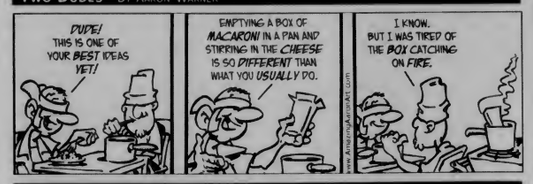
New England linebacker Willie McGinest said the distractions of the week had nothing to do with the way the Patriots played.



"We had the game plan. We practiced well," he said. "They put us in a position to win and we didn't execute it."

Dante Hall got behind rookie cornerback Ellis Hobbs, one of several reserves the Patriots have pressed into service, and hauled in Trent Green's 52-yard pass for a 26-3 lead.





Franco the Clarinetting Navy Bean and Stan By Rainy Stanford

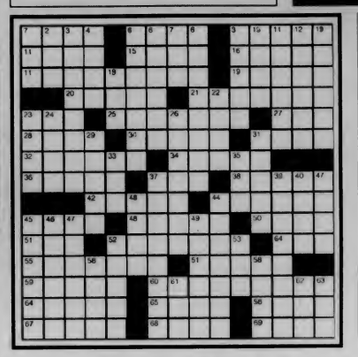
Two Dudes By Aaron Warner

Paul By Billy O'Keefe

The Family Monster By Josh Shalek

A College Girl Named Joe By Aaron Warnter

Quote of the Day



"When the power of love overcomes the love of power the world will know peace."

—Jimi Hendrix

ACROSS
1 Bleacher cheers
5 Gin flavoring
9 "The Plague" writer
14 Soap additive
15 Get better
16 Make suitable
17 Sink in
19 ___ of Aragon
20 Wood pattern
21 Draw near
23 Flood haven
25 Stirit on the plate
27 Function
28 Long or hot finisher?
30 Banks of baseball
31 High-tailed it
32 Virgil's hero
34 Pentateuch
36 Beeped
37 Channy of "The Wolf Man"
38 Jewel weight
42 Hunter Ryan
44 Sister of Venus
45 Gnus to lions
48 Architect Jones
50 Problem with a chain
51 Gun it in neutral
52 Masked carnivores
54 Holy smokes!
55 Bric-a-brac shelves
57 Foreigner
59 Neap and ebb
60 Question and answer
64 City on the Adige
65 Shoe points
66 Gillette blade
67 Affirmative responses
68 Mineral veins
69 Sellon and Black

DOWN
1 Utter sharply
2 Pub order
3 Chinese port
4 Observer
5 Sacred sites
6 Almost a ringer
7 Trigger treat
8 Voting process
9 Fowl choice
10 Citrus drinks
11 Invented
12 Ascent
13 Perfect with rocks
18 Sigma follower
22 Salacious look
23 Rush-job acronym
24 Periman of "Cheers"
26 Shylock's customer
29 Minuscule
31 "Jaws" creature
33 Hubbub
35 Top card
37 Simpson's judge
39 Inspire anew
40 Frank or Heche
41 Seize
43 Pinocchio or Ananias
44 Like a family of girls
45 Pleasing to the eye
46 Go to bed
47 Gals around
49 Chin whiskers
52 Breathers
53 Tide of respect
56 Sarazen or Rayburn
58 La Gallienne and Gabor
61 And also not
62 Block of time
63 Existed once

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

Horoscopes

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You are about to spill orange juice all over yourself.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
You should start layering blankets on your bed.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You don't put enough marshmallows in you hot chocolate.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
You will meet someone today with a very unusual name.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
You should really put some neosporin on that cut.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Stop going to class intoxicated. Your teacher knows and hates you.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You will not be mugged any time in the near future.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You should really consider taking up yoga.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
You need to stop ordering food and start going to the DC for dinner.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You should give your younger brother/sister a call today.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
It's time to start wearing your winter coat instead of that rain jacket.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You will be surprised with a beautiful pair of earrings.

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Announcements

Montreal Weekend
New Years Party $129
Complete cocktail age 18
781-979-9001 Call now
montrealexpress.net

Apartment for Rent

1, 2, 3 & 4 Bedroom spacious apartments, Great location, Bus Route, All utilities included No Fee Call 413-253-3000

Employment

Rent us your ears! Listening experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu Voicemail: 545-6837.

Employment

November 30th is the last day to apply to become a legal assistant with the Student Legal Services Office. Earn 12 credits while gaining valuable experience. Hurry! Contact us at 545-1995 or stop by at 922 Campus Center to pick up an application.

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience nees. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

Happy Birthday

Want to make your friend feel special on his or her birthday? Put a classified ad in the Collegian. Call 545-3500 M-F 9-3:30.

Room for Rent

413-335-5226 Mo. to mo. $325 inclusive 20 min to campus

Services

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

Questions about your lease/security deposit? Questions about subletting/assigning leases? Questions about the condition of your apartment? Contact the Student Legal Services Office at 922 Campus Center or call 545-1995.

Services

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance. 549-1906

Travel

15 Day Fully guided tour or Italy leaving 7/20/06 $3,279 includes air hotels, breakfast and some dinners. If interested call Kathy at (413) 498-2490 or Carol at (413) 423-3654 Call by December 30th.

ACT NOW – SPRING BREAKERS Book early & Save! Free meals/parties by 11/7. Lowest prices. Be a rep & TRAVEL FREE! Get the ultimate hookups with STA TRAVEL 413-256-1261.

Travel

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

Advertise in the Massachusetts Daily Collegian!

Whether you want a full-page ad or to place a classified, we can fulfill your advertising needs. Not sure how your ad should look? Let our experiend graphics staff design it for you! Call 545-3500 M-F 8:30am-3:30pm. Or stop by the Campus Center basement.

Wanted

WANTED: COLLEGIAN EMPLOYEES

The Collegian is hiring for paid positions for the spring semester.

Open positions include: Managing Editor, Night and Copy Supervisor, as well as positions in Arts and Living, Editorial Opinion, photography and graphics.

Come to the Campus Center basement to apply, or call (413) 545-3500.

Applications close November 23, 2005.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTSMONDAY

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

A Mullins Center upset

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

Senior captain Stephen Werner's goal at 13:08 helped the UMass hockey team knock off No. 3 Colorado on Friday night in the Minutemen's third straight victory over a ranked team this season.

The word, "upset," may not provide justice to describe the way the Massachusetts hockey team upended No. 3 Colorado College (12-3-1 6-1-1 Western Collegiate Hockey Association) by a 4-3 score on Friday night, but the Minutemen (4-8-0 2-5-0 Hockey East) still won their biggest game since their tournament run of 2004, and turned the college hockey world upside down in the process.

But they couldn't keep their three-game winning streak – all over nationally ranked opponents – alive when the two-time defending national champion and No. 13 Denver Pioneers (6-6-2 3-3-2 WCHA) strolled into town on Saturday and promptly left the Pioneer Valley with a 4-0 business-like victory.

UMass is currently in the middle of its second 10-day layoff of the month and will not return to the ice until next Tuesday, Dec. 6, for a matchup with Merrimack at the Mullins Center. It will also mark the first time current Merrimack coach Mark Dennehy will face the Minutemen since leaving his assistant coaching position in Amherst this past offseason to take the job on the Warrior bench.

UMass	4
Colorado	3
Denver	4
UMass	0

UMass was helped tremendously in Friday night's comeback win by the third line pairing of Jamie Solon, Kevin Jarman and Cory Quirk, who contributed with two goals and four assists, but they were equally as impressive on the defensive side, matching up with the Tiger line spearheaded by Hobey Baker winner Marty Sertich.

The trio of Sertich, Scott McCulloch and Jimmy Kilpatrick had combined for 12 goals and 18 assists through the early portion of the schedule heading into Friday but were held off the scoring sheet altogether against the Minutemen.

"It was a great night for that group," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "We tried to match the lines throughout the night, and we don't often do that. With the makeup of [Colorado College], we felt like we had to do something like that tonight. They played against one of their top lines all night long, and I thought they had the better of the play so it was a big night for them."

UMass goalie Gabe Winer, who saw action in net for the first time since Nov. 5, showed some rust early but really came back strong to make 42 saves, including 33 of those in the second and third periods.

Colorado College jumped out to a fast start, picking up two goals in the first 10:16 for a 2-0 edge, but the Minutemen began to neutralize the Tiger attack and turn the tide on their home ice.

With seven minutes remaining in the first period, UMass freshman forward Chris Davis moved the puck down the ice and fed Stephen Werner in the high slot. Werner passed left to Chris Capraro, who quickly returned the favor, and Werner redirected and backhander through CC goalie Matt Zaba's legs to cut the margin to 2-1.

Less than two minutes later, Solon dug the puck out of the right corner and passed it off to Quirk, who was angled behind the CC net. Quirk found Jarman standing in the low slot, and Jarman one-timed the puck through Zaba's legs to tie the score up heading into the first intermission.

Six minutes into the middle frame, Solon fired a shot into Zaba that rebounded out to Quirk, who turned himself around and got off an awkward shot off Zaba's right leg. The puck bounced out again to Quirk, who made good with his second attempt to give UMass its first lead at the 6:01 mark of the second period.

After CC's Brandon Straub was sent to the penalty box for holding, the Minutemen put together another offensive threat. Topher Bevis put a long shot on net, and the rebound was collected by Werner, who put a shot of his own on Zaba. This time, though, the long rebound to Zaba's left made its way to the stick of Capraro, who buried the puck home for a 4-2 lead with under 16 minutes to play.

"It was important that we didn't sit back and try to sit on anything," Cahoon said. "They still came at us pretty good, but what was important about that was the power play [goal]. We didn't lose

See HOCKEY on page 6

Minutemen not able to hang with UAB

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. – In a fast-paced game against a run-and-gun University of Alabama at Birmingham squad, the Massachusetts men's basketball team ultimately ran out of gas, falling 86-77 in the Hall of Fame Tip-Off Classic on Friday afternoon at the MassMutual Center in Springfield.

The loss was the second of the week for the Minutemen, as they were edged 66-63 by Davidson on Tuesday on the road. UMass (1-2) will look to get back on the winning track tonight as they host Savannah State (1-3), a team that went 0-28 last season, tonight at 7 p.m. at the Mullins Center.

UAB	86
UMass	77

Against UAB, the Minutemen played with only eight scholarship players on their roster, as junior guard Art Bowers left the team on Wednesday. Bowers plans to transfer to a school where he will receive more playing time than he saw early this season.

A shorthanded team paired with the relentless full-court pressure applied by UAB (1-0) could have been a disastrous combination for UMass, but the Minutemen hung tough. UMass closed to within two points three times in the second half, but was unable to get over the hump and take the lead.

Every time the Maroon and White drew close, the Blazers turned up their trademark defensive intensity and maintained the lead. Unlike UMass, UAB features a deep bench, as 11 players saw action in the game.

UMass coach Travis Ford knows with only eight scholarship players there is little room for error.

"We've got to get the most out of every player," Ford said. "We're not a team that's going to go out and have a lot of firepower. We have some good basketball players that have to play to their strengths. We have to get everyone doing that on a consistent basis in order for us to be our best."

UAB on the other hand, had plenty of firepower, as four players scored in double figures, led by Demario Eddins' career-high 28 points Eddins, a 6-foot-7 forward who played for two years at Winchendon Prep in Winchendon, Mass., came through every time UAB needed a hoop, and also played tough defense on Rashaun Freeman down the stretch.

Freeman scored 21 points and grabbed 11 rebounds, but scored only seven points after the break, as Eddins and the Blazers made it difficult for the Minutemen to get the ball inside to their top scoring option.

Brandon Thomas turned in his strongest performance of the young season, stepping up with a team-high 22 points on 8-of-12 shooting, including 4-of-6 from three-point land. Stephane Lasme was the only other player in double figures for the Maroon and White with 14 points. Lasme also added eight rebounds and seven blocks, giving him 20 blocks in just three games, a 6.7 per game average.

See M. HOOPS on page 6

Junior Maurice Maxwell contributed four points as the Minutemen fell to UAB 86-77 in the Tip-Off Classic on Friday. UMass now stands 1-2 this season.

History changed in UM win

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

Entering Thanksgiving Weekend, history, both past and present, was working against the Massachusetts hockey team. The Minutemen (4-8-2 5-5 Hockey East) had never beaten either Colorado College (12-3-1 6-1-1 Western Collegiate Hockey Association) or Denver (6-6-2 3-3-2 WCHA) in a combined four all-time meetings. Never mind the fact that not once had UMass ever beaten a team from the WCHA.

This time around the feeling seemed to be different. The Maroon and White were coming off two great victories over ranked opponents in then No. 14 Boston University and No. 5 Vermont, and it seemed as though the Minutemen were poised to right the ship after a slow start to the season.

That good feeling turned into a great one as UMass defied the odds and history to defeat No. 3 CC, 4-3, Friday night at the Mullins Center. The win was the biggest for the UMass program in a long time. Senior netminder Gabe Winer turned in a gutsy performance to fend off a late Tiger rally and clinch the win.

Even with the team's recent successes, UMass head coach Don Cahoon still felt it was too early tell if the win over the Tigers was signs of things to come.

"Great win for our program and a great win for the guys in the locker room," Cahoon said. "I think its way to premature to say [the season has turned around]. We've got a long way to go before we fill a few holes that we have, and to become an upper echelon team, but we're a pretty difficult team to play against when we play at our best."

On Saturday night, however, the team couldn't ride their recent wave of momentum to another upset victory over the Pioneers of Denver. The Minutemen lost the game decisively by a score of 4-0.

Despite the white-out the Pioneers administered, the Minutemen can chock up the weekend as being a successful one. On Friday night they defeated one of the best team's in the country in CC. During that win over the Tigers it looked like the Minutemen were doing everything right.

Cahoon has been saying for the better part of three weeks now that when his team is playing up to its abilities they can hang with just about anybody out there and they proved that on Friday night. They had it all working. Winer gave them solid goaltending, they put pressure on CC goaltender Matt Zaba, and even converted a man-advantage opportunity.

"It was important we didn't sit back and try to sit on the lead," Cahoon said of his team's

See HISTORY on page 6

Hartford overcomes UMass

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

Redshirt senior Katie Nelson and the UMass women's basketball team dropped to 1-3 after being beat by Hartford 68-52 at the Mullins Center on Saturday.

It happened against Holy Cross on Nov. 20, and it happened again on Saturday. The Massachusetts women's basketball team lost its collective intensity against the Hawks with six minutes left in the game, and allowed Hartford — after being tied with the Hawks with just over six minutes left in the game — to build a 20-point lead by the end of regulation.

In the second game of the season against the Crusaders, the Minutewomen had a 15-3 lead in the first half, but sat on their lead and allowed Holy Cross to climb back into the game and keep it close for the rest of the afternoon.

Against the Hawks on Saturday, UMass held a 45-41 lead after redshirt senior Katie Nelson hit a three-pointer with just under 10 minutes left in the game. From there it was all Hartford, as the Hawks came back to tie the game, and then built a six-point lead with 4:27 remaining.

Hartford	68
UMass	52

UMass coach Marnie Ducko called a timeout after her team fell behind 56-50, but couldn't rally the Minutewomen, as UMass went cold during the last five minutes of the game. Even when the Minutewomen executed a solid possession on the offensive end, they couldn't convert from the free-throw line – 14-of-26 for the game – and that hurt their momentum down the stretch.

The Minutewomen were outscored 27-7 in the final eight minutes of the game.

The Hawks' bench outscored UMass' 25-6. With sophomore Pam Rosario playing over 35 minutes a

See W. HOOPS on page 6

Bowers opts to depart from Pioneer Valley for more playing time

Junior guard Art Bowers announced on Wednesday that he will be leaving the Massachusetts men's basketball team.

Bowers plans to transfer from UMass to a school where he will be able to get more playing time than he did in the Minutemen's first two games.

The decision was announced on Friday prior to UMass' game against the University of Alabama at Birmingham in the Hall of Fame Tip-Off Classic in Springfield.

Playing with only eight scholarship players on their bench, the Minutemen lost 86-77 to UAB.

The move is somewhat surprising, as Bowers was heralded by new coach Travis Ford as one of the most improved players in the preseason.

Bowers earned the starting nod in the first two games of the season, but did not record a point in either the 67-62 season-opening win against Hartford on Nov. 18 or in Tuesday's 66-63 loss to Davidson.

Bowers only played 20 total minutes in the two games, and attempted just two shots.

Bowers came to UMass as a highly-touted recruit, and despite being named to the Atlantic 10 All-Rookie Team in 2003-04, he never played at the level that many expected from the Wilmington, Del. native.

UMass will be down to eight scholarship players until sophomore Dante Milligan, who transferred from Pittsburgh last year, becomes eligible for the Dec. 23 game against Sienna.

While the loss of one of the team's veterans will make things tougher for Ford, he said the split was amicable.

"I could sense that he wasn't happy with his playing time, but Artie's really represented himself well while he was at UMass," Ford said. "We're parting on good terms and I wish him the best of luck. He just wanted a chance to go somewhere where he could play the minutes he wants to play, and there's nothing wrong with that."

—Dan Duggan

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Tuesday, November 29, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXVI Issue 55

Missing Plymouth canoeists presumed dead

PLYMOUTH, Mass. (AP) — A 21-year-old woman and 16-year-old boy who fell out of a canoe in near-freezing weather late at night were presumed dead after a search at a pond Sunday turned up no signs of them, authorities said.

Two other canoeists who were in the same boat when it overturned Saturday night were pulled out of Great South Pond just after midnight, and were recovering in hospitals.

A short time after the rescue, authorities recovered the canoe along with a sneaker and a baseball cap floating near shore, Plymouth Fire Chief Jim Pierson said.

An initial four-hour search for the missing canoeists shifted from a rescue attempt to a recovery operation Sunday morning at 8 a.m. as more than a dozen arriving divers looked for bodies in the chilly water and a helicopter circled overhead. There were no additional signs of the missing canoeists by nightfall, and the recovery effort was to resume Monday morning.

Relatives of the survivors told investigators the group attended a birthday party Saturday night for a 78-year-old grandmother of one of the four, then decided to head to the pond, Pierson said. The party was in Braintree, about 35 miles northwest of Plymouth.

Authorities were unsure what led the group to go canoeing late at night in temperatures in the 30s, apparently without life jackets or flotation devices, Pierson said.

Authorities did not immediately release the names of the missing canoeists or the two male survivors. The missing 21-year-old woman was believed to have been the girlfriend of one of the survivors, Pierson said.

The green canoe apparently capsized, but investigators were unsure why, Pierson said. An inspection revealed no obvious problems with the boat. The pond stretches more than a half-mile across, and is as deep as 50 feet in some spots.

Rescue workers were called to the scene at 11:42 p.m. after neighbors reported they heard screaming. The pond is surrounded by summer cottages on the outskirts of Plymouth near Myles Standish State Forest, about 45 miles southeast of Boston.

- Associated Press

Two canoeists disappeared into Great South Lake, pictured above, after their canoe capsized on Saturday night. Divers are searching for the pair, who are now presumed dead.

Motorists and passengers injured in crash

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

HADLEY — A teen is being treated at the Baystate Medical Center in Springfield today for injuries sustained in a weekend car accident at the by-pass of Routes 116 and 9.

Angela Reid, 18, of Belchertown, was removed from the Intensive Care Unit and put into the adolescent care facility and was listed in fair condition as of yesterday.

Reid was a passenger in her mother Laurie Reid's vehicle. As the vehicle went through the intersection at Route 9, it struck a car driven by William Stewart, 40, of Leverett. According to police, Leverett's car had been stopped on Route 116 and was spun with the force of the impact, ending up against a tree.

Reid's car then hit another vehicle on Route 9, driven by Deborah Zukowski, 48, of Charlemont, police say.

Though all the passengers of the cars were wearing seatbelts at the time of the accident, each had to be hospitalized for injuries.

Stewart and his passengers, Sarah Dolvin, Rheannon Stewart, three, and Liam Stewart, seven weeks, were taken to Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

According to police, Stewart and Dolvin were treated and released for minor injuries.

Zukowski was brought by ambulance to Baystate Medical Center and was listed in fair condition as of yesterday morning.

Laurie Reid was taken by ambulance to Cooley Dickinson Hospital where she was treated and released. Angela Reid, who had to be removed from the vehicle by firefighters, was more seriously injured and was brought to Baystate Medical Center.

Laurie Reid was given two citations for traffic violations that resulted in the destruction of all three cars involved in the accident.

Saddam voices trial treatment complaints

By Hamza Hendawi
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — The trial of Saddam Hussein for alleged crimes against humanity resumed Monday in a heavily guarded courtroom, with the former Iraqi president trying to take command of the proceedings and angrily complaining about having to walk up four flights of stairs in shackles under foreign guard. A former U.S. attorney general sat with the defense team.

After a short session in which the first testimony was read into the record, Chief Judge Rizgar Mohammed Amin adjourned the trial until Dec. 5 to allow time to find replacements for two defense lawyers who were slain and another who fled Iraq after he was wounded.

Saddam was the last of eight defendants to enter the courtroom, walking with a swagger, appearing confident and acknowledging people with the traditional Arabic greeting, "Peace be upon the people of peace." He also carried a copy of the Muslim holy book, the Quran.

Saddam and his co-defendants are charged in the killings of more than 140 Shiite Muslims after an assassination attempt against the former president in the Shiite town of Dujail in 1982. Convictions could bring a sentence of death by hanging. The former leader pleaded innocent to charges of murder, torture, forced expulsions and illegal detentions at the opening session last month.

Amin had ordered all handcuffs and shackles removed from Saddam and the seven co-defendants before they entered the courtroom. Mortar fire echoed through the center of the capital just before the session began.

Once inside, Saddam had a brief but heated exchange with Amin, complaining of having to walk up four flights of stairs in shackles because the elevator wasn't working.

The judge said he would tell the police not to let that happen again. Saddam snapped: "You are the chief judge. I don't want you to tell them. I want you to order them. They are in our country. You have the sovereignty. You are Iraqi and they are foreigners and occupiers. They are invaders. You should order them."

Saddam also complained he was escorted up the stairs by "foreign guards" and that some of his papers had been taken.

"How can a defendant defend himself if his pen was taken? Saddam Hussein's pen and papers were taken. I don't mean a white paper. There are papers downstairs that include my remarks in which I express my opinion," he said.

Saddam's half brother and fellow defendant Barzan Ibrahim also complained to the judge that he had not received proper medical treatment since being diagnosed with cancer and that this amounted to "indirect murder."

Saddam then complained that he had written three or four memos to the judge since the Oct. 19 session but received no response. The judge said he was unaware of them.

Former U.S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark and former Qatari Justice Minister Najib al-Nuemi sat with the defense team inside the heavily guarded room, along with Saddam's chief lawyer, Khalil Dulaimi.

A moment of silence was observed in memory of two defense lawyers assassinated since the trial began. Other defense attorneys were on hand, despite a boycott threat to protest the government's alleged failure to protect them.

Afterward, a videotape obtained from Iraqi intelligence was shown to the court. It depicted Saddam on the streets of Dujail right after the incident in a military uniform, questioning three men held by guards.

The court also played the videotaped testimony of former intelligence officer Wadah Ismael al-Sheik, who investigated the assassination attempt and died of cancer Oct. 27.

Amin read the transcript as the tape played without sound. According to the transcript, al-Sheik, who appeared weak,

See SADDAM on page 2

More chest compressions recommended for CPR

By Jamie Stengle
Associated Press

DALLAS — Updating the way everyday people do CPR, new recommendations urge many more chest compressions for victims of cardiac arrest.

The revised guidelines issued Monday by the American Heart Association on cardiopulmonary resuscitation advise giving 30 chest compressions for every two rescue breaths.

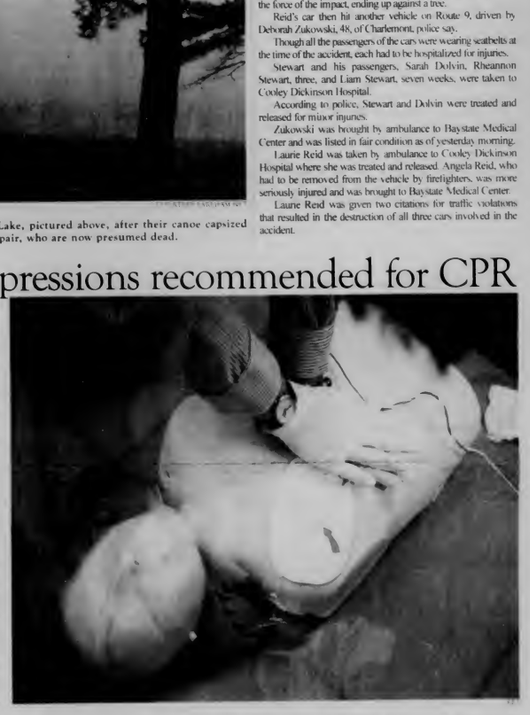
"Basically, the more times someone pushes on the chest, the better off the patient is," said Dr. Michael Sayre, an Ohio State University emergency medicine professor who helped develop the new guidelines.

"When you stop compressions, blood flow stops," said Mary Fran Hazinski, a clinical nurse specialist at Vanderbilt University Medical Center who also helped develop the guidelines.

"You have to make up for that lost ground," she said. "We think that the fewer the interruptions, the better for blood flow."

The guidelines also recommend cooling cardiac arrest patients for 12 to 24 hours to about 90 degrees Fahrenheit. Two significant studies have shown that practice can improve survival and brain function for those who are comatose after initial resuscitation.

More than 300,000 Americans die each year of cardiac arrest, when the heart suddenly stops beating. The heart association estimates that more than 95 percent of cardiac arrest victims die before they get to the hospital.



Studies show that the chest compressions create more blood flow through the heart to the rest of the body, buying time until a defibrillator can be used or the heart can pump blood on its own. Studies have also shown that blood circulation increases with each chest compression and must be built back up after an interruption, the association says in its online journal Circulation.

The new guidelines also cut down on the number of times a rescuer needs to use a defibrillator and they advise rescuers not to stop after giving two rescue breaths to check for signs of circulation before starting compressions. The bottom line advice is to focus on the chest compressions.

Instead of applying the defibrillator pads up to three times before beginning CPR, the guidelines advise rescuers to just give one shock and then do two minutes of CPR beginning with chest compressions before trying the defibrillator again.

Studies show that the first shock works more than 85 percent of the time.

Defibrillators have been popping up in public places like airports and businesses, but the heart association says that more public places need to install the devices. Survival rates have been as high as 49 to 74 percent for lay rescuer programs when defibrillators are placed in casinos, airports or used by police.

An employee practices CPR along with an automatic external defibrillator during a class taught by the American Red Cross. Recently, the Red Cross came out with new guidelines for the performance of CPR.

The guidelines also urge that 911 operators be trained to provide CPR instructions by phone.

"For the bystander that witnesses a collapse, the main danger is inaction," Sayre said. "We believe there is very little downside to trying to attempt a resuscitation."

According to the heart association, about 75 percent to 80 percent of all cardiac arrests outside a hospital happen at home, and effective CPR can double a victim's chance of survival.

Sudden cardiac arrest can occur after a heart attack or as a result of electrocution or near-drowning. It's most often caused by an abnormal heart rhythm. The person experiencing it collapses, is unresponsive to gentle shaking and stops normal breathing.

"The most common reason many people die from cardiac arrest is no one nearby knows CPR," Sayre said.

The new guidelines provide an opportunity for those who have taken CPR in the past to take a refresher course, said Dr. Ahamed Idris, professor of surgery and medicine at the University of Texas Southwestern Medical Center.

"I think it's a good idea for people to take CPR lessons at least every couple of years," said Idris, also involved in creating the guidelines.

Hazinski said that she expects the new guidelines will be disseminated over the next few months to those who teach CPR.

The heart association says that currently about 9 million Americans a year are trained in CPR, but the association has a goal of more than doubling that number in the next five years to 20 million.

"The bottom line is we think more people need to learn CPR," Hazinski said. "We have more and more evidence that good CPR works. We're doing our best to increase the number of bystanders that learn CPR."

School opens for first time since Katrina

By Kevin McGill
Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS — After two years of trying, Ronald Coleman was at last delivering his children Monday to one of New Orleans' best public schools – thanks in large part to a catastrophe.

"It took Hurricane Katrina to get my children in a good public school in Orleans Parish," Coleman said as he and his wife escorted their son and daughter into Benjamin Franklin Elementary.

On Monday, Franklin Elementary became the first regular public school in New Orleans to reopen since Katrina devastated the city on Aug. 29.

Before the storm, Franklin was a magnet school with selective enrollment for children with an aptitude for math and science. But now, Franklin is open to anyone in the city who wants to attend.

Welcome signs hung over the door and in the hallways as students began trickling into the three-story brick building in the Uptown section that was largely spared by the storm. The building has a capacity of 550, but only 210 students were registered and only about 120 showed up.

For the students, the day opened with a breakfast of granola bars, canned peaches and fruit juice in the cafeteria, where Sabina Puri, a teacher in the school's gifted program, had a tearful reunion with first-grader Michael Bankston. She had taught him in kindergarten last year (he was reading at third-grade level) and she had not heard from since his family evacuated.

"He started crying and I started crying," Puri said, wiping away a tear as she sat next to Michael.

Some private schools in New Orleans began reopening in October, but no public schools had opened, with the exception of two charter schools that are outside the local board's control.

Franklin's opening was both a hopeful sign for the city's recovery and a sign of the difficult road ahead in re-populating the city.

At least 10 public schools are expected to open in the coming weeks. Only about 4,000 to 5,000 students are expected to come back during the current school year, out of a pre-Katrina public school enrollment of close to 60,000.

One hurdle is the housing shortage. Puri and second-grade teacher Ava Price both were left homeless after Katrina. Puri is staying with friends, while her husband and children remain in Texas. Price is staying with an aunt.

Franklin is among only about a dozen schools still under control of the Orleans Parish School Board. Most of the others were taken over by the state recently because of years of mismanagement, waste and corruption.

Coleman considered the public schools in New Orleans so bad that he sent his son and daughter to private schools while he tried to get them into Franklin.

ARTS & LIVING
NEW MUSIC TUESDAYS
Your weekly dose of what's new in music.
PAGE 5

EDITORIAL/OPINION
SEND OUR SOLDIERS HOME?
In our 'nation of traitors,' will we ever see it happen?
PAGE 4

WEATHER
TODAY Cloudy, H57°
TONIGHT Cloudy, L52°
TOMORROW Rain, H56°, L30°

SPORTS
BACK IN THE GAME
UMass Men's Hoops defeat FSU last night at the Mullins Center.
PAGE 8

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Michael Busack
MANAGING EDITOR Cameron J. Woods
BUSINESS MANAGER Hirak Shah
PRODUCTION MANAGER Nicholas Belanger
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Sherri Wolnik
ADVERTISING MANAGER Kerri O'Grady
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Lauren Egavian
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Amanda Allen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Matthew O'Rourke
COPIES EDITOR Amanda Allen
EDITORIAL EDITOR Allison Edles
NEWS EDITOR Dan O'Brien
PHOTO EDITOR Kate Sachsenmaier
SPORTS EDITOR Jeff Howe
CIRCULATION MANAGER Thomas Hecht
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Nick Gleason
FINANCE MANAGER Daniel Conti
HUMAN RESOURCE Phil Smoller
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Caren Tortorici
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Nathan Chomsky
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Mackenzie Isler
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Ian Jones
ASSISTANT NEWS Megan Dales
ASSISTANT NEWS Matt Belliveau
ASSISTANT PHOTO Elizabeth Carsti
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eric Athas
ASSISTANT SPORTS Dan Duggan
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Kristen LaCasse

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS' ACADEMIC SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS ALMA LET. BECAME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1907, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1950. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967. THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADDITIONAL RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL ADVERTISING AT 545-3500 M-F 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

Saddam's trial resumes and is postponed again

SADDAM from page 1

Saddam Hussein looks across the Baghdad courtroom during his trial yesterday. The trial of Saddam and seven others on charges of crimes against humanity resumed yesterday before being postponed once again.

frail and sat in a wheelchair in a U.S.-controlled hospital last month, said about 400 people were detained after the assassination attempt, although he estimated only between seven and 12 gunmen took an active part in the ambush of Saddam's convoy.

"I don't know why so many people were arrested," al-Sheik said, adding that Ibrahim, head of intelligence at the time, "was the one directly giving the orders."

A day after the assassination attempt, whole families were rounded up and taken to Abu Ghraib prison, he said.

He also said co-defendant Taha Yassin Ramadan, a former vice president, headed a committee that ordered orchards in the area to be destroyed. The orchards had been used to conceal the assailants, he said.

Tight security surrounded the court proceedings. The precise starting time was not announced due to fear of attack by both Saddam's supporters and opponents.

Authorities said Sunday that police arrested eight Sunni Arabs for allegedly plotting to kill the judge who prepared Saddam's indictment. The eight were apprehended Saturday in the northern city of Kirkuk, police Col. Anwar Qadir said.

He said they were carrying instructions from a former top Saddam deputy, Izzat Ibrahim al-Douri, ordering them to kill investigating judge Raed Juhi, who prepared the case against Saddam.

Al-Douri is the highest ranking member of the Saddam regime still at large and is believed to be at least the symbolic leader of Saddam loyalists fighting U.S. forces and Iraq's new government.

The front row of seats in the press gallery bore a warning in English and Arabic: "If you sit here, you could be on television."

The predominantly Sunni insurgency has complicated efforts to put Saddam on trial and forced tight security. For example, names of four of the five trial judges have been kept secret and some of the 35 witnesses may testify behind curtains to protect them.

Defense lawyers had threatened to boycott the proceedings after two of their colleagues were slain in attacks following the opening session Oct. 19. However, lawyer Khamees al-Ubaidi told The Associated Press on Sunday that the defense team would attend after an agreement with U.S. and Iraqi authorities on improving security.

Clark and al-Nueimi flew to Baghdad on Sunday from Amman, Jordan, to lend weight to the defense team. Both have been advising Saddam's lawyers and support their call to have the trial moved out of Iraq.

Clark and others say a fair trial is impossible in Iraq because of the insurgency and because, they argue, the country is effectively under foreign military occupation. U.S. and Iraqi officials insist the trial will conform to international standards.

Clark, who was attorney general under President Lyndon Johnson, is a staunch anti-war advocate who met with Saddam days before the 2003 invasion. He has also consulted several times with one-time Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic, who is on trial in The Hague on war crimes charges.

The trial has unleashed passions in an Iraqi society deeply divided in its judgment of Saddam and his rule.

Many of the Sunni Arab insurgent groups include Saddam loyalists, members of the former ruling Baath party and veterans of both Saddam's personal militia and the Republican Guard.

The ousted leader is vilified by Iraq's Shiite Muslim majority and its Kurdish community, which were oppressed during his rule.

On Saturday, hundreds of supporters of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr rallied in Baghdad to demand Saddam's execution.

The leader of the biggest Shiite party, Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, accused the court of "weakness" for not having sentenced Saddam to death already. He also complained that media attention over allegations of torture by the Shiite-led security services had belittled Saddam's alleged crimes.

Federal Work Study program faces budget cuts

By Laura Hoesman
THE BG NEWS (BOWLING GREEN STATE U.)

BOWLING GREEN, Ohio — When freshman Jessica Williams arrived on campus this fall, she thought finding a Federal Work Study job would be relatively easy.

She didn't count on the effects a 20 percent decrease in Federal Work Study funding has had on numerous campus employers.

Many campus offices that hire FWS students have had to cut hours, pay rates and jobs as a result of the FWS decrease, which started in 2003, according to Craig Cornell, director of Student Financial Aid.

The university's FWS allocation was over $1 million in the 2002-03 year, declining to about $900,000 in 2003-04. After another significant decrease to $840,000 in 2004-05, the university's FWS allocation has leveled off at $819,000 this year, Cornell said.

He added that the university's FWS decrease is consistent with FWS decreases at universities nationwide.

With the decline of FWS allocations, campus employers have been forced to pay a higher percentage of students' checks with non-FWS money, leading some offices to hire fewer students.

The shrinking pool of FWS money has made job hunting difficult for some university students. Williams said she has applied for jobs "almost everywhere," including various residence halls and offices.

"I've looked all over, and I've gone home on the weekends to work," Williams said. Much of her paycheck, she added, has been siphoned into expensive gas payments.

I have to pay for college myself and I feel like I have no backbone because I have no income right now," she said. Williams had to withdraw from her sorority Monday because she couldn't pay the mandatory fees.

The university offers FWS eligibility to more students than it can afford to pay, according to Cornell. He said this is because the university knows many eligible students do not look for FWS jobs.

Although Williams qualifies for Federal Work Study money, she said she would be willing to take any job on campus, regardless of its ties with FWS.

Campus employers that have stable sources of income, such as the University Bookstore and Dining Services, have little need for FWS, according to Michelle Simmons, senior associate director at the Career Center.

But some employers, including many academic and administrative offices, cannot afford to hire enough students without the help of FWS.

The School of Art, which employs about 30 students, at least half of which use FWS, has begun to list some jobs as unpaid internships and volunteer positions. In addition, paid students' hours have been cut due to diminished funding.

"Come spring when the Work Study money runs out, we have to cut back on hours," said Jane Steinert, accounting clerk in the School of Art. "So if they [students] need equipment, or if they're researching something and want to use the resource center, hours are limited."

The America Reads program, a part of Outreach Literacy Programs that relies solely on FWS to pay nearly 85 student employees, has had to hire fewer students and decrease pay checks as a result of dwindling FWS funding.

Martha Sears, coordinator of OLP, said she has had to readjust her thinking about pay as a result of the FWS decrease.

"Students originally started at a base rate and got a large increase the next year," she said. But when the program had to end one month early in spring 2004 because FWS funds ran out, Sears made the decision to lower second-year America Reads employees' hourly pay from $8 to $6.25.

Still, Sears said the program lacks enough money to pay students for every time slot available in a semester.

"If we filled every time slot and paid every student base pay [$6 per hour] ... there is not enough money to continue the program," she said, adding that students do not typically fill every time slot.

In the Department of Biological Sciences, the FWS decrease has had a somewhat less serious impact on employment.

"In order not to hurt the students, we've tried to hire almost as many students, but we give them less hours," said administrative assistant Deb McLean.

Employing 175 students, half of which are FWS employees, Jerome Library is also striving to minimize the effects of the FWS decline.

"The rate of pay for our students has not changed," said Mariann Reiter.

police log

Wild turkey seen as traffic hazard

Thursday Novemeber 24

Amherst Police were called to assist the Amherst Fire Department. The Amherst Police arrived at 17 Orchard St. at 1:11 a.m. A 67-year-old man reported having chest pains. He was then transported to Cooley Dickinson Hospital by the fire department.

A noise complaint was reported to the Amherst Police. The police arrived at 497 East Pleasant St. at 10:08 a.m. A neighbor reported loud noises from the apartment next door. Police report that this is another issue in an ongoing problem between those tenants. The reporting party was advised to ask management to settle the dispute.

Friday Novemeber 25

An Amherst resident reported to the Amherst Police Station that she had missing property. The complaint was filed at 10:14 a.m. The reporting party said that she was missing a black East Sport waist pack. Inside the pack there were two keys, checks, receipts, savings bonds, and her savings account passbook. The reporting party was advised to freeze accounts and notify the bank.

At 1:14 p.m., a resident came to the police station and reported that he had lost his wallet in the parking lot of the Eric Carle Museum. The wallet contained $40-$60 in cash, his driver's license, and some credit cards.

Saturday Novemeber 26

Doreen, 43 of Leverett, was arrested and charged with OUI liquor and failure to use care when stopping. At the corner of North Pleasant St. and Eastman St., she was in a motor vehicle crash involving one other vehicle. The police arrived at 739 North Pleasant St. at 1:17 a.m. The two vehicles involved were a blue 2003 Honda Accord and a 1995 Ford Escort.

There was a disturbance reported at 103 North Pleasant St. The police arrived on the scene at 7:23 a.m. Two people were arguing about a parking space. One person reported being threatened and cursed at. Both parties involved were advised to contact the police for guidance in parking issues.

There was an animal complaint from 43 Amity Place when a resident reported a wild turkey running around in the area. The police arrived on the scene at 3:05 p.m. The reporting party said she was concerned about the children in this situation. She also felt that the turkey was a traffic hazard.

Sunday Novemeber 27

Adolf E. Jansen, 54, of Belchertown, was arrested and charged with failure to yield at an intersection, failure to yield at signals, marked lane violations, and operating under the influence of liquor. The police arrived at 186 Bay Rd. at 12:54 a.m. to make the charges. The vehicle was a grey 1994 Lincoln Towncar.

David S. Kielbowitcz, 47, of Amherst, was arrested and charged with his third violation of operating under the influence and was also charged with marked lane violations. The police arrived at the scene at 1:15 a.m. to make the arrest. The vehicle was a grey Pontiac Bonneville.

—Arka Sen

Study finds inner cities still losing jobs despite federal programs

By Stephen Ohlemacher
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Many of America's inner cities continue to hemorrhage jobs despite years of federal programs designed to improve their economies.

Nearly half of the country's 82 largest municipalities lost jobs from 1995 to 2003, according to a new Harvard University study. By comparison, only one of the surrounding metropolitan areas lost jobs during the same period.

A separate analysis by The Associated Press found that most inner cities targeted by the federal government's primary urban economic programs lost jobs as well.

In fact, the best-performing cities were not part of the federal empowerment zone and renewal community programs, which provide businesses with billions of dollars in tax incentives to expand and hire workers.

"It's sobering," said Michael Porter, a Harvard business professor who did the study for the university's Initiative for a Competitive Inner City. "It suggests that there are relatively few inner cities that are thriving in the sense of job growth."

Porter and his team analyzed how many jobs were added or lost in inner cities with more than 50,000 residents. They found that only 10 added jobs at a higher rate than surrounding metropolitan areas. All 40 inner cities that lost jobs did so faster than surrounding areas.

Among the best performing: Jersey City, N.J.; Long Beach, Calif.; Tulsa, Okla.; and Anaheim, Calif. Among the worst: Detroit; Grand Rapids, Mich.; Rochester, N.Y.; and Miami.

Thirty-two of the inner cities studied also had neighborhoods that were designated federal urban empowerment zones or urban renewal communities.

Of those, 12 showed an increase in jobs from 1995 to 2003. Only one, Mobile, Ala., added jobs at a higher rate than the surrounding metropolitan area.

Whatever these programs were, the research and the experience suggests that their impact was marginal at best," said Alan Berube, a fellow at the Metropolitan Policy Program at the Brookings Institution, a think tank.

Brian Sullivan, a spokesman for the Department of Housing and Urban Development, said many businesses and communities have benefited from the programs. He said HUD is trying to better promote the tax incentives, especially among small-business owners.

But Sullivan said, many communities could do more to remove local barriers to development, such as cumbersome regulations.

"We're not trying to preach to people that you are over-regulating," he said. "But it is true that in some parts of the country the regulatory climate puts out the unwelcome mat."

Examples?

"Take your pick," Sullivan said. "I don't want to point fingers."

Economic development experts agree that tax incentives alone will not revive urban areas with chronically depressed economies.

The cities should improve services and schools, build affordable housing and enact reasonable business regulations, Harvard's Porter said.

"There's no silver bullet," he said. "To get it right you've got to work on the fundamentals."

The Clinton administration launched the urban empowerment zone initiative in 1994, designating six zones, in New York, Chicago, Detroit, Philadelphia, Atlanta and Baltimore.

Each was awarded $100 million for a host of programs, including job training, social services and tax incentives for businesses. Fifteen more empowerment zones were designated in 1998, each receiving about $25 million.

A HUD-commissioned assessment of the first empowerment zones found mixed results from 1995 to 2000. Although many individual projects were creating jobs and reviving neighborhoods, the study found no widespread, sustained job creation.

"There is little evidence to indicate that major reform or 'reinvention' occurred," the assessment said.

After President Bush took office in 2001, grants were phased out in favor of tax incentives.

"You can give somebody a one-time grant, but if you can cut their taxes each and every year, that's serious coin, potentially," HUD's Sullivan said.

Healthy eating can reduce freshman weight gain

By Elizabeth Chapman
Daily Mississippian (Mississippi U.)

OXFORD, Miss. — College students have a lot of concerns about life after high school when they start their freshman year.

Some students have to worry about paying for school, some worry about getting a date for the football game and then others dread the inevitable freshman 15, which plagues the majority of students who enter college.

According to national statistics, more than 1.5 million students enter U.S. colleges and universities each fall, which could lead to more than 11,000 tons of weight added to the incoming freshmen.

A study conducted by Cornell University found that most students gain an average of four pounds during their first 12 weeks of college — 11 times higher than the typical weight gain for 17- and 18-year-olds.

There is no cure for the freshman 15, but there are several ways to control the weight gain. A new craze hitting many college campuses is the consumption of organic products.

Organic foods are those raised or conducted without the use of drugs, hormones or synthetic chemicals, according to the supermarket guru Web site.

According to Joseph Mercola, author of Total Health Program, organic gardening produces higher percentages of vitamin C, iron, magnesium and phosphorous. Organic foods also have fewer nitrates.

"Studies have shown an increase in the 83 percent of nutrients in conventional produce," Mercola said.

The health benefits of organic products vary from food to food. Just because something is organic does not necessarily make it better for you.

Organic products are not only healthy for the body, but they are also beneficial for the environment.

Conventional farmers apply chemical fertilizers to the crops, whereas organic farmers feed and build soil with natural fertilizers like compost -- far more environmentally friendly.

"Studies show that the use of just one agrochemical contributes to more than 20 percent of the global ozone depletion," Mercola said.

Farmers who grow organic crops use natural methods such as insect predators and barriers to protect the plants.

Pesticides, used by conventional farmers, may have many negative influences on the health of consumers.

"Some health concerns include neurotoxicity, carcinogenicity of your endocrine system and immune system suppression.

Healthier food options, such as the one pictured above may help prevent weight gain during college years.

Springfield fire chief replaced

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. — The control board overseeing Springfield's finances has removed the city's top firefighter from civil service protection.

The move to abolish the position of fire chief and replace it with fire commissioner comes five months after a similar reorganization in the city's police department.

Gary Cassanelli, who has led the fire department for about a decade, will report directly to the mayor as commissioner. Phil Puccia, executive director of the state-appointed financial control board, said Cassanelli will be offered a contract within the next two months.

"He's been doing a good job managing the department," said Phil Puccia, executive director of the state-appointed financial control board.

The new position will not carry any civil service protections that essentially guaranteed a job for life. Instead, the commissioner will be held to certain performance standards during the course of a three-year contract with the city.

UMASS AMHERST UNIVERSITY PRODUCTIONS & CONCERTS PRESENTS:

BEN KWELLER
with Matt Nathanson

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 2, 2005
CAMPUS CENTER AUDITORIUM
DOORS OPEN AT 7:30 PM. SHOW STARTS AT 8:00 PM
$8 UMASS STUDENTS
$12 FIVE COLLEGE STUDENTS
$15 GENERAL PUBLIC
AVAILABLE AT THE DOOR.

IF YOU SAVE A HERO WHAT DOES THAT MAKE YOU?

U.S. AIR FORCE
CROSS INTO THE BLUE

More men and women on the front lines are surviving life-threatening injuries than ever before for one reason: We have the most elite nurses in the world. As a U.S. Air Force nurse, you receive the most advanced training and have access to the best medical technology on the planet. And whether you're treating Airmen on foreign soil or their families on bases here in the U.S., you can put all of that training to use. If you're interested in learning more about a better place to practice medicine, call or visit us online.
1-800-588-5260 • AIRFORCE.COM/HEALTHCARE

Please join us for an information session about the

Oxford Summer Seminar

Thursday, December 1st at 4:00 PM
Campus Center room 903

The Oxford Summer Seminar provides a unique opportunity for students to enjoy six weeks of residential life (July 6-August 15) at Oxford University's historic Trinity College. The seminar offers over 15 tutorial-based courses in literature, history, law, and politics. Classes are taught by British university faculty; both undergraduate and graduate-level credits may be earned.

The information session will include alums from last summer's Seminar and program administrators will describe next summer's Seminar. For more information visit the Seminar's website at www.umass.edu/oxford or you may contact the seminar via e-mail at:
oxford @english.umass.edu

Shopping for a Health Club?
Do your homework first!
HAMPSHIRE FITNESS CLUB
Has it ALL for you!

JOIN FOR THE
"WINTER SPECIAL"
5 WEEKS - $99 INDIVIDUAL
$7 CODE - $8 STU/SR

HAMPSHIRE FITNESS club

WHAT DO YOU GET?
Full Sized Indoor Pool • Aqua Aerobics
Cybex Nautilus Circuit • Cybex Free Weights
Full Court Basketball • Volleyball • Indoor Tennis
Cardio • Saunas • Indoor Cycling
Jacuzzi • Yoga/Pilates • Aerobics/Step/Bosu

COMPETITIVE BASKETBALL WITH JERRY
MONDAY & THURSDAY 6-8 PM

NO INITIATION FEE OR LONG-TERM CONTRACT NECESSARY
90 Gatehouse Rd. (At Echo Hill) Amherst • 256-6446
Off Rte. 9, two miles east of Amherst College
OPEN 6AM-10PM MON-FRI • 8AM-9PM SAT & SUN

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 2005

Simon's Chocolate Factory

Join us from 5-8 pm in All DC's for:
Chocolate Soup • Chocolate Pizza • Double Chocolate Mousse Cake
Vegan Chocolate Cake with Vegan Ganache
Warm Chocolate Bread Pudding • Chocolate Dipped Mango
Chocolate Profiteroles

Simon Stevenson
Pastry Chef/Bake Shop Manager, a native of Sheffield, England, is one of the newest members of the UMass Dining Services team. Simon received a degree from Johnson and Wales University, and training in England.

DINING SERVICES
UMassAmherst

Virginia Hospitality

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it" Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

They better have been lying

Mike Sances

Newsflash: Just because a Republican and a Democrat both say the same thing doesn't make it true. I know, I might as well have opened this by reminding you that two and two make four. Apologies to the more intelligent readers out there; you have to understand this is a highly ideological place, where views not in line with the conventional, binary political framing are simply unthinkable. It's one of the primary reasons we presently find ourselves in such dire straits, abroad and at home.

You see, you might think it obvious that the establishment of fact requires more than an agreement by George Bush and John Kerry that something is true. Unfortunately, from the sounds of the childish taunting and name-calling that passes for debate on the Iraq war, renewed in recent weeks by Representative John Murtha's (D-PA) unexpected call for an immediate withdrawal of all American troops, this is not the case.

If you haven't been following the headlines, the latest developments can be summarized as follows: Democrats accuse the Bush administration of misleading the country (Congress and the public) into war with Iraq; in response, Republicans start reciting quotes from prominent Democrats, from the 1990s and even 2002 and 2003, who at various times seemed to be advocating for war just as strongly, making identical claims about alleged weapons of mass destruction.

(Oh, and meanwhile, people continue to be slaughtered in Iraq. Ayad Allawi, former American puppet president, told the London Observer this weekend that human rights abuses in the country are as bad as they were under Saddam Hussein. But back to the important stuff – namely, which party can scream louder.)

So Democrats and Republicans are arguing, fundamentally, over whether the White House knew there was no weapons program in Iraq but said otherwise. Personally, I continue to hold out hope that this was the case. Why? Because launching a ground war against a country with nuclear weapons ready to launch (or ready to pass to terrorists) is an act of insanity. They better have known those weapons weren't there; they better have been lying when they said they were.

Still, I never thought they were there anyway, and I was hardly in isolation. In fact, most people opposed this war on the grounds that the case for war was a joke, something realized as early as autumn 2002. That's right, most people – if 90 percent of world public opinion counts for anything.

In fact, most people opposed this war on the grounds that the case for war was a joke, something realized as early as autumn 2002. That's right, most people – if 90 percent of world public opinion counts for anything.

Ask yourself, why did millions of people take to the streets in Europe, in London and in New York before the war started? Because they were in favor of Iraq attacking the United States? Right.

But back to the present. Today, almost two-thirds of Americans want the war to end, want some or all American troops brought home starting today. When supporters of the war call those holding this position "cowards" (Representative Jean Schmidt of Ohio), they should keep this in mind. Similarly, when they question the patriotism and motivation of those who believe the president "lied" or otherwise mislead the country before the war, they should know that the group they are smearing includes 64 percent of Americans, according to a Wall Street Journal/Harris poll published Wednesday. If believing the president lies is treason, then we are truly a nation of traitors.

That's not to say that public opinion is infallible, as some will no doubt point out right away. After all, Americans overwhelmingly supported military action against Iraq when the war started. But this goes to the heart of the issue. Americans supported the war, but why? Was it because we are a nation of bloodthirsty jingoists who have endorsed the Bush doctrine of preventive war? Is it because we think spreading democracy by force is a good idea?

Just the opposite. The only reason the public supported the war was because they thought we were about to be attacked. Many thought we already had been attacked by Iraq on September 11 – many still do. It had nothing to do with the absurd stories of aluminum tubes that appeared in the New York Times, or some fabled potential of an intent to develop a program that could possibly be used to produce banned weapons. The current arguing over this minutia is so remote from why the public supported the war in the beginning that it can only serve to marginalize them even more.

The Vice President has called Democrats who have turned against the war "irresponsible." I agree. It was irresponsible to vote for a war of aggression against the weakest country in the Middle East. It was irresponsible to mislead the public into the war, as both parties and the mainstream media did. But it is hardly irresponsible to respond to popular sentiment by calling for an end to the carnage in Iraq; it is democracy. As Representative Murtha noted in his statement calling for an end to the war, "The American public is way ahead of us."

Mike Sances is a Collegian columnist.

Mother exploits own son

David B. Lawrence

Casey Sheehan was killed in Iraq on April 4, 2004. The 25-year-old Californian was released from the U.S. Army just after the start of the Iraq war in 2003. He voluntarily reenlisted, knowing that he would be sent to Iraq. On April 4, a QRF (quick reaction force) was organized to rescue American troops, and Casey signed on for the dangerous mission. He was killed in action that day. There is little doubt, considering that he volunteered for the treacherous mission, that up until that day he believed in the causes for which he fought, and willingly risked mortal sacrifice for his country. He was a true hero.

Casey Sheehan made the ultimate sacrifice for his country. For that sacrifice and for the similar sacrifices of millions of Americans through history we are deeply indebted. For that sacrifice Casey was posthumously awarded the Bronze Star and the Purple Heart.

For that sacrifice Casey Sheehan's memory has been exploited.

Casey's parents met with President George W. Bush several months after his death. In an interview published shortly afterwards, his liberal-leaning mother voiced common and reasonable concerns that the President's justification for the war was shifted after troops in Iraq failed to uncover weapons of mass destruction. Mother Cindy Sheehan also remarked on her respect for Bush and his faith, saying that he was "... sincere about wanting freedom for the Iraqis ... I know he's sorry and feels some pain for our loss. And I know he's a man of faith."

But those comments quickly became uncharacteristic of Casey's mother, as over the next several months her bereavement gave way to radical activism. She became an anti-war protestor, and despite Casey's commitment to the war and to America, rewrote the story of Casey's death to fit her message. According to Cindy, Casey did not die fighting for freedom and democracy, but "he was killed for lies and for a PNAC [Project for the New American Century, a neo-conservative think tank] Neo-Con agenda to benefit Israel." According to Cindy, Casey was not killed by bloodthirsty terrorist extremists while trying to rescue his trapped brethren in Iraq, but was murdered by President Bush. She wants to ask Bush, "Why did you kill my son?"

Since her transition from bereaved mother to leftist radical, Cindy has changed her mind about Bush, his faith, and his being "sincere about wanting freedom for the Iraqis."

Since her transition from bereaved mother to leftist radical, Cindy has changed her mind about Bush, his faith, and his being "sincere about wanting freedom for the Iraqis." Of her meeting with him following Casey's death, Cindy said in July that Bush seemed "detached from humanity" and that "his mouth kept moving, but there was nothing in his eyes or anything else about him that showed me he really cared or had any real compassion at all."

Casey Sheehan had compassion for his fellow troops and for the much persecuted Iraqi people. He knew he would be sent to Iraq if he reenlisted, and he did so because he wanted to fight for his country and for Iraqi freedom. Casey knew that the QRF he signed onto in April was a dangerous mission. So risky was it that commanders would not order troops to go. Casey volunteered for the mission to help save some of his fellow American troops. Casey knew the risks and he knew his duty.

Casey's actions that day, the actions that led to his death, speak for themselves. We have no substantial record of him speaking about his mission, nor have we any of Casey's rhetoric to turn to in assessing his thoughts and feelings about the war or President Bush. We do, however, have record of his noble actions – actions that speak volumes about his commitment to America and to freedom and winning the war he was fighting in; actions that led to his sacrifice.

Those actions speak louder to me than does the droning leftist rhetoric of the pundit Cindy Sheehan. Despite her biting attacks on Bush, her overbearing political pessimism and her exploitation of Casey's sacrifice, the statement he made with his own deeds is clear to this day. I admire the bravery and conviction of Casey Sheehan: he was a true hero, and he deserves to be remembered as one.

David B Lawrence is a Collegian columnist

Victim of hate crime remembered

Ben Gaines

I was on the bus the other day and noticed a sign above all of our heads. It read something to the tune of: "Did you know hate graffiti can be a real crime? And you could pay a fine, or do real time?" Petty vandalism and someone spray-painting the "big bad word" on a building aren't really what I'm interested in and only slightly what the ad was really about. What the ad was really about was hate, and what that ad really made me think of was Matthew Shepard.

Let me tell you, in case you don't know, about Matthew Shepard. Matthew Shepard was a college student who was murdered in 1998 in Laramie, Wyoming. He was beaten, robbed, tied to a fence, and beaten more until he died. Well, until he lapsed into a coma from which he would die several days later.

The human body is a pretty resilient thing, really; fragile when compared to say, a tiger or a brick outhouse but still a pretty tough little cookie. Anyone who has had to saw through bone can attest to just how hard that stuff is. Beating someone to death isn't always the easiest thing to do. It takes a little time, and some real effort. Leaving them to die in a field, still strapped to a barbed wire fence, so that they could die in the hospital in front of their parents, well, that requires something else; human waste running through your veins, probably.

Matthew was, by all accounts, a pretty good guy who certainly didn't have this coming to him. But Matthew was gay, and his two killers figured nothing else really mattered. They're in jail now, and probably having a train run on them as we speak, so there's that.

Matthew's tragic story received a good deal of media attention, with a movie ("Anatomy of a Hate Crime") being made about it. Matthew's killers deserve to spend the rest of their lives in jail, picking up the soap and getting hot, sticky and exceedingly ironic prison love on a daily basis. But they deserve this because they killed someone, not because they killed someone out of hate.

Now, some critics of hate crime laws argue that all crimes require you to hate someone, but this really misses the point and borders on petty sophistry. I'm more interested in pointing out the fact that hating someone because they're African-American, gay, Jewish, Protestant Catholic, or whatever petty division you so choose is your right in this country. If you want to belong to the Ku Klux Klan, that's your right. It's your right to hate gay people in much the same way it's your right to hate just about anything you want.

Matthew's killers deserve to spend the rest of their lives in jail, picking up the soap and getting hot, sticky and exceedingly ironic prison love on a daily basis. But they deserve this because they killed someone, not because they killed someone out of hate.

You're not allowed to do anything about it, though. You're not allowed to burn a cross on someone's lawn, or hit them with a car, because hitting people with cars is illegal, no matter what the reason. Because trespassing and harassment are illegal, no matter the reason. Because we have laws to force people to behave the way they wouldn't otherwise.

If I steal a Pauly Shore movie from Blockbuster and smash it against the pavement because he sucks, is my larceny charge any more grievous than if I did it because I was bored? Of course not.

Now, I'm not saying that smashing a video tape is the same as a person's skull: I'm pointing out that, in our society, your personal beliefs do not factor into your sentencing. If those two men had killed Matthew Shepard because they were bored, mean and looking for kicks on a Friday night, would he be any less dead? Would their crime be any less monstrous? Of course not.

Matthew Shepard's killers deserve to spend the rest of their lives behind bars, without hope of parole, because they ended a human life. They did so neither to protect themselves from harm nor by accident. They did so with malice of forethought and with heinous disregard for human life. They, and all their kind, should be dealt with in the exact same way, regardless of whether they are motivated by hate, greed or simple sadism.

Ben Gaines is a Collegian columnist.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

LATE NIGHT BUSES ARE THE ANSWER

In light of a tragic drunk driving accident at Bridgewater State College recently resulting in the death of an innocent student, the University of Massachusetts needs to wake up and prevent drunk driving around Amherst. The solution is not to offer more pathetic anti-drinking courses or crack down on underage possession. The solution is to extend the PVTA bus hours.

There have been far too many instances in which students have absolutely no options left but to drive home drunk. When the buses stop running at a measly one in the morning and when Red Cab's cell phone (virtually the only cab service in town) rings for what seems like an eternity, students are left with no option but to select the least drunken one to drive a car. It is depressing that our University has not assisted in solving this very serious problem.

It is absolutely inexcusable that funds in the budget have not been allocated to providing much later bus schedules and a University-run taxi service. Students will undoubtedly pay for such a service as long as it means getting home safe. If no taxi companies have capitalized on providing taxi service in a taxi-desolate area, then why hasn't the University?

This is a very serious problem and needs immediate attention before another innocent life of a UMass student is lost.

Brian Peters
UMass student

IDEA TO PREVENT DRUNK DRIVING

I am currently a junior at this fine institution and don't have many complaints. Actually I will be honest, I am going to resist on a lot of things that I could complain about, and focus on something that is a big issue and can easily be fixed.

All the years I have been going to school here, I have noticed how big a problem drunk driving really is on campus. When you think about it, why do kids drink and drive? The answer pretty much always the same: they want to get home from whatever place they spent the night drinking.

Most of the time there is a designated driver, but occasionally there isn't and this is when people get DUIs. I have probably the simplest solution that can not only save people from getting DUIs, but will save people's lives. Why not let the PVTA run a little later?

It's pretty much as easy as it sounds. All you need are a few more buses out past one in the morning, when most people leave their house from their evening plans. Why not have buses run until three between campus and the major apartment complexes around campus? This wouldn't be very expensive either. Just run one bus on each of these few routes and make it an hourly stop. Talk it over with your gang and get back to us. It's that simple, try it.

Eric Wisman
UMass student

Write for ED/OP...

email: editorial@dailycollegian.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

New Music Tuesdays

"I feel my shows are like a late-night talk show that we settle down and do every night." - John Mayer

Week of 11/29 to 12/5

Blink 182

6.5/10

Greatest Hits
Geffen Records

Just because a band breaks up does not mean they aren't going to release any new albums anymore. Or in the case of Blink 182, just because they go on an indefinite hiatus does not mean they won't release any new albums.

Although they will have very little new material to release, they will release it all slowly so fans will want more and more until the vault is empty.

To start this wanting process off, Blink 182 has released a greatest hits album. This album is full of the band's singles from their previous albums. It even includes "Carousel" and "M&Ms" from their independent label days.

While it may have all the singles, the album itself is lacking in quality even though Blink 182 was never a band for high-quality work. The singles are nice here in retrospect, but some of them, like "All The Small Things," would be better off not on the album and replaced by fan favorites from live shows.

No, not the songs that were full of curse words and immature tales about each others' moms. Gems that weren't singles, but still good and important, like "Pathetic" from 1997's "Dude Ranch." This song is equally as important as any of the singles and always got a huge reaction from the crowd whenever they played it live, which was almost every live show since the song's incarnation.

Another thing the album lacks is quality artwork. An album cover of just the band's logo? Come on, that's just lame. Even Beatles greatest hits albums have their images on them. It didn't even have to be a new picture; it could be old ones that were never used.

Quality liner notes would have been nice too. They had them in their last album, 2003's "Blink 182." So why not again as part of the goodbye to the fans that loved them until this day?

Overall, the album isn't bad. In retrospect, it is fun to hear all of the singles again together as if the radio was having a Blink 182 special. It's also good to hear the two new songs on the album, "Not Now" and the cover of Only One's "Another Girl, Another Planet." Both new songs really showcase the new side Blink 182 was taking before they decided to go on hiatus.

John Mayer Trio

TRY! JOHN MAYER TRIO

8.4/10

Try! John Mayer Trio Live in Concert
Sony

Attention: An Amber Alert has been set up for a man in his late 20s, shaggy dark hair, typically sarcastic and often plays guitar. Yes, that's right. John Mayer is missing or at least the pop star John Mayer. A new John Mayer has been found in a new band with a new sound. This could possibly lead to a new age "John is dead" ordeal similar to the "Paul is dead" conspiracy theory of the 1960s.

With this new act, John Mayer has an entirely new approach to music. Long gone is the pop style he first established himself with songs such as "No Such Thing" and "Your Body Is a Wonderland."

Mayer lately has been trying and successfully proving to rock 'n' roll and blues elders such as Buddy Guy and Eric Clapton that he can rock out like the rest of them. Then Mayer went to Esquire Magazine to prove it to the rest of the world.

At first, there was disbelief that he could live up to all the hype he had been creating, but with one listen to "Try! John Mayer Trio Live in Concert," it is obvious something got into Mayer and whatever it was should stay a long, long time.

The trio consists of Mayer with musicians Steve Jordan and Pino Palladino. Their sound comes across as if they have been playing together for years, but in reality it's been barely a year. They even go into above-average jamming during songs, creating a great rock 'n' roll with a twist of funk sound.

Even during the slower songs on the album, the new funk sound can be heard in the background. The fans' reaction to these songs is almost dead silence except for the approval yell every now and again.

Another improvement on this album is Mayer's songwriting ability. The lyrics to the song have so much more to them then just a potential Top 40 radio hit. They carry much more weight and could possibly be too much to be a hit, but after two different wins at the Grammys, Mayer doesn't need any more breakout hits. He is already one of the best singer-songwriters out there today.

By Tim McCall
Collegian Staff

Nada Surf

8.5/10

The Weight Is A Gift
Borsuk Records

After a band strikes with a huge hit song and then disappears from the mainstream radar, they are quickly forgotten by the so-called fans that embraced them so briefly. The one-hit-wonder factory is crammed with bands that valiantly tried to recreate the magic before disbanding or spiraled out of control due to their newfound success. However, what is far more interesting is the group of bands that quietly continued making great music. There are the bands like The Flaming Lips and Local 11 that were always making, and continue to make, excellent records but only happened to strike radio gold once. Then there are bands like Nada Surf, who emerged in the mid-'90s with a Weezer-esque geeky pop/punk sound and a novelty hit with "Popular," a tongue-in-cheek spoken-word guide to being cool in high school. The band was quickly forgotten and went unheard of for four years following their sophomore effort, which came and went without anyone taking note.

However, in 2002 something funny happened; Nada Surf, the fun, quirky novelty band from the '90s, came back with "I Let Go," a dark, introspective pop record that appropriately cited Bob Dylan's "Blonde On Blonde" in one of its songs. What was more shocking than this change in sound was how good Nada Surf was, winning over indie-rock fans across the world and building up great anticipation for the band's next move. "The Weight is a Gift" is the best follow-up that Nada Surf could've hoped to make, taking the best elements of "I Let Go's" intelligent pop but never repeating a move from that breakthrough record.

"The Weight is a Gift" does have the same getting-older, semi-depressed mood but the songs and the hooks themselves are more energetic. Songs like "Concrete Bed" and "All is a Game" have some beat-down lyrics but the songs are alive and kicking. "Always Love" isn't nearly as cheesy as the title might indicate and "Blankest Year" is a rocking song that features some extremely fuzzed-out guitar and ends with singer/guitarist Matthew Caws singing, "Fuck it, I'm gonna have a party." When melancholy, wistful songs – which are all spectacular – like "Your Legs Grow" and "Comes A Time" come on and slow the pace of the record down, Nada Surf immediately picks it back up, rather then sinking deeper and deeper into a depressive shell. Where as "I Let Go" feels a long, cold winter, "The Weight is a Gift" feels like an older, wiser, retrospective look on a deep freeze that finds some good in it. It is the type of aging that results in more vibrancy, a realization that getting older doesn't mean slowing down and hibernating forever. Nada Surf earned this second chance for themselves with nothing but their own talents and "The Weight is a Gift" takes the opportunity and runs with it.

"The Weight is a Gift" is an original and impressive slice of indie-pop that is sure to make even bigger waves for Nada Surf.

Radiohead

10/10

27 5 94 The Astoria London Live
Capitol Records

Radiohead is known as one of the most original, creative, talented and generally brilliant bands around. It seems that with each release the acclaimed band gets bigger and bigger and seems to be pushing the limits – and themselves – further and further. As a result, many listeners today are only strong followers of a certain period of Radiohead. 1997's "OK Computer" often ranks in the top 10 of best albums of all time list and everything after it has found the band becoming more adored by a larger population of listeners.

Broach the subject of early Radiohead to casual fans and the expected response would be to shrug it off, citing the big hits and nothing more. Even many who list Radiohead among their favorite bands and rank 1995's "The Bends" alongside the rest of the band's catalogue will quickly dismiss the band's 1993 debut "Pablo Honey," an unfortunate move that even Radiohead often falls pray to.

Sadly, the fact that the band has quietly slipped out this live DVD of a 1994 performance in London shows that they still look down upon their early output. While it's understandable that most people would be a little bit reluctant to air young videos of themselves, from years before they are fully grown and matured, it is a real shame as this material is just as good as anything Radiohead has ever released. The tracks featured (eight from "Pablo Honey" plus the UK-only single "Pop is Dead" and six that would end up on the then-unreleased "The Bends" along with the future b-side "Maquiladora") show Radiohead as a vibrant, loud, noisy, guitar-based band that was years ahead of their time.

Kicking off with an explosive version of "You," the DVD immediately gets to the point. Radiohead has been amazing since they emerged in 1993. The whole band looks remarkably young and while bassist Colin Greenwood seems content to lurk in the shadows next to Phil Selway's drum kit, guitarists Ed O'Brien and Jonny Greenwood are going nuts, jumping into the air and attacking their instruments with the type of ferocity that is normally seen in punk bands. The whole time, singer/guitarist Thom Yorke comes off as lighthearted, mock-bowing when he apologizes for playing so many new songs. Songs like "Ripcord," "Prove Yourself" and "Maquiladora" should be ranked among Radiohead's best and the live versions included here confirm that. Thom Yorke's voice is not as fully trained as it would become but he still was one of the more talented vocalists in the pop/music world and Jonny Greenwood seals his place as one of the best noise-guitarists of all time bending notes, tearing up and down the fret board and creating amazing and imaginative sounds out of his massive pedal board – turning already-great songs into monuments of excellence.

Perhaps Radiohead has shied away from this material not because they are ashamed but because they don't feel the need to defend it. "Pablo Honey" is an album that is consistently bashed for no apparent reason aside from the fact that perhaps the listener just doesn't get it. If "The Astoria" proves anything, it's that Radiohead has always been ahead of their time and innovative, which makes this DVD a must-have even for those who aren't as into the earlier stuff – in fact, it could convert a large hoard of those people. Anyone interested in seeing one of the very best guitar-rock bands of the '90s, and arguably one of the best bands of all time, needs to pick up this disc immediately.

Little Brother

9/10

The Minstrel Show
Atlantic Records

Spike Lee's 2000 film "Bamboozled" was a dark, controversial, and above-all raw satire of race relations – specifically in the media – where a black television executive, disgusted with the way he sees black people portrayed on TV, tries to get fired from his post by putting on the most racist, stereotype-filled program he can think of – an old fashioned minstrel show. North Carolina rappers Little Brother have apparently noticed the same thing when they flip through the radio and MTV. There has been a large subculture of rappers that care more about real issues, art and being honest than they do about getting rich (or dying in the process) and playing the Video Music Awards but they have mostly been suppressed in favor of the next big thing and MCs in metaphorical blackface, happily playing the fool to executives who are only interested in the almighty dollar.

"The Minstrel Show" is a thoroughly entertaining, consistently engaging, and, above all, brilliant slap in the face to the real minstrel show that keeps the best and brightest – those with something serious or "dangerous" to say – suppressed and lifts up those willing to sell themselves out for pennies. Little Brother has been fortunate enough to have producer 9th Wonder amongst their ranks and thanks to his recent work with heavyhitters like Jay-Z, Little Brother has scored a major-label record deal, effectively infiltrating the minstrel show. Luckily, they haven't compromised at all; in fact they have gotten stronger and far more eager to challenge the status quo. Rappers Phonte and Big Pooh have top-notch flows but it is their lyrics that make Little Brother one of the best rap groups out today.

"The Minstrel Show" has songs like "Beautiful Morning" and "Say It Again" that are instantly ear-grabbing with line after line of tight rhymes and smart messages. 9th Wonder's production consists of the same soft synths and soul-samples that have become his trademark, and while he isn't as challenging as the lyrics, he fits perfectly. Little Brother works in skits that serve as part of the "UBN" network – the broadcaster of the minstrel show – and unlike the skits on most rap albums, they serve an important role on the record, fleshing out the parody.

And parody it is. Little Brother approaches arguably the biggest, most serious issue facing hip-hop culture today with a level of lightheartedness that makes them more accessible than their message is. Little Brother's approach is part dry-sarcasm, part exaggerated-parody, part jovial boosting and part straightforward sharp shooting that adds up to a uniquely intelligent but instantly enjoyable concoction. People look to Kanye West or Outkast as the new saviors of rap, and while they arguably avoid the minstrel show, they simply have nothing on Little Brother.

Little Brother should easily join the company of revered intelligent rappers like Dead Prez that are rarely seen on the mainstream radar – in-touch enough to attract hip-hop heads that are looking to explore the real issues of the day and smart enough to reel in the harshest critics of mainstream, thug-life rap. For those that have seen the minstrel show in action, Little Brother arrives as a breath of fresh air, and for those that are caught up in it, "The Minstrel Show" serves as a warning shot and a war cry that simply cannot be ignored.

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

UM dominates Tigers

BASKETBALL from page 8

going into this contest with 6.7 per game, recorded two in under three minutes of play, and added to his career total of 143 with another later in the game.

Although UMass did not relinquish its lead the entire night, Savannah State did not give up in the early going, cutting the Minuteman lead down to 11 after Chauncey Shaw hit both of his free throws off of a Lasme foul.

UMass had a dry streak of 2:23 afterwards, and a lay-up by junior Javon Randolph gave the Tigers hope, with the score then down to 23-14.

A three-pointer by Thomas put a stop to any chance for Savannah State and lay-ups by junior James Life, sophomore Lawrence Carrier, Thomas, and senior Jeff Viggiano added to the UMass lead in the first half.

Junior Rashaun Freeman, who leads the team in scoring with 6.5 points on the season, did not record a single point during the first half, but the All-American candidate came out in the second period ready to put the contest away.

Freeman and Maxwell exchanged baskets, and a three-pointer by freshman Chris Lowe made the second half of play unreachable for the Tigers.

KAREN WEINTRAUB/COLLEGIAN

Junior guard Maurice Maxwell had 13 points and five rebounds last night's win over Savantah State. The win improved UMass to 2-2 on the season.

As the Minutemen starters slowly trickled off the court and the score at 88-50 with the game nearing its end, the Minutemen walk-ons entered the game and closed out another chapter in the early Lord era.

NOTES: The six players to reach double-digits (Lasme, Freeman, Thomas, Maxwell, Life and Carrier) is the most for UMass since Dec. 27, 1991 when the Minutemen beat Harvard 98-63. UMass will play a UConn team that is currently ranked third in the nation and looking for revenge after UMass derailed the then-defending national champions 61-59 on Dec. 9, 2004 at the Mullins Center. Junior James Life's 18 points is a career-high for him, and led the team last night.

Former Cowboy gets arrested

IRVIN from page 8

ESPN spokesman Bill Hoffheimer said it was not known whether he notified the network of his arrest before he went on air.

Later in the day, Irvin told the AP that the drug pipe police found in his car belonged to an old friend who had left a Houston rehab center to spend Thanksgiving with the Irvin family in their Carrollton home. Irvin would not tell The Associated Press his friend's name.

Irvin said he put the pipe in his car rather than leave it in his house where his four children might find it. He said he intended to throw it away but forgot.

During Irvin's 12 seasons with the Cowboys, he became the team's all-time leading receiver and helped the team to three Super Bowl titles. In September, he was inducted into the Cowboys Ring of Honor at Texas Stadium along with former teammates Troy Aikman and Emmitt Smith.

His success on the field, however, was accompanied by high-profile problems off it.

In 1996, Irvin pleaded no contest to felony cocaine possession and was sentenced to four years' probation. He successfully completed probation.

In 2002, Irvin told the Colleyville Chamber of Commerce that after his football career ended, he had found his way back to God and away from drugs and alcohol.

"I started searching for things so that I would feel what I'd felt on the football field – drinking and hanging out, chasing, getting high. I was out there," he said.

Fox Sports Net hired him in July 2001, the day he officially retired from the Cowboys. But he never made it to a single broadcast. The two sides parted ways less than a month later after his arrest in connection with marijuana and cocaine possession in a North Dallas apartment in the company of a 21-year-old woman. Charges against him were later dropped.

Last season, he joined ESPN's studio team and has emerged as a top analyst and a lightning rod on several controversial subjects. One of Irvin's demands from ESPN when he took the job before the 2004 season was that he travel in a limousine to remind players of his elite status around the league. ESPN said Irvin would appear on the network as scheduled Monday night.

"We talked to Michael, who explained it to us the way he did to the AP," said ESPN spokesman Josh Krulewitz. "We will continue to talk with Michael, but you can expect to see him on Monday Night Countdown on Monday evening."

RALPH LAUER/FORT WORTH STAR-TELEGRAM

Former Dallas Cowboys star wide receiver Michael Irvin was arrested on Friday for possession of drug paraphernalia in Plano, Texas.

Jauron to replace Mariucci

MARIUCCI from page 8

would make us happy and make the fans happy."

Millen hired both Mariucci and his predecessor, Marty Mornhinweg, and drafted or signed most of the players currently on the Lions – and Detroit is an NFL-worst 20-55 since 2001. Millen, a former NFL linebacker and TV analyst, was given a five-year extension before this season.

Jauron, Detroit's defensive coordinator the past two seasons, was fired in 2003 after four losing seasons in five years with the Bears. He was selected as NFL coach of the year during his lone winning season in Chicago.

"We need to take these next five weeks, and we need to play ... and see what we can get out of it," Jauron said. "I don't have plans other than the next game."

The Lions are the first team since the NFL and AFL merged drafts in 1967 to draft receivers in the first round three straight years.

Charles Rogers missed most of his first two seasons with injuries and was suspended for four games this year for violating the NFL's substance abuse policy. Roy Williams has made his share of plays, but has struggled to stay healthy. Rookie Mike Williams, also slowed by injuries, has shown few flashes of promise.

Detroit's quarterback situation also hurt Mariucci's chances for success.

Joey Harrington, the third overall pick in 2002, has failed to be consistent throughout his career. The Lions added a veteran to push Harrington, or replace him, but 35-year-old Jeff Garcia has been nagged by injuries and an inability to throw deep passes.

The Lions' porous offensive line has added to their passing- and running-game woes while a decent defense has been hampered by being on the field too long, and by injuries.

Duke holds onto No. 1 spot

By Jim O'Connell
Associated Press

Duke, Texas and Connecticut, winners of the biggest early-season tournaments, held on to the top three spots in The Associated Press' college basketball poll on Monday.

Villanova and Oklahoma, who play Saturday, stayed fourth and fifth, respectively, then came a slew of changes in the Top 25.

Duke (5-0), which beat Drexel and Memphis in winning the NIT Season Tip-Off, received 61 first-place votes and 1,785 points from the national media panel to keep the No. 1 spot it has held since the preseason poll.

Texas (5-0) beat West Virginia and Iowa in taking the Guardians Classic, and the Longhorns were No. 1 on six ballots and had 1,696 points.

Connecticut (4-0) won the EA Sports Maui Invitational by beating Arkansas, Arizona and Gonzaga, and the Huskies received four first-place votes.

Villanova (2-0), which had the other first-place vote, and Oklahoma (3-0) meet this weekend in Philadelphia.

Ten ranked teams lost a total of 14 games last week, but 11 of the losses came at the hands of other members of the Top 25. So, only two teams dropped out – West Virginia from 13th and Syracuse from No. 17. The teams that replaced them were North Carolina State at No. 24 and LSU at 25th.

Gonzaga, which beat Michigan State 109-106 in the semifinals at Maui then lost 65-63 at the buzzer to Connecticut in the title game, moved up two spots to eighth and ninth. Kentucky, which lost to Iowa in the semifinals of the Guardians Classic, dropped three places to No. 10.

Florida was 11th followed by Illinois, Michigan State, Iowa, Arizona, UCLA, Indiana, Washington, George Washington and Nevada.

The last five ranked teams were Alabama, Wake Forest, Maryland, North Carolina State and LSU.

North Carolina State gives the Atlantic Coast Conference five teams in the Top 25 along with Duke, Boston College, Wake Forest and Maryland.

The Wolfpack (5-0) beat VMI 75-55 and Notre Dame 61-48 last week. They were ranked in the preseason poll and for the first seven weeks of the season in 2004-05, reaching as high as 12th.

"I think it's a good thing to have high expectations for your basketball program," North Carolina State coach Herb Sendek said Monday. "But I think we all recognize at the end of the day, what the polls say on Nov. 28, in the whole scheme of things, isn't really important. It's early, those polls and rankings are going to change."

LSU (3-0) beat Nicholls State 104-57 and West Virginia 71-68 in overtime last week to get in the Top 25 for the first time since being 24th for one week in January 2004.

The Tigers' win at West Virginia was the third loss of the week for the Mountaineers (2-3), who fell to Texas and Kentucky in the Guardians Classic.

Syracuse (4-2) lost 74-69 to Bucknell at home last week.

The other ranked team to lose two games last week was Arizona, which fell to Connecticut and Michigan State on Maui.

Both the Southeastern Conference and Big Ten have four ranked teams this week, while the Big East and Pac-10 have three each. The Big East teams (Connecticut, Villanova and Louisville) are all in the top seven.

In addition to Oklahoma-Villanova, there are three other double-ranked games this week: North Carolina State-Iowa and Duke-Indiana are on Wednesday as part of the ACC-Big Ten Challenge, and Gonzaga plays Washington on Sunday.

GREAT Reasons to use UHS Eye Care Services
1 Savings on eyeglasses from the on-site Optical Services at UHS
2 A great place to get contact lenses
3 Convenient hours and location
4 FREE eyeglass adjustments and one year warranty on frames
5 Savings on routine eye exams for students at UMass
SPECIAL OFFER: 10 PERCENT STUDENT DISCOUNT ON ALL FRAMES AND EYEGLASS LENSES!*
"I invite you to use the Eye Care Services"
* Cannot be combined with other insurance discounts.
For appointments or questions, call 577-5383
Frederick H. Bloom, O.D. Director, UHS Eye Care Services
UHS EYE CARE SERVICES

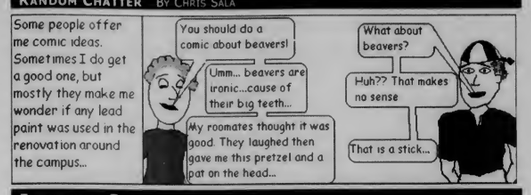
FRUSTRATED?
PUZZLED?
DO YOU HAVE:
a grade dispute?
teacher, roomate or job concerns?
billing problems?
harassment?
...or any other University related problems?
THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP
(confidentially, of course)
students, faculty, and staff are all welcome
823 Campus Center
Office Hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.
telephone: 413-545-0867
fax: 413-545-9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

Getting your degree by getting the credit you deserve.
You're beyond living the on-campus life, but you want to tap into the broad and deep resources of UMass Amherst to earn your degree. University Without Walls provides a guiding hand and gives you credit for life and work experience.
UNIVERSITY WITHOUT WALLS
www.UMassULearn.net 413-545-2414 100 Venture Way, Hadley, MA
UMassAmherst Continuing Education

Get the ballerinas on the stage and the paintings on the wall.
For the arts to thrive, it takes more than artistry – it takes business savvy. That's why UMass Amherst offers courses in arts management that show you how to plan, program and market the arts. There's an art to raising and managing money, thinking strategically and helping the arts become a vital part of any community.
ARTS MANAGEMENT
www.UMassULearn.net 413-545-2414 100 Venture Way, Hadley, MA
UMassAmherst Continuing Education

Bio-science or compassion?
In nursing and health care, you'll need both. You need to know bio-science and technology. And you must have compassion. That's why UMass Amherst offers courses in nursing and public health that provide a full foundation for a successful and rewarding career in health care.
NURSING and PUBLIC HEALTH
www.UMassULearn.net 413-545-2414 100 Venture Way, Hadley, MA
UMassAmherst Continuing Education

Can you catch the crooks?
If you want to work in law enforcement, probation, courts or corrections, UMass Amherst offers a Certificate of Criminal Justice with a focus on criminal behavior by citizens and by government and corporate officials. Get valuable insight that'll help you advance in any area of criminal justice.
CRIMINAL JUSTICE
www.UMassULearn.net 413-545-2414 100 Venture Way, Hadley, MA
UMassAmherst Continuing Education

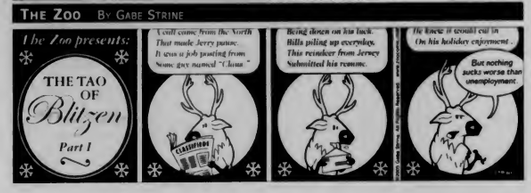


Regency Hair Stylists
"Get a new look for fall"
$5.00 OFF a haircut
Monday - Thursday
Bring this ad and your Student ID.
Call for an appointment or stop by the salon
253 - 9526
189 N. Pleasant St
Amherst, MA 01002

NOW SHOWING at PETE'S
NEW BURGERS
NEW MEALDEALS
BANANA FOR 2 BURGER FOR 2 BUCKS
HAMBURGERS - HOT DOGS - GRINDERS
CHICKEN - SEAFOOD - FRIES
PHILLY CHEESE STEAKS
SHAKES - SMOOTHIES - FLOATS
HAND ICE CREAM & SOFT SERVE
287 Russell St. Route 9 - Hadley
585-0241
petesdrivein.com

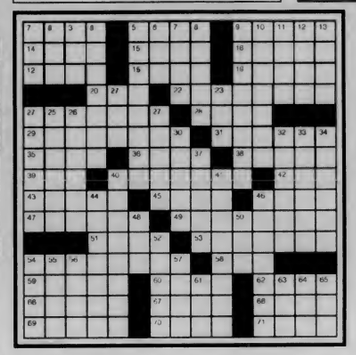
PULP By Richard Martelly

RANDOM CHATTER By Chris Sala



FUNCTIONAL DYSTOPIA By Zeid Rusan

THE FAMILY MONSTER By Josh Shalek



THE ZOO By Gabe Strine

ACROSS
1 Writer Ambler
5 Light touches
9 Smallest amount
14 Tolerate
15 PC symbol
16 Pyrmesa
17 Skeleton piece
18 Sicilian spouter
19 Brick ownis
20 Fitting
22 Pleasant quality
24 Graphite removers
26 Ken's girlfriend
29 Rip van Winkle game
31 Time amounts
35 Gear teeth
36 Dessert choice
38 Small porch
39 Had a meal
40 Pip squeaks
42 Genetic material, briefly
43 Cassba or honeydew
45 Napoleon's 1814 address
48 Like the piper of Hamelin
47 Babbles
49 Attorneys jargon
51 Shred
53 Mixes
54 Provided
58 Wager
59 Burn brightly
60 Dynamic leader?
62 Track shape
66 Speed checker
67 Moist, sticky earth
68 Excessively suave
69 Removes wrapping
70 Chart-toppers
71 Scruff
DOWN
1 Recede as the tide
2 Antique auto
3 Author Fleming
4 Folds
5 "The Blue Angel" star
6 Perform
7 Beethoven's birthplace
8 Slow moving mollusk
9 Resemblance
10 Distinguished
11 Competent
12 Catches some rays
13 Hardy heroine
21 Vigor
23 Hipster
24 Pitch one's tent
25 Possible looter
26 Actress Lansbury
27 Trap
30 Defiance
32 British Conservatives
33 Truthful
34 Black suit
37 Campfire remnant
40 Lip curlers
41 Curled-under hairstyles
44 Cushioned footstool
46 Military unit
48 Blue
50 Mimic
52 Arrive at
54 Big hardo
55 Flutter
56 Lose brightness
57 Sub seller
61 Squeal
63 By way of
64 Lofty peak
65 Potash
Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

THE HARP
NEW!! Wireless Internet
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted
Irish Pub
November Special!
$1.50 PBR Bottles; Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 A pint / $6.50 a pitcher
Tonight: • TRIVIA NIGHT!
Wed. • Cold Duck Complex
"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments

Submit your comic!
e-mail
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You will eat entirely too many peanuts today.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
You are running dangerously low on hair elastics.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Today is a good day to go bowling with your friends.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
You could make a lot of money mowing lawns.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Don't bother getting a new printer. Just use your roommates'.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Your wardrobe is lacking the color green. Fix that before March.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
A career in plumping is not in your future.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You got those wool socks just in time. Good job.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
You could definitely use more protein in your diet.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
It would be a waste of money to have business cards made for yourself.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
You really need to invest in some new sneakers.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
It's far too muddy out to play frisbee today.

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"City girls just seem to find out early, how to open doors with just a smile."
—Eagles

★ Submit your comic ★
e-mail
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Montreal Weekend
New Years Party $129
Complete cocktail age 18
781-979-9001 Call now
montrealexpress.net

APARTMENT FOR RENT

1, 2, 3 & 4 Bedroom spacious apartments, Great location, Bus Route, All utilities included No Fee Call 413-253-3000

EMPLOYMENT

GET PAID VIEWING ADS ON THE INTERNET: $6,000/mo. Potential. START TODAY!! www.ezmoney.FindHere.org

EMPLOYMENT

November 30th is the last day to apply to become a legal assistant with the Student Legal Services Office. Earn 12 credits while gaining valuable experience. Hurry! Contact us at 545-1995 or stop by at 922 Campus Center to pick up an application.

Rent us your ears! Listening experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu Voicemail: 545-6837.

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience nees. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

ROOM FOR RENT

413-335-5226 Mo. to mo. $325 inclusive 20 min to campus

SERVICES

Legal Questions? We Have Answers at the Student Legal Services Office, 922 Campus Center or Call 545-1995.

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

SERVICES

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance. 549-1906

TRAVEL

15 Day Fully guided tour of Italy leaving 7/20/06 $3,279 includes air hotels, breakfast and some dinners. If interested call Kathy at (413) 498-2490 or Carol at (413) 423-3654 Call by December 30th

ACT NOW – SPRING BREAKERS Book early & Save! Free meals/parties by 11/7. Lowest prices. Be a rep & TRAVEL FREE! Get the ultimate hookups with STA TRAVEL 413-256-1261.

TRAVEL

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

SPRING BREAK FROM $569 BAHAMAS, CANCUN, ACAPULCO, JAMAICA! FREE PARTIES, FREE DRINKS. Sign up early and save. Organize a small group and you travel FREE. Or become a CAMPUS REP and GET PAID COMMISSION on each trip sold. Call today and get started 1-800-GET-SUN-1

WANTED

Advertise in the Massachusetts Daily Collegian!

Whether you're looking to publish a full-page ad or a classified ad, we can cater to your advertising needs and budget.

Not sure what your ad should look like? Let our experienced graphic artists design it for you!

Advertising representatives are awaiting your calls M-F 8:30am - 3:30pm. (413) 545-3500

Or visit us in the Campus Center Basement.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS TUESDAY

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Minutemen coast to victory

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

There wasn't much that the Massachusetts men's basketball team (2-2) had to do heading into its match up against Savannah State (1-4) last night at the Mullins Center. The Minutemen were facing a Tiger team that had gone 0-28 last season and were 1-3 in 2005.

Although this match up appeared as somewhat of a trap for the Maroon and White, there was no shocker as UMass went on to defeat the Tigers 93-57, with six Minutemen posting point totals in the double-digits.

The Minutemen will have 10 days to prepare for the long-anticipated rematch against No. 3 Connecticut on Dec. 8 at the Hartford Civic Center.

UMass	93
Savannah State	57

Against the Tigers, junior transfer Brandon Thomas posted his second straight solid showing, and heated things up early. With less than seven minutes off the game clock, Thomas knocked down four baskets totaling nine points, including a trey at the 16:06 mark in the first half.

"[UMass coach Travis Ford] definitely stressed that there's not going to be anymore games like this on the schedule like this one," Thomas said. "We're all aware of [Savannah State's] record last year, but we still didn't want to take them lightly."

The San Antonio native fed the ball to junior Maurice Maxwell a few minutes later, who hit the three-pointer to give UMass an early 17-8 advantage with 13:59 remaining in the first half.

Ford was pleased with the performance of Thomas, as he put up 15 points, 14 of which came in the first half.

"Brandon Thomas is a very good basketball player and I like that he's put two games back-to-back. That's something we need to work on as a whole team — consistency," Ford said.

Junior Stephane Lasme, who led the nation in blocks

See BASKETBALL on page 6

KARIN WONG/COLLEGIAN

Junior forward Rashaun Freeman had a double-double last night, recording 12 points and 12 rebounds in the Minutemen's 93-57 win over Savannah State at the Mullins Center.

Life looks to shoot his way out of slump

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

For the Massachusetts men's basketball team, last night's 93-57 blowout win against Savannah State (1-4) didn't provide much to learn from, as the Tigers are far below the level of the opponents that the Minutemen typically face.

But there were still some positive signs that UMass (2-2) hopes to build on.

One of the biggest highlights for UMass was the improved production of junior guard James Life. Life struggled in the first three games of the season, averaging 5.3 points per game while shooting just 21 percent from the field.

Last night Life led all scorers with 18 points, and finally began to show some of the shooting touch that was expected from the junior college transfer who averaged 25.4 points per game last year at Manatee Community College.

Although Life only connected on 5-of-14 shots from the floor, the 14 attempts were the most he has attempted in a game all season, and signal that he is starting to regain some confidence in his stroke.

"Right now [my confidence level is] probably about 10 percent," Life said. "I've been struggling quite a bit. It's an ongoing process for me, and I just have to try to find a way to get out of this slump."

Life, who UMass coach Travis Ford says works harder on his jump shot than any other player on the team, hopes that last night's game will serve as a step in the right direction as he looks to provide the outside threat that the Minutemen desperately need.

"I think it was a good opportunity to come out and score points," Life said. "I think this was a good step for me. I'm going to have to learn to be more consistent with everything I do."

Ford recruited Life to score points, and he knew that last night would be a good opportunity for him to get extended playing time and try to regain some of his confidence.

"I pulled James Life aside and told him, 'You're going to play a lot of minutes tonight. It could be close or we could be way up, but you're going to play.' I had to stick him in there and let him play through it," Ford said.

Ford feels that Life's shooting ability brings an important dynamic to the team, and hopes that last night's performance will help Life turn the corner.

"We need him to get going," Ford said. "For our basketball team to succeed we have to have him making shots from the perimeter to open things up inside."

UM looks to end losing skid

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team will continue its three-game home-stand when it tip-offs against Siena (1-2) tonight at 7 p.m. at the Mullins Center.

The Minutewomen (1-3) are currently on a two-game losing streak, and are coming off of a 68-52 loss to Hartford on Saturday afternoon.

The Minutewomen will look to get back on track tonight as they face a Siena team that has been struggling as well. The Saints are coming off of a 54-48 loss to Bucknell on Saturday, and are led by senior forward Whitney Cave. Cave is coming off of her second consecutive double-double and leads the team in rebounds with 8.3 per game.

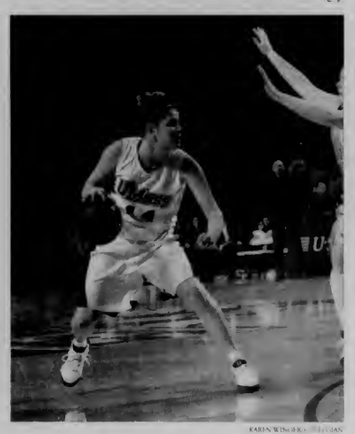
The Maroon and White do not want to fall into a deep hole early in the season, so coach Marnie Dacko knows how important tonight's game will be.

"It's huge for us," Dacko said. "Right now the team is questioning their focus. Giving up 24 points in a six-minute period [against Hartford] is unacceptable. So we had a great practice yesterday, and I want to bring emotion back into the picture."

Emotion is something that Dacko stressed at practice yesterday, and while the loss to Hartford was a tough one to stomach, the Minutewomen know that they have to move forward and look ahead to prepare for tonight's game against a Siena team that is also hungry for a win.

"We have got to set the tempo," Dacko said. "We want to run. We have to look at ourselves and play with much more emotion. We have to come out and play with an edge and with a purpose, and that is what we are trying to re-focus on."

The Minutewomen will have to be on the lookout for last year's MAAC Rookie of the Year, sophomore Laura Menty. Menty has continued where she left off in 2004-05, averaging 12.0 points per game and 5.3 rebounds per game for the Saints.



UMass has struggled early on in its 2005-06 campaign, but there have been many positive signs. Sophomore Pam Rosanio is 10th in the Atlantic 10 in scoring with 14.3 points per game. Rosanio has been looked upon to be a major player this year, and her 34.5 minutes per game prove that to be true.

Also making some noise for the Maroon and White is junior forward Tamara Tatham. Tatham is the team's rebounding leader with 34 total rebounds. She is fifth in the A-10 in rebounds with 8.5 per game, and is third on the team in scoring with 7.8 points per game.

Sophomore Kate Mills has established herself as one of the best shot-blockers in the conference, as she leads the A-10 in blocked shots with 2.75 per game. Mills leads the Minutewomen with 11 blocked shots, and is second on the team in scoring with 9.3 points per game.

The Minutewomen need a win tonight with the home crowd behind them, and the key to the game will undoubtedly be rebounding.

"We need to rebound for 40 minutes," Dacko said. "We didn't get any transition baskets against Hartford because we didn't get the run game going. That is what we have to look to do to get transition baskets and create an up-tempo style of basketball."

KARIN WONG/COLLEGIAN

Sophomore Pam Rosanio and the Minutewomen will host Sienna tonight at 7 p.m. at the Mullins Center. UMass is 1-3 this season.

Detroit cuts ties with Mariucci

By Larry Lage
Associated Press

ALLEN PARK, Mich. — The Detroit Lions fired coach Steve Mariucci on Monday and promoted defensive coordinator Dick Jauron to succeed him on an interim basis.

Mariucci's record with the Lions was 15-28. His 2003 hiring was hailed by fans and media alike, but he was not able to turn around a team that has won one playoff game since 1957.

"It's hard for me to stand up here in this position because Steve is a friend," said Jauron, who had a 35-46 record as head coach of the Bears from 1999-2003.

After Detroit lost 27-7 to the Atlanta Falcons on Thanksgiving to fall to 4-7, reports swirled that the team was considering firing Mariucci. When Mariucci was not let go over the weekend, some thought his job was safe for the final five games of the regular season.

"We started off this season with high expectations. I believed this was a roster that was capable of making a playoff run," team president Matt Millen said at an afternoon news conference. "We have not lived up to our expectations. We have underachieved as a football team."

Millen, who said the decision to fire Mariucci was made Monday, also fired offensive line coach Pat Morris and tight ends coach Andy Sugarman.

The Lions have lost four of five games since a solid start put them atop the NFC North with the Chicago Bears. The team has collapsed on and off the field with players failing to produce and some bickering with one another and questioning the coaches' game plans.

Offensive tackle Jeff Backus said players had not been notified of the move.

"Something had to give, I guess," Backus told The Associated Press. "It's not my job to judge whether Mariucci did a good job or bad job, but we're in a bottom-line business and our bottom line hasn't been very good."

Mariucci has more than two years remaining on the $25 million contract he signed in 2003. The Michigan native came to the Lions from San Francisco, where he was 60-43 over six seasons.

Mariucci was cut some slack in the past because the team he inherited was crafted by Millen, but expectations were high heading into his third season.

"I think we need to [make the playoffs]. We want to, and we're going to make it happen," Mariucci said before the season. "If we win 10 or 11 ballgames and make the playoffs, it

See MARIUCCI on page 6

BRIAN HORGAN/FREELANCE/THE DETROIT FREE PRESS

Steve Mariucci was fired as coach of the Detroit Lions yesterday. Mariucci's record in three seasons with the Lions was 15-28.

Irvin arrested on drug charges

By Barry Horn
Knight Ridder

DALLAS — On Tuesday, former Dallas Cowboys wide receiver Michael Irvin was named a Pro Football Hall of Fame semifinalist. On Thursday, he celebrated Thanksgiving with his family. On Friday, he was arrested in Plano on a misdemeanor charge of possession of drug paraphernalia.

On Sunday, after spending his morning talking football on national television, he was left to explain his off-field actions yet one more time.

"It's a situation that is not as it seemed," Irvin told The Associated Press in a phone interview Sunday night.

The "situation," Plano police said, was Irvin's arrest after he was stopped on suspicion of speeding in the northbound lanes of the Dallas North Tollway about 3:30 p.m. CST Friday.

A computer warrant check revealed that Irvin, 39, had an outstanding warrant for speeding in Irving. A search of Irvin's car just south of the Spring Creek exit turned up a drug pipe, police said. Irvin was arrested and booked into Plano city jail. The charge is a Class C misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of up to $500. He was also given a citation for speeding.

Irvin paid the fine for the outstanding warrant as well as the bond on the drug charge and was released about 4:45 p.m., police said. His bond amount was not available Sunday.

Before news of the arrest began to spread Sunday afternoon, Irvin spent his morning at the ESPN studios in Bristol, Conn., where he is a member of the NFL pregame studio show.

See IRVIN on page 6

USC and Texas remain on top

By Ralph D. Russo
Associated Press

NEW YORK – Only twice in Bowl Championship Series history has a team been in position to reach the title game heading into the final weekend of the regular season and played its way out.

Southern California and Texas will try to avoid tripping up at the finish line Saturday, the way UCLA did in 1998 and Tennessee did in 2001.

As they have been all season, the Trojans and Longhorns were atop the BCS standings Monday. USC is first for the fifth time in six weeks. Texas, which was on top for one week, is second again.

The final BCS standings are released Sunday and the top two teams will play in the Rose Bowl for a national title. USC and Texas are the only unbeaten teams left in Division I-A, but each faces one more test.

USC (11-0) plays rival UCLA (9-1) at the Coliseum on Saturday. Texas (11-0) will meet Colorado (7-4) in the Big 12 title game at Reliant Stadium in Houston. Both the Longhorns and Trojans are favored by at least three touchdowns, so only a major upset will prevent them for meeting in Pasadena, Calif., on Jan. 4.

Penn State is third, ahead of LSU and Virginia Tech, as the entire top 10 was unchanged from last week. It's just the second time in the eight years of the BCS that has happened.

Since the BCS was implemented, nine teams have played games on the final weekend of the season ranked either first or second in the standings. Those teams are 6-3, and none that were No. 1 failed to reach the championship game.

UCLA was second and undefeated in 1998 when it lost 49-45 at Miami in a game rescheduled because of Hurricane Georges earlier in the season. The Bruins missed out on a shot to play Tennessee, which beat Mississippi State in the Southeastern Conference title game later that same day, for a national title.

UCLA's loss, and a loss that same day by unbeaten Kansas State, allowed Florida State to reach the title game against Tennessee. The Volunteers won the Fiesta Bowl and the national championship.

In 2001, Tennessee was second in the BCS standings heading into the SEC title game against LSU. A win would have sent the Volunteers to the Rose Bowl to play Miami for the national title, but they were upset 31-20. Nebraska, which didn't even make the Big 12 title game, ended up playing — and losing to — the Hurricanes.

Oklahoma was No. 1 in the BCS standings when it lost to Kansas State 35-7 in the Big 12 title game in 2003, but the Sooners still reached the Sugar Bowl to play LSU for the national title. LSU beat Oklahoma to win the BCS title and USC beat Michigan in the Rose Bowl to win the AP national championship.

Ohio State, Oregon, Notre Dame, Miami and Auburn round out this week's BCS top 10.

New England's Largest College Daily · Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Wednesday, November 30, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXVI Issue 56

Federal work study programs lose funding

By Laura Hoesman
The BG News (Bowling Green State U.)

BOWLING GREEN, Ohio—When Freshman Jessica Williams arrived on the Bowling Green campus this fall, she thought finding a Federal Work Study job would be relatively easy.

She didn't count on the effects a 20 percent decrease in Federal Work Study funding has had on numerous campus employers.

Many campus offices that hire FWS students have had to cut hours, pay rates and jobs as a result of the FWS decrease, which started in 2003, according to Craig Cornell, director of Student Financial Aid.

The University's FWS allocation was over $1 million in the 2002-03 year, declining to about $900,000 in 2003-04. After another significant decrease to $840,000 in 2004-05, the University's FWS allocation has leveled off at $819,000 this year, Cornell said.

He added that the University's FWS decrease is consistent with FWS decreases at universities nationwide.

With the decline of FWS allocations, campus employers have been forced to pay a higher percentage of students' checks with non-FWS money, leading some offices to hire fewer students.

The shrinking pool of FWS money has made job hunting difficult for some University students. Williams said she has applied for jobs "almost everywhere," including various residence halls and offices.

"I've looked all over, and I've gone home on the weekends to work," Williams said. Much of her paycheck, she added, has been siphoned into expensive gas payments.

"I have to pay for college myself and I feel like I have no backbone because I have no income right now," she said.

Williams had to withdraw from her sorority Monday because she couldn't pay the mandatory fees.

The University offers FWS eligibility to more students than it can afford to pay, according to Cornell. He said this

See FUNDING on page 2

Judge rules Bulger entitled to higher pension

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

Former University of Massachusetts president William Bulger won a huge victory in court Monday when a Superior Court judge ruled that his pension must be increased to over $200,000 a year.

Judge Ernest B. Murphy ruled that Bulger must receive a housing allowance and a portion of an annuity in his pension. The housing allowance and annuity had been discounted as perks during Bulger's reign as president of the UMass system.

Murphy's ruling will add roughly $45,000 in annuity payments and a $29,000-a-year housing stipend. Bulger's pension will rise from $179,000 to $208,000 per year.

Bulger's lawyer, Thomas Kiley praised the decision saying to the Boston Globe, his client "has served in positions of great importance to the citizens of the Commonwealth."

The judge's decision has come under fire by several public and private leaders, including Massachusetts Attorney General Tom Reilly.

"I don't believe he's entitled to anything he requested… This sets a precedent that could be very expensive for this state, and we're prepared to appeal this decision," Reilly said in a statement.

UMass originally resisted paying Bulger the additional money in his pension because officials considered the housing and annuity payments as perks.

"He's become a predator on our paychecks, that's the way I can describe Billy Bulger," said Chip Faulkner, associate director of the Massachusetts Citizens of Limited Taxation.

A recent review published in the Boston Herald on Nov. 6 shows several retired state employees making six-figures on their pension plans. The article said that out of all 57 state retirees making six figures, 31 of them are former employees of the UMass system.

"The top 10 highest paid retirees draw between $130,000 and $230,000 a year," the Herald article stated.

"The pension should be based on salary, on pay, and not on perks," Reilly said. "Enough is enough, but unfortunately in this case, enough is never enough."

"I understand how most people think that's an excessive pension, but that's the way it goes," said UMass journalism professor Stephen Simurda. "Bulger is getting a very large pension, but he spent a very long time in service to the state and legislature and here at UMass. And the percentage is based on his earnings over that time and he made a fair amount of money."

Former UMass president William Bulger was awarded a $200,000 increase in his yearly pension, Monday. Massachusetts Attorney General Tom Reilly has filed an appeal of the judges ruling.

"The old argument used to be that with public employees, they earn a relatively low salary, but good benefits," said Faulkner. "What it's turned into now is huge salaries and huge benefits. That's why government costs so much in Massachusetts… That's why we have one of the highest income tax rates in the country."

While Reilly, a Democratic gubernatorial candidate in 2006 also blasted the judge's decision, his potential political rival, Republican Gov. Mitt Romney agreed with his opinion.

Romney called the new additions to Bulger's pension "excessive."

Bush says withdrawing troops would be a 'mistake'

By Robert Burns
Associated Press

WASHINGTON—President Bush said Tuesday that "it would be a terrible mistake" to pull U.S. forces out of Iraq and that politics should not play any part in a decision about withdrawal.

"We will make decisions about troops levels based upon the capability of the Iraqis to take the fight to the enemy," Bush said in El Paso, Texas. "I will make decisions on the level of troops based upon the recommendations of commanders on the ground."

The argument against withdrawal was echoed in Washington by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who said quitting the war would allow insurgents to prevail and put the United States "at still greater risk."

"Quitting is not an exit strategy," Rumsfeld said at a Pentagon news conference.

Rumsfeld made clear that the time has arrived to wean the Iraqis of their dependence on American support for security.

"They have to do it for themselves," Rumsfeld said. "There isn't an Iraqi that comes into this country and visits with me that doesn't say that. They know that. They know that they're the ones that are going to have to grab that country. And it's time."

Bush and Rumsfeld spoke in advance of a speech by the president on Wednesday at the U.S. Naval Academy at Annapolis, Md. The remarks are expected to outline the administration's strategy for giving Iraqi forces increasing responsibility for the security of their country.

The war in Iraq and the mounting number of American casualties have contributed to a steep drop in Bush's popularity. His approval rating is at the lowest level of his presidency.

Talking with reporters in El Paso, Texas, Bush said he would make decisions about troop levels based on the advice of military commanders.

"If they tell me the Iraqis are ready to take more and more responsibility and that we'll be able to bring some Americans home, I will do that," the president said. "It's their recommendation."

"Secondly, we want to win," Bush said. "The whole objective is to achieve victory against the terrorists."

"I'm interested in winning. I want to defeat the terrorists. And I want our troops to come home," the president said. "But I don't want them to come how without having achieved victory. We've got a strategy for victory."

"People don't want me making decisions based on politics," the president said. "They want me making decisions based on the recommendations of our generals on the ground. And that's exactly who I'll be listening to."

"Now I know there's a lot of voices in Washington," Bush added. "We've heard some people say pull them out right now. That's a huge mistake. It'd be a terrible mistake. It sends a bad message to our troops. And it

See BUSH on page 2

President Bush, speaking in advance of Wednesday's speech at the U.S. Naval Academy in Annapolis, Md., said it would be a 'terrible mistake' to pull troops out of Iraq at the present time.

Roads still closed as snowstorm slams the Plains

By James MacPherson
Associated Press

BISMARCK, N.D.—Crews on Tuesday gradually reopened major highways that had been closed by the Plains' first blizzard of the season, stranding post-Thanksgiving travelers. Thousands of people remained without electricity.

Five deaths were blamed on slippery roads in Minnesota, South Dakota, Nebraska and Kansas. A sixth person was killed by a tornado spun off by the huge storm system in Arkansas.

Remnants of the system headed over the upper Great Lakes on Tuesday after the storm dumped snow as far south as the Texas Panhandle. As much as 20 inches of snow fell at Kennebec, S.D., while Chamberlain, S.D., was choked by drifts up to 8 feet high.

Utility officials estimated that 50,000 customers were blacked out across eastern South Dakota on Tuesday, and many communities in North Dakota had no electricity. Nebraska also had scattered outages. The morning's low at Grand Forks, N.D., was 14 degrees.

South Dakota Gov. Mike Rounds said Tuesday that electricity might not be restored to some areas for a few days as roads blocked by drifted snow kept utility crews to finding all the damaged lines. Power companies in North Dakota said it could take days to restore power.

It was the worst storm to hit eastern and central South Dakota in nearly a decade, Rounds said.

Firefighters in Fairmount, N.D., offered the town's roughly 400 residents rides to the community center, which has a backup generator, but the blackout also shut down the town's pumps.

"We still have water but it's getting pretty low here," Fairmount Fire Chief Dave Jacobson said.

See BLIZZARD on page 2

COURTESY OF MIKE MITCHELL

The UMass Chapter of the American Society of Civil Engineers held their first Balsa Wood Bridge Building Competition' last Tuesday in Marston Hall. Eight teams designed and built bridges using five 36-inch pieces of 1/4' balsa wood. The winners built a bridge that, while only weighing 1.4 ounces, withstood over 100 pounds of weight.

Romney heads to California

By Glen Johnson
Associated Press

BOSTON — Gov. Mitt Romney, nearing a decision on his political future, jets to California Tuesday to assume a party position that could give him a running start into the 2008 presidential campaign.

If plans hold, Romney will assume the chairmanship of the Republican Governors Association on Thursday, following a round of leadership voting at the group's annual meeting in La Costa Resort and Spa in Carlsbad, Calif. The governor is already the group's vice chairman.

The new title would go on a resume that has been growing through the fall legislative session, as Romney made a high-profile push for a tougher drunken driving law in Massachusetts, signed a bill providing energy assistance to low-income residents and campaigned for a plan to bring universal health care coverage to Massachusetts residents.

The Statehouse is already rife with speculation that Romney has delayed an announcement about his political intentions until he locks down the RGA chairmanship, a bully pulpit from which to opine from coast to coast heading into the 2006 midterm elections.

He would serve as chairman for the next year, coinciding with the final year of his four-year term as governor.

Romney has pledged to announce whether he will seek re-election in 2006 — a decision that must precede any conclusion on a presidential candidacy — by Dec. 21, the end of fall. His staff discounted any speculation his timetable was affected by the RGA elections.

"The governor has said all along that he'll make his decision sometime in the fall, and that's from September to the end of December," Romney spokeswoman Julie Teer said Monday.

ARTS & LIVING

REDEFINING THE THRILLER
"Paradise Now," a film about two young suicide bombers, is an untraditional thriller film.
Page 6

EDITORIAL/OPINION

UMASS IS STILL SAFE
With new security precautions, UMass is safer than ever.
Page 4

WEATHER

TODAY Showers, H58°
TONIGHT Partly Cloudy, L31°
TOMORROW Partly Cloudy, H47°, L29°

SPORTS

SIENA TOPPLED
UMass women's basketball beats down Siena at the Mullins Center.
Page 10

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Michael A. Busack
MANAGING EDITOR Cameron J. Woods
BUSINESS MANAGER Hirak Shah
PRODUCTION MANAGER Nicholas Belanger
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Sherri Wolnik
ADVERTISING MANAGER Kerry O'Grady
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Lauren Egovian
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Amanda Allen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Matthew O'Rourke
COPY EDITOR Amanda Allen
EDITORIAL EDITOR Allison Edles
NEWS EDITOR Dan O'Brien
PHOTO EDITOR Kate Sachsenmaier
SPORTS EDITOR Jeff Howe
CIRCULATION MANAGER Thomas Hecht
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Nick Gleason
FINANCE MANAGER Daniel Conti
HUMAN RESOURCE Phil Smoller
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Caren Tortorici
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Nathan Chomsky
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Mackenzie Isler
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Ian Jones
ASSISTANT NEWS Megan Daley
ASSISTANT NEWS Matt Bellveau
ASSISTANT PHOTO Elizabeth Caristi
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eric Ashe
ASSISTANT SPORTS Dan Duggan
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Kristen LaCasse

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Michael A. Busack
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Kate Sachsenmaier
COPY EDITOR
Dan O'Brien
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Amanda Allen
PRODUCTION STAFF
Allie Mamone

Thousands remain without shelter, electricity, after blizzard

BLIZZARD from page 1

Utility crews were out early Tuesday working to restore electricity in northwestern Minnesota. "Bless 'em, they're just the cavalry," said Chris Kling, a spokeswoman for Otter Tail Power Co.

At Hankinson, N.D., people took refuge at the Dakota Magic Casino, which also has its own generator, said customer service representative Cheri Braun. "Our hotel can't hold any more," she said.

Interstate 94 was closed overnight for about 100 miles across eastern North Dakota from Fargo to Jamestown, but the Highway Patrol reopened it Tuesday morning. I-29 also was reopened from Fargo south to the South Dakota line, and South Dakota authorities said their section would reopen by midday.

South Dakota officials said traffic also would be restored on I-90, which had been closed for nearly 200 miles across the state. In Nebraska, I-80 was reopened along a 200-mile stretch, the state road department said.

At least 600 travelers were still stranded Tuesday at community shelters in central Nebraska's Dawson County, said emergency manager Brian Woldt.

"At times they get grouchy. They're wanting to get down the road, but for the most part they're doing fine," Woldt said.

Colorado and Kansas had reopened more than 400 miles of eastbound I-70 between Denver and Salina, Kan., after two days.

The storm also disrupted mail delivery in the region Monday, and some post offices were still without power Tuesday. Clem Felchle, the postal service's district manager in Sioux Falls, S.D., said carriers were back at work Tuesday but they may have trouble reaching outlying areas.

Almost 1,000 people spent Sunday night in shelters along I-70 in Kansas, including more than 200 on cots and exercise mats at Fort Hays State University in Hays, officials said.

Among those at Fort Hays State were Mike and Ilona Dorsey, returning to Denver after visiting relatives in Topeka.

"We stopped at every town from Colby to here and couldn't get a hotel," Dorsey told The Hays Daily News. "Everything was filled."

AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE/GETTY IMAGES

A motorist drives along Highway 281 in near whiteout conditions near Aberdeen, South Dakota. At least 600 travelers were still stranded Tuesday at community shelters in central Nebraska's Dawson County.

Work study program in financial struggle is because the University knows many eligible students do not look for FWS jobs.

FUNDING from page 1

Although Williams qualifies for Federal Work Study money, she said she would be willing to take any job on campus, regardless of its ties with FWS.

Campus employers that have stable sources of income, such as the University Bookstore and Dining Services, have little need for FWS, according to Michelle Simmons, senior associate director at the Career Center.

But some employers, including many academic and administrative offices, cannot afford to hire enough students without the help of FWS.

The School of Art, which employs about 30 students, at least half of which use FWS, has begun to list some jobs as unpaid internships and volunteer positions. In addition, paid students' hours have been cut due to diminished funding.

"Come spring when the Work Study money runs out, we have to cut back on hours," said Jane Steinert, accounting clerk in the School of Art. "So if they [students] need equipment, or if they're researching something and want to use the resource center, hours are limited."

The America Reads program, a part of Outreach Literacy Programs that relies solely on FWS to pay nearly 85 student employees, has had to hire fewer students and decrease paychecks as a result of dwindling FWS funding.

Martha Sears, coordinator of OLP, said she has had to readjust her thinking about pay as a result of the FWS decrease. "Students originally started at a base rate and got a large increase the next year," she said. But when the program had to end one month early in spring 2004 because FWS funds ran out, Sears made the decision to lower second-year America Reads employees' hourly pay from $8 to $6.25.

Still, Sears said the program lacks enough money to pay students for every time slot available in a semester.

"If we filled every time slot and paid every student base pay [$6 per hour] ... there is not enough money to continue the program," she said, adding that students do not typically fill every time slot.

In the Department of Biological Sciences, the FWS decrease has had a somewhat less serious impact on employment.

"In order not to hurt the students, we've tried to hire almost as many students, but we give them less hours," said administrative assistant Deb McLean.

Employing 175 students, half of which are FWS employees, Jerome Library is also striving to minimize the effects of the FWS decline.

"The rate of pay for our students has not changed," said Mariann Reiter, director of budgets for University Libraries.

"If there is a period of time where our Work Study funds have run out, the Library's operating budget kicks in and picks up the difference."

In rare cases, according to Library Dean Lorraine Haricombe, students have had their hours cut due to the FWS allocation, but no students have lost their jobs due to the decrease in FWS funding.

However, overall decreases in government funding have led the Library to hire fewer students over the past few years, Haricombe added.

USG Senator-at-Large TaKasha Smith, a junior, brought the FWS situation to the attention of the USG at its meeting two weeks ago. Last week, USG President Aaron Shumaker attended an Inter-University Council meeting to draft a letter concerning the decrease in higher education funding. The letter, which the student presidents of 13 Ohio universities plan to send to several state legislators, mentions decreased FWS funds.

"I hope we all rally around this point and put together a collaborative effort from all the universities to support federal funding," Shumaker said.

Any help students can receive in finding jobs is welcome, according to Freshman Danielle Stewart, who has been searching for FWS work for much of the semester.

"They need to open more jobs," Stewart said. "It's not fair to people who are trying to get Work Study."

Aware of students' collective plight, the University asks for more funding each year according to Cornell, who said the University usually requests $2 million in FWS.

"Every year we request more [FWS funding] than we ever get," he said, adding, "We spend every penny every year."

Insurgent video shows peace activists taken hostage in Iraq

By Robert H. Reid
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq—Al-Jazeera broadcast an insurgent video Tuesday showing four peace activists taken hostage in Iraq, with a previously unknown group claiming responsibility for the kidnappings.

The Swords of Righteousness Brigade said the four were spies working undercover as Christian peace activists, Al-Jazeera said. The station said it could not verify any of the information on the tape.

The aid group Christian Peacemaker Teams has confirmed that four of its members were taken hostage Saturday.

German TV broadcast photos Tuesday showing a blindfolded German woman being led away by armed captors in Iraq. Six Iranian pilgrims, meanwhile, were abducted by gunmen north of Baghdad.

The pictures of Susanne Osthoff were taken from a video in which her captors demanded that Germany stop any dealings with Iraq's government, according to Germany's ARD television. Germany has ruled out sending troops to Iraq and opposed the U.S.-led war.

Two U.S. soldiers assigned to Task Force Baghdad were killed when their patrol was hit by a roadside bomb north of the capital, the U.S. command said. At least 2,109 members of the U.S. military have died since the war began in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

A suicide car bomber killed eight Iraqi soldiers and wounded five more when he drove into an army patrol Tuesday in Tarmiyah, 30 miles north of Baghdad, police Lt. Ali Hussein said. A U.S. Army medical helicopter helped evacuate the wounded, he added.

President Bush told reporters in El Paso, Texas, he would make decisions about U.S. troop levels in Iraq based on the advice of his military commanders.

"If they tell me the Iraqis are ready to take more and more responsibility and that we'll be able to bring some Americans home, I will do that," the president said. "It's their recommendation."

Lt. Gen. Martin Dempsey, who manages the training of Iraqi security forces, told National Public Radio on Tuesday that 212,000 people in the police and army are trained and equipped, although he suggested that more needed to be done.

"Now you know they lack some capabilities that we still have to provide them and will continue to have to provide them for a period of time," Dempsey said. "They're short officers because we brought in some senior officers, and we grew some junior leaders but not enough. They require about 8,000 junior leaders and they're hovering just now about 4,500 or so."

"We're focused very carefully now on logistics, communications and the generation of an officer corps," he said.

Iraq was rocked by a wave of foreigner kidnappings and beheadings in 2004 and early 2005, but they have dropped off in recent months as many Western groups have left and security precautions for those who remain have tightened. Insurgents, including al-Qaida in Iraq, seized more than 225 people, killing at least 38.

The video on Al-Jazeera showed four men and a British passport belonging to Norman Kember. The British government and the Christian Peacemaker Teams have both said Kember, a 74-year-old Briton, was among the four activists taken hostage.

Christian Peacemaker Teams said it would not identify the other three for their protection.

A white-haired man shown in the passport photograph also was seen sitting on the floor next to three other men in the video, which had a date stamp indicating it was recorded Sunday.

The corner of the video showed two crossed black swords and the name of the insurgent group written in red Arabic script.

Christian Peacemaker Teams issued a statement saying the four were working on behalf of Iraqi civilians. The group said it has had a team in Iraq since October 2002, working with U.S. and Iraqi detainees and training others in nonviolent intervention and human rights documentation.

Kember and another person were part of a visiting delegation, while two members of the group's Iraq-based staff also were taken, the statement said.

Kember, a retired professor, is a longtime peace activist who once fretted publicly that he was taking the easy way out by protesting in safety at home while British soldiers risked their lives in Iraq.

The U.S. Embassy has confirmed that an American is missing in Iraq. A Canadian official has said two Canadians were in the group.

"The team's work has focused on documenting and focusing public attention on detainee abuses, connecting citizens of Iraq to local and international human rights organizations, and accompanying Iraqi civilians as they interact with multinational military personnel and Iraq's government officials," the group said.

The statement said those taken hostage knew the risks when they went to Iraq.

The organization said it "does not advocate the use of violent force to save our lives should we be kidnapped, held hostage, or caught in the middle of a conflict situation."

In Barcelona, Spain, British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said he had contacted Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari about Kember's abduction, and that Zebari "pledged every assistance from the Iraqi government."

Osthoff and her driver have been missing since Friday and, "according to current information, we have to assume it is a kidnapping," German Chancellor Angela Merkel said in Berlin.

She added that the Foreign Ministry has set up a crisis team to help secure the pair's release.

"The German government will do everything in its power to bring both back to safety," Merkel said.

Osthoff, 43, is a fluent Arab speaker and a trained archaeologist who has worked since 1998 for the Munich-based management consulting firm FaktorM, which said on its Web site that she has "organized and supported the distribution of aid goods in Iraq since 1991." She was in Iraq working to help German organizations distribute medicine and medical supplies.

"One can only hope and keep their fingers crossed and remain optimistic," her mother, Ingrid Hala, told Germany N24 news station.

Hala said she had not heard from her daughter for about five years, and her uncle, Peter Osthoff, said his niece had broken almost all ties with her family, including a daughter who will be 12 in December.

Germany's Central Council of Muslims called for Osthoff's immediate release.

The Iranian pilgrims were abducted Tuesday near Balad, 50 miles north of Baghdad, police Maj. Falah Mohammedawi said, but it was not clear if the six were going to or coming from Samarra, a central city that houses a shrine to two Shiite saints.

Experts suggest ways to avoid flu

By Kayleigh Karutis & Ryan McLaughlin
The Daily Free Press (Boston U.)

BOSTON—Wrapped in multiple scarves and somewhat resembling plump marshmallows, students quickly scamper across a brutally cold, snow-covered campus. This is a scene returning Boston University students can easily envision. That cold is swiftly approaching again and the official beginning of winter is less than a month away.

During the colder months in Boston, ask most people on the street and they'll tell you there aren't many places with winter weather quite as bitter or unpleasant as Boston's. And with the telltale sniffles of another flu season beginning its chorus in lectures across campus, it is important to be well informed about how to stave off winter-related sicknesses and, of course, how to get rid of them if you happen to fall ill.

APPROPRIATE APPAREL

One of the most important things to consider when gearing up for the cold winter weather is clothing choices, said Denise Buckley, director of nursing at Student Health Services. She said layering is essential to keeping warm and dry and, in turn, healthy.

"Layered clothing is best and wear water resistant if you're outside in the rain or snow," she said.

Dave Benedum, an assistant manager at Eastern Mountain Sports, agreed with Buckley, saying dressing in layers is important but also suggested using concealable long underwear.

"In the city, really there's not much else that you need to know then just wearing long underwear," he said. "But generally, layers are one of the key points. The more layers you wear, the warmer you'll be. It also allows you to remove outer layers if you get too hot.

"Something that would be waterproof and breathable, like a Gore-tex shell, would certainly help protect against the elements-wind in particular," he said.

People lose a lot of heat through their head, Benedum said. He suggested students wear something to cover their heads.

"Wear a hat," he said. "A wind-proof fleece is always going to be nice because it keeps wind off as well as keeping you insulated."

Appropriate footwear is also something students should consider, Buckley said, adding that "water resistant or waterproof footwear" is a definite must for Boston winters. Benedum said choosing footwear based upon popular styles will not keep students warm. He suggested wearing warm socks for added comfort.

"With students in particular the UGGs are always popular," he said. "But really with footwear, any type of shoe will suffice as long as you have warm socks. Nonetheless, [UGGs] wouldn't have been my first choice."

Layering clothing and having waterproof shoes is an overall good decision in New England weather, but there are still lots of students walking down Commonwealth Avenue with flip-flops on, said Raphael Arar, a freshman in the School of Management.

"The whole flip-flop thing [is] not too smart when it's 40 [degrees] and below," he said.

Despite the rare sandal-wearing student, Arar said, "I think that students dress accordingly ... to both weather and style."

He added that his personal style takes a back seat when it's cold out and that being comfortable and warm is more important to him than looking stylish.

College of Arts and Sciences junior Kristin Martowe echoed Arar's opinions and said comfort and warmth are the most important things she considers when getting dressed for the cold weather. As for her fellow students, she said that they dress "generally more towards the weather, since the weather's so severe."

As for wearing flip-flops during the winter?

"I'd say [people that wear flip flops] are probably not from a cold weather climate," Martowe said

COMBAT CATCHING A COLD

The winter months seem to usher in a slew of illnesses the second the temperatures start to drop. But it is not the cold weather that directly causes sickness, Buckley said.

"Illnesses are not due to getting cold or wet ... [they're] caused by viruses and bacteria," she said.

The immune system acts as a person's defense shield against germs and illnesses. When someone doesn't protect themselves by dressing appropriately during the winter months it can leave his or her immune system weak and therefore less able to fight off the flu or a similar illness, Buckley said.

"Your immune system fights bacterial and viral illnesses," according to the Student Health Services Web site. "Therefore it is important to avoid behaviors that lower immune system efficiency such as: lack of sleep, stress, poor diet and alcohol."

Buckley echoed several of the Web site's assertions.

"Students need to keep healthy by not getting overly tired, eating properly and setting reasonable study schedules and sticking to that plan," he said.

By following these easy guidelines, Buckley said students can keep their immune systems strong and capable of fighting off illness.

Even being extra vigilant about sleep schedules and weather-related attire is sometimes not enough to prevent an illness. Buckley said students will often go to class even though they are still sick so they don't miss any important information. This puts the people near them at a higher risk of catching their illness.

"When [a student] sees that another student is ill, [they should] avoid close contact with that student," Buckley recommended.

"Students should keep in their backpack some antiseptic gel and use it frequently, especially during the winter months."

The gel can especially help keep students healthy because many of the illnesses circulating through the university population are "upper respiratory infections and flu or other viral infections," she added.

Sometimes even the most wary student succumbs to the myriad illnesses floating around during the winter months. For such a case, the Student Health Services website offers some tips to help battle an illness.

Gargling with saline every 2 to 3 hours can ease the pains of a sore throat while nose drops and steam inhalation will help clear up nasal and sinus congestion, according to the Web site. Staying hydrated is especially important and the Web site suggested that students drink 6 to 8 glasses of water or juice a day.

Center for Student Development
UMassAmherst
UP TO THE MINUTE

THURSDAY, December 1
Women's Ice Hockey vs. Lindenwood
Mullins Center, 9pm
Free to UMass Amherst Students
$5 adults, $3 children

FRIDAY, December 2
Women's Ice Hockey vs. Lindenwood
Mullins Center, 6pm
Free to UMass Amherst students
$5 adults, $3 children

Something Every Friday
Stealth
With Jamie Foxx
Student Union, Cape Cod Lounge, 9pm FREE

SUNDAY, December 4
String Quartets of UMass Amherst
Graduate and undergraduate musicians perform chamber works from the classical era
Benzanson Recital Hall, 7:30pm FREE

Sunday Night Movie
Stealth
With Jamie Foxx
Student Union, Cape Cod Lounge, 8pm FREE

TUESDAY, December 6
Men's Hockey vs. Merrimack
Mullins Center, 7pm
Free for UMass Amherst Undergraduates
Reserved $12, General Public $8

Student businesses are open! Located in the Student Union: the Bike Coop, Campus Design & Copy (CDC), Earthfoods Cafe, People's Market, Tix Unlimited. Located in the residence halls: Greenough Sub Shop, Sweets 'N More (Field), & Sylvan Snack Bar (McNamara).

Brought to you by Student Affairs and Campus Life
UMass Amherst Calendar of Events: www.umass.edu/umhome.events

WRITE FOR NEWS!
Stop by the Collegian newsroom or e-mail us at:
news@dailycollegian.com

Rumsfeld on War: The strategy is working sends a bad message to our enemy. And it sends a bad message to the Iraqis."

BUSH from page 1

Rumsfeld said the president would outline in detail his plans for helping the Iraqis take control of their own country.

"The strategy is working, and we should stick to it," Rumsfeld said.

The U.S. strategy has been built on an expectation that training a competent Iraqi security force and facilitating the election of a democratic government would stabilize the country and allow a gradual U.S. military exit, possibly starting in 2006.

Rumsfeld ticked off several indicators of progress on the military front, including the fact that U.S. forces have turned over control of about 29 military bases to the Iraqis, Baghdad's once-violent Haifa Street is now more peaceful and under the control of an Iraqi army battalion, the Iraqi army has seven division and 31 brigade headquarters in operation, compared with none in July 2004 and the number of Iraq army battalions "in the fight" has grown to 95, compared to five in August 2004.

On Monday, a U.S. military spokesman in Baghdad said the number was 100, plus 30 battalions of Iraqi Special Police. Pentagon spokesman Maj. Todd Vician said the 100 total includes five Iraqi special forces battalions.

Rumsfeld did not mention the recent call by Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., to begin immediately to withdraw U.S. troops, but he posed the question of whether the United States would be better off leaving Iraq quickly.

"I believe the answer is clear," he said. "Quitting is not an exit strategy. It would be a formula for putting the American people at still greater risk and an invitation for more terrorist violence."

Rumsfeld said the more the insurgents in Iraq "make it sound as though we are going to quit or lose," the more encouraged they will become and the more successful they will be in raising money and recruiting insurgents.

Watroba's Liquors
79 Sunderland Road North Amherst (liquor store 11:00 AM - 11:00 PM)
Just before the Harp!
Watroba's Market
Red Bull 4 - Pack $7.29 plus deposit
• Corona and Corona Light Loose Case Bottles $20.99 + dep.
• Jim Beam Kentucky Whiskey $19.99 1.75 ml. Btl.
• SKYY Vodka $14.49 750 ml. Btl.
• Svedka Vodka $17.99 1.75 ml. Btl.
• Mirassou Assorted Wines $7.99 750 ml. Btl.
• Pabst Blue Ribbon 30 Pack $13.99 + dep.
• Genny Light 30 Pack $12.99 + dep
• Vast array of HUGE Deli Sandwiches
• Coke 12 Pack Cans and Coke products 2 for $6.00 + dep
Jagermeister $20.99 750 ml. Btl. With FREE T-shirt or FREE shot glass
KEG SPECIALS
Bud & Bud Light $63.99+
Michelob Lager & Ultra $63.99+
"Natty" Light & Ice $59.99+
Miller Lite $59.99+
Pabst Blue Ribbon $44.99+
Try our selection of European and Micro Brew Beers

AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE/GETTY IMAGES

Shown above, the words "God Help Us" written on the dust of a nearby van. A pair of car bombs targeting a Baghdad hotel housing Western journalists killed eight Iraqis. The violence continued with the kidnapping of four peace activists.

RAIN
Three Clubs / DJs Under One Roof! Party Till 2 a.m!
HOT BODY CONTEST
Every Thursday Night
18+ College Night
HAREM FRIDAYS
19 + for Ladies
21+ for Men
"Party with the Harem Girls!!!"
Rain transforms into a Sultan's tent
Present this flyer and receive
FREE Admission
for 21+ until Midnight
Party till 2am!
Now Hiring: Bartenders, Waitstaff, Promotions and Security Staff
10 Stearns Square • Springfield, MA 01103 • (413) 827-9000 • www.RainSpringfield.com

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 2005
Simon's Chocolate Factory
Join us from 5-8 pm in All DC's for:
Chocolate Soup • Chocolate Pizza • Double Chocolate Mousse Cake
Vegan Chocolate Cake with Vegan Ganache
Warm Chocolate Bread Pudding • Chocolate Dipped Mango
Chocolate Profiteroles
Simon Stevenson
DINING SERVICES
UMassAmherst

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UMass campus remains safe despite misleading allegations

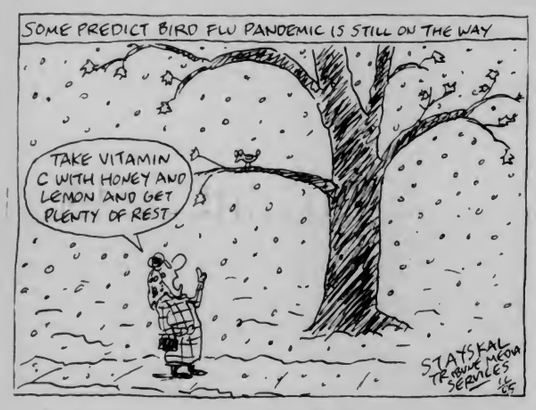
Recently a lot has been said about the safety of UMass. ABC did a "Primetime" special which shined our university in a negative light. Since then the question of how safe this campus really is has been on all of our minds. In order to ease concerns, UMass has taken many precautions to improve security across the entire campus.

According to a student security employee, security cameras have been installed to monitor doors in Southwest that have previously been problematic. This will help avoid unwanted persons sneaking into residence halls. Also, the security personnel monitoring the dorms have started their shifts earlier in the day at 3 p.m. While at 8 p.m., more monitors come on and are either stationed by the doors or at desks.

Student security has also posted flyers describing the security policy so students are more aware of the changes and the rules in general. Employees have also been instructed on the new policy in order to increase their knowledge and the overall safety of students. New rules have been enforced, such as requiring that all guests be accompanied by their host when entering the dormitory. Some may view this new rule as a pain but ultimately all will benefit.

ABC did their best to make this university look bad. Before pinning UMass Amherst as the most dangerous school of its size in the nation, they showed clips about very serious crimes which occurred at other schools. This made whoever watched it think that equally violent crimes happened on our campus. This kind of slandering is unacceptable and misleading.

Most crimes that are reported to student security are not serious, according to the student security employee. A code three is the most common type of crime reported which can include anything from fire alarms to noise disturbances. Only a couple of fire alarms have been reported within dormitories within the past two months. Other more serious crimes usually get reported to the police right away.



There has also been a recommendation that students should undergo random bag searches. This would make students feel safer in the long run, but most are worried about their privacy being intruded upon. Security is one thing but intrusion is quite another. This is not an appropriate step to take in order to keep students safe. It would cause added stress to students more than anything else. Would students get in trouble for having pocket knives or letter openers? It's something to worry about.

The campus has also undergone various improvements to increase safety such as installing new outdoor light fixtures and new police call boxes. Video cameras have also been installed outside in various places to aid in identification and proof if a crime occurs.

Increased security does not come for free. Granted the money should have been spent on making students feel safer in the first place, but what other programs will be jilted as a result? Only time will tell.

All in all, this campus is pretty safe for being as big as it is. If students don't want to walk alone at night they even have the option of calling for an escort. With all of the measures being taken to make students and faculty feel safe, hopefully the good reputation of the school will be restored.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board

En Español por favor

Wesley Miller

Though I didn't know it at the time, perhaps the most rewarding day of my stay here in Mexico was the day we were completely finished with grammar in my Intermediate Spanish class. Four months of four-day-a-week classes had paid off and we were finished. Then came the inevitable unsettling question, "Do I speak Spanish?" Do I consider myself bilingual? It was too strange to comprehend at the time, but my answer would come later.

The moment I realized that I had effectively broken the language barrier, was during a conversation with my host mother. I told her I had been very tired lately because I was using so much of my time to study Spanish. I didn't think anything of my statement as I said it, but my host mother did. Her eyes lit up and she emphatically kissed me on the cheek telling me how happy she was with my progress. Maybe it was a little over affectionate for my Anglo sense of décor, but it did give me the boost of confidence I needed.

Four months and 15 tenses ago, I could barely speak a word. Beyond the here and now, I couldn't express myself at all. I remember my first stabs at the past tense. My host family and I were sitting down to eat a big Sunday dinner. I was stuffed and I meant to say, "I ate too much." Unfortunately I addressed that comment to my rather corpulent host mother and said, "You ate too much." My roommate nearly choked laughing.

Mix-ups like this became less and less frequent as I went on. A friend of mine made the suggestion of keeping a record of exactly what I did the previous day, memorizing it and repeating it to anybody that would care to listen. I did this two or three times a week and it worked like a charm. The amount of effort I put in on a week-to-week basis was directly proportional to my increasing fluency.

The benefits of speaking another language are fantastic, especially studying abroad in Mexico. Mexicans love to hear foreigners speaking their language and will take the time to talk to you and encourage it, no matter how bad you slaughter the language. Over time, my friends and I learned all the good one-liners to break through inevitable awkward silences. In addition developing shticks is a blast, the best of course picking a random Eastern European country and describing your childhood there (it also covers you in case they happen to speak English.)

The benefits of speaking another language are fantastic, especially studying abroad in Mexico. Mexicans love to hear foreigners speaking their language and will take the time to talk to you and encourage it, no matter how bad you slaughter the language.

Spanish is spoken by over 700 million people worldwide, including our Southern neighbors and native citizens. According to Indiana University, Spanish ranks third in the world behind Chinese and Hindi in terms of speakers, native and secondary. It's odd to think that more Americans don't speak Spanish considering its presence in United States. To think that two summers ago I managed to work an entire summer surrounded by Spanish speakers without knowing a word. I feel good knowing that I'm capable of communicating with my fellow Americans, both Northern and Southern.

I remember this kid Phil in my high school who when asked, "Why learn Spanish?" answered sarcastically "So I can order a meal at McDonalds." Bad show Phil. But I'm not going to tirade against our ignorant youth. Instead I'm going to credit Phil with a valuable insight concerning the changing demographics of the United States. And along with changing demographics come different languages, changing language. That's something I've come to understand.

The process of learning a second language is long and arduous. Just as one thing begins to click, you hit a wall on another. But frustration gives way to satisfaction. Though I'm not terrifically well versed in the scientific advantages of second language acquisition in terms of memory, cognitive abilities, etc., I can tell you that it's one of the most rewarding things I've experienced thus far.

Wesley Miller is a World Perspectives columnist. He is currently on exchange in Mexico.

Time to study a map

Asif Khan

During the first week of freshman year here at UMass a girl asked me where I was from. I said Islamabad, Pakistan. She goes "Oh my God, my really good friend Maria is from Chile." I waited for a consequent sentence explaining the connection she had made between the two countries. After an awkward pause she said, "Have you been there?" I said no, and she asked how come. Because it is quite far from where I live. "Oh I thought you were next to each other." I really did not know what to say after that, but I tried to get her bearings in order a little bit better.

I got to thinking how a woman in a prestigious university such as ours can have such limited knowledge of world geography. But after a little while I grew to realize that it was not really her fault per se. But the education system in this country is very exclusively centered on American and Western European viewpoints. The rest of the world is mentioned briefly if at all during history and geography classes. This has enormous consequences as was apparent during the build up before the attack on Iraq.

A large majority of the public had not much knowledge about Iraq except for what they saw in Aladdin or how bad the country is according to the current administration. They thought it was some backward desert, Arab country with a mean, evil dictator who needs to be brought down. Most people probably would have no idea that Iraq boasts some of the world's most ancient cities and was a premier learning place for scientists, mathematicians and scholars. It is here that the world's first heart transplant and the creation of algebra came about. Modern day Iraq had its faults like all countries but it had very high education rates for women. A lot of the nuclear scientists later arrested by the United States are also Iraqi women. The standards of living for most people were much higher than they are now, in spite of the large amount of sanctions placed on that country.

I am not saying that every American should be perfectly literate in where Zambia is on the map and what the history of the Middle East is. But a general awareness would not hurt, especially when U.S. foreign policy shapes a lot of the governments in the world today and U.S. bombs have been dropping on many parts of the world for a significant part of the last (and this) century.

A general awareness [of geography] would not hurt, especially when U.S. foreign policy shapes a lot of the governments in the world today and U.S. bombs have been dropping on many parts of the world for a significant part of the last (and this) century.

I saw a video of a poll done by a news company on Americans. They had a fake map of the world with the labels mixed up. On Australia they had written North Korea and they asked a number of people to point out North Korea on the map. Almost everyone pointed to Australia thinking it was North Korea. One of the men interviewed thought that they should be attacked if they continue their "violent behavior" towards the United States.

Now, when people do not know where a country is on the map, how can they back their administration's decision to attack that country, kill thousands of people there, lose troops and set up a "friendly" government? That is not democracy in the least. In a functioning democracy the dispersal of factual and accurate information is very crucial so that the masses can make informed decisions based on that information. And images of angry crowds burning U.S. flags, women shrouded in veils and angry looking turban clad grandfathers do not meet the criteria of accurate information and imagery.

Most of the Americans I have met seem very eager to learn about the world. They all have their biases of this place not being safe, and that country hating Americans but a lot of them are willing to challenge themselves. Some of my American friends have gone back with me to Pakistan and had a great time and did not experience any sort of discrimination or prejudice they thought they would have by virtue of being American. Their previous perceptions of a Muslim country were challenged and proved wrong. They did not except to see women driving, dance parties, hospitable people happy to meet them, very relatable and worldly images.

I agree that in some places in the world there are people who are not happy with the American government and what it does throughout the world. I cannot say I blame them. I would not be too happy either if the bosses at the Nike plant treated me like an animal or my village was just bombed because it was "suspected" to hold terrorists. However these people are the minority, the majority separates the government from the people and when they meet someone who is from a country they do not hold them responsible for every act committed by their nation but meet them as who they are, as an individual.

So, next time you meet someone who is not from this country, talk to them about where they come from and how it is over there, instead of telling them how to say this word properly and how happy they must be that they are here in America now. You will be making a huge difference by that small gesture.

Asif Khan is a Collegian columnist.

The Collegian is hiring an assistant Ed/Op editor for the Spring semester.

Come down to the Collegian newsroom in the evenings to apply!
Ask for Allison or Kristen.

A bittersweet holiday season

Becky Martins

Change is inevitable. No matter how much we would like to freeze time, it is impossible to forever live in the present. It makes one wonder, though, what allows people to live for the movement knowing they are only there temporarily?

Personally, I feel our memories and traditions let these times continue on for however long we choose. Without them, we would never allow ourselves to enjoy life, knowing nothing was forever. And there is no better time we are reminded of this than the holidays.

Days of celebration hold a much different definition today than they did during our youth. In adulthood, the holidays, for many, are times of stress, excessive spending and forced visits with family we did not choose. As children, though, our lives were far from exciting and not realizing the "bigger picture" of adulthood yet, our reality was much simpler. Once the leaves began to fall, October stood for, to me at least, an assortment of birthdays and most importantly, Halloween. After November hit, the next holiday was Thanksgiving. But after the turkey was carved and the relatives had left, every child grew anxious for what was to come. Whether it was Christmas or Hanukkah, to us presents were presents and Dec. 25 could not be here soon enough.

Looking back on those holidays spent with family, it is hard not to feel bittersweet. I remember spending Thanksgiving at my grandmother's, which could not have been a more perfect place. After eating, the children would go off to her finished basement while the adults got into their yearly game of cards around the dinner table. Why they grew so rowdy as the night went on blew my mind for years.

Some of my best memories with my sisters and cousins were created downstairs on this annual get-together. We would sit around my grandparents' bar and serve each other soda, pretending our beverages were actually a little stronger like our parents' upstairs. We would have our own card games using poker chips, acting as if we actually knew the rules. But most importantly, we enjoyed our time together: something so rare since we hardly saw each other aside from holidays. It was during these years that life felt so safe and comfortable.

And then it happened. Suddenly, there was talk that my grandfather had cancer. Chemotherapy began and soon stopped working; within the year, news came that it had metastasized to the brain. Due to her husband's constant need for care, my grandmother wouldn't be hosting Thanksgiving that year. Little did she know, she would never again host it the way it had once been. At the time, I may have only been in the fourth grade, but I understood what was happening. Life had been so stable until now, but the time had come for things to change.

Since my grandfather's death over a decade ago, like every family, my own has faced other hardships. Older members lost their lives to illness. Younger ones were taken too soon for unfair reasons. And while we all go through the normal grieving process and eventually move on, it is hard not to be reminded of both the good and the bad on the holidays.

Since my grandfather's death over a decade ago, like every family, my own has faced other hardships. Older members lost their lives to illness. Younger ones were taken too soon for unfair reasons. And while we all go through the normal grieving process and eventually move on, it is hard not to be reminded of both the good and the bad on the holidays.

This past Thanksgiving, while sitting with family and reminiscing, I accidentally blurted out the question, "Where's Auntie ...?" Luckily, before I said the name of my late aunt who died two years ago, I quickly changed the subject. But with the verbal slip, I realized I was still holding onto a time when my family was not just the members I see today, but also those who touched our lives in the past. By almost saying my Auntie Diane's name, I didn't forget she was gone. At that time, things felt so comfortable being with family that I felt she, among others, had never left.

Some things never change. It is never a holiday without my grandmother's laughter rising above everyone's chatter, dinner being prepared in the kitchen and football blaring in the living room. I still can count on some of my most fulfilling meals being cooked when we are all together. But it is inevitable that life will take multiple forms throughout our years. It is simply up to us to keep up.

Today on holidays, my family plays cards together, instead of having the children herded off to play quietly. In years to come, I understand a new shift will take place when my sisters and I have families of our own and our larger family unit breaks apart. But instead of stressing what is to come, we can still live for the moment today. Life will someday change, but nothing can take away our memories.

Becky Martins is a Collegian columnist

Ineptitude 101

Duncan Devlin

If you wish to pursue a life of total uselessness, this is the column for you. If you prefer making excuses for yourself at all costs, and never growing to your full potential, your guidebook is here. The following are a collection of five of the best ways to demonstrate to someone else just how useless you are, and avoid all responsibility at college and in the future. Do not fear the consequences, for you will develop many excuses before most consequences arise. If everything works out correctly, life will be one long, dull ball of ineptitude.

I CAN'T.

This is a beautiful explanation to avoid doing just about anything. In two words, the whole world of responsibility has been brushed aside. How dare someone ask you to do something you simply cannot do? This can get you out of studying a difficult subject, or any of the numerous tasks associated with any job. Suppose you hate studying math. Just say you can't do it, and you have a self-consoling excuse to just "not like" the subject. There is rarely a basis for this lack of ability, such as a doctor's note; there is just an acceptance of failure.

I WON'T.

Here is your method of getting out of tasks that are well within your range of ability, but you just do not feel like completing. This works for matters of spoiled preference, such as, "I don't want to eat at the DC," cleaning or being friendly to the housekeeping staff. You have to be careful when using this one though, as there are adults in all areas who will make you do it anyways. Professors often have a certain callous against, "I won't," which you will have to adjust to. This is best saved for friends who try to get you to do unspeakable tasks, such as going to class.

I'LL TRY.

Yeah, sure you will. This is a nice statement to deal with those people who just will not leave you alone. While many people will settle for, "I can't," it is not good enough for everyone. They will not give up, and insist that you "give it a shot." The key here is to exert just the right amount of visible effort. Too much effort might lead to actually succeeding, while not enough will just lead to more pestering. Your observer must always think that you are sincere in your effort, even if you know the truth. Oh, and ignore the words of Master Yoda, "Do, or do not; there is not try."

LEAVE IT TO SOMEONE ELSE.

Everyone on earth is better than you at everything, so why try to do any work on your own? There will always be someone around to pick up after you, so get used to it early. Even better than that is the fact that you can place all of the blame on someone else if something goes wrong. Whenever anything breaks down, you can always find someone else to fix it, and the Internet holds all of your college essays waiting for you to put your name on them. This also leads to great phone skills, "please call the other customer service." Just remember how your parents treated you when you were five years old, and you will be fine.

DUH.

When all else fails, play stupid. Anytime someone asks you to do something, just get a vacant look in your eye as though you are suffering from a sudden bout of amnesia or a stroke. In the meantime, make a face that conveys your true love of dog biscuits. Your professors will smile when you do not show up to class, police will actually believe you thought the speed limit was 85 and your superiors (of which there are many) will soon put you in a nice, cushy position, out of the way, where they will not have to see you. With any luck, you will never again even have to ask "Do you want fries with that?"

So there you have it. Next time you are faced with any form of difficult task, just use one of the excuses listed above. With any luck, the whole world will see your total ineptitude, and leave you alone. Difficult tasks will be a thing of the past. So will life, but then again, life is really too hard anyways, so don't let it get you down. There are plenty of high-paying jobs out there waiting for you: McDonalds, Wal-Mart and the presidency, just to name a few. Stick to the plan, and you will be useless in no time.

Duncan Devlin is a Collegian columnist

How I became a socialist

Joseph Drury Jr.

More and more problems keep on popping up in the ever continuing General Electric saga. It's hard to describe the sort of angst and bitter hatred that I feel towards that company to someone who did not grow up in or around Pittsfield. We were a company town. In the late '70s Pittsfield had a population of approximately 70,000. GE employed some 14,000 people. When you take into consideration that most of these were males over the age of 18 the numbers are staggering. Probably around 70 percent of this demographic worked there.

Every single adult male that I knew worked at GE. They were all involved with the union (IUE) but they were also very involved with the company. GE was life. Never in my wildest imaginations as a child did I envision myself working anywhere else. And why would I? A worker at GE could etch out a decent living. Not great by any means. But the union contract, won through a series of bitter struggles in the '70s against one of the most virulent anti-union companies in history, ensured a decent living for all of the employees. We weren't rich. Hell, we weren't even middle class. We were working class, hard-nosed, blue collar folk. Proud of our town, our union and our General Electric.

But all of that changed in the late '80s. General Electric left town. They went from employing 70,000 in the late '70s to only a handful by the mid-'90s. The economic impact was devastating and complete. Unemployment shot up to over 15 percent in the town and surrounding areas. My father lost his job just after being put on disability for destroying his back. My grandfather was forced to retire in his mid-'50s.

And this story was repeated in nearly every household in Pittsfield.

General Electric offered "training" to its laid off employees but this was a joke. There were no jobs to be trained for. And very few people who worked for GE had enough money and resources to relocate. Gradually, people began to give up. Drug use and alcoholism skyrocketed. People stopped looking for jobs (thus lowering the official unemployment numbers). And the youth left. The youth continue to leave. There is no future in Pittsfield. There is no future in Pittsfield because we relied so heavily on General Electric. We relied on them and were stabbed in the back. Generations, my people, suffered and toiled so the GE executives could become some of the wealthiest people on the planet and what did they receive in return? Job training to prepare them for their new position as a "sales associate" at Wal-Mart.

There is no future in Pittsfield. There is no future in Pittsfield because we relied so heavily on General Electric. We relied on them and were stabbed in the back.

And in addition to this GE left the majority of Pittsfield a "Superfund Site." Half of the town is an ecological disaster. You can't eat fish from local streams and rivers (some warn against even swimming in them). Cancer rates are suspiciously high in the area. Now we come to find out that one of their dumping grounds was underneath an elementary school, Allendale Elementary School. And Jack Welch and all of those others at General Electric knew it and didn't do a thing about. They stood idly by while hundreds of thousands of little children played and went to school on top of a PCB dumping site. And did any of their children go there? Of course not.

The other day I was talking to my father about how I came to be a socialist. My pops, a life-long labor Democrat is not so fond of this trait of mine. But I got a socialist fist and red star tattooed on my arm recently and it has become increasingly hard to ignore. He couldn't understand how and why I grew up to be a communist. He certainly never taught me to be one. But I told him ... look around this town. Look at the idealism that we all had surrounding General Electric and look at what they did to us. I told my dad, "You can thank your buddy Jack Welch for turning me into a communist." I think that made a lot of sense to him. At least I hope it did.

Joseph Drury Jr. is a UMass graduate student.

The ties that bind

Colin Jones

They say home is where the heart is. I've never liked that saying. I suppose I don't like a lot of what "they" say, but this one in particular pinches my nerves. It might be because not everyone has a home. It might be because not everyone has a heart. But I think it's mostly because of the question it raises. If you don't have a quote unquote "home," then where do you put your heart?

This was a question that plagued me for a very long time. The combination of being on my own and the realization of how the world (or at least my world) works left me unable to answer it. I've heard suggestions. For the most part, they have involved giving it away or hiding it somewhere, protected by cold shoulders and lying eyes.

Over time, I have found that there is only one place worth keeping it. Right on your sleeve. It may be more vulnerable to fray, cuts and abrasions, but without these things, without outright exposure, "the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune," you're not living. You're just surviving. I have done that for more than long enough.

One of the things that never ceases to amaze me is that, provided you have the necessary depth, that appreciation for the things that make this life worth living will only increase. Take music, for example. It was said somewhere that "the words of the prophets are written on the studio walls." I believe this to be very true. In 1965, the Beatles released their album, "Rubber Soul." Arguably, not their best work, but there is a track on it that still strikes chords deep inside of me. The first time I heard it, I was entranced by it, because I knew exactly what it meant.

"He's a real nowhere man, sitting in his nowhere land, making all his nowhere plans for nobody. Doesn't have a point of view, knows not where he's going to, isn't he a bit like you and me?" The lyrics to "Nowhere Man," while no doubt catchy, are a perfect instance of the way that a song can carry along with it a very deep meaning.

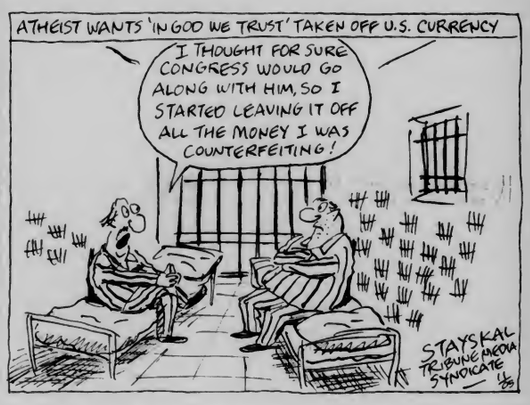
For a long time, that was me. I was so distanced from everything, most of all myself, that forming relationships or finding my place in the world were tasks that were insurmountable. It wasn't until I learned the truth of the last line that I found the comfort and joy that comes along with the bonds that we can form and the discoveries that we can make about each other.

We seek success, the personal and satisfying knowledge that we have a place in this world. And I'd like to believe that most of us want part of that knowledge to be that the world is a better place for having us in it.

Perhaps the most notable one that I have found is that we have a lot more, many more, similarities than we have differences. Above all, we seek success, the personal and satisfying knowledge that we have a place in this world. And I'd like to believe that most of us want part of that knowledge to be that the world is a better place for having us in it.

When you see that the ties that bind us are much stronger than the forces pulling us apart, the opportunity to gain wisdom and insight has no boundaries. We are all subject to the same insecurities, fears and desires. Sometimes these things can be misplaced, juxtaposing themselves at a sharp angle with those of others, creating borders instead of bridges. But good intentions go a long way, and with them, few deficits cannot be recovered.

I have seen firsthand, time and again, that when earnest motives and genuine understanding are used to bridge the gaps that I have formed with someone, whether deliberately or unconsciously, the gaps can be closed or narrowed. And it has only been through these bonds with other people that I have begun to find what I know is success for me. It's not about money or power. It's about knowing that I mean something to someone else, and letting them mean something to me.



John and Paul were right: "Nowhere man, don't worry. Take your time, don't hurry. Leave it all, 'til somebody else lends you a hand."

Over the past few years, I have developed a number of deep and true friendships, without which the world, for me, would be a very cold place. It was only through lowering my defenses, by allowing myself to trust and dropping the chip I carried on my shoulder that I was able to do this. Laughter is truly the best medicine.

It's all true. We get lost sometimes. We don't always know where we're headed, but the best thing to do is to take a step back, relax and breathe. Maybe smell the roses, or turn on the radio.

"Nowhere man, please listen. You don't know what you're missing. Nowhere man, the world is at your command."

Colin Jones is a Collegian columnist.

Breaking 'Asian' barriers

Britney Lai

What is an Asian American identity? There are a lot of times when I have heard people ask Asians what makes them different from other people, and the most common response I hear is "I'm different because I'm Asian." This response just makes me think. Yes, you are Asian, but the question is "So what?"

What makes someone "Asian"? The most common responses to this question are usually stereotypical responses. We have all heard them. Studious, good at math, quiet, hardly speaks English. Asians are the "model minorities." The passive group that never gets mad. Asian men are stereotyped to be feminine men who are bad in bed, while the Asian women are labeled as exotic sexual creatures.

There are always Asian stereotypes floating around no matter what environment I am in. I went to a high school that was labeled as one of the most "liberal" high schools in all of Massachusetts. There were always the forums and debates regarding stereotypes, how to avoid them and how to eliminate them from the school environment. I always applauded my school's efforts, but then I realized in my senior year that these efforts were almost all directed to fighting African American and homosexual stereotypes. When Asian Americans were being stereotyped, I rarely heard anyone speak up of the "injustice." Or perhaps the Asian American population itself was playing into the stereotype of a passive race.

When Asian Americans were being sterotyped, I rarely heard anyone speak up of the "injustice." Or perhaps the Asian American population itself was playing into the stereotypes of a passive race.

I grew up in Newton, Mass. for the majority of my life. When I was young, I never labeled myself as being "Asian." It never occurred to me that others would label me as Asian for the first thing that was a part of my identity. It was only until I reached middle school that I noticed being Asian was a big part of my identity and how people viewed me. There were so many times in school where teachers would look directly at me when talking about a subject relating to anything Asian. Teachers and students would always ask me if I knew how to read, write or speak Chinese. And when I said I did not know, everyone would think I was lying, because to them it was impossible for an Asian girl to not know her "own" language.

When I entered high school, I was not really friends with a lot of Asian students. This really upset some of the Asian students in my school. To them, I was "betraying" my "own people" by only having white friends. But it was not like I was purposely going out of my way to make just white friends. It just happened that I clicked with these people who happened to be non-Asian. To these Asian people I was not Asian. I was on a different level of "Asian-ness" than them. But since when are there requirements on how I should act to be Asian.

Isn't my ethnicity enough? Why do I have to hang out with Asians or know how to speak the language to be Asian?

I am not trying to say that Asian Americans are being treated horribly by society and there is a lot of injustice. This has all been said and done. I'm always hearing how the American culture is becoming a "melting pot," and that old racial stereotypes are becoming taboo. I know that no matter what is said or done to educate society, there will always be racial stereotypes. That is a fact of life. But why is it that when an Asian American individual does not fit the common Asian stereotypes, he or she is all of a sudden labeled as "white-washed."

What is the term "white-washed"? It is an individual who does not act "Asian," and acts "white" instead. Simple, right? Since when is there a set definition of how an Asian American individual should act? Personally, I do not speak much Chinese nor act "Chinese" at all according to most of my peers. I am very often labeled as that "white-washed" Chinese girl. But the last time I checked I am an Asian American. I am an American who happens to have an Asian background. Yet when I do the same exact things as them I am considered "white-washed." Confused? I know for sure I am. Apparently, Asians should act a certain way now even though stereotypes should be avoided.

Why can't the way I act just be because that is my personality? It is easy to say that Asians can be white washed, or can operate a normal life and live in a normal society like the average white person, but the question is why do we even have to say these words?

Being Asian is always a part of my identity, even when I do not think of it as being a big part of who I truly am as a person. There is no such thing as an "Asian American identity." People are just trying to make a clear definition of it, but that is just not possible. If anything, an "Asian American identity" is just who you are and how you choose to live your life. There is nothing more to it. There is no uniform identity or definition.

Britney Lai is a UMass student.

Ed/Op Poll

Are you satisfied with the financial aid you receive from UMass?

A. Yes, I worked hard and I deserve it.

B. It's enough. Beggars can't be choosers.

C. Their financial aid couldn't cover my morning coffee.

D. I'm an out-of-state student. Enough said.

Go to www.dailycollegian.com to vote!

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

'Paradise Now' puts new spin on old genre

BY PETER FRISMAN

Courtesy photo

"Paradise Now"

Directed by Hany Abu-Assad

Starring Kais Nashef, Ali Suliman, Lubna Azabal

Warner Independent Pictures

Rated PG-13

90 mins.

Grade B+

Cheaters never prosper

Lovers Only

Hannah Drake

Cheating. It's such a dirty word. People, who cheat on those they do care about, end up feeling guilt to the Nth degree for many days to come. Some confess, some hide the truth, some are never found out and others would deny it until they're blue in the face. And looking back, people who cheat usually don't understand why they did it. But there are several aspects of cheating that people don't usually know about.

First of all, cheating incidents are not all alike. Sometimes it's a repeat offense; sometimes it's a drunken encounter. Sometimes it's because the person has and always will be a cheater. Other times it's because the cheater was too weak to break up with the person they cheated on beforehand. Sometimes the cheater is really and truly sorry, and honestly would never do it again.

Both guys and girls can cheat, but usually it's guys. I'm going to venture that it's because girls are usually more forgiving. We are still partially defined by our romantic relationships, and to lose a relationship is somewhat viewed as a failure by society on the part of the woman, whether or not this is right or wrong. Who is more likely to cheat? Someone who's in a long-distance relationship, someone whose friends are single or cheat on their lovers, or someone who drinks.

Sometimes people convince themselves that they're in love with the person they've met, thus justifying the infidelity to their partner. First, if the person you meet is that wonderful, he or she wouldn't fool around with you knowing you were with someone else. Why? Because people who have enough self-confidence realize that they deserve someone who will be faithful to themselves, or anyone that they have made a commitment to.

Let's say that a really cute guy has been hitting on you. You find out from his friends that he has a girlfriend, but he doesn't really mention it to you. He wants you to hang out, and he's really flirtatious. You like him. I'm telling you, nip this flirtation in the bud. As I mentioned earlier, if you have enough self-esteem you would realize that you're wasting your time on this seemingly charming and wonderful guy, and that you deserve someone who would show you the same level of attention when he's serious about his interests in you. If he were truly serious, he would break up with his girlfriend and date you. There's a reason the girl is his girlfriend.

Similarly, if you're a guy and the friend of a girl with a boyfriend, and she starts whining to you about him and then starts flirting with you, again, I'd say stay away. If you've listened to her you've made yourself out to be the nice guy who wouldn't hurt her, you also probably look good by comparison. Girls: warn yourself if you're in this track. The guy you think is better than your boyfriend may not be a better guy to date. Also, you're feeling low because things aren't working out with your guy. But don't be so quick to think that what you're feeling and thinking is leading you in the other direction.

Also, if you're thinking about cheating, it doesn't just make you feel guilty. It scars the person you care(d) about, chances are, for much longer than your relationship will last once they've found out you cheated. Trying to fix the relationship afterwards is usually a failed attempt, once you break trust, it usually doesn't come back. The best thing to do once someone has cheated is pack up those bags and move on. Nobody deserves to be cheated on. And nobody should commit to anyone who wouldn't commit to them. Words are just words. Actions are what counts.

Overlooked styles finally kick down door of rock shrine

BY MALCOLM X ABRAM
KNIGHT RIDDER NEWSPAPERS

It's about time.

After years and years of moaning, complaining and accusations of snobbery from fans and critics, the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame voters have swallowed what was apparently a very bitter pill and made the Sex Pistols, Black Sabbath and Lynyrd Skynyrd part of the class of 2006, along with Miles Davis, Blondie and A&M Records founders Herb Alpert and Jerry Moss as nonperformers.

The Pistols, Sabbath and Skynyrd have been eligible for years (a band/performer becomes eligible 25 years after their first recording), and all have been nominated multiple times. But for various reasons — Ozzy Osbourne's and John Lydon's open criticism of the entire concept probably didn't help their cases — the bands have been repeatedly ignored.

Perhaps hoping to silence the public cries of bias against heavy metal, Southern rock and punk (the Ramones and the Clash notwithstanding), or simply because the pickings are beginning to get slim as the eligibility years creep into the '80s, the voters have decided that 2006 is the year all three are welcome.

All three bands fall under the rubric of "seminal" in their respective genres, and ignoring them was making the Rock Hall look like it was run by a back-slapping bunch of industry insiders who favored splashy names and personal favorites over bands that simply deserved to be honored.

In retrospect, the Sex Pistols' three-chord midtempo tunes may be hard to hear in successful latter-day punk bands such as Green Day, but their sole album — 1976's "Never Mind the Bollocks, Here's the Sex Pistols" — was the punk boogie spat around the world. Filled with raw, unbridled anger, power chords and Johnny Rotten's (nee Lydon) lyrical maddle finger aimed right at British society, the album contained several classics, including the aforementioned "God Save the Queen," "Anarchy in the U.K." and "Pretty Vacant."

For many young Britons, the band's music and attitude encapsulated the frustration of being poor and on the dole with seemingly "no future" (as goes the chant in "God Save the Queen"). The Sex Pistols weren't the first punk band, but they were one of the loudest, and their influence is still strong.

Black Sabbath was arguably the first band to define heavy metal. While late '60s bands such as Led Zeppelin and Blue Cheer were indeed heavy, Sabbath's alternating sludgy and fast tempos, bass- and groove-heavy riffs and Osbourne's nasal wail set the blueprint for much of what has followed in metal, musically and stylistically.

The band's use of dark lyrics and imagery became an intrinsic part of metal (one reason the party-hearty "hair metal" bands had to have their own subgenre) and if one were to look in the CD rack/iPod playlists of nearly every metal fan and performer, chances are there's a Sabbath album in there still scaring the heck out of the rest of the collection.

The Sex Pistols are among the previously overlooked bands who will be inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 2006. Lead singer Johnny Rotten still performs.

Lynyrd Skynyrd not only defined Southern rock, but also gave it a proud, good ol' boy, redneck ethos. With a three-pronged guitar attack, a charismatic singer-songwriter in Ronnie Van Zant and a mix of country, blues and rock, the band churned out many a radio staple. Love them or hate them, thousands of kids have grown up with a steady diet of Skynyrd, and its music and style have outlasted its own personal tragedies and the changing times.

Folks will probably debate the inclusion of Blondie more than the others, but it was a hip and happening band in its late-'70s and early-'80s heyday. Frontwoman Debbie Harry was blonde and pretty, but she was never simply eye candy. The band represented the commercial end of the CBGB's crowd, releasing several hits.

Presumably, jazz icon Miles Davis' induction is due in part to his electrified and then-controversial albums, such as "Bitches Brew" and "On the Corner." Heavy on electric guitars, funky bass and rock drums, the open-ended vamps of the '70s drove a stake through heart of the jazz world and helped make Davis even more of an international star.

This is a good class of performers and it should make for a heck of an induction ceremony come March 13, assuming that all the inductees show up. Sharon Osbourne may have Ozzy on his best behavior (Chill Pills combo No. 8, I think), but Lydon is almost a lock to say something rude about the Rock Hall voters, the Rock Hall itself, the populations and infrastructures of New York and Cleveland, their respective sports teams and his fellow inductees past and present.

Why are the good shows always the first to go?

BY MOLLY GRIFFIN
THE OBSERVER (NOTRE DAME)

SOUTH BEND, Ind. — Fans of "Arrested Development" knew it was coming.

With low ratings, changing time slots and several near-cancellations, the show remained one step away from getting axed throughout its run. In spite of vocal fans, adoring critics and an Emmy win for Best Comedy series, the show still suffered from low ratings. With Fox's recent announcement that it was cutting its order of the show's current third season, the death knell sounded, and fans began to mourn.

The end of "Arrested Development" brings up the question of why some shows get cancelled in spite of loyal legions of fans and how others can hang on for years longer than they should. Also, in today's entertainment world, filled with options like TiVo and DVD sets of television shows, is there any hope for fans once a studio has turned its back on a good show?

Some shows seem doomed from the start, while others are seemingly ended without any prior warning. Cult favorite "Freaks and Geeks" made it through one season but seemed doomed to be cancelled from the beginning.

"Joan of Arcadia," while making it beyond the one-year mark, still received — ironically — no mercy when it came to getting cut out of the television schedule. The show was well-regarded by critics and viewers alike, but a slump in the ratings led to a swift cut and somewhat unexpected axe from the network.

In other cases, ending a show can be a lengthy process. Longtime favorites like "Friends," "Everybody Loves Raymond" and "Seinfeld" ended because their stars decided they were ready to leave, not because they failed to get a stay of execution from the studio. "The X-Files" survived the exit of not one but both of its central characters before ultimately getting the axe, proving just how much it can take to get a successful show cancelled.

"The Simpsons" is an example of a show that, despite its success, may be ready for cancellation. Either that, or they need to lure back some of the other writers from the past when the show was in its prime. "The Simpsons" simply isn't as good as it used to be, and the new episodes may be ruining the legacy the show established for itself long ago. The show will continue to run on fumes for as long as it can, but in some ways, canceling it now and cutting the damage to the show's legacy might be a better option.

For long-running shows like this, bowing out gracefully is probably the best option available. Few shows can remain consistently good for extended periods of time, and it always looks better for a star to leave a show than to get the axe. Others will continue to run on fumes, doing untold damage to their future legacies.

While the cancellation of a show can seem like the end, even in the age of DVD sets of television shows, there are a few success stories around to give confidence to depressed television fans everywhere.

When it first debuted on television, "Family Guy" wasn't a huge ratings winner. It managed to offend many of the viewers who did tune in, mostly because they were expecting another "Simpsons" instead of what they got. Fox cut the show, but massive sales of the series on DVD actually inspired the network to revive it. Its current less-than-stellar ratings may give more credence to the popularity of television on DVD than to reviving programs, but it still offers some hope to those mourning a cancelled show.

When one network doesn't work out, other stations can step in and give an abandoned show a home. Cult favorite "Buffy the Vampire Slayer" faced cancellation on the WB, but was picked up by UPN and survived for two more seasons before finally, excuse the pun, getting staked.

"Buffy" creator, Joss Whedon, penned another show, "Firefly," that got canceled after one season, in spite of being a huge cult hit. While it wasn't revived on television, it did come back in a big way — on the big screen. The movie "Serenity," was based on the show and became a hit after being released.

These shows can offer some hope to viewers by offering the assurance that shows tenuously near cancellation can still find homes, albeit in often non-traditional places.

By looking at some examples from television's wildly chaotic past, fans of "Arrested Development" may not find solace, but at least they can see that there are some options. And even if this is the end for the Bluth family, one can always argue that it's better to go off the air than to be stuck in the mediocrity of shows like "Yes, Dear," the next incarnation of "The Bachelor" or one of the multitudinous spinoffs of "Law and Order" or "CSI."

If the show does fail to find sanctuary from getting cancelled, fans may miss quoting lines "Hey hermano!" or "No touching!" They will, however, appreciate never having to say anything resembling, "Do you remember when 'Arrested Development' used to be good?"

George and Michael Bluth show their love for each other in Fox's show "Arrested Development," which will be cancelled soon, despite its popularity with fans and critics.

The Savoy Shuffle explores the metaphysical and abstract

BY BRIAN DUFFEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

"It's all shrouded in secrecy," says lead singer Bill Callahan. The music of the Savoy Shuffle is "experimental blues and rock." The origin of the band's name and the inspiration behind their music remains a mystery. The Savoy Shuffle likes it that way.

Just outside the Amherst town limits, the Savoy Shuffle hones their craft in a modest Leverett apartment. Each Wednesday evening, this collegiate foursome spends several hours improving their sound. Academic and work responsibilities make it difficult for the group to practice as much as they'd like.

The band originated in the summer of 2000. Lead vocalist, songwriter, and guitarist Bill Callahan, a senior English major at UMass, started the group on the South Shore with Savoy Shuffle drummer, Ross Anti, a senior Exercise Science major. These two UMass seniors have been friends since junior high school. The current version of the band began on Sunset Avenue in 2003. Parties at the Amherst residence gave the band an opportunity to perform.

Bassist/vocalist Drew Barraford, a senior mathematics major, lived at Sunset and joined Callahan and Anti. Barraford is a self-taught musician who has been playing for less than two years. Shortly thereafter, senior Environmental Science major Adam Stackhouse became the fourth member of the group. Stackhouse plays the djembe, tambourine and congas. "[It's] been great for me. I get to play with them in a structured thing," said Stackhouse. The group is also currently looking for a keyboardist and guitarist.

The Savoy Shuffle plays a mix of original music and covers. They cover music from the Band, Pink Floyd, the Beatles, the Flaming Lips and others, ranging from the 1950s to present day. The band often plays three hour sets with roughly 25 songs, comprised of 15 originals and 10 covers. The Savoy Shuffle has been a mainstay at the Harp, a bar located in North Amherst. They have also played at the Pub in Amherst, the Basement in Northampton, along with weddings and graduation parties.

The Savoy Shuffle relies heavily on improvisation. The music has a framework, but each member varies from that design in each song. Some songs are up to 20 minutes long. "Our songs are never played the same way twice," says Callahan.

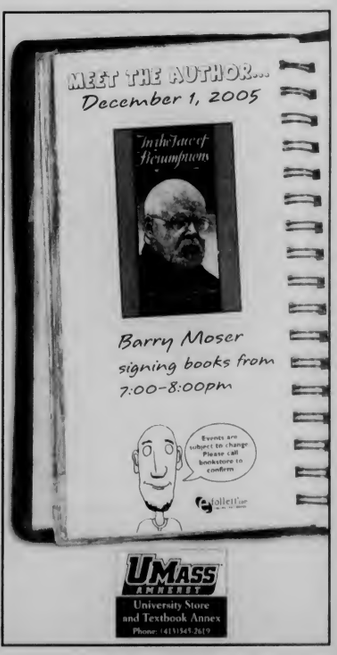
Callahan is the primary songwriter for the group. He says that more than half of the music is derived from his poetry. "[I] hear it in my head and adapt it to the guitar, sticking different pieces of music together until it gets into something cohesive." Callahan took a couple of guitar lessons several years back, but says they were a "rip-off." Like his band mates, he's self-taught.

Recently, Drew Barraford began writing music. Barraford and Callahan co-wrote a tune, titled, "Up From the Gutter."

"Up from the Gutter your world distends. The place you know so well meets a bitter end. Up from the gutter, through the smoke and haze. It's hard to see right now, better day."

"At the Seams," written by Callahan, is a rare relationship song. He explained that the Savoy Shuffle does not write tear-jerking, love ballads. "[The] songs are abstract and metaphysical," says Callahan. "The Marvelous Gangrel," a new tune written by Callahan, began as a short story in Sam Michel's Creative Writing Fiction class.

The Savoy Shuffle is recording their second album this winter. Their first album, "Strange Beasts and Where to Find Them," was recorded in 2004. To hear music by the Savoy Shuffle or contact the group, check out purevolume.com/thesavoyshuffle.



COURTESY SAVOY SHUFFLE

The Savoy Shuffle are regular performers at the Harp, the Pub and the Basement, as well as weddings and graduations.

KAMINS
SPECIALIZING IN HOUSE AND APARTMENT RENTALS
LOOKING FOR A PLACE TO LIVE?
PRESIDENTIAL APTS
COLONIAL VILLAGE APTS
PERRY APTS
177 N PLEASANT ST
COLLEGE INN APTS
LANTERN COURT APTS
MILL HOLLOW
CRESTVIEW APTS
55 S. PLEASANT ST 253-2515 AMHERST

FRUSTRATED?
PUZZLED?
DO YOU HAVE:
a grade dispute?
teacher, roomate or job concerns?
billing problems?
harassment?
...or any other University related problems?
THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP
(confidentially, of course)
students, faculty, and staff are all welcome
823 Campus Center
Office Hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.
telephone: 413-545-0867
fax: 413-545-9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

Friends before UMass

TEAMMATES from page 10

back."

For Dacko, it would be hard to find a team that is more together than the one she has playing for her this season. Chemistry in basketball is perhaps the most important of all the sports because the five players on the court are playing both sides of the ball and distributing it (if they're playing the game right) equally on offense. The longer athletes play with each other and get used other players' tendencies, the more effective a team will become. Rosanio and Mills know each other's games as well as they know their own.

Both players told anecdotes about the on-court experiences that they've had together at UMass.

"Most of the time we're just running our break so it's just whoever gets up the floor the fastest," Mills says describing the Minutewoman offense. "[Pam is] usually up the floor the quickest and I'm following right behind her. That's kind of fun too because if she's behind me then she'll push me like, 'Go, Go, Go!'"

Rosanio commented on the same situation.

"I'm usually the first one down [the court] so if I'm going so fast and I just throw it off the glass she's there to get it and she gets the points," she jokes. "I get the missed shots.

"I know what she's going to do," Rosanio says. "I've been playing with her so I know her type of moves. I can sort of see where she's going. But for some reason me and her cannot do a backdoor together. It just doesn't work. We've just never been able to do it. The ball always ends up out of bounds."

Minus the occasional backdoor turnover, these two Minutewomen have been a welcome addition to Dacko's squad. After coaching the tandem for a year, Dacko has become aware of both their strengths and weaknesses. She doesn't hesitate to tell them what they need to work on, and both sophomores, according to Dacko, have much improving to do over the next three years. Since Rosanio and Mills joined the team, there have been on-court adjustments both players have made at Dacko's request.

For Mills, it has been rebounding. The Maryland native is 6-foot-2 and strong, with long arms that can snag rebounds from bigger opponents. Early in the 2005 campaign, it is clear that without Mills on the floor UMass is a weaker rebounding team. Dacko admits that Mills can have her way in the paint when she wants to, and with the loss of Brooke Campbell and other prominent rebounders to graduation, Mills will need to be a consistent rebounding force if the Minutewomen hope to sustain an up tempo style of play.

"I want [Kate] in the paint," Dacko says. "I think that that is where she is really going to help us. She's got to step up defensively. She's got to get more rebounds than she does."

Mills also draws praise from Dacko and Rosanio about her biggest strength, a skill that post players are rapidly developing in modern basketball: shooting. Her coach is extremely confident in her outside touch.

KAREN WINKOWSKI/COLLEGIAN

Kate Mills met teammate and longtime friend Pam Rosanio when the two were 10-years-old, playing against each other in a basketball tournament.

"Kate has an outstanding shot," Dacko says. "She's probably one of the best shooters on the team. Long range, medium range, she can stick it from anywhere. From the elbows and 15 feet in, the kid is deadly. I'd put her up against anybody. She can be a machine."

"Her shot is so good. It's always on," Rosanio says. "One game last year she had a horrible shooting game and I was like, 'That's the first time I've seen her shoot bad since forever.' She's really good with her shot."

Rosanio had a different problem when she got to Amherst – she didn't shoot enough. Dacko described her as a slasher during her freshmen year, a girl who would rather take it hard to the basket off the dribble than pull up for a shot. But Dacko has molded her into a blend of both, a player who can shoot when necessary and utilize her strength inside by taking smaller guards down on the block. Rosanio is known best for her speed and leading the Minutewoman fast break by beating other players down the floor.

Rosanio's appearance is deceiving. Standing 5-foot-10 with a solid build, she looks more like a small forward than a guard who can beat players down the floor. But after watching her play, it is apparent that effort is what separates Rosanio from her competition.

As soon as a teammate pulls down a defensive board Rosanio is off to races, looking back for the ball and holding her arm up in full extension like a receiver going out for a pass. If she doesn't get a basket on the fast break she will pull up and make a ball-side cut to the sideline (where point guard Katie Nelson will usually find her) and toss up the occasional three-pointer.

"Pam we've made into a shooter," Dacko says. "What makes her effective is she is the first one up the floor every day – in practices, in games. You tell her, 'I want the lanes filled,' and she's the first one out. She will bust her rear end to get out there, to be the first one up the floor. Even if she's not getting the ball she's creating an opportunity for a teammate to score."

Dacko has coached Rosanio and Mills for over a year now, and during the recruiting process she was well aware of their bond. But she insists to this day on treating them like individuals. She recruited them separately, knowing they had different interests and personalities. Now she has seen them play together. She has seen them practice hard, play hard and spend most of their time away from the gym together. She has noticed nuances of their relationship and the friendship that has lasted so long while remaining fun, honest and productive.

"They've gone through peaks and valleys since I've gotten to know them," she says. "I think that they really have been able to work through their differences. College is a time for growing and change. They think independently. They act independently. They have their own friends independently. One may not agree with something the other one is doing and probably pass their judgment. And it takes for some mature kids to work things out."

The women's team wants to run this year. They want to get out in front of the defense and put opposing teams on their heels. It is a style of play that, according to Dacko, Mills struggled with last year because of her conditioning. But over the summer she committed to getting in shape, Rosanio says, and has come into this winter slimmed down and broad-shouldered, ready to run the floor with her old friend.

The individual successes of last season are behind them now. They don't want to talk about being All-Rookies. Mills said she wants to avoid a sophomore slump and has worked hard to get in shape, while Rosanio has worked hard to improve her defense.

After accomplishing coming so far together, an A-10 championship doesn't seem far fetched.

KAREN WINKOWSKI/COLLEGIAN

Pam Rosanio, a Southampton, Penn. native, is a vital member of the UMass basketball team and attributes friend Kate Mills to a lot of her success.

Minutewomen win decisively over Siena played physical in the first half – hit a shot from the foul line on the next possession to push the UMass lead to 25-18 with 7:31 remaining in the first half.

W. HOOPS from page 10

Siena was forced to call a timeout at the 5:36 mark after Rosanio took a defensive rebound, dribbled all the way down the court and dished it off to Mills in the paint who finished the play to give UMass the 29-18 lead, its largest of the game.

With the first half winding down, Nelson hit her second three of the game from the left corner to give UMass a 32-20 lead, Mills rolled in a baby hook shot and Rosanio hit another three from the left corner on three straight offensive possessions to give the Minutewomen a 37-26 lead to end the half.

The Tatham sisters scored the first five points of the second half for the Minutewomen, as Tamara scored twice from down on the block, Alisha hit a free throw and a hook shot and Tamara followed that with a spin move and a finish with her left hand to give UMass a 48-35 lead with just over 12 minutes to go in the game.

With UMass holding a 60-41 lead, the Minutewomen continued to pound the ball inside to T. Tatham and Mills, and they seemed to be scoring at will on the interior down the stretch.

Division, playoffs in view for Colts think they've got a great shot at it," Shula said.

COLTS from page 10

Over the past four weeks, the Colts also have demonstrated their mettle by knocking off three of the conference's top contenders – winning at two-time defending Super Bowl champ New England and AFC North leader Cincinnati before taking out Pittsburgh 26-7 on Monday night.

That also meant exorcising some old demons.

The victory over the Patriots was Indy's first in Foxborough since 1995, and Monday night's victory ended a 21-year drought against the Steelers.

Those victories have essentially eliminated all three teams from the home-field chase. That makes the Denver Broncos (9-2) the only serious contender to force the Colts out of the RCA Dome in January, when Indianapolis has been most vulnerable playing outdoors in the cold.

For now, though, it means little to the Colts, who can wrap up their third straight AFC South title with two more wins – at home Sunday against Tennessee and at Jacksonville on Dec. 11.

"We want to see if we can get that done," Dungy said. "So our focus is winning the first one. This is a very critical two-week stretch for us."

While others debate which team could derail the Colts' historic quest, staying unbeaten is not what motivates Indianapolis.

"We just need to take this step and move forward," defensive tackle Corey Simon said after the Steelers game. "We can't rest our head on what we did this week and then go out next week and not play well. We need to continue to improve."

After Tennessee and Jacksonville, the Colts have a dangerous game against San Diego, which is making a late-season push for the playoffs. It also happens to fall between an emotional contest against the Jaguars and what will likely be hyped as a Super Bowl preview at Seattle on Dec. 24.

They finish at home against Arizona, and then the Colts can finally focus on the games they've been craving since last January.

"I was talking to (Pittsburgh coach) Bill Cowher about it last night, and he said 'We went 15-1 last year and no one really cares,'" Dungy said. "It would be an honor, it would be special to go undefeated, but it won't mean anything if you don't win in the playoffs."

So Manning, the two-time MVP, and his teammates find themselves in an unusual position. Fourteen or 15 wins would assure the Colts of not playing outdoors after Dec. 24. But anything less than 16-0 may not satisfy critics.

So the Colts will focus on their stated goal of winning the Super Bowl and let others debate the definition of a perfect season.

"Going undefeated has never been our goal," Dungy said. "The teams that get remembered are not the ones who have great regular seasons, they are the ones who do something in the playoffs."

ROBERT SCHEER/INDIANAPOLIS STAR

Indianapolis Colts tight end Dallas Clark has been a major factor in 2005. So far this season, Clark has 27 catches for 349 yards and three touchdowns.

Please join us for an information session about the

Oxford Summer Seminar

Thursday, December 1st at 4:00 PM
Campus Center room 903

The Oxford Summer Seminar provides a unique opportunity for students to enjoy six weeks of residential life (July 6-August 15) at Oxford University's historic Trinity College. The seminar offers over 15 tutorial-based courses in literature, history, law, and politics. Classes are taught by British university faculty; both undergraduate and graduate-level credits may be earned.

The information session will include alums from last summer's Seminar and program administrators will describe next summer's Seminar. For more information visit the Seminar's website at www.umass.edu/oxford or you may contact the seminar via e-mail at:
oxford @english.umass.edu

Winter-Session Housing

Taking a class this winter?
Need a place to stay?
Great rates available.

Hawthorn Suites | Econo Lodge BY CHOICE HOTELS | University Lodge

413-586-0114 413-582-7077 413-256-8111
www.hampshirehospitality.com

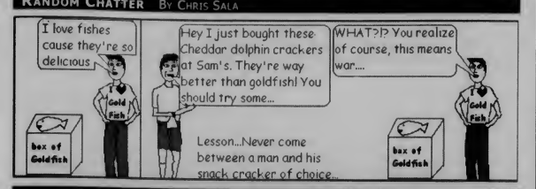
Delivery:
413.549.0077
Tel: 413.256.8923
413.256.8924
Fax: 413.253.1173

103 N. Pleasant St.
Amherst, MA

Panda East
FINE CHINESE & JAPANESE CUISINE

Featuring:
- Vegetarian options
- Lunch Specials
- Sushi Bar
- "Light and Healthy" entrees

~ We Bring China Town to you ~



Semester Special

Bring in this ad and receive 10% off your total

*Cannot be combined with any offers, coupons or OCMP.

visit us at: www.pandaeastamherst.com

RANDOM CHATTER By Chris Sala

ELSIE HOOPER By Robert D. Kryzkowski

FUNCTINOAL DYSTOPIA By Zeid Rusan

PAUL By Billy O'Keefe

TWO DUDES By Aaron Warner

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"For some people money is . . . money is a foreign film without subtitles."

—Matchstick Men

ACROSS
1 Added shading to
6 Trap
11 Bikini part
14 Interface
15 Wading bird
16 Skedaddle
17 Stackable snacks
18 Merge
19 Bambi's aunt
20 Most considerate
22 Pouchlike structures
23 ___ out (dwindled)
26 Orchid parts
28 Dodgson
29 Alimony payers
31 Keanu in "The Matrix Reloaded"
32 Ms. Turner
34 Setting off
39 Bikini, for one
41 Hot time in Paris
42 Passover feast
43 Outlawing
46 Withered
47 Scrimp
48 Despotic emperor
50 5th or Lex.
51 Female ruler
55 Was the equal of
57 Spick-and-span
58 Broadway building
60 Matter-of-fact
61 Medicate
62 Irritated
66 Mine find
67 Cacophony
68 Steel plow pioneer
69 Welsh river
70 Moppets
71 Bygone

DOWN
1 Gemini count
2 "___ the land of ..."
3 Scot's refusal
4 Draw forth
5 Craving
6 Quivered convulsively
7 Hawaii's state bird
8 Face the day
9 Decaying
10 Vane dir.
11 Lamb's lament
12 Cowboy's milieu
13 Accumulate
21 Tellot's call
22 Beaches
23 Rice dish
24 Muse of lyric poetry
25 Choir part
27 Launch forces
30 Nonviolent protest
33 Einstein or Gore
35 Gives rise to 36 Utopian
37 Brazenness
38 Avance
40 Be fond of
44 Tear down
45 Pluck
49 Carry too far
51 Provide financing for 52 Jocular
53 Check recipient
54 Rudolf Valentino role
56 Historian Durant
59 Palliate
61 Big bang letters?
63 Guided
64 Before, in poetry
65 Lair

Find today's answers online

www.dailycollegian.com

THE HARP
NEWH Wireless Internet
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted
Irish Pub
NOVEMBER SPECIAL!
$1.50 PBR Bottles; Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 A pint / $6.50 a pitcher
Tonight: • Cold Duck Complex
Thur: • 5th Pocket
Fri: • Irish Setsim
Sat: • Alchemystics
"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments

Submit your comic!

e-mail
collegiancomcis@yahoo.com

HOROSCOPES

aquarius JAN. 20-FEB. 18
You are going to need large quantities of band-aids in the near future.

pisces FEB. 19-MAR. 20
You will spend entirely too many hours at the DC today.

aries MAR. 21-APR. 19
Never underestimate the power of friendship.

taurus APR. 20-MAY 20
Watch your back, or you will be shoved into a huge mound of dirty snow.

gemini MAY 21-JUN. 21
You will get a nice new pair of earrings this holiday season.

cancer JUN. 22-JUL. 22
You will be a lot happier if you bring your laptop to class today.

leo JUL. 23-AUG. 22
Avoid ink pens today. They are far too risky.

virgo AUG. 23-SEPT. 22
Your first child will be named either Lucy or Austin, depending on gender.

libra SEPT. 23-OCT. 22
Close your windows before you go to bed tonight or you will freeze.

scorpio OCT. 23-NOV. 21
You will get a disturbing but slightly comical e-mail today.

sagittarius NOV. 22-DEC. 21
Put that money from grandma in the bank.

capricorn DEC. 22-JAN. 19
Stay away from any toothpaste that is flavored something other than mint.

★ Submit your comic ★

e-mail
collegiancomcis@yahoo.com

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Attention RSO's, Fraternities, Sororities, & Club Sports: Advertise for your events in the Classifieds! Inexpensive and effective! Call 545-3500 for more info.

APARTMENT FOR RENT

1, 2, 3 & 4 Bedroom spacious apartments, Great location, Bus Route, All utilities included No Fee Call 413-253-3000

EMPLOYMENT

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience nees. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

EMPLOYMENT

Winter Break Employment at the Boston University Bookstore! Many jobs are available through January. Stop by our JOB FAIR Dec.6 at the UMass Campus Center Concourse or email your resume to bnhmnres@bu.edu

November 30th is the last day to apply to become a legal assistant with the Student Legal Services Office. Earn 12 credits while gaining valuable experience. Hurry! Contact us at 545-1995 or stop by at 922 Campus Center to pick up an application.

EMPLOYMENT

Rent us your ears! Listening experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu Voicemail: 545-6837.

ROOM FOR RENT

413-335-5226 Mo. to mo. $325 inclusive 20 min to campus

SERVICES

Computer Diagnostic Desktop $9.95 Laptop $39.95 413-584-8857

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance. 549-1906

SERVICES

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

TRAVEL

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

TRAVEL

SPRING BREAK – Early Booking Specials – FREE Meals & Drinks - $50 Deposit – 800-234-7007 www.endlesssummer-tours.com

15 Day Fully guided tour of Italy leaving 7/20/06 $3,279 includes air hotels, breakfast and some dinners. If interested call Kathy at (413) 498-2490 or Carol at (413) 423-3654 Call by December 30th

ACT NOW – SPRING BREAKERS Book early & Save! Free meals parties by 11/7. Lowest prices. Be a rep & TRAVEL FREE! Get the ultimate hookups with STA TRAVEL 413-256-1261.

WANTED

Advertise in the Massachusetts Daily Collegian!

Whether you're looking to publish a full-page ad or a classified ad, we can cater to your advertising needs and budget.

Not sure what your ad should look like? Let our experienced graphic artists design it for you!

Advertising representatives are awaiting your calls M-F 8:30am - 3:30pm. (413) 545-3500

Or visit us in the Campus Center Basement.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Brought together by basketball

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

They started playing basketball together at 10-years-old. They were different colored jerseys when they met on the hardwood for the first time, competing for different state traveling teams in an AAU game. It was the start of a 10-year journey for Pam Rosanio and Kate Mills, one that has taken them from their respective homes in Pennsylvania and Delaware all the way to the Mullins Center hardwood — together.

Rosanio has played basketball for as long as she can remember. At 10-years-old, she was playing basketball for a Pennsylvania traveling team, challenging other squads from across the Northeast during the summers.

She met Mills there. They played each other at an AAU tournament — Mills was playing for the Delaware team — then Mills joined up with Rosanio's national team.

"You're allowed to pick up people to go to nationals so we picked her up," Rosanio recalls. "She just came to one tournament with us and she kept coming back."

She came back for the summers, the only time during the year when they would meet up. After spending June, July and August playing non-stop basketball together, they would go back to school and communication would cease. It was nothing intentional, just a natural separation that occurred during the school year. But come summertime they knew they would be together again, brought to each other by a love of the game.

What they didn't realize was how far basketball would take them together.

"We always kind of joked about it together with our families just how crazy it would be if we went to the same college," Mills says. "It just worked out that way. We made separate decisions. We both liked [UMass] for different reasons, and it just worked out well that we were able to play together."

It wasn't a typical friendship. They saw each other for just three months of the year throughout middle school and high school, and for the other nine months it was radio silence. But the intensity of the summer months and the shared love of basketball protected their bond and carried it through years of separation.

"Over the summer we were always just hanging out, talking, all this stuff," Mills says. "Then when school started we just lost contact but we got right back where we left off over the summer as soon as we saw each other again. It was kind of weird like that."

It was a relationship that only the best of friends can have: to not talk for the better part of a year, but when reunited it seemed like no separation had occurred. Mills used the word "weird", but "special" could take its place and more appropriately describe what was happening.

"We would have sleepovers at one of our houses. During the year she went to school in Delaware and I was in Pennsylvania," Rosanio says. "We were so weird sometimes because we'd never talk on the phone. During school we just stuck with our own friends and our own schools. But then when summer came and AAU started, we were right back to where we left off before. And then the same thing would happen next time."

And it would happen the next time, and the next time, until their basketball experiences brought their families together. Mills describes Rosanio's mother as a "second mom," and when they go out to dinner on parental visits to UMass, Mills often is the victim of some teasing at the hands of Rosanio's mom — the kind reserved only for the closest of family friends.

"If we go out to eat, my mom always jokes about Kate because Kate's always like, 'Ugh, I need some money to get some food,'" Rosanio says with a smile. "And my mom's like, 'Alright, I'll pay for you again.'"

It was this close-knit relationship that helped them stay in a comfort zone at UMass — a large school far from home, and a place that can engulf the students not prepared for its intensity.

"It's just the comfort level of having her here because you always have a person to be there and support you," Rosanio says. "If she's down and I'm up then I can always try to bring her up with me. We balance each other out."

KARYN WONG/COLLEGIAN

UMass women's basketball sophomore forward Kate Mills (left), who averaged 6.0 points-per-game as a freshman last year, shares her love for the game with fellow sophomore Pam Rosanio (right). The two have built a friendship that was steadied by their devotion to the Minutewomen program.

While Mills recalled joking about the prospect of going to college together, they arrived at UMass with separate goals and aspirations, most of which had nothing to do with basketball. Mills chose UMass for its engineering program, Rosanio for its educational programs. Their friendship was rooted in basketball, but ending up at UMass had nothing to do with it — it was the school that they liked, and playing for the Minutewomen together was an unexpected perk.

"It was definitely separate [decisions] because we wanted it for different things," Rosanio says of their decision to come to Amherst. "We were both looking at different schools. A bunch of other schools actually wanted us. They wanted us as a package. They wanted us together because they'd seen us play AAU together."

Northern Arizona and the Naval Academy pursued them, but those were the only two schools Rosanio could remember when asked to recall other recruiters. It seemed that there was really only one school for her.

"Pam came here and her parents told me after that after her initial visit she wanted to come here," UMass coach Marnie Dacko says. "Her parents wanted her to look at other schools. But she fell in love with the place as soon as she got here."

Once the tandem suited up for the Maroon and White last year, their individual talent, as well as their chemistry together, was showcased. They were both named to the Atlantic 10 All-Rookie team, with Rosanio leading the team in scoring (10.9 points per game) and Mills hitting her stride late in the season, starting the last seven games and averaging 9.8 points per game during that stretch.

Like a quarterback knowing his receivers or a cut-off man knowing his outfielder, Mills and Rosanio have an unspoken connection on the court. It comes from years of experience together on the hardwood and knowing the other's personality on, and off, the court. They will tell you that knowing when to pick each other up, and being an emotional punching bag every once in a while, is the key to their success and keeping their sanity during the rigors of the season.

"[We are able] to recognize when one of us is down and when the other one has to pick the other person up knowing that we aren't going to take anything to heart on the court when we get in each other's faces," Mills says. "I'm not going to take it personally and she's not going to take it personally. It's just like that, being able to push each other at the right times.

"When I'm struggling with basketball and I'm getting either frustrated or I'm kind of getting down on the game I can go to her and talk to her. She's kind of like my therapist."

It is something that most athletes don't have: a person playing with them that is willing to listen, take criticism and provide constructive criticism when the time is right. Sometimes coaches can press the wrong buttons. Sometimes captains can be out of touch with the team. But these two basketball lifers have found something that is whatever they need it to be at a certain time.

"They're like sisters without the blood," Dacko says. "It's important to have your [players] close, and it's contagious. It's nice having Tamara [Tatham] and Alisha [Tatham] as sisters, and with Pam and Kate almost sisters, there's a certain closeness that they share from many years

See TEAMMATES on page 8

UMass beats down Siena

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

In the middle of a three-game homestand, the Massachusetts women's basketball team (2-3 0-0 Atlantic 10) has three losses — all by over 10 points, all to non-conference opponents — and was looking to correct some inconsistent play that has plagued the team early this year.

UMass	71
Siena	53

UMass ended its two-game skid last night with a decisive 71-53 victory over the Siena Saints at the Mullins Center last night and will face Hofstra at 7 p.m. on tomorrow at home.

Sophomore Pam Rosanio led all scorers with 19 points followed by sophomore Kate Mills who tallied 15 points and seven boards on the night. Junior Tamara Tatham turned in a solid second half performance with eight points to build the Minutewomen's already-comfortable lead.

"We were making some mistakes here and there," redshirt senior Katie Nelson said. "We didn't really have the solid game we wanted right off the bat. We know we were making some mistakes and letting down our defense. Our energy helped us break away."

"I'm just happy with the way my team came out and played," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said.

KAREN W. TSANG/COLLEGIAN

Freshman Sakera Young, a Glassboro, N.J. native, helped the UMass women's basketball team take down Siena 71-53 at the Mullins Center last night. Young had three assists in the victory.

"I'm particularly happy with the second half. We played with a great deal of emotion and energy. That's something we really needed to improve upon."

The Minutewomen came out with a different look last night, starting redshirt senior Katie Nelson, T. Tatham, sophomore Alisha Tatham, Rosanio and senior Patrycja Gulak. Both redshirt senior Ashley Sharpton and Mills started the game on the bench, an early switch from the normal starting lineup of the Tatham sisters, Nelson, Mills and Rosanio.

Siena came out of the gate with two quick lay ups before Nelson hit a three to put the Minutewomen on the board. Rosanio then scored her first points of the game on a fast break basket to give the Minutewomen their first lead of the game at 5-4.

A. Tatham had her jump shot going in the first half, hitting two shots from the foul-line extended on the left side of the floor, giving UMass a 15-14 lead with just over 12 minutes left in the first.

UMass utilized a half court trap with about 10 minutes to go in the first half, forcing Siena guards into double teams and rushing the Saints' offense. The defense forced a few turnovers, built a five-point cushion and turned the momentum in UMass' favor.

"It's more of a scramble defense," Dacko said about the half court trap. "We're trying to extend it more with a full court situation. We knew we really had to play aggressive defense."

The Minutewomen held a 23-16 lead after Mills scored around the eight minute mark. Siena answered right back with a jump shot from the right side to cut the lead to five, but Gulak — who

See W HOOPS on page 8

Sox release spring training schedule

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Red Sox will play the rival New York Yankees once this spring, on March 22 at the Yankees' training home in Tampa.

The Red Sox released their spring training schedule on Tuesday, and it has them opening on March 2 against the Minnesota Twins.

The AL wild-card winners follow the next day with games against Boston College and Northeastern.

The Red Sox play the Florida Marlins twice, giving new pitcher Josh Beckett two chances to face his former teammates.

After breaking camp in Fort Myers, Fla., the Red Sox will play two games against the Phillies in Philadelphia before opening the regular season in Texas on April 3.

--Associated Press

Colts not focused on breaking records

By Michael Marot
Associate Press

INDIANAPOLIS — Peyton Manning and the Indianapolis Colts would define perfection as winning a Super Bowl title. Anything more would be a bonus.

But with five weeks left in the regular season, the Colts' arduous, three-decade quest to return to the Super Bowl now carries an added burden — trying to join the 1972 Miami Dolphins as the only unbeaten teams in NFL history.

Forget that the Colts are already 11-0, could clinch the AFC South title in the next two weeks and may soon wrap up a first-round bye and home-field advantage throughout the playoffs.

The big question now around Indy — and the NFL — is whether anyone can beat this team.

Coach Tony Dungy wants everyone to keep things in perspective.

"Hopefully we win the next two because that means we will wrap up the division," he said Tuesday. "If we win them, we know there will be a lot of talk about 'Can you go undefeated?' But that's never really been our goal."

What the Colts have demonstrated through September, October and November is that they can win games in almost every conceivable fashion.

Shut down Manning and the offense, and Indy can win the slugfest. Force the Colts into a shootout, and they'll score more points. Take the lead, early or late, and the Colts can rally. And if an opponent dares the Colts to protect a lead, they've proven they can run out the clock.

"It's a matter of it all coming together at the right time," running back Edgerrin James said.

How good are the Colts?

Indy hasn't trailed in a game since Oct. 17, the offense has averaged nearly 36 points in the last eight games and the defense has allowed an AFC-low 159 points.

On Monday, former Bears and Saints coach Mike Ditka said on a national radio talk show that this offense was the best he'd ever seen. Last week, Don Shula, architect of the Dolphins team that went 17-0, said he believed the Colts could continue knocking off challengers.

"As long as they stay healthy, I

See COLTS on page 8

DECEMBER

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY · EST. 1890

The Daily Collegian

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 1, 2005 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM VOLUME CXVI ISSUE 57

JAMIE LAU/COLLEGIAN

Members of the UMass police department, Student Government Association, Environmental Health and Safety office and students and parents participated in the "Walk for Light" event last night to find the parts of campus need better safety percautions.

'Walk for Light' shines trouble spots

By JAMIE MASON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Students, parents, and faculty members gathered last night to participate in the annual "Walk for Light," a walk to point out safety hazards on the University of Massachusetts campus.

A number of problem areas were found on the walk, including the path between the Worcester Dining Common and the Orchard Hill Residential Area, the area near Morrill garden and blue parking lot 63, which were noted as being poorly lit and in need of attention.

Last night was a dark night, with no moon and only a few stars. It was a good night to see how much light is on campus, said the chief of UMass police, Barbara O'Connor.

Participants were divided into groups, each of which had students, one UMass police officer and other participants. The groups followed predetermined routes around campus looking for lights that have gone out, dark places where lights need to be installed and overgrown vegetation. They also checked that call boxes were working correctly. Groups were given cameras to document the problem areas.

There were four routes that included one around the Sylvan and Northeast Residential Areas and onto East Pleasant Street; another around the parking garage, the Textbook Annex, and back around the Engineer Buildings; one that went by Morrill and up to Central and Orchard Hill residential areas; and a fourth that went by Bartlett to the Southwest Residential Area, and then continued to Haigis Mall and the Campus Pond.

Steven Woodworth, a parent of a UMass freshman, came from Boston to attend the walk.

"Most of the time, crimes are committed against women. I am always concerned for my daughter's safety. My daughter lives in Butterfield [in Central] and she plays volleyball so she walks home alone at night," Woodworth said.

See WALK on page 4

Romney speaks about possible election plans

By GLEN JOHNSON
ASSOCIATED PRESS

CARLSBAD, Calif. — Gov. Mitt Romney said Wednesday he's in no rush to declare whether he will run for re-election next year — a decision widely viewed as an indicator of whether he'll seek the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

In an interview with The Associated Press before the start of a three-day Republican Governors Association meeting where he is set to assume the chairmanship, Romney said waiting as late as his promised deadline of Dec. 20, the end of fall, not only gives him time to win approval of a universal health care plan, but also hurts the Democrats hoping to succeed him.

"I understand that Tom Reilly is very anxious for me to make a decision, so it may well be that a relatively late process hurts his campaign. In which case, I'm delighted," Romney said with a smile. "My job is not to help the campaign of the Democratic opponent, so I don't lose sleep over that."

Reilly, the attorney general, said Tuesday that Romney's out-of-state travel had become a "distraction," adding: "At some point, make up your mind. Come or go. Stay. Run. Whatever. Just do your job."

Romney also said he was not concerned his delay is hurting a potential campaign by Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey, a fellow Republican who has been raising money in anticipation of a run to succeed him. "The lieutenant governor and I have spoken about my time frame," the governor said. "She has no problem with it."

In a half-hour conversation at the La Costa Resort & Spa, Romney also said he cannot assess whether his Mormon faith would hurt him in a national campaign, but he does not believe it has impeded him in Massachusetts. One GOP activist in South Carolina political recently labeled Mormonism "a cult" and speculated Christian conservatives in the politically important South would be reluctant to vote for one as president.

Professor urges SGA action on war in Iraq

By MATT BELLIVEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Student Government Association of the University of Massachusetts was challenged to organize an effort to stop the war in Iraq during last night's Senate meeting.

Marvin Daehler, a member of the UMass Faculty Senate and Associate Chair of the Psychology department, informed the Senate of the war's impact on students and made a plea to SGA members to organize a voice against the war.

According to Daehler, in President's George Bush's five years in office, Amenca has accumulated a higher debt than any of the debts of previous president's combined.

"This war impacts all of us, especially the college students. We have spent about $500 billion on the war," said Daehler. "Who's going to pay for that? You are going to pay for it. Your children are going to pay for it. Your grandchildren are going to pay for it."

Daehler contends that the American government has gone to great lengths to prevent a student upheaval similar to the one seen during the Vietnam War.

"Why is there no military draft? There's no draft because the government learned their lesson with Vietnam," said Daehler. "If they hold a draft there will be students screaming 'Hell no, we won't go', and the government doesn't want that."

Daehler suggested that the Senate begin organizing immediately to "end this war now," combining with the efforts of other universities.

"It was a combined effort of students that stopped the Vietnam War. What began with one set of students continually grew as they reached out to other student form colleges throughout the country," said Daehler. "There is no reason a revolt couldn't start now. There is no reason it couldn't start at UMass. There is no restraint on this group from reaching out to other student governments to organize and come together to stop this war. It takes will, it takes determination, but there is no reason this couldn't be done."

The SGA Senate also voted during last night's meeting to allocate $2,206.60 to Student Valley Productions.

Student Valley Productions is a combination of three different comedic groups: "Mission Improvable", "IWA", and "Sketch 22".

JAMIE LAU/COLLEGIAN

Tyler Wolff-Ormes, treasurer of Student Valley Productions addressed the Senate last night. SVP was allocated $2,206 in funds from the SGA at last night's meeting.

Speaker Sean Bliss expressed his displeasure with the productivity, or lack there of, of the SGA committees, his anger stemming from the fact that only one of the committees held their weekly meeting.

"I spoke at great lengths in the beginning of the semester about how the effectiveness of the Senate is only as effective as our committees themselves," said Bliss. "If we don't take responsibilities seriously and make the most of them, I know a couple of guys in the Whitmore building who will. So, let's do our jobs."

The Senate also observed President Pavel Payano's 20th birthday, singing "Happy Birthday" as he entered the Cape Cod lounge in the Student Union.

The Ways and Means Committee of the student Senate will offer a budget workshop for treasurers of Registered Student Organizations. The workshop is scheduled for Dec. 5 at 5p.m. in room 168C of the Campus Center. The workshop plans to provide Registered Student Organizations (RSOs) with the necessary training to complete their yearly organization budget for the 2007 fiscal year.

According to Senator Jen Kennedy, in order to complete a budget for the 2007 fiscal year budget, an RSO representative must attend the budget workshop.

JAMIE LAU/COLLEGIAN

Helping out families

Joseph Sklut was one of many cadets from the UMass Army ROTC who volunteered their time yesterday in front of the Student Union to collect funds for the Family Outreach of the Amherst Holiday Toy Drive.

Community examines war's effects on education in Iraq

By JOHN FENUCCIO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

NORTHAMPTON—Community members from across the region gathered to discuss the effects of the Iraq war on literacy, education, and libraries in both the United States and Iraq at the Northampton Center for the Arts Tuesday night.

"Learning in a Time of War" is the inaugural event of a year-long initiative looking to explore the war's effects on literacy and educational programs such as libraries and schools. Books Building Bridges, a community-building project, hosted the event that invited four guest speakers ranging in areas of expertise to discuss the current problem.

Safaa Al-Hamdani, a biology professor at Jacksonville State University; Michéle Cloonan, dean and professor of the Graduate School of Library and Information Science at Simmons College; Pamela Schwartz, outreach director of the National Priorities Project; and Jeff Spur, an Islamic and Middle East specialist, spoke on the war's drastic effects on Iraq's declining literacy.

Education and literacy is at an all-time low in Iraq due to the daily threat of suicide and car bombs, the destruction of national museums and libraries whose librarians have been scared away. University faculty members in Iraq have been assassinated and 1,500 others were driven out. The librarians who held their ground during the conflict are the ones that Spur believes deserve our support.

"We don't know who's doing what," Al-Hamdani said. Al-Hamdani, an Iraqi native who has lived in the United States since 1979, is the founder of Books to Baghdad, a program that has sent 11,000 college textbooks and educational supplies to his alma mater, Baghdad University. Due to the current danger in Iraq, citizens are afraid to go to school or libraries for fear of their own safety.

"We need to send a clear message to Iraqis by giving them a book that Sadaam banned," Al-Hamdani said. Between previously banned literature under Hussein and looters stealing much of the Iraqi wealth, the event highlighted the United States' effort in helping to raise the quality of education. Through donating up-to-date textbooks and partnering with Simmons College to train international librarians, the United States is helping Iraq make up for years of tyrannical oppression.

Schwartz noted that during the 1970s, Iraq had a reputation of having some of the best "libraries and schools in the Middle East." But under Saddam Hussein, the majority of Iraq's wealth was squandered to creating palaces whose remnants are now being converted to libraries and education centers.

Being educated in Iraq deems one a "preferred citizen," something that hopefully more Iraqi citizens will be able to obtain through education and literacy improvements.

See WAR on page 4

ARTS & LIVING

AN UNLIKELY DUO
Kweller and NathaNson to charm Student Union Ballroom.

PAGE 6

EDITORIAL/OPINION

CAN LIGHTNING STRIKE TWICE?
In this world of second chances, are there once-in-a-lifetime limits?

PAGE 5

WEATHER

TODAY Mostly Sunny, H45°
TONIGHT Snow L30°
TOMORROW Partly Cloudy, H41°, L22°

SPORTS

UMASS HOCKEY NOTEBOOK
Minutemen rack up Hockey East accolades. Degon deep-fries and Dennehy returns to Amherst.

PAGE 12

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Michael Busack
MANAGING EDITOR Cameron J. Woods
BUSINESS MANAGER Hirak Shah
PRODUCTION MANAGER Nicholas Belanger
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Sheryl Wolnik
ADVERTISING MANAGER Kerry O'Grady
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Lauren Egavian
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Amanda Allen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Matthew O'Rourke
COPY EDITOR Amanda Allen
EDITORIAL EDITOR Allison Edles
NEWS EDITOR Dan O'Brien
PHOTO EDITOR Kate Sachsenmaier
SPORTS EDITOR Jeff Howe
CIRCULATION MANAGER Thomas Hecht
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Nick Gleason
FINANCE MANAGER Daniel Conti
HUMAN RESOURCE Phil Smoller
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Caren Tortorici
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Nathan Chomsky
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Mackenzie Isler
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Ian Jones
ASSISTANT NEWS Megan Dales
ASSISTANT NEWS Ran Bellineau
ASSISTANT PHOTO Elizabeth Carusi
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eric Athas
ASSISTANT SPORTS Dan Duggan
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Kristen LaCasse

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS ACADEMIC SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS AN INDEPENDENT, STUDENT-OPERATING, NON-PROFIT NEWSPAPER. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SCIENCE (c. 1901), THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN (c. 1914) AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN (c. 1936). PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 5:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Sheryl Wolnik
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Jamie Lau
COPY EDITOR
Meghan Murphy
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Ginny Nielsen
PRODUCTION STAFF
Kristen LaCasse, Chris Martin

New England news in brief

From the Associated Press

Board of Ed. says state is failing some schools

MALDEN — The head of the state Board of Education said the state has "failed" to improve underperforming schools and radical change is needed, including possibly giving charge over struggling schools to private companies.

Chairman James Peyser's comments Tuesday came before the board for the first time rejected improvement plans by underperforming schools.

The split 4-4 vote on plans by three schools — two in Springfield, one in New Bedford — came over the objection of Education Commissioner David Driscoll, who said he "would almost plead" with the board to accept the plans.

Driscoll, while supporting the call for faster improvement, said rejection would be a major blow to the schools, who crafted their plans following current rules with guidance from the department. He also said it would leave the state's underperforming schools wondering what's now expected of them.

Peyser said it was pointless to endorse plans produced under a system that offers only incremental progress as its best result.

The plans were submitted by the Normandin Middle School in New Bedford, and Springfield Academy for Excellence and Brightwood School, both in Springfield.

Despite the board's rejection, the schools must by law apply the plans. Officials said they would do so, despite the board's message that the whole process is flawed.

Divers search Plymouth pond for third day

PLYMOUTH — Divers searched a third day Tuesday for a 21-year-old woman and 16-year-old boy who were presumed dead after their canoe capsized on a pond.

They were expected to resume looking on Wednesday at Great South Pond for Brian Raleigh, 16, of Plymouth, and Ashley Coury, 21, of Delray, Fla.

Raleigh and Coury were among four people in the canoe when it capsized late Saturday night. The two others — Coury's boyfriend, Dan Madden, 20, also of Delray, and Michael Raleigh, 22, Brian's half-brother, from Plymouth — were rescued and treated for symptoms of hypothermia.

The only items recovered so far are the canoe, a sneaker, a baseball cap and a couple beer cans found floating near shore shortly after the accident, Plymouth Fire Chief Jim Pierson said.

Police Capt. Michael Botieri on Tuesday declined to comment on any aspect of the investigation into the accident's cause, including whether alcohol may have been a factor.

Family members of the victims issued a statement Tuesday saying: "Alcohol was not the cause of this agonizing tragedy ... These four beautiful people merely wanted to share a special end to a wonderful day by taking what they intended to be a short canoe ride on a still, tranquil pond on a clear and beautiful evening.

"They simply did not realize that four people were too many for a canoe, or that the water was as cold as it was," the family said.

The four had attended a birthday party for one of their grandmothers earlier Saturday evening in Braintree, about 35 miles northwest of Plymouth. Afterward they headed to a family home at the pond and went out in the canoe, without life jackets and despite temperatures in the 30s, Pierson said.

Romney seeks funds for prison workers

BOSTON — Gov. Mitt Romney is asking lawmakers to approve an additional $12.8 million to avoid hundreds of layoffs at prisons across the state.

In a letter sent to lawmakers Tuesday, Romney cited several reasons for the extra spending, including increased fuel and medical costs and a four percent growth in the Department of Correction's inmate population in the current fiscal year.

Without the additional funding, Romney said the department will have to make over 300 layoffs starting Jan. 1.

"Such an action may imperil the safety of the remaining employees at DOC, the inmates, and the public," Romney said in the funding request sent to lawmakers.

Romney said there are sufficient state funds currently available to fill the gap. The additional funds will let the Department of Corrections maintain their current staffing levels, he said.

Calls to officials from a union representing prison guards were not immediately returned.

Haverhill woman charged in fatal crash

ANDOVER — Police are seeking to charge a Haverhill woman involved in a two-car accident that killed a New Hampshire woman and her unborn daughter.

Susan McNamara, 39, has been cited with two misdemeanor counts of negligent operation of a motor vehicle resulting in death, Lt. James D. Hashem told the Eagle-Tribune of Lawrence. McNamara was driving on the wrong side of the road, police said.

McNamara's car struck a vehicle driven by Krista Raymond, 22, who was eight months pregnant. Raymond was killed, along with her unborn child.

In the Nov. 17 crash, McNamara was turning left out of a day-care center on Route 28 in Andover, and struck Raymond's car. Raymond was on her way to a surprise baby shower at another day-care center, Bright Horizons Family Solutions in North Reading, where she worked.

"She was traveling north in the southbound lane when the two vehicles collided," Hashem said of McNamara.

McNamara, who along with her three children was not injured, will be summonsed before a Lawrence District Court magistrate, who will decide if formal charges should be filed. She could face up to a total of five years in jail.

Cops, feds shut down global drug ring in Boston

BOSTON — Police and federal agents shut down an international drug trafficking ring, arresting 78 people and seizing hundreds of pounds of heroin in near-simultaneous raids across Colombia and the United States, authorities in the two countries said Wednesday.

Authorities said the ring brought heroin from labs in Colombia to Boston, New York, Chicago and Orlando, Fla. Seventeen people were arrested in Massachusetts, where the ring was selling heroin in Everett and Lynn, authorities said.

The DEA said the smugglers concealed bricks of heroin inside the porcelain frames of paintings. They also allegedly sewed heroin into the lining of clothing and the soles of shoes.

U.S. Attorney Michael Sullivan announced the arrests in Massachusetts.

The DEA said 19 people were arrested in Colombia, including the alleged leaders of the drug ring, Alberto Bejarano-Ospina and Gonzalo Salazar-Oliveros. They are charged with distribution of and conspiracy to distribute heroin. They are now subject to extradition to the United States.

During the yearlong investigation, authorities also seized $1.4 million in cash and 20 weapons.

Worcester mayor announces run for lieutenant governor

WORCESTER— Mayor Timothy Murray will run for lieutenant governor next year, saying there is a need for a strong voice on Beacon Hill for the state's cities and towns.

"For too long, there has been a disconnect and lack of understanding (at the Statehouse) of the issues and problems facing our municipalities," Murray told the Telegram & Gazette of Worcester Tuesday following a city council meeting.

Murray, a Democrat, was recently elected to a third term as mayor.

The 37-year-old lawyer has filed papers with the state Office of Campaign and Political Finance, allowing him to raise money as a candidate for lieutenant governor.

Three others seeking the Democratic nomination for lieutenant governor are Deborah Goldberg, a former chairman of the Brookline Board of Selectmen; Andrea Silbert, of Harwich, co-founder and former chief executive of the Center for Women and Enterprise; and Dr. Sam Kelley, of Cohasset.

Westfield Mayor Richard Sullivan, a Democrat, said earlier this month that he is also considering a run, but has not made a final decision.

Salisbury grave robber sentenced to 18 months

NEWBURYPORT — A Salisbury man was sentenced to serve 18 months in prison after he pleaded guilty Tuesday to charges of breaking into a crypt and removing remains, authorities said.

Neil Goodwin, 19, will serve that time after his one-year sentence for violation of probation, the Essex district attorney's office said in a statement.

Goodwin pleaded guilty in Newburyport District Court to charges of disinterring a body, and disturbing a grave. Prosecutors said he broke into a Newburyport cemetery crypt on Aug. 17.

Judge Peter Doyle sentenced Goodwin to 2 1/2 years in the House of Correction, with 18 months to be served. Upon his release, Goodwin will be on probation for three years.

The judge also ordered Goodwin to be evaluated by the court clinic. Goodwin also must make restitution to the city, with the amount to be determined at a hearing in January.

UMASS AMHERST UNIVERSITY PRODUCTIONS & CONCERTS PRESENTS:

BEN KWELLER
with Matt Nathanson

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 2, 2005
CAMPUS CENTER AUDITORIUM
DOORS OPEN AT 7:30 PM. SHOW STARTS AT 8:00 PM

$8 UMASS STUDENTS
$12 FIVE COLLEGE STUDENTS
$15 GENERAL PUBLIC
AVAILABLE AT THE DOOR.

Accelerated Culinary Arts Certificate Program

THE CULINARY INSTITUTE OF AMERICA

Raise the Bar on Your Career Possibilities

Increase the Marketability of Your Bachelor's Degree in Hospitality and Tourism Management, Food Science, or Nutrition

In just 30 weeks of cooking, studying wine, developing menus, and exploring culinary trends, you will:

- Gain new skills and insight into culinary techniques, ingredients, and cuisines
- Heighten your ability to work with chefs and lead a culinary operation
- Learn in an inspiring setting in the heart of America's wine country

Program Dates:
July 24, 2006–March 9, 2007

Space is Limited, so Apply Now!
Applications are due May 1, 2006.

www.ciaprochef.com/acap
707-967-2497

The Culinary Institute of America at Greystone
Napa Valley, California

The CIA at Greystone is a branch of the CIA, Hyde Park, NY.
©2005 The Culinary Institute of America

Fisheries killing more fish than regulated

By John Heilprin
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Commercial fisheries in the U.S. kill a pound of fish for every four pounds intentionally caught, jeopardizing efforts to restore some struggling stocks, scientists said Wednesday.

A tally of the nation's yearly unintentional "bycatch" — unwanted fish that are caught and, in most cases, die before being thrown overboard — was conducted by scientists Jennie Harrington, Andrew Rosenberg and Ransom Myers.

Their peer-reviewed study, sponsored by the environmental group Oceana and published in the December issue of Fish and Fisheries magazine, found that 1.2 billion tons of fish annually are left for dead with every 4 billion tons caught in commercial nets.

"We can and should do better," said Rosenberg, dean of the University of New Hampshire's College of Life Sciences and Agriculture and member of a federal commission that studied ocean policy. "This sort of waste undermines efforts to recover those depleted resources."

Most of the fish — such as skates, monkfish, swordfish, tunas, sharks, salmon and halibut — are snared by shrimpers' nets in the Gulf of Mexico or in the huge trawling nets some vessels use to reach the ocean floor.

The Gulf's shrimpers, for example, catch 114,000 tons of shrimp a year but discard four times that weight in snappers, mackerel, Atlantic croaker, crabs and porgies.

The Northeast had the third highest discard rate in the nation, with nearly half a ton of fish discarded for every ton caught.

The New England groundfish fishery — which includes popular commercial species such as cod, flounder and haddock — discarded almost double the weight of fish caught. According to the report, 540,000 tons of groundfish were caught in 2002-2003, but 977,000 tons was bycatch, with spiny dogfish, skates and monkfish among the most discarded species.

Some scientists say most fisheries unintentionally kill one pound of fish for every four pounds intentionally caught.

The study said bycatch was "especially detrimental" in fisheries that are struggling to rebuild, such as New England groundfish, because the bycatch often includes juveniles from depleted species, such as cod.

Boston homicides reach 10-year high; 66 killings in 2005

BOSTON (AP) — A pair of shooting deaths brought the number of homicides in Boston this year to 66, matching a 10-year high in a city that had made strides in curbing violent crime.

A 17-year-old boy found with multiple gunshot wounds late Monday night in the city's Roxbury section died the next day at Boston Medical Center, police said. Another 17-year-old who was shot in the head on Thanksgiving, also in Roxbury, was also pronounced dead on Tuesday.

The 66 homicides surpassed last year's 12-month total with a full month left in the year. It matches the 2001 total as the highest since the 96 homicides in Boston in 1995 and continues a trend of rising gun violence in some neighborhoods over the past few years.

"There's so many guns out there," Mayor Thomas Menino said Tuesday in an interview with The Boston Globe. "It is so frustrating."

Menino said he wants to create an anonymous call-in center that could pay tipsters for information about illegal guns in an attempt to curb the growing murder rate.

Forty-two of this year's homicides were caused by guns, 16 were stabbings, and eight were by other means, according to police records.

Boston, with a population of around 570,000, still has a relatively low rate of violent crime compared to other large U.S. cities. But a trend that saw the number of homicides drop from 152 in 1990 to just 31 in 1999 appears to have reversed. Sixty or more killings have now been recorded in four of the past five years.

Investigators have arrested or identified suspects in 20 of the 66 cases — a rate of just 30 percent, a 10-year low. The next lowest was 2004, when suspects were identified or charged in 34 percent of the 64 homicide cases.

The Boston Police Department has a patrol force of about 1,300, down some 200 officers from five years ago. Commissioner Kathleen M. O'Toole said last month that she needs to restore those positions to help stem the rising crime rate.

Police say more than 300 shootings in the city have killed or injured people this year.

"This isn't the Wild West," Menino said. "This is the city of Boston."

11-year-old at center of feeding tube dispute

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — Doctors are split over whether the state should remove the feeding tube from a comatose 11-year-old West Springfield girl at the center of a right-to-die legal battle after she was allegedly beaten by her adoptive parents.

According to court documents released Wednesday, two doctors for Haleigh Poutre agree she should be removed from her ventilator, but one of them is opposed to removing her feeding tube.

If she is taken off the ventilator but continues to receive nourishment through the feeding tube, Haleigh would die "anytime from several weeks up to two months," the doctors said.

"Without the feeding tube, the child's demise would likely occur in a substantially shorter period of time," according to the documents.

The documents don't explain why the doctors are split over the issue.

Haleigh has been virtually brain dead since being hospitalized in September with brain stem injuries. Authorities say she was beaten nearly to death by her aunt and her husband, who were the girl's adoptive parents.

The state Department of Social Services now has custody of the girl and is seeking to end her life support.

Denise Monteiro, a spokeswoman for the agency, declined to comment on the case Wednesday, but said Haleigh remains hospitalized in critical condition.

A Juvenile Court judge has approved the agency's request to take Haleigh off life support, but that decision is being appealed before the state's highest court, which will hear arguments in the case next week.

Haleigh's aunt, Holli Strickland, and her husband were charged with beating the 11-year-old.

Holli Strickland was fatally shot in what police say was either a double murder or a murder-suicide. The husband, Jason Strickland, is out on bail after pleading innocent to assault and battery charges.

Associated Press

Alexander PringWilson sits in court with his lawyers in 2004.

Former Harvard grad gets bail relaxed

By Denise Lavoie
Associated Press

CAMBRIDGE — A former Harvard graduate student convicted of manslaughter will get the conditions of his bail relaxed while he awaits a new trial in the fatal stabbing of an 18-year-old Cambridge man.

Alexander Pring-Wilson, 27, of Colorado Springs, Colo., was convicted in October 2004 in the 2003 death of Michael Colono. He had served about eight months of a six- to eight-year sentence when Middlesex Superior Court Judge Regina Quinlan ordered a new trial.

Pring-Wilson was released on $400,000 cash bail in July, and since then has been confined to his apartment 24 hours a day, essentially under house arrest.

On Wednesday, Pring-Wilson's lawyer asked Quinlan to relax the conditions of his bail by allowing him to leave his apartment for several hours a day, several times a week, so he can work and run personal errands such as grocery shopping.

Quinlan said she plans to allow Pring-Wilson to leave his apartment during the day so that he can work, but will place him under a curfew at night, from 6 p.m. to 8 a.m.

The judge said she will investigate whether Pring-Wilson can wear a global positioning device that will track his movements at all times. If that cannot be arranged, the judge said she plans to have him continue wearing his electronic monitoring bracelet. But instead of being confined to his home 24 hours a day, he will be allowed to leave during the day.

Prosecutors opposed the move and said strict bail conditions were needed to ensure Pring-Wilson shows up for his trial.

"Mr. Pring-Wilson — having had a taste of what state prison is like — has as much incentive – if not more – now to flee than he did before," said Assistant District Attorney Adrienne Lynch.

Pring-Wilson's attorney, J. Peter Parker, said Pring-Wilson's longtime girlfriend has now moved to Massachusetts and is living with him, representing what he called a "tie to Massachusetts" that should reassure the court that Pring-Wilson will not flee before his trial.

A probation officer told the judge that Pring-Wilson has complied with the bail conditions during the five months since he has been out of prison. He also noted that Pring-Wilson lives about 200 yards from an airport. His lawyer would not say where he is currently living.

THE BLACK CROWES
WITH SPECIAL GUESTS
MY MORNING JACKET
NORTH MISSISSIPPI ★★★ ALLSTARS ★★★

NEW YORK CITY
MADISON SQUARE GARDEN
NEW YEAR'S EVE 2005
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 31

CHOICE SEATS TO BE AVAILABLE THIS SAT, DEC 3. TICKETS AT TICKETMASTER.COM ONLY. BE SURE TO LOG ON EARLY!

TICKETS AT SELECT ticketmaster LOCATIONS, TICKETMASTER.COM, AND CHARGE BY PHONE: (212) 307-7171
ANGELUS www.blackcrowes.com RONDELSHER PRESENTS

OPEN FORUMS

Meet the candidates for the position of Associate Vice Chancellor
Center for Student Development

Dr. Bryan Samuel
Interim Director of Multicultural Affairs
University of Nebraska at Kearney
December 1, 2005, Campus Center 917
1:45 p.m. - 3:15 p.m.

Mr. Byron Bullock
Dean of Enrollment Management
Saint Augustine's College, Raleigh, NC
December 5, 2005, Campus Center 917
1:45 p.m. - 3:15 p.m.

Dr. Miriam Feldblum
Senior Director for Academic Support & Planning
Special Assistant to the President
California Institute of Technology
December 8, 2005, Campus Center 917
1:45 p.m. - 3:15 p.m.

Resumes will be available at the Open Forums

Student Affairs and Campus Life

Bush gives no exit strategy for Iraq in speech to the nation

By Deb Reichmann
Associated Press

ANNAPOLIS, Md. — President Bush gave an unflinching defense of his war strategy on Wednesday, refusing to set a timetable for U.S. troop withdrawals and asserting that once-shaky Iraqi troops are proving increasingly capable. Democrats dismissed his words as a stay-the-course speech with no real strategy for success.

Bush recalled that some Iraqi security forces once ran from battle, and he said their performance "is still uneven in some parts." But he also said improvements have been made in training and Iraqi units are growing more independent and controlling more territory.

"This will take time and patience," said Bush, who is under intense political pressure as U.S. military deaths in the war rise beyond 2,100 and his popularity sits at the lowest point of his presidency.

Bush's speech at the U.S. Naval Academy, the first of at least three he'll give between now and the Dec. 15 Iraqi elections, did not outline a new strategy for the nearly three-year-old war. Rather, it was intended as a comprehensive answer to mounting criticism and questions. Billed as a major address, it brought together in a single package the administration's arguments for the war and assertions of progress on military, economic and political tracks.

The address was accompanied by the release of a White House document titled "Our National Strategy for Victory in Iraq" – a report that House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi dismissed as "35 pages of rhetoric on old sound bites." Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., called Bush's speech "lipstick" on a failed Iraqi strategy. "If things on the ground in Iraq are as rosy as the picture the president painted today, then we should be able to begin to bring our troops home in 2006," he said.

Bush spoke to a friendly audience of midshipmen. They welcomed the president by singing him the Navy fight song. At the end, they chanted in unison, 'Fire it up!' 'Fire it up!'

The president said the U.S. military's role in Iraq will shift from providing security and fighting the enemy nationwide to more specialized operations targeted at the most dangerous terrorists. "We will increasingly move out of Iraqi cities, reduce the number of bases from which we operate and conduct fewer patrols and convoys," the president said.

Still, Bush remained steadfastly opposed to imposing a deadline for leaving Iraq.

"Many advocating an artificial timetable for withdrawing our troops are sincere – but I believe they're sincerely wrong," Bush said. "Pulling our troops out before they've achieved their purpose is not a plan for victory."

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada called on the president to release a strategy that has military, economic and political benchmarks that must be met. "Simply staying the course is no longer an option," Reid said. "We must change the course."

Grateful Dead asks Web site to halt free music downloads

By Dan Goodes
Associated Press

Late Grateful Dead frontman Jerry Garcia performs at a show shortly before his death in 1995.

SAN FRANCISCO — The Grateful Dead, the psychedelic jam band that toured for three decades, has angered some of its biggest fans by asking a nonprofit Web site to halt – at least temporarily – the free downloading of concert recordings.

Representatives for the band earlier this month directed the Internet Archive, a site that catalogues content on Web sites, to stop making recordings of the group's concerts available for download, band spokesman Dennis McNally said Wednesday.

Fans, who for decades have freely taped and traded the band's live performances, quickly initiated an online petition that argued the band shouldn't change the rules midway through the game.

"The internet archive has been a resource that is important to all of us," the petition states. "Between the music, and interviews in the archive we are able to experience the Grateful Dead fully."

Representatives of the group, which disbanded in 1995 following the death of guitarist and lead singer Jerry Garcia, haven't reached a final decision about whether they will ultimately permit the Internet Archive and other sites to offer free live recordings, McNally said. He said a compromise could be reached that allows some downloading of specific songs or shows.

The Grateful Dead once set concert attendance records and generated millions of dollars in revenue from extensive tours.

Walk for Light finds possible spots of danger around UMass

An inspector from the Environmental Health and Safety organization speaks with Steven Woodworth, a UMass parent, and UMPD officer Allen Silva about safety plans during last night's "Walk for Light."

WALK from page 1

Albertina Navarro attended the walk as a representative of the Every woman's Center. She said, "It is vital for students to feel safe on their own campus. We are looking for the areas that need security enhancements in order to provide better safety to students."

"I want to make UMass a safer and better school," said Stephen Aman, a sophomore student and member of the Student Government Association.

Bernie Melby, director of UMass Health Services, says that as a community member and a member of the UMass faculty, she wants not only herself, but all students to feel safe.

"I think it's a good thing to participate in and a good community service piece. I am also on campus at night," Melby said.

The governor of Orchard Hill Area Government, Andrew Taft, says he is concerned with how well areas are lit, including the trail that runs between Orchard Hill and Northeast, known by some as "the rape trail" for its darkness and obscurity. "I am concerned with issues of lighting on the rape trail and the area from Worcester Dining Common to Orchard Hill," he said.

O'Connor explains that the results of the Walk for Light walk will create tasks that will be divided up by different organizations on campus.

"The findings will be compiled and the trimming and trees will be taken care of by Pat Daly, the director of the physical plant. I handle the help phones, getting new ones put in and broken ones fixed," O'Connor said.

"The trimming of trees will be done right away once the list is compiled; the lights take more time [because] it depends on if there is already a circuit in place," Pat Daly said.

On one walk it was reported that between the Fine Arts Center and the Franklin Dining Common it is too dark next to the greenhouses. There were broken lights at the Morrill Science Center as well as overgrown vegetation.

"With the pine trees next to the building, you get the sense that someone could be hiding in the corner," said O'Connor.

A menu of options will be considered to make this path safer, such as more call boxes, more lights and security cameras.

"Generally, people don't feel the need to use call boxes; most people use their cell phones, but the call boxes give the perception of safety," said O'Connor. "It is common practice on most campuses to have these walks to check for safety issues. We have done it for a number of years. It gets everyone thinking about safety."

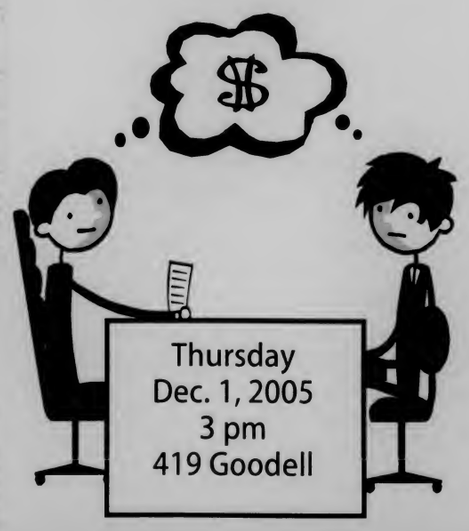
Education in war examined

WAR from page 1

"One way to fix Iraq is through education. I think we can improve the relationship between Iraq and the United States," Al-Hamdani said.

Schwartz also gave startling figures as far as the cost of the Iraq war. The $223 billion that has been spent on the war "could pay close to four million school teachers." If the United States shifted the budget slightly, improvements can be made, she said.

As Cloonan described her efforts in training librarians with Simmons College, she spoke of the simple pleasure Iraqis enjoy with their newfound freedom.



"People brought families [to the training.] One brought a little boy, who was running throughout the streets. When I asked why, his mother said, 'We can't do this back home [in Iraq].'" Cloonan said.

Despite one's position on the war, there's no doubt Iraqis need help in rebuilding all aspects of their lives. What was once one of the wealthiest nations in the Middle East is now a war-torn disaster area, where sense of national-self has been destroyed along with the museums holding their national history.

With programs such as "Learning in a Time of War," Books Building Bridges is helping to raise awareness of our national responsibility to help. With more events planned throughout the year, all are encouraged to attend and donate, whether it's money, textbooks, computers, printers; all are needed and will be appreciated.

Is it time to negotiate your salary?

Learn when and how to negotiate your salary!

Thursday
Dec. 1, 2005
3 pm
419 Goodell

phone 413-545-2224
fax 413-545-4426
www.umass.edu/careers

CareerServices

Career Services Office
UMass Amherst
511 Goodell Building

a division of Student Affairs & Campus Life

IT IS RAINING MONEY AT...

THE DAILY COLLEGIAN!!

Apply now and catch some cash!!

T-Shirts

YOUR DESIGN OR LOGO!

with this coupon get

Sunraise

322 Russell Street • Hadley, MA 01035
E-mail. print@sunraiseinc.com www.sunraiseinc.com

586-7133

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 1, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." – Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

A blessing in disguise

Paige Cram

Two weeks ago, I got hit by lightening ... literally. As thunderstorms rocked the town of Amherst, my unsuspecting roommates and I sat safely doing our work, or so we thought. For those of you who don't know what happens when lightening strikes a house, there's an extremely loud popping sound, and in our case, sparks. In the instant before it struck, I saw the bolt outside my bedroom window, but as the lights flickered and my room lit up with blue light, I had no idea what had happened. It took the three of us that were home a few frantic, panicky minutes to put two and two together.

Luckily there was no major damage (except for my roommate's TV, which may never be the same), but it got me thinking. Does that mean I'm safe from freak accidents for 10 years, 20? For life even? The odds of a house getting hit by lightening as far as I know are pretty slim, so does that mean my turn is over? And if that's the case with lightening, does it work the same with other unpleasant events in our lives?

> Ventriloquist Willie Tyler once said, "The reason lightning doesn't strike twice in the same place is that the same place isn't there the second time."

We spend so much time worrying, afraid that the bad things that have happened to us in the past will somehow happen again. As we get older, and we experience more, the list of things from which we need to protect ourselves grows longer. For some reason, we tend to be more afraid of the things we have already survived than those we have yet to face. Childhood bullies leave us constantly worried we won't be accepted; the deaths of loved ones leave us pessimistic of others' survival. We avoid the activities that once broke our bones and the people who once broke our hearts. But realistically, what are the odds? What are the odds that we will make the same mistakes or suffer the same ill fate a second time around?

Last spring I was in Switzerland, and I had the opportunity to go night sledding in the Alps. I hesitated at first because just over a year before, I had broken my first and only bone in a sledding debacle right here at UMass. Given that it was a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity, there was no way I could turn it down, so I played the odds, and although I may never become a championship sledder, I survived with all bones intact and felt that at least this time, I'd had a stroke of luck.

My heart has needed mending more than once in my lifetime, but never for the same reasons. I've said goodbye to close friends and significant others, and the more it happens, the more I'm convinced that I've paid my dues. There may not be a once-in-lifetime limit to heartbreak, but it sure is nice to think that once we reach our pain threshold, we'll be set for life.

Ventriloquist Willie Tyler once said, "The reason lightning doesn't strike twice in the same place is that the same place isn't there the second time." He may have made a living speaking through a dummy, but maybe he had a point. Maybe the reason we're safe from having the same bad experiences over and over again is simply because we learn. Maybe what makes us avoid the things that have hurt us is not fear, but wisdom. Maybe it's not odds or luck that will keep my house from being struck again; it's the fact that I realized I need a damn lightning rod.

So maybe we can never really be sure that we won't experience the same pain or be hurt in the same way ever again. But we can have faith in the lessons we've learned and trust that our instincts have improved just a little over the years. If lightening never strikes the same place twice, then it's good to know that I'm safe for a while. Sure, I may someday break another bone, but it probably won't be in a sledding accident.

Paige Cram is a Collegian columnist

Fixing illegal immigration

David Shenkenberg

According to CNN, George Bush will address illegal immigration in a speech this week, so I felt it pertinent to write this column. His plan includes a guest worker program, which is an excellent idea. I have read and heard some views recently which do not present illegal immigration as a problem. CNN anchor Larry King has a permissive attitude, and I read a recent article from a writer at the Daily Texan, the official university publication of the University of Texas, that overlooked the problems of immigration. I present to you that illegal immigration is a problem and a guest worker program is the best solution for it.

According to the 2000 U.S. Census, there are an estimated eight million illegal immigrants in this country. According to the INS, nearly 70 percent are Mexican nationals, so they will receive some more treatment in this article.

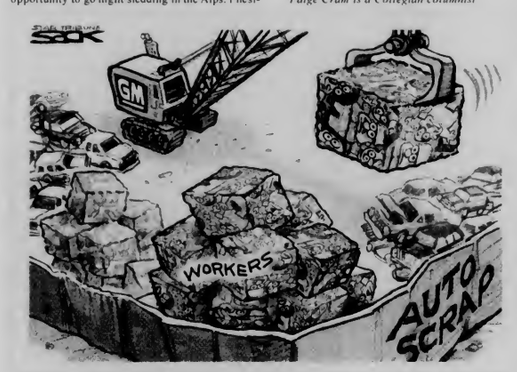
Illegal immigrants are seeking employment without skills and without the ability to speak the language of business. 800,000 illegal immigrants are illiterate, according to the National Right to Read Foundation. This poses a problem. They need special attention in school and they do not work in higher-paying jobs, so they need money from other people's taxes to fund their schools.

Vicente Fox, the president of Mexico, said that illegal immigrants from Mexico take jobs that no one wants, yet this is ignorant of the unskilled workers that exist in the United States. According to the Center for Immigration Studies, a think-tank, the amount of wages declined in 1990 but the amount of unskilled native-born people decreased. Any economics student can tell you that the wages for workers should increase when they become scarce, but they did not because illegal immigrants were taking the jobs.

Illegal immigrants make up four to seven percent of all criminals held in jail, according to the National Academy of Science's 1998 report. This means an average annual cost of more than $30,000 per inmate for the illegal aliens occupying our jails, let alone the damage that their crimes physically cause. Illegal immigrants account for 95 percent of all warrants for homicide, of which they have over 1,000, and two-thirds of all fugitive felony warrants in Los Angeles, according to Heather MacDonald of The City Journal.

> If we militarize the border as comical past presidential candidate Pat Buchanan or he-who-has-no-friends Bill O'Reilly advocates, we will dishonor our immigrants, because killing is what the Army is trained to do.

The Southern Border States have the biggest challenge in regards to illegal immigration, but illegal immigrants also move to other states. The hospital in the town where I was raised, Valley Baptist Medical Center in Harlingen, Texas, receives large amounts of crisis pay every year because of illegal immigration. This is because illegal immigrants abuse emergency room policy, but I will let Senator John McCain tell you this:



"Federal law requires all hospitals to accept and treat all patients in need of medical care, regardless of immigration status or ability to pay. Unfortunately, this mandate does not ensure adequate compensation for the care they provide. Although this situation is most critical for our border regions, the states as far north as New York are being affected. If left unaddressed, this will quickly become a national emergency."

The guest worker program is the best answer in a long time; in fact, John McCain endorsed it in the same speech. If we militarize the border as comical past presidential candidate Pat Buchanan or he-who-has-no-friends Bill O'Reilly advocates, we will dishonor our immigrant history and possibly kill immigrants, because killing is what the Army is trained to do. While illegal immigration is a problem for U.S. citizens, we need not forget those who come here to lead a better life and are willing to work hard to do so.

Illegal immigration is bad for illegal immigrants, too. If you have read Upton Sinclair's "The Jungle," the Lithuanian immigrants in the novel are duped into buying a house without functioning utilities and with hidden costs. This still goes on today in what are called colonies or "colonias" in South Texas. In addition, Starr County, a county in South Texas, is the third poorest in the nation. Don't take my word for it, read the article from the Save the Children charity entitled, "Starr County, Texas: One of America's Poorest Counties." Illegal immigrants sometimes literally become slave labor, too. In May of this year, law enforcement broke up a prostitution ring in Brooklyn. Also this year, a couple in Michigan allegedly sexually abused and whipped an African girl with a belt.

A guest worker program is the best answer to this out-of-control problem, because it gives illegal immigrants a formula to find a way to enter our country and fit in without suffering abuse and without abusing the system.

David Shenkenberg is a UMass graduate student.

We need more classes on the finer points of life

Gilad Skolnick

We come out of a university after three to seven years with a beautiful degree, fully knowledgeable in our area of concentration, yet unfortunately there is a lot of critical knowledge that we are never required to learn in order to attain this degree.

We need to know so much to be able to function in society, all of which we are expected to simply pick up on our own. We can know the works of multiple philosophers by heart, but to get a degree we are allowed to have no idea how a car works, allowing us to live a lifetime of being ripped off by mechanics. There is no class on how to have a good conversation: think how complicated the whole process is; I'm sure we all know people who don't know when to stop talking, ask too many questions or not enough. We need a course like "Conversations with Humans 101."

My beautiful Bachelor of Arts degree didn't require me to take one class on how to bargain or negotiate, cooking or how to understand the stock market, mutual funds and interest rates. I have to learn that on my own or hope that I never make enough money to worry about that stuff. Not to mention that learning how to properly pack would have saved me a lot of pain over the past few years; a simple class teaching how to fold my clothes and pack in a safe yet efficient manner would have been a lifesaver. The fine science of folding clothes is underappreciated and undervalued in our society; yet mastering this provides an abundance of power and control over your room. Are we expected to be born with this knowledge or learn it on the dangerous Internet?

> Our UMass degree doesn't teach us the fine art of rioting etiquette, how to make our own fake IDs, laugh or how to understand the delicate technique of tongue-in-cheek humor and satire.

Our UMass degree doesn't teach us the fine art of rioting etiquette, how to make our own fake IDs, laugh or how to understand the delicate technique of tongue-in-cheek humor and satire. This has been one of the biggest shocks of all for me. It's an individual thing if you find "Gulliver's Travels" funny (it's a work of satire for those of you whose knowledge of the book consists of picture books), if you can smile or chuckle when you come across a simple hyperbole, but the understanding and comprehension of facetious remarks, parody, sarcasm, etc. as being what it is: that's the great challenge.

My many sarcastic columns, like the one where I accused alpaeas of being underachievers and giving mean looks, were merely an attempt to lighten the mood. After all, the news can be depressing, with the rate of people infected with HIV in Swaziland at 43 percent, the threat of an Avian Influenza epidemic, radical Islamic terrorists that recently attacked a wedding in Jordan killing dozens upon dozens of civilians, a recent series of hurricanes wreaking havoc along the Gulf Coast, our polar iceceaps melting and still not really knowing where Dick Cheney is.

Sometimes we need to lighten up, laugh, and relax. Next time you see someone making an absurd statement, I suggest, if time permits, that you grab some chocolate, preferably something interesting like Reese's peanut butter cups, and try to smile.

Gilad Skolnick is a Collegian columnist.

Prescription drugs: why care?

Gregg Brennan

The issue of prescription drug costs has never been hotter than it is today. At first glance, from the perspective of the college student, the issue of increasing drug costs seems far off our radar. It seems like it is the last thing to be thinking about, especially with the upcoming finals. Besides, most college students are healthy and don't need prescriptions right now, but what about later in life?

How many college students do you think have taken prescription drugs? The term prescription drug invokes names such as Cialis, Viagra, Vioxx (for arthritis) and Lipitor (for cholesterol). I personally don't know any college student who takes Viagra, but I do know a lot who take Accutane for acne treatment.

I bet you know someone currently taking a prescription drug, and I bet you at one time or another took a prescription drug. Prescription drugs should be an issue we are thinking about because it's a safe bet that sometime down the road, we will be taking a prescription drug in an effort to stick around as long as possible.

> Prescription drugs should be an issue we are thinking about because it's a safe bet that sometime down the road, we will be taking a prescription drug in an effort to stick around as long as possible.

Prescription drugs have become a huge part of the everyday lives of millions of Americans of all ages. On the whole, everyone is taking more prescription drugs compared to the past, including the college student. We should be aware of the issues on prescription prices because everyone is affected by the high prices. For example, the company who employs your parent takes a larger portion out of their pay to cover increased cost of health insurance. The health insurance went up due to high prescription costs. With a lower disposable income, you might find yourself needing to work on the side because your parents are spending more on prescriptions.

So how high are prescription drug costs today? According to a study by the AARP published in USA Today by Julie Appleby, "the wholesale prices of 200 brand name drugs commonly used by Americans ages 50 and over rose 6.1 percent over a period of a year ending last June." To put this in perspective, according to Psychiatric News, general inflation (or the average increase in price of consumer goods) only increased by three percent in that same period, meaning that the price of prescription drugs increased more than twice the amount of other goods like pizza or beer. Wouldn't you be upset if pizza and beer prices increased faster than general inflation?

These high costs are by no means a new issue. Prescription drugs prices have been increasing faster than general inflation for years, but the issue has resurfaced due to price increases showing no limit. Like any business, the drug companies make drugs to make money. It's all about profits.

Being a college student, these issues don't seem to be life and death, but to many Americans they are. Most students rely on their parents for their income. I am one of them, and if I ever needed medicine my parents would foot the bill. But, there are countless families and elderly people that simply can't afford these prices. They could be your grandparents, your parents or your family. If you are having trouble coping with the high prices, you should know how to cut costs.

The most publicized way to cut costs is by crossing the border into Canada. According to Canada's Medical Association Journal, Carol Roberts, a 2002 congressional candidate, ran TV ads giving information for ordering prescription drugs on the Internet from Canada: "'Our neighbors in Canada can buy the very same FDA-approved drugs for two to three times less than we pay,' said Carol Roberts." The easiest way would be switching to generic brands. These are the same drugs made under a different name because the brand names' patent expired.

In almost all cases, generics are cheaper than brand names. An article in the Wall Street Journal titled "Tricks of the Trade: Saving on Medicines," advocates "pill splitting." The article makes the claim that most drug prices are based on number of pills, not the size of the pill. According to the article, the trick is to buy the same drug at higher doses and cut the pill in half. This should give you the same medical benefit at lower prices. The article also points out to check with your pharmacist to ensure pill splitting will work for certain drugs.

None of these suggestions are solutions to the problem in America, but anything will help. The only way to solve the problem is for government action. The more noise the consumers make, the more likely the government will take action. So, believe it or not, the government is starting to get its act together. Thanks to public outcries and also according to the CMAJ, a majority of voters say they wouldn't vote for any senator who wouldn't fight for prescription drug benefits. The government is feeling the heat and starting to take action.

One way you can help as a college student is by simply becoming educated in this issue. Go out and do research on your own, form your own opinions and voice your views. Vote for candidates who advocate health care reforms including restrictions on the pharmaceutical industry. Students across the country have been known to be the loudest and most persistent activists on all sorts of issues. The sooner college students get involved in this issue, the sooner everyone will be able to afford prescription drugs.

Gregg Brennan is a UMass student.

The Collegian is hiring an assistant Ed/Op editor for the Spring Semester!!

Come down to the Collegian newsroom in the evenings to apply!

Ask for Allison or Kristen

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS&LIVING

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 1, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Ben Kweller

By Allie Roth
Collegian Staff

Ben Kweller is a big nerd, and he knows it. He displays geek-like affinity for "The X-Files," the band Pavement and the magazines "Mac Addict" and "National Geographic." On his Web site, he proudly cites his hobbies as watching bass fishing on ESPN, Apple computers and MySpace. Kweller's music and personality really encapsulate a special music geek persona that many of us can relate to and that some of us wish to emulate.

Kweller was born in 1981 in San Francisco and grew up in Greenville, Texas. His parents demonstrated a hippie attitude and urged Kweller to explore music. By the age of 11, he had already mastered the drums, the piano, and owned his first guitar, a red Fender Stratocaster. During his teenage years, Kweller and his childhood friend, John Kent, formed punk-rock band Radish. When he arrived in New York City at the ripe age of 19, he began to record pop songs on his laptop. He would spend off-nights creating posters with the words "Ben Kweller" written in glitter. He became interested in such bands as The Moldy Peaches and Nada Surf, which were part of an anti-folk movement. Kweller developed a specific brand of mop-top indie-pop that reflected his influences (drawn from the Beatles, The Violent Femmes and Bob Dylan) and his New York City surroundings.

Kweller transmits his own brand of quirky metaphors and insightful ironic humor into his songs. In the song "Wasted and Ready," he sings, "Why am I dealing with this feeling?/ I'm maxxed out like a credit card/ I'll continue to be my worst enemy … I am wasted/but I'm ready." It's almost funny and shows a shrewd understanding for largely experienced emotions of being jaded. Even more so, the line "sex reminds her of eating spaghetti" is an odd phrase that he actually borrowed from the movie "Doom Generation." It fits perfectly as a tongue-in-cheek example of how we feel when formally meaningful activities (such as sex) become meaningless and trite (like a spaghetti dinner).

Central themes in his songs concern alcohol, relationships and the influences of his location. He boasts his love of "drinkin' Jager all day" in "Commerce, TX." He expresses his confusion regarding love in the song "Walk on Me" when he sings "Love ain't supposed to be this bad/make you cry mega ultra sad." The song "My Apartment" expresses his feelings of coziness associated with living in New York City. He says, "But I like it here in my small space/New York's the place where the sidewalks know my face."

In 2002, Kweller released "Sha Sha" (ATO Records), which has been hailed as a cool sing-along type record. "On My Way" was released in 2004 (ATO Records) and displayed a more stripped-down sound that took inspiration from Bob Dylan and Neil Young. Both of these albums further the fact that Kweller knows how to write oddly intelligent songs.

Performing with Kweller is singer-songwriter Matt Nathanson. Some know him as the guy who covered James's "Laid" for the movie "American Wedding," but his music extends beyond that one popular cover song. He has been releasing music since 1993, when he was a college sophomore attending school in California. His music can be describes as a blend of acoustic rock with a rock 'n' roll-type attitude. He displays a strong sense of sincerity and charm in his guitar and lyrically-driven songs.

His most recent album, called "Beneath These Fireworks," was released in 2003 on Universal. His songs tackle a wide spectrum of relationship issues. Some of these issues are never getting over the one that you love (in "Curve of the Earth"), being betrayed (in "Bent"), and the optimism associated with finding someone that you really love (in "Sing Me Sweet").

Ben Kweller and Matt Nathanson will be performing in the Campus Center Auditorium on Friday, Dec. 2 at 8 p.m. Tickets are $8 at the door for all UMass Students, $12 for Five-College Students, and $15 for all others.

Ben Kweller
Matt Nathanson
Student Ballroom
Friday Dec. 2
8 p.m.
$12 Students
$15 other

Graduate Art Student Association to host reputable art critic

By Alex Butler
Collegian Staff

Linda Weintraub, an internationally renowned art critic and overall authority on certain aspects of art, will be visiting the University of Massachusetts this week on Dec. 1. She will be stopping in at various studios around campus and holding a lecture at the Isenberg School of Management with a question and answer session at the end.

Who is this mystery woman? Why should anyone care? Art is dead, some might say. It is all a lost cause. Push her out of the lecture room where we could all learn more important things, like how to increase our already-bulging profits.

The answer is quite simple: art triumphs over all. And, by all means, it should. For this absolute expert of everything art, this entrepreneur of post-modern, contemporary, and avant-garde artwork, to come to UMass and teach one of at least the bare basics of the art framework, one should be grateful. Her lecture is aptly named, "Artists Who Innovate." She will no doubt cover a wide array of artists from our present times.

Miss Weintraub has quite a full reputation. She is the former director of the Emerging Arts Program at Oberlin College, the author of several textbooks in the area and future author of two more textbooks, soon to be released. She will, no doubt, address these future works in her lecture. Not only this, but she has taught classes on contemporary art history and has managed to fly through Rutgers University, with a degree as a Master of Fine Arts.

Let's just say this isn't Drawing 101. She knows her stuff.

But step back for a moment; take this all in, one fact at a time.

In our society today, there are many bizarre instances of art all around. Bands such as Xiu Xiu and Deerhoof are floating by and people are not even blinking an eye. Art exhibitions are popping up just about everywhere and people simply disregard it all as background noise. Sometimes it is so overwhelming that people will just get flustered and forget it all. That is where Linda Weintraub, we hope, comes into play.

At UMass, students have their very own experts on just about every aspect of contemporary art in our current times. The student body simply cannot pass up this opportunity to question and find answers to art in either general or specific terms. If you are asking yourself why she is such a great expert on these things, how she got in her shoes, what makes her better or more knowledgeable than me, then this is your chance to find out. This is your chance to put her to the test; to ask her whatever it is that has got your scratching your head. She has been at this for quite some time – she has been lecturing around the country since 1996.

She will be waltzing around our campus Dec. 1. The lecture will be held in room 137, Isenberg School of Management, at 5:45 p.m.

It would be interesting to see what she says about the buildings around our campus, even; the beautiful, inspirational, colorful, bright, cheerful, bizarre, energetic buildings that we have decorating the university area.

Linda Weintraub
Isenberg School of Management
Room 137
5:45 p.m.

Linda Weintraub, an authority on avante-garde and contemporary art, will spend Friday visiting studio art classes before giving a lecture at the School of Management later in the evening.

Potter-mania spells hope for a new generation of readers

Pop Doppler
Jacqueline Ronan

Are movie adaptations shortchanging the next generation of readers?

This week, "Harry Potter and the Goblet of Fire" has grossed over 200 million dollars since its Nov. 20 opening. If and when a movie ever hits that mark, it usually takes at least a whole summer or holiday season. The first four installments of the Hogwarts saga has made over one billion dollars in domestic box-office profits alone and there are still three more to go. According to timesonline.co.uk, star Daniel Radcliff was confirmed to be Britain's richest teen. He has earned about 10 million pounds for the first three films. The last guy to have that title had a royal one too. And all this money was possible because of a single welfare mother's mind. Every character, line and twist came from one person's imagination. Nobody has the same one, either. Take, for instance, the Rorschach inkblot test. Where one would see a child gathering flowers in a field, another might see a turtle riding a motorcycle.

That's why every time someone reads a book, he or she has a distinct mental interpretation. While reading "The Sorcerer's Stone," I always pictured Hermione as a little chubby and having glasses, freckles and dark chocolate hair. Actress Emma Watson does not have any of those features in the movie. I pictured the Weasley's dilapidated Borrows and the Dursley's uptight Privet Drive house as tweaked-out versions of my own relatives' homes. But the various Oscar-nominated art directors didn't scope out either of the Havens or Ginsberg residences.

Still, all the movies are very well done and incredibly detailed. Everything in the production was methodically thought out, from the vast scenery of rolling hills on the Hogwarts grounds to the Quidditch uniforms to the spinal candles in Lupin's office. And the storyline is as emotionally driven as it is visually. Many time children's films (as well as adults') rely on site gags and sappy morals for the plot points. The Harry Potters are mature and serious while still being fantastical. They deal with magical problems as if they were real ones. Nobody waves a magic wand and makes everything better. Bad things happen, and they have consequences and affect the characters. This remains very true to the books.

When the Potter-mania began in the late 90s, it was so unique to have such a cultural phenomenon driven solely by a book. There were no theme songs or tie-in food products or Halloween costumes. It was just word of mouth. Everyone had a clear version of the book in their heads.

The current and next generations of young readers (and some secretly older) do not have that advantage. The Potter film series have become an unavoidable factor in kids' lives. Children as young as five attended the midnight premiere. Television channels bid for and heavily promote the network showings. The series has a huge merchandise line, like theme songs or tie-in food products or Halloween costumes. These movies become so wildly popular that seeing them is practically required. Fitting in is so much more important than retaining your individuality. It's much easier for adults to avoid this pressure of watch first, read later, because you're not a total loser for never seeing "Under the Tuscan Sun" or "The Notebook."

Think about it: most of our generation has seen "Wizard of Oz," "Alice in Wonderland," "Willy Wonka and the Chocolate Factory" or "Swiss Family Robinson" before they read the book, if they even read the book. Since the first Harry Potter film, children's favorites like "Lord of the Rings," "A Series of Unfortunate Events" and "Holes" have been made into very successful franchises. And the upcoming Narnia series is one of the few classics left that hasn't been Hollywood-ized. Frodo will always look like Elijah Wood and Willy will be Gene Wilder; sorry Johnny, you'll never be Wonka. You're exposed to the predetermined expectation. Kids are most likely going to watch the movie first.

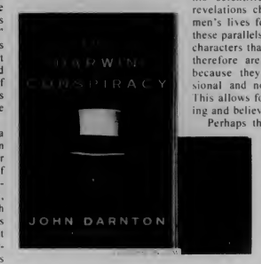
Why? Because reading is hard. Have you ever tried to read a book cover to cover? You stare at the pages for hours and most of the time there aren't any pictures. There's no on or off button, battery compartment or commercial break. Sure, you could get it on tape but then you just have a guy talking for, like, six hours. Boring. It is so much easier to watch the movie. Comedian Jim Gaffigan best expressed the difference between reading and watching: "You know what I liked about the movie better, you didn't have to do all that reading."

We as a generation have really short attention spans. Something always has to be stimulating. It usually has to be a little shiny, brightly colored and have at least one flashing light. We are so dependent on stimulants; every public bathroom has a radio station pumping music just in case we get a little bored.

A Michigan State study found that kids today spend more time watching TV than they spend in school. We tell kids reading is a magical and entertaining adventure. Yet when most kids do get the opportunity to read it's usually from a small selection of books that are falling apart and older then them. This is usually followed by a five-page book report or test. Nickelodeon has so much less work involved. Reading is something that must be discovered on one's own. Then, it becomes magical and entertaining.

One positive out of this situation is that seeing the movie will entice some kids to read the book out of pure curiosity. They enjoyed it so much, the book becomes another way to experience the story. But when reading is more and more often coming after watching, kids are missing out on making their own blockbuster in their heads.

Oh, and congratulations for making it to the end of the article. You should give yourself a pat on the back.



Darnton's 'Conspiracy' evolves into a simple yet intriguing read

By Katy Staley
Collegian Correspondent

The mere mention of the name Charles Darwin sparks quite a bit of controversy, not just among scientists or certain religious groups, but also among everyday people. Individuals try to form their own opinions about the theory of evolution and about the strangeness of the life Darwin led. In John Darnton's novel "The Darwin Conspiracy," he addresses these controversies by taking real information about Darwin's trip on the Beagle and later life and creating a work of fiction that explores the reasons for the choices Darwin made about his work.

Instead of writing from a single perspective, Darnton chooses to address the reader from three different points of view. One is from a modern-day scientist, Hugh Kellem, who is trying to come up with new ideas amidst the thousands of overused speculations about Darwin's life. The second perspective comes from Darwin's daughter Lizzie, in the form of letters and journal entries. The third comes from young Darwin himself as he recounts his voyage on the Beagle. The reader gains a better understanding of Darwin and his life as it is presented in this fictional work as a result of this combination of narrators. This is because each source presents different pieces of information about Darwin's life. In effect, the reader feels the information is more reliable than if it were just coming from one source.

While the book is split amongst three different narrators, the plot of the story is pushed by the modern-day characters. Hugh Kellem is a twenty-something scholar working on researching Darwin, but trying to take an angle that no one had thought of previously. While researching in England he discovers a diary of Darwin's daughter, Lizzie. He runs into another scholar, Beth Dulcimer, who is also searching to find some new information about Darwin's life. At first, the two are secretive about their work, but when they learn they are on the same trail, they decide to team up and happen upon one of the biggest secrets surrounding Darwin and his work.

This novel is a twofold mystery. The first is the mystery the two scholars are trying to solve: the truth about what was behind Darwin's discovery of natural selection as well as the illness that plagued him from the return of the Beagle until his death. The second mystery, however, is a personal mystery for Hugh. While in England, he runs into his deceased brother Cal's ex-fiancee. Others from Cal's past also turn up, bringing Hugh on a journey of discovery about the events surrounding Cal's death. Also, for those who like a little romance and scandal to keep things interesting, "The Darwin Conspiracy" presents just enough to add more than one dimension to the novel without taking away from the main point of the story.

The author adds another interesting aspect to story, paralleling the lives of Hugh Kellem and young Charles Darwin aboard the Beagle. Both of these men are struggling through life, trying to please their fathers and feeling as though they are failing miserably. Incidentally, both have chosen to gain their father's acceptance through making their name in the field of biological science. Also, both men experience what Darwin calls in the book a "nuit de feu." This expression, taken from the French philosopher Pascal, is used to express a great conversion. Both Hugh and Darwin learn a great truth: Hugh about his brother Cal, whose untimely death haunts him throughout the novel and Darwin about his scientific theories. These revelations change both of the men's lives forever. In creating these parallels, Darnton presents characters that have a past, and therefore are more interesting because they are multidimensional and not flat characters. This allows for a more fascinating and believable story.

Perhaps the most intriguing parts of the novel are the letters of Darwin's daughter Lizzie. Although Elizabeth Darwin actually did exist, little is known about her. As a result of this, Darnton "seized upon this blank canvas to construct a portrait and an imaginary lineage that suits [his] alternative narrative." For Darwin and for the reader, knowing virtually nothing about Lizzie makes reading these letters and journals more interesting, because the reader can imagine that this is really what Lizzie's life might have been like. Choosing to write from this point of view, however, made the ideas posed in "The Darwin Conspiracy" so realistic that, at times, it was necessary to remember that this work was actually fictitious and not a real revelation of Darwin's life.

Overall, Darnton does not use fancy language or metaphor, but presents the story simply. All the while, however, he manages to spin a mystery so intriguing that just when it seems the truth is near, it is ripped from the reader's grasp and turned upside down before the real truth is exposed. In "The Darwin Conspiracy," Darnton illustrates a point that is relevant even in real life: the truth cannot stay hidden forever.

ALUMNI ASSOCIATION
UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AMHERST 1863

2006 Alumni Association Senior Leadership Award

Attention: Faculty and Staff

Do you know a senior that is deserving of the Alumni Association Senior Leadership Award? Please help us identify deserving students by nominating them today!

The Alumni Association Senior Leadership Award was established to recognize graduating seniors who have demonstrated outstanding leadership and service to the campus in areas including academics, student organizations, athletics, campus jobs, or community and volunteer services.

Nomination forms are available online at UMassAlumni.com/students. For any additional information, contact Melanie Corbeil with the Alumni Association at 545-2317.

Deadline: Friday, December 16, 2006 at 5:00 p.m.

Please join us for an information session about the

Oxford Summer Seminar

Thursday, December 1st at 4:00 PM
Campus Center room 903

The Oxford Summer Seminar provides a unique opportunity for students to enjoy six weeks of residential life (July 6-August 15) at Oxford University's historic Trinity College. The seminar offers over 15 tutorial-based courses in literature, history, law, and politics. Classes are taught by British university faculty; both undergraduate and graduate-level credits may be earned.

The information session will include alums from last summer's Seminar and program administrators will describe next summer's Seminar. For more information visit the Seminar's website at www.umass.edu/oxford or you may contact the seminar via e-mail at: oxford @english.umass.edu

The T-Shirt Factory
A division of The Image & Mail Factory, Inc.
Serving Colleges Throughout New England

Custom Printed T-Shirts

12 FREE CUSTOM PRINTED T-SHIRTS When You Order 72 or More Call For Details!

- Clubs
- Parties
- Fraternities
- Special Events
- Fundraisers
- Sports Teams
- Give Aways
- Student Union

OFFER ENDS Nov. 30, 2005

THE T-SHIRT FACTORY
Call Today! TOLL FREE 877-439-5629
Visit Our Website at www.nefactory.com for Our Online Catalog.

A Taste Of Amherst

The Lone Wolf - not your typical breakfast spot

By Sarah Freddie
Collegian Staff

When you're craving a delicious breakfast, a restaurant named "The Lone Wolf" may not automatically be your top choice. The name may make you think of a dingy bar where you go for a drink in hopes of meeting other lonely singles. Even though The Lone Wolf does have a bar, it is anything but dingy. On the contrary the restaurant is filled with light, delicious food and the cheerful personalities of staff and customers.

If you arrive before 11 at The Lone Wolf, the wait should not be more than 15 minutes. Stepping into the restaurant, one of the first things you notice is that a lot of chatter spills forth from every occupied table and booth. If quietness is an essential element when choosing a restaurant to breakfast at, this is not the place for you. Likewise, if you are considering a restaurant for a first date, the hustle and bustle vibe and the loud chatter make The Lone Wolf a poor choice.

The Lone Wolf is quite sunny, rectangular-shaped, and somewhat cramped, with three tables, booths along the walls, and a bar in the back. What the restaurant lacks in space is made up in a great decorating style that's a mixture of classic, modern, and Southwestern. Two enormous bay windows sit in the front of the restaurant, while on the right side the walls are covered with framed pictures of flowers, and on the left side the Southwest takes over and there are framed prints of deserts and cactuses. The restaurant is lit with a variety of dark blue and brightly flowered cone-shaped lamps hanging from the ceiling. The Lone Wolf itself is very clean. Before customers are seated, the tables are cleared and sparkling.

Now the reason to come to the restaurant in the first place: the food. There is something satisfying for every taste pallet on The Lone Wolf's breakfast menu. Aside from the usual breakfast dishes such as omelets and French toast, there are three different specialty sections of the menu. There is a vegan section with six choices, including vegan pancakes and a tofu veggie scramble. Part of the menu seems to have been imported straight from New York City, including choices such as cheese blintzes and Lox 'n' eggs. Lastly, there is the Southwestern section, which includes a Santa Fe omelet and Huevos Rancheros.

Tempting as the diverse selections are, the blueberry almond French toast is one of the best choices on the menu. The bread is moist, flavorful, and firm, without succumbing to sogginess or dryness. Tiny slivers of almonds are laced throughout, accompanied by sweet blueberries, a soft compliment to the crispness of the almonds. The syrup is also quite marvelous; sweet, with enough of a bite to save it from being saccharine.

Unfortunately, the Belgian waffles are sub-par. Belgian waffles are normally assumed to be thick, fluffy, and loaded with enough whipped cream and strawberries to feed an army. The waffles were disappointingly shaped like tiny rectangles with two strawberries and a miniscule dollop of whipped cream topping each of the four served.

The prices of the breakfast dishes fall into the normal range for a nice restaurant. An average meal costs anywhere from $6.75 to $7.95.

Don't forget that lunch is served at The Lone Wolf as well. The lunch menu is filled with healthy, vegetarian-friendly fare such as root vegetable quesadillas. There is a bar in the back of the restaurant for the occasional catering events The Lone Wolf puts on. The bar serves beer at lunch, but not liquor because the Lone Wolf does not have a liquor license. Overall, the bright atmosphere, friendly staff, and great food mold The Lone Wolf into a marvelous restaurant.

The Lone Wolf is located on Main Street, Amherst next to the Black Sheep. Their hours during the week are 7 a.m. to 2 p.m., and 7 a.m. to 2:30 p.m. on the weekends. They serve breakfast the entire time they are open. They also serve lunch Monday through Friday from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m.

The Stables - great for 'Mom and Pop' style food

The "country home cookin" sign displayed proudly on the wall of The Stables Restaurant does not lie. Whatever you decide to order for breakfast, it will pretty much be a guarantee that your choice will cover the plate and be hearty enough to keep you full until well after lunchtime.

The Stables serves classic breakfast fare such as eggs, omelettes, waffles, and French toast. The specialties section of the menu is where the heart of the restaurant lies. Half of the choices listed under the specialties section contain enormous amounts of food for low prices, such as the "Starving College Boy," which includes three eggs, three pieces of bacon, three sausages, three pancakes, and homefries and is only $6.95. The other half of the choices are for those of you who consider eating an art and enjoy creativity in meals, such as "CJ's Ultimate Homefries," which is a mammoth amount of homefries containing sauteed onions, bacon, peppers, and broccoli, all drowning under a river of melted cheese. This filling meal may be weighing down your cholesterol level, but is easy on the wallet; it's only $3.95.

If those aforementioned specials did not tempt you enough, there are also breakfast specials that are only served on the weekends. The breakfast specials include eggs benedict, eggs dutches (essentially the same as eggs benedict but also including bacon and tomato slices) and sausage gravy over buttermilk biscuits. The prices on the weekend specials are the same as the other options on the menu, ranging from $4.95 to $5.95.

In keeping with the country cooking theme, the "light starts" portion of the menu boasts choices such as grits, homemade bread and grilled biscuits and honey, all of which can be purchased for under $2.

The blueberry pancakes are extremely filling, yet they lack that special something that makes you lean back in your seat and appreciate the fact that you have taste buds. The pancakes are monstrous in diameter and thickness. Yet, for the giant amount of food you receive, The Stables is definitely a little skimpy on the amount of blueberries they serve in the pancakes. The top layer of the pancakes can also be a bit undercooked. With maple syrup, they're moist and satisfying, but if you're looking for exquisite taste, it's better to stick to the egg or omelette's choices on the menu. Although for $3.95, you can't complain.

"Kelly's Konoction" consists of scrambled eggs with either diced kielbasa or ham mixed in, toast and homefries. Although "Kelly's Konoction" is not as surprising as you would expect a concoction to be, this meal is very good nonetheless. The ham and eggs are prepared to a perfect level; they are neither burnt nor undercooked. The homefries are seasoned and warm, and very tasty with ketchup. Even the toast deserves praise as the bread the restaurant uses is thick and toasted to a perfect shade of gold. This filling meal is only $4.95.

The decor of the restaurant is fitting of a country kitchen-style restaurant. There are posters everywhere of vintage Coke ads and decorations that include apples and a milk pail. Even the coat rack consists of a row of horseshoes. The main decorations that catch your eye are the roosters. Roosters seem to be waddling out of the woodwork at The Stables. There are roosters on the wallpaper, ceramic roosters, wooden roosters and even a clock in the shape of – you guessed it – a rooster.

Odd as the rooster theme may be, it is not dispelling customers or irritating the staff. On a Sunday morning the restaurant is full and a bit cramped, with every table filled and cheery staff bustling about. The staff is very attentive and friendly to the customers; if your waitress does not take your order within five minutes, you will have another one asking you if there's anything you want.

This is a great date restaurant. The atmosphere is fun and noisy enough where silence won't be awkward, but you won't have to yell for your date to hear you either. The friendly, warm personalities of the staff will also put you and your date at ease. The Stables is located on Route 9 in Hadley. They're open daily from 6 a.m. to 2 p.m., except on Tuesdays, when they are closed all day. On Saturdays and Sundays only breakfast is served all day.

Courtesy La Veracruzana

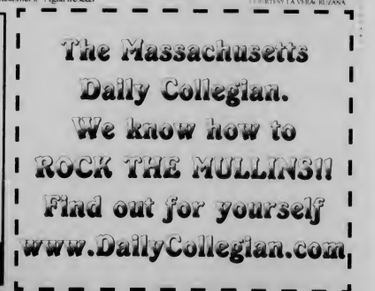
Old standby La Veracruzana still serves up fresh Mexican flavors

By Jerome Yuan
Collegian Correspondent

Horchata, Cactus leaf, Camarones. Not exactly Taco Bell's 99 cent menu, but then again, La Veracruzana doesn't need a talking dog to advertise. Situated in the center of downtown Amherst (with the original location in Northhampton), La Veracruzana has been dishing up Mexican cuisine since the '90s and was even featured last month in the Boston Globe. With quick service, a diverse menu and affordable prices, it's no surprise it remains popular among students and local residents.

Tucked between Collective Copies and the Jeffery Amherst Bookstore, the restaurant takes its name from owner Martin Carrera's birthplace in Veracruz, Mexico. The interior is simple, with unadorned tables set up similar to West Coast taquerias. The kitchen is viewable over a pick-up counter so customers can see their food being prepared. Walls that lead up to high ceilings often display local art. Large front windows offer a view of Amherst Common, and during warmer weather, outside seating is available.

But as with any restaurant, what matters is the food. Ordering is a straightforward affair: up at the register and pick up at the counter. While many might expect a Taco Bell-type chain to dominate in a college town, La Veracruzana sets itself apart with a diverse menu that offers plenty of choices even for picky eaters: from typical favorites like burritos and tacos to more authentic fare like the Poblano Mole Chicken or tamales. Vegetarians may want to try the Cactus Leaf tacos (yes, cactus leaf) or the Chile Rellenos. Trout and Camarones (shrimp) are offered for those looking to taste seafood with a Mexican twist.



It's not just the food that is diverse: La Veracruzana offers a large variety of beverages for thirsty customers. "Agua frescas" (fresh fruit beverages) are made daily, such as the aforementioned Horchata, a Mexican rice drink. Melon, tamarind and mango juices are also available. There is also a wide variety of Mexican beers to choose from, such as Negro Modelo or Sol, all served with a chilled glass, as well as margaritas served with customary salt-rimmed cups.

On a recent visit, I had an order of the tacos de pescado (fish tacos) and a horchata drink, along with complementary tortilla chips. (A self-serve salsa "bar" has a multitude of salsas to choose from, each with a written description of heat level for wary customers.) The horchata drink, sweet and refreshing, was flavored with cinnamon and spices and complemented the spice of the meal. It's no wonder the fish tacos are one of the most popular items: they were excellent. Lightly breaded and pan-fried cod are served in warm corn tortillas with tomatoes and fresh, crisp cabbage and topped off by "Martin's secret sauce." The sauce's mixture of mayonnaise, citrus and pepper provided an unexpected and spicy kick.

While everything is not always perfect (tacos can be a bit dry, and the sides of rice are typical of many Mexican restaurants: dry and lacking seasoning), it's hard to fault a diverse menu and prices as low as $3.95. For those who enjoy good Mexican food and don't need gimmicky bells and dogs in their face, La Veracruzana is an excellent choice.

Degon deep-fries the competition

UMASS NOTES from page 12

pounds, so I'm up to like 190 now. The easier and more accessible it is, the better it is for me."

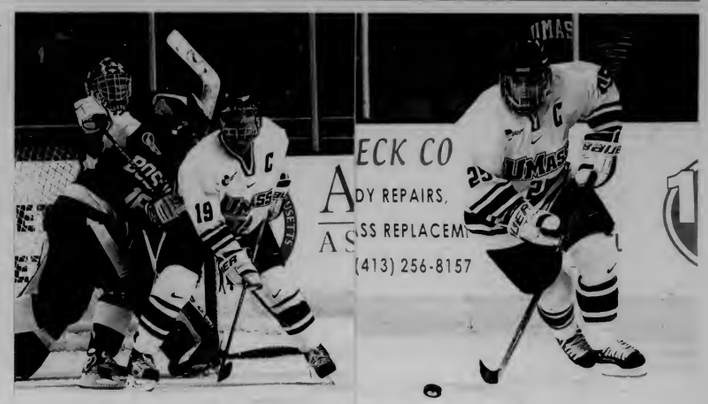
He said the strangest things he has deep-fried to this point have been candy bars, and he has also been known to buy chicken nuggets from Wendy's, bring them home and – well, you get the idea. But his favorite item on the menu at Degon's House of Deep-Frying is a "ripper."

"They're hot dogs that I split down the middle so you can put sauce in the middle of the hot dog," Degon said.

His customers have provided mixed reviews.

"If you ever go to his apartment, you don't even have to look; you can just follow your nose, and you'll walk into his place," fellow defenseman Mike Kostka said. "I've actually been fortunate enough to eat some fried chicken and some fried mozzarella sticks. It was his first time making them, and they were excellent. I was surprised, but it was impressive."

Werner wasn't so sure.



"I think it pretty much grosses everybody out," he said.

Welcome Back, Welcome Back, Welcome Back

The Minutemen are currently in a 10-day layoff, but on the other side of this hockey hiatus awaits Merrimack and new coach Mark Dennehy, who left his job as the UMass assistant coach to join the Warriors this past offseason.

Tuesday's meeting at the Mullins Center will mark the first time the two sides will reunite, but after the pre-game hellos and handshakes are exchanged, don't look for the Mass Attack to take it easy on their old boss.

"Playing against Coach Dennehy will be interesting, and we'll be looking forward to that," Werner said, but added, "In our league, no game is more important than any other so we can't put too much emphasis on that, but at the same time, it's a Hockey East game so we'll be excited to play whether Coach Dennehy is coaching or not."

Kaity Kling / Collegian

Senior forward Stephen Werner (left) was named Hockey East Player of the Week after picking up the assist on both game-winning goals for the Minutemen last week. Senior defenseman Marvin Degon (right) has gotten some good and some not-so-good reviews for his deep-frying abilities.

Boston Bruins trade away superstar to San Jose for three players

BOSTON (AP) — The struggling Boston Bruins traded away captain Joe Thornton, once thought to be the future of the franchise, to the San Jose Sharks for three players, a Bruins spokeswoman confirmed late Wednesday night.

The Bruins get Marco Sturm, Wayne Primeau and Brad Stuart in return for Thornton, who in August signed a three-year, $20 million contract.

-Associated Press

Girard Retires, Ends Comeback Bid

BOSTON (AP) — Boston Bruins defenseman Jonathan Girard retired yesterday, abandoning his comeback more than two years after he was seriously injured in a car accident.

"We were hoping that Jonathan would be successful in his comeback attempt," Bruins general manager Mike O'Connell said. "But his doctors have advised him that he is not physically able to compete at the level of professional hockey.

"The hard work and determination that he has shown over the past two seasons gearing toward training camp this year was truly an inspiration to all of us associated with the team. He is a courageous young man, and we are thankful that. Although he is unable to resume his hockey career, he has recovered from his injuries."

Girard, 25, was a second-round pick in the 1998 draft and played his only full NHL season in 2002-03, scoring six goals with 16 assists.

But during that offseason, he lost control of his car on a corner near Rawdon, Quebec, about 30 miles northeast of Montreal. The car flipped and landed in a ditch; it took emergency workers 45 minutes to extricate Girard.

He broke his pelvis in four places, along with his right hip and his neck.

-Associated Press

Broncos have Indy date circled

By Eddie Pells
Associated Press

DENVER — This season is shaping up as a special one for the Denver Broncos. Still, there is something disconcerting about that 9-2 record and Denver's postseason prospects.

The elephant sitting in the middle of the Denver locker room – the subject everyone knows is there but very few want to deal with – is the undefeated Indianapolis Colts.

You know, the Colts: The team that has plastered Denver in the playoffs the last two years by a combined score of 90-34.

You know, Indianapolis: The city that coach Mike Shanahan said was imperative to avoid in the playoffs if Denver is ever going to get back to the Super Bowl.

There they are, two games ahead and showing no signs of slowing. Barring a drastic change, and if form holds, all signs point to another rematch with the Colts in Indy.

This time, though, it would be in the AFC title game instead of the first round of the playoffs.

"They're undefeated. They're in our conference. So, I guess you have to look at them," Broncos running back Ron Dayne said. "But it's not like we spend any time worrying about it. We've got to worry about our own stuff."

That, by and large, is the company line among the Broncos. Predictably, they talk about taking them one at a time and worrying about next week, not the playoffs.

For the most part, that strategy has worked.

At 9-2, the Broncos have so far avoided the midseason slump, the likes of which have plagued the franchise the last few years. They have a two-game lead over San Diego and Kansas City in the AFC West, with a game at Kansas City coming Sunday.

Denver has positioned itself well to earn the division title, a home playoff game and a bye week. All would be monumental. The Broncos haven't earned any of those since 1998, the year they won their second Super Bowl. That Super Bowl still stands as their last playoff win.

Despite all that promising news, the Broncos know if the season ended today, they would be a second seed, and the Colts would be No. 1.

It would mean another week of preparing for Peyton Manning. On the turf. In Indy.

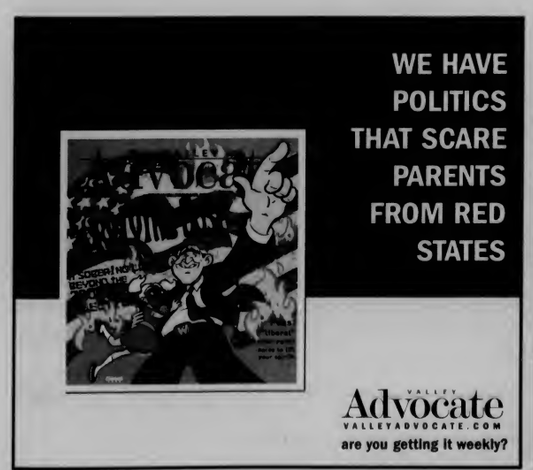
Sure, the Broncos have reason to believe they've improved over the last two years, when they gave up a combined 934 yards passing in a pair of embarrassments. The pass rush has improved with the addition of Courtney Brown and Gerard Warren – among others – and the return to health of Trevor Pryce. Rookie cornerbacks Darrent Williams and Domonique Foxworth have strengthened a position that got rocked in Indy last year despite the addition of Champ Bailey.

Jake Plummer is playing better. Mike Anderson, Tatum Bell and Ron Dayne are a formidable running back trio.

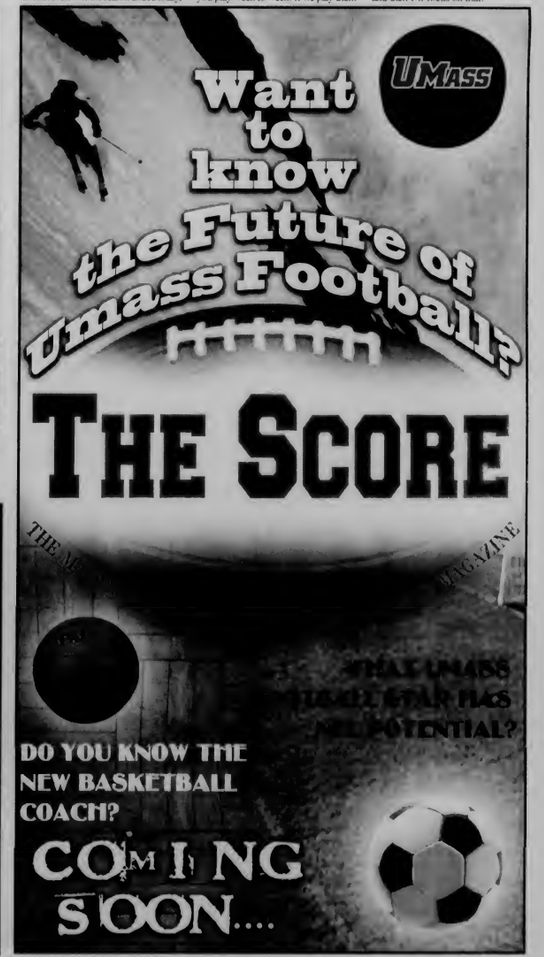
But, as their undefeated record plainly states, the Colts have clearly gotten better, too.

"You always look at how other teams are doing," said cornerback Roc Alexander, beaten repeatedly in last year's 49-24 loss. "I saw them on Monday night. They looked good. But you play week to week. If we play them again, we play them again."

Could it be that the Broncos have simply picked the wrong year to get really good? Indianapolis is the first team to start 11-0 since – who else? – the 1998 Broncos, who went 13 games before their first setback.



The good news for the Broncos is that Indy does have a reasonably difficult schedule the rest of the way, with a home game against San Diego (7-4) sandwiched between trips to Jacksonville (8-3) and Seattle (9-2).



Denver's remaining schedule is a bit easier, but far from a cake-walk because of this week's game at Kansas City (7-4) and the season finale at San Diego.

And as they'll tell anyone who asks, the Broncos are minding their own business, not looking ahead toward that train coming down the tunnel.

"If they end up undefeated, that'd be great for them, great for the league or whatever," Broncos safety Nick Ferguson said. "At this point, I've got other things I need to focus on. At some point, maybe we'll play them, and then I'll focus on that."

UM looks to build winning streak

WOMEN'S HOOPS from page 12

Dacko knows her capabilities.

"She kind of gets herself like a corkscrew sometimes," Dacko observed. "She gets so deep she doesn't know where she is, but she's got a quick first step. If there's a gap, she's going to go. She has not played well up until this game [Siena]. You haven't seen the Tamara that we know. Last year against Siena, she had 23 points and 10 rebounds, and she played horribly."

Mills also turned in a solid performance and seemed surprised after the game when she was told of her high rebounding total. But Mills was a consistent presence on the defensive boards, which helped the Minutewomen get out and run for the majority of the game. It was a good sign for Dacko and the coaching staff to see her inside players performing to her expectations.

"I've got to get my post players playing with some confidence," Dacko stated. "They've missed their share of buckets so far this year. That's inexcusable, and they know that."

An 18-point victory against a team that is very beatable won't lift the spirits of a coach who knows that her team has a long way to go. Dacko was surely relieved to get a win after two straight losses, but the team will be hard at work trying to iron out some of its glaring weaknesses.

"We have to get an inside-outside game," Dacko said. "And I think if we have two things to work on, that would be free throws and management of the ball. With 46 seconds left in the half, [Siena] got two [shot] attempts, and we didn't get any."

Redshirt senior Katie Nelson, who scored eight points with two three-pointers on Tuesday, knows her team well, and knows that most of the teams that UMass will face this year will try to play zone defense. In some technical basketball talk, Nelson explained how her team needs to execute against a zone defense.

"The last couple of practices we've been looking for more options and concentrating on getting the ball into the post down in the short corner," she said. "And that will create more for us; create for your teammates – that's the main thing we're trying to focus on."

After Hofstra tonight, the Minutewomen will depart on a five-game road trip beginning with New Hampshire on Sunday.

KAREN WINCH/COLLEGIAN

Point guard Katie Nelson and the Minutewomen will take on Hofstra tonight at the Mullins Center before hitting the road for five games, starting in New Hampshire on Sunday. Nelson scored eight points Tuesday night.

Team grants Dacko's wish

EMOTION from page 12

Kate Mills, also had a big night on Tuesday, as she recorded her first career double-double.

Mills had 15 points and 10 rebounds and gave the Minutewomen some much-needed post presence.

A noticeable change to the Minutewomen starting lineup had been made when senior center Patrycja Gulak and sophomore guard Alisha Tatham got the starting nod instead of the usual Kate Mills and Ashley Sharpton.

While it looked like Dacko was trying to mix it up to get something going, she said the change was only a strategic move.

"We really wanted to have some post presence against Laura Menty," Dacko said.

"We wanted to bump her around a little bit, and Patrycja is much bigger. On [Katelyn] Dooley, we wanted to put somebody that was much quicker, like Alisha, and more physical on Dooley too because those are their two guns. So we just changed the lineup a little bit. And I thought it would be good for Kate to come off the bench. It certainly wasn't punitive; it was just the way that we saw the match-ups more fit from the start of the game."

Although she may not have gotten her usual starting nod, Mills had a career night, and knows whether she is coming off of the bench or is in the starting lineup, the task at hand remains the same.

"I guess it is a little different," Mills said, "just because you get to see the game before you actually have to play in it. Either way, I know I have to come out and get rebounds and hopefully score some points. I know I have to step up and play hard."

Rebounding was another area in which the Minutewomen knew they had to provide more of, and they did not disappoint against the Saints.

Tuesday night marked the first time this season that UMass had grabbed more rebounds than its opponent.

While Mills was surprised to find out that she had pulled down 10 boards, those type of showings from the sophomore forward are going to have to come about more often if the Minutewomen want to get back to .500.

"The kid knows where the basket is, and she can finish," Dacko said. "She's probably the best spot-up shooter we have on our team. We are trying to keep her from not thinking and just playing. This is her game. This is her type of game. The 10 rebounds are quite shocking for me. I'm very happy, and that is certainly something that I have to get used to. Again, that is a good thing, and hopefully she can continue that."

Campbell brings down the boards for UMass per game average last season to 5.5 in 2005. She tied her career-high with nine rebounds against Holy Cross on Nov. 20.

HOOPS from page 12

In anticipation of a productive season, the A-10 coaches selected Rosario to be on the Preseason All-Conference Second Team.

Rebounding Machine

UMass needed a new rebounding presence this year after graduating some prominent rebounders to graduation, including Brooke Campbell, but junior Tamara Tatham has been up to the task. She is averaging 8.5 boards per game this season, ranking fifth in the conference and first on the team.

Tatham is also 33rd on the UMass all-time scoring list with 565 points, and her 9.1 points per game are good for 20th on the all-time scoring average list.

She is tied for 14th on the all-time blocks list with 37 blocked shots four games into her third season with the Minutewomen.

Redshirt senior Katie Nelson is closing in on some UMass records; she is second all-time in 3-points field goals made with 154, which is 25 behind Beth Kuzmeski. She also ranks second all-time in 3-pointers attempted, just four behind Kuzmeski.

Nelson is seventh in UMass history with 284 career assists, and her 1.4-to-1 assist-to-turnover ratio is first in Minutewoman history.

Nelson has 695 points on for her career which is 26th all-time at UMass.

NFL scouts love Bush

By Ralph D. Russo
Associated Press

Reggie Bush as been compared to Gale Sayers and Marshall Faulk. He's the front-runner to win the Heisman Trophy and already holds the unofficial title of "Most Exciting Player in College Football."

All those accolades are great, but what counts most for the USC tailback — or at least for his bank account — is that he's developed into the best NFL prospect in the country.

A junior who has not said if this season will be his last at Southern California, Bush already has some NFL fans rooting for their downtrodden teams to lose and improve their draft position.

"I think he's the No. 1 pick in the entire draft," said Mike Mayock, a former NFL defensive back and college coach, who is now the NFL Network's draft guru. "You beg, borrow and steal to get guys with that kind of ability, so you can have a one-play, 80-yard drive instead of a 16-play, 80-yard drive."

As expected, Bush is playing it cool on the NFL, keeping the focus on USC's run for a possible third straight national championship and leaving his options open.

His college career has been a steady ascension to superstar status.

As a freshman, he carried the ball 90 times for 521 yards, caught 15 passes for 314 yards, returned kickoffs at a 27-yard average and scored eight touchdowns.

Last season, he finished fifth in the Heisman voting with 908 yards rushing, 509 receiving and 15 touchdowns. He averaged 179 all-purpose yards per game, fifth best in the nation and even threw a touchdown pass.

This season his numbers have jumped to 1,398 yards rushing, an astounding 8.6 yards per carry, and 212 all-purpose yards per game, tops in the nation.

"In my position, he's been the best college football player in the country for three years," Mayock said.

The one question about Bush as far as his NFL future is concerned is his size. He is listed at 6 feet and 200 pounds. He said he added about five pounds of muscle before this season to get up over 200 and become a more effective runner between the tackles.

"When you see him [before this season], he doesn't look like an every-down back," said Gil Brandt, the former Dallas Cowboys personnel director under Tom Landry. "He was a slimmer-type of a back."

Brandt said Bush reminds him of Tony Dorsett, whom Brandt drafted second overall out of Pittsburgh in 1977.

"There was a lot of question whether Dorsett had the ability to play all the time. He was never hurt. Those backs are so good at avoiding tackles that they don't get hurt."

Bush has blazing speed, soft hands and is comfortable splitting out like a wide receiver. In fact, when the Trojans were breaking in a new receiving crops at the beginning of the 2004 season, Bush was their most reliable wideout for a while.

But it's those videogame-like moves that make him special.

"His ability to get to full speed so quickly and change directions at full speed, that's what separates him from anybody I've seen," Mayock said.

Bush's seminal performance came two weeks ago when he piled up 513 all-purpose yards in a 50-42 win over Fresno State. Slashing and darting and stopping and starting, Bush made a year's worth of highlight-reel plays in that one game.

"He has the smoothness of Gale Sayers and the vision and cutting ability of Barry Sanders," Emmitt Smith, the NFL's career rushing, said on the NFL Network after Bush blew through Fresno State.

Notre Dame coach Charlie Weis made the Faulk comparison with Bush after Bush ran for 160 yards and three touchdowns on 15 carries in USC's 34-31 victory in October.

Bush grew up outside San Diego, watching Faulk play at San Diego State.

Faulk was drafted second overall by the Colts in 1994 and became an NFL MVP with the St. Louis Rams. Faulk's versatility made him almost unstoppable in the Rams' high-powered offense.

"I see [Bush] as a cross between Brian Westbrook of the Eagles ... and Marshall Faulk in his heyday with the Rams," Mayock said, acknowledging a team might have to get creative to get the most out of Bush.

"If you want to put him behind the fullback in the "I" [formation] and run him 20-25 times, I don't think he's that guy," he said. "The whole key is matchups and you want to get this kid the ball in space with his ability to make people miss.

"I think he'll have the highest draft rating in recent history."

KRT

USC tailback Reggie Bush breaks away from the Washington defense into the open field. Bush is only a junior, but NFL scouts are saying he could be the first pick in the draft if he decides to leave school early.

Be a Web-savvy writer.

There are some significant differences between writing for the printed page and writing for the Web. That's why UMass Amherst offers a Certificate of Online Journalism that'll give you the skills editors are looking for. Tomorrow's journalists will know their news and know their 'Net.

ONLINE JOURNALISM

www.UMassULearn.net
413-545-2414
100 Venture Way, Hadley, MA

UMassAmherst Continuing Education

UMASS Campus Recreation

GET THOSE FORMS IN BY

Spring Basketball (M/W/C) 12/5

MANDATORY CLINICS FOR SPRING BASKETBALL OFFICIALS ARE SCHEDULED IN TWO PARTS. CLINICS ARE SCHEDULED FOR JANUARY 30 & 31AT 6 P.M. AND FEBRUARY 1 & 2AT 7 P.M. CALL FOR REQUIREMENTS AND LOCATIONS.

On The Web . www.umass.edu/umim

Could you make the Wizard of Oz on your laptop?

What once required a lot of heavy equipment can now be accomplished with lightweight, lightning-fast digital technology. If you have the know-how. That's why UMass Amherst offers a Certificate of Digital Media Production that'll give you the skills to produce the next Star Wars, eBay or Odelay.

DIGITAL MEDIA PRODUCTION

www.UMassULearn.net
413-545-2414
100 Venture Way, Hadley, MA

UMassAmherst Continuing Education

Today's engineers aren't driving trains. They're driving technology.

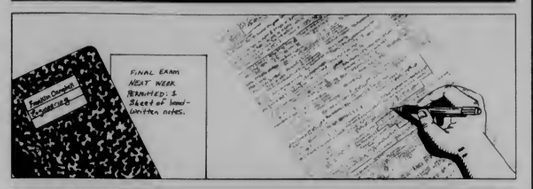
That's why UMass Amherst offers courses in computer science, electrical engineering and all things digital. Get the skills you need to advance in today's technology-driven economy. You can even get credit for work-related projects.

ENGINEERING AND APPLIED SCIENCES

www.UMassULearn.net
413-545-2414
100 Venture Way, Hadley, MA

UMassAmherst Continuing Education



THE SCORE PROMOTIONAL PARTY
DECEMBER 10
BEHIND THE MULLINS CENTER
4 P.M. - 7 P.M.
BEFORE THE UMASS - BC HOCKEY GAME

If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!
Insurance Replacement Rates
FREE PICK-UP

POTTERS
AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL
• Direct Billing to Insurance Company
• Locally Owned & Operated
• 7 & 15 Passenger Vans
• UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates

North Amherst Motors
Collision Repairs & Gloss Replacement
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
(413) 549-RENT (7368)
www.northamherstmotors.com
(One mile North of UMass - on bus route)

LABRAT By Richard Martelly

RANDOM CHATTER By Chris Sala

JACK DOGG By Xavier Rhodes

PAUL By Billy O'Keefe

A COLLEGE GIRL NAMED JOE By Aaron Warner

Quote of the Day

"It's not the size of the dog in the fight, it's the size of the fight in the dog."

—Mark Twain

ACROSS
1 Rip-off
5 Tony Orlando's group
9 Lane-crossing turns
14 Volcanic flow
15 Lotion additive
16 Portion out
17 Business managers
19 List of candidates
20 Traveling on foot
22 Bikini
23 Sen. Kefauver
24 Pulverize
26 Springs
30 Investigations
33 Aries image
36 Bed supports
38 Eat soup impolitely
39 Checkup
41 Summer ermine
43 Hodgepodge
44 Sprites
46 Lean lover of rhyme
48 Wager
49 Ribbed
51 Epic tales
53 Proportional relationship
55 Does' mates
59 Overflow letters
61 Spielberg movie extra?
65 Bizarre
67 Strait entrance to the Gulf of St Lawrence
68 Take out bows
69 Unemployed
70 Thunder peal
71 WWII surrender site
72 ___ the line (obeyed)
73 Experiment

DOWN
1 Gradient
2 Ann and Hatteras
3 Ward off
4 One Hemingway
5 Items of info
6 Large quantity
7 Was dressed in
8 Wasp homes
9 Malay seamen
10 Right-angled joint
11 Outmoded camera accessory
12 Carryall bag
13 Fricassee
18 Church parts
21 Minor devil
25 Fly single
27 Pacino and Hirt
28 Touches gently
29 Subway stations
31 Part of HOMES
32 Catch sight of
33 Bump into
34 Car shaft
35 Tenor Luciano
37 Poet Teasdale
40 Flat-topped hill
42 Running game
45 Seals for several 47 Try some
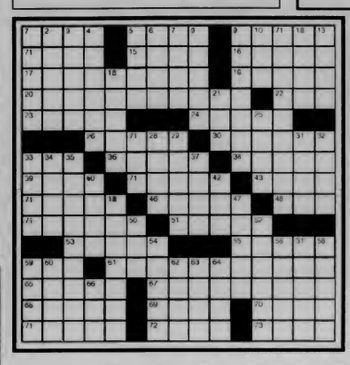
50 Hide out
52 Rigorous
54 Pilaster's path
56 Path to the altar
57 Celebrations
58 Caught a few winks
59 Go off, as milk
60 Ancient letter
62 Decorate anew
63 Fashion magazine
64 Idolized rice
66 Tire support



Find today's answers online

www.dailycollegian.com

The Moan and Dove

if you find yourself at the moan and dove, congratulate yourself for being successfully brainwashed.
next thing you know you'll be thinking for yourself.
now that's a party.

themoananddove.com
460 West St • Rte. 116
Amherst, MA • 256-1710
3pm 'til 1am every day

ROUTE 63 ROADHOUSE

FRIDAY 2ND
CATAMOUNT CLASSIC ROCK
9:30 PM

$5 PITCHERS

SATURDAY 3RD
TRAILER PARK BBQ ROCK
9:30 PM

$1 OFF COVER W/ VALID COLLEGE ID

All welcome to come and play!

SUNDAY 4TH
ACOUSTIC JAM
1 PM - 5 PM

WWW.RT63ROADHOUSE.COM

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You will be disease-free for at least the next few months.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
You will get a fun and high-paying job next semester.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You will drop one of your notebooks in a puddle today.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Make sure you have laundry detergent before putting your clothes in the machine.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Your favorite aunt will send you a large check in the near future.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Make sure you have a #2 pencil before taking that test.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You will have a messy run-in with a bicycle today.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Your schedule for next semester is not turning out to be very fun.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Seriously, Wednesday is not the best night to party.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You will regret not buying that book of stamps.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
You will forget your keys today and be locked out for hours.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You are an excellent essay writer, but not so good at multiple choice.

NEW IN TOWN? Get it done right the first time!

AMHERST HAIRSTYLISTS
Caren's Place

YOU CAN TRUST US WITH YOUR HAIR.
- Haircuts & Styling
- Hair Coloring (free Highlighting Consultations)
- Multi-Color Highlighting
- Body & Facial Waxing
- For Both Men & Women
- Walk-ins Welcome

www.carensplace.com

Fall Semester Coupon Specials!
10$ Clipper Cut
Free blow dry with haircut (straightening extra) or 10% off a regularly priced cut.
10 % Discount on Body & Facial Waxing
* only with this coupon *
debit - visa - mc - $

40 Main St.
Downtown Amherst
(Next to Newbury Comics)
Monday Prudy 10-6
Saturday 10-4
(413) 253-1200

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Attention RSOs, Fraternities, Sororities, & Club Sports: Advertise for your events in the Classifieds! Inexpensive and effective! Call 545-3500 for more info.

APARTMENT FOR RENT

1, 2, 3 & 4 Bedroom spacious apartments, Great location, Bus Route, All utilities included No Fee Call 413-253-3000

EMPLOYMENT

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience necessary. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

EMPLOYMENT

Winter Break Employment at the Boston University Bookstore! Many jobs are available through January. Stop by our JOB FAIR Dec.6 at the UMass Campus Center Concourse or email your resume to bnhmnres@bu.edu

November 30th is the last day to apply to become a legal assistant with the Student Legal Services Office. Earn 12 credits while gaining valuable experience. Hurry! Contact us at 545-1995 or stop by at 922 Campus Center to pick up an application.

EMPLOYMENT

Rent us your ears! Listening experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu Voicemail: 545-6837.

ROOM FOR RENT

413-335-5226 Mo. to mo. $325 inclusive 20 min to campus

SERVICES

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

SERVICES

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance. 549-1906

Computer Diagnostic Desktop $9.95 Laptop $39.95 413-584-8857

TRAVEL

SPRING BREAK FROM $569 BAHAMAS, CANCUN, ACAPULCO, JAMAICA! FREE PARTIES, FREE DRINKS. Sign up early and save. Organize a small group and you travel FREE. Or become a CAMPUS REP and GET PAID COMMISSION on each trip sold. Call today and get started 1-800-GET-SUN-1

TRAVEL

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

15 Day Fully guided tour of Italy leaving 7/20/06 $3,279 includes air hotels, breakfast and some dinners. If interested call Kathy at (413) 498-2490 or Carol at (413) 423-3654 Call by December 30th

ACT NOW – SPRING BREAKERS Book early & Save! Free meals/parties by 11/7. Lowest prices. Be a rep & TRAVEL FREE! Get the ultimate hookups with STA TRAVEL 413-256-1261.

TRAVEL

Leave your advertising needs to us! Let our experienced advertising representatives and graphic artists take care of you!

Reach over 14,000 readers daily! We offer a full range of ad sizes, as well as design services.

Contact us by calling (413) 545-3500 or by visiting us in the Campus Center Basement M-F 8:30am - 3:30pm

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS THURSDAY

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 1, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UMass attacks the trophy case

Werner and Quick receive accolades from Hockey East

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

When your team knocks off two of the top-five nationally ranked programs in a four-day span, that will open some eyes. When you happen to record the assist on both game-winning goals during that stretch, the open eyes will begin to stare at you. And when you throw a goal into that mix, well, that will earn you Hockey East Player of the Week.

After the Massachusetts hockey team upset both No. 5 Vermont and No. 3 Colorado College last week, senior captain Stephen Werner was spotlighted by the league for doing all of the above.

With the Minutemen tied at 1 in Burlington, Vt. last Tuesday, Werner and John Wessbecker helped set up freshman Chris Davis for the game-winning tally with just under three minutes left to play in the game.

As UMass was trailing 2-0 in the first period of Friday night's meeting with Colorado College, Werner's 2-on-1 goal got his team on the board. Then, in the third period with the Maroon and White on a power play, Werner picked up an assist on Chris Capraro's lamplighter to push the Minuteman lead out to 4-2 in the team's eventual 4-3 triumph.

"It's always good to get an award like that, and I think there are a lot of people on the team who could have gotten it for the way they played last week," Werner said, deflecting the attention off himself and onto his teammates. "I just got lucky that a few of my points came at crucial times in the games. But a lot of guys stepped up last week, and they were all deserving of that award, too."

In addition to Werner's accolades, freshman netminder Jon Quick was tabbed as the Hockey East Rookie of the Month for his services.

The youngster had just a 2-3 record in November, but his two victories (against Boston University on Nov. 12 and then UVM) knocked down the first two legs of UMass' three-game winning streak, which was halted in the 4-0 loss against Denver on Saturday night.

Quick brushed aside 179-of-191 shots last month, which is good for a .937 save percentage, and he allowed just 2.40 goals per game in his five outings.

Fry Me a River

Defenseman Marvin Degon, also a senior captain for the Minutemen, has gotten off to a tremendous start to the new season, picking up three goals – all on the power play – and one assist for four points. He has also gotten the Mullins Center crowd up and roaring for some of his thunderous hits, like the one he laid on Hobey Baker finalist Brett Sterling of CC on Friday night in the third period.

But no one on the team really wants to focus on Degon's on-ice heroics, as his teammates would rather talk about his off-the-ice masterpieces — or sometimes, lack thereof – and his newly purchased deep fryer.

After taking a trip to the Minnesota State Fair a couple years ago, Degon stumbled upon the wonders of deep-frying all kinds of different foods, so he figured he would pick one up of his own.

"I love food," Degon said. "At the end of the year last year, I think I weighed about 165

See UMASS NOTES on page 9

KAREN WONG/COLLEGIAN

UMass freshman goalie Jon Quick was named Hockey East Rookie of the Month for his stellar performance between the pipes. In five games, he registered a .937 save percentage and 2.40 goals against average.

HEA welcomes old with new

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

Just about two months into the hockey season and already Hockey East has seen its fare share of surprises. From breakout rookies to stunning newcomers, 2005 has yet to disappoint.

New Kids on the Block

Taking an early look at the conference standings, there are a few new teams at the top as well as some old regulars.

So far this season, the Friars of Providence (6-6-1 6-2-1 HEA) are atop the heap in the conference. Their six league wins not only account for all their wins on the season but tie their total conference wins from a season ago. In their last conference game on Nov. 18, the Friars tied perennial contender Boston University, 2-2.

HEA newcomer Vermont broke out of the gates on fire this season and is out to a 10-3-0 overall record and is 4-3-0 in the league. The Catamounts have slowed as of late, however, trading wins and losses in their last seven games. In that span they've taken down conference-leading Providence as well as the defending league champs Boston College.

After a slow start, New Hampshire has come on strongly lately to climb up to second place in the league. After starting the season 3-3-1, the Wildcats went on a tear, winning five straight conference games over the likes of Northeastern, BU, Maine and Lowell.

Goaltenders Lead the Way

It was no secret entering the season that there was an abundance of young and talented netminders all around the league.

One of the biggest question marks for Maine entering 2005 was how they were going to cope with the loss of all-conference goalie Jimmy Howard. Those questions and more were soon answered when freshman Ben Bishop took the ice. In his nine games this season, all Bishop has done is record a 1.89 goals against average and a .920 save percentage. Those numbers are good for second and third in the league, respectively.

Joe Fallon, UVM's last wall of defense, won't be outdone. Fallon has been a key component to his team's early season success in its new league. The sophomore dropped his last game out against UMass but has all in all had a season similar to his UCAC Rookie of the Year campaign of a year ago. Fallon's 1.83 goals against average and two shutouts lead the conference.

Another young goalie making a name for himself is BC's Cory Schneider. The sophomore is anchoring the defense for a team that is having a successful yet quiet season. Schneider's 6-3-1 record leads the way for the Eagles, who are looking to repeat as league champions. His 16-save effort lifted the Eagles to a 3-0 win over Merrimack on Saturday.

Best of the Best

UNH's Daniel Winnik was named Hockey East Player of the Month for his outstanding play for the Wildcats. Winnik, along with linemates Brett Hemingway and Jacob Micflikier, represents one of the most offensively potent lines in the nation. During the month, Winnik recorded four goals and nine assists to propel the Wildcats to a 5-3-1 record in November.

Despite his efforts, Winnik couldn't lift his team over Merrimack and Hockey East Goaltender of the Month Jim Healey. The Warriors defeated UNH 1-0 behind the outstanding efforts of Healey. The junior shut down the high-powered Wildcats to the tune of 31 saves.

The runner-up for Goaltender of the Month turned out to be the Superskills Rookie of the Month, UMass' freshman sensation Jon Quick. The rookie put together back-to-back wins over ranked opponents (BU and UVM) and stopped 179 shots in the five games he played last month.

Minutewomen welcome Hofstra to Mullins Center

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team (2-3 0-0 Atlantic 10) tallied its second win on Tuesday night against the Siena Saints (1-3) at the Mullins Center and will conclude a three-game home stand tonight against Hofstra (2-2).

Playing with emotion has been a tall order for the Minutewomen so far this season, and the practice following the Nov. 26 loss against Hartford was focused on raising the on-court intensity and enthusiasm.

Tuesday's game provided the first forum for the newly energized Minutewomen, and a convincing 71-53 win gave way to smiles and cheers for most of the 40-minute blowout. Now, it's a matter of consistency they must focus on.

"The real test is," Dacko offered, "can we come out [tonight] and reproduce this kind of energy against Hofstra?"

That will be the ultimate challenge for UMass, as a victory over Siena might produce some extra confidence and get the team one step closer to .500, but it is a win against a weaker non-conference opponent, a small accomplishment in the big picture.

After the Siena win, Dacko talked mostly about the mental aspect of the game – knowing what it's like to win, expecting to win, having confidence, having emotion and energy. The on-court talents of this year's team are not in question, as the Minutewomen's strengths were showcased in a combination of post moves, potent outside shooting, swarming defense and consistent rebounding.

Rosario led all scorers with 19 points in 36 minutes on Tuesday, while classmate Kate Mills tallied her first double-double of her career with 15 points and 10 rebounds. Junior Tamara Tatham baffled Siena defenders with athletic spins and strong finishes with her weak hand.

At one point in the second half, Tatham received the ball on the block, turned and faced the basket in triple-threat position, dribbled to the right, spun back to the left and finished the play with her left hand in the paint. It caught most by surprise, but

See WOMEN'S HOOPS on page 10

Dacko calls for emotion

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

The weather was unusually warm for a late November night as the Massachusetts women's basketball team headed into their showdown against Siena (1-3) at the Mullins Center on Tuesday.

The Minutewomen (2-3) were hungry for a win and determined to forget about the late 27-7 run that Hartford had put on them just three days before, giving UMass its third loss of the season.

Tuesday night's game was huge for the Minutewomen, as coach Marnie Dacko made it crystal clear that her team needed to show more emotion on the court than in past games, and the Minutewomen did just that against the Saints. And you could tell by the priceless look of satisfaction on her face that Dacko was pleased with her team's performance.

"I can smile," Dacko said after Tuesday night's game. "I'm just happy with the way my team came out and played. I'm particularly happy with the second half. We played with a great deal of emotion and energy, and that was something we were lacking. We identified that as something we need to improve upon, so I'm just really proud of my team."

UMass defeated Siena by a score of 71-53, and the team's intensity was higher than ever.

Dacko had focused mainly on getting her players to show more emotion than they did against Hartford, and with a strong performance on both ends of the court on Tuesday night, it looked as she got her message across.

"The day after that loss [against Hartford], we had a practice, and our main focus that whole practice was just about emotion and getting excited over everything," sophomore Pam Rosario said after Tuesday night's win over Siena.

"For example, taking a charge or making a huge block; Marnie really wanted us to focus on that and to come out and stay emotional.

"Don't just do it for the first three minutes or the first half, do it the whole game and be consistent with it. And I think it really showed tonight because we all put it in the back of our mind and kept focusing on that."

Rosario continued her outstanding play as she once again led the Minutewomen offense in scoring with 19 points.

Rosario has proven to be a major player for the Minutewomen this season, as she averages 34.8 minutes per game and leads the team in scoring with 15.2 points per game.

Her sophomore partner-in-crime,

See EMOTION on page 10

KAREN WONG/COLLEGIAN

Kate Mills (41) recorded her first career double-double on Tuesday night when she picked up 15 points and snagged 10 rebounds.

Mills and Rosario step up big

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team (2-3 0-0 Atlantic 10) displayed its potential on Tuesday against the Siena Saints (1-3), as the game featured a 19-point performance by sophomore Pam Rosario, a double-double by sophomore Kate Mills (the first of her career), some flashy low-post moves from junior Tamara Tatham and a new half-court trap defense that UMass coach Marnie Dacko threw in for the first time this season.

But five games into the 2005 campaign, it is uncertain which Minutewoman team will show up to play: The one with fire and enthusiasm that executes offensively, rebounds well and gets easy baskets off of fast breaks; or the one that loses to weaker teams and loses mental intensity at inopportune times.

It plays Hofstra tonight and then goes on five-game road trip, a potent test for a fragile team.

Run of the Mills

Kate Mills posted the first double-double of her career last night with 15 points and 10 rebounds, and her 15 points were a career-high. She has also shown promise in another defensive realm: blocked shots. Mills has blocked 11 shots in the last three games and ranks first in the league in blocks per game, averaging 2.75, and her 11 total blocks are good for second in the league behind Temple's Candace Dupree, who has 12.

UMass is third in the league in the blocks per game, averaging 4.50, and its 18 blocks are second in the league behind Temple, which has a staggering 36 blocks out of the gate.

No Bed of Rosanios

Rosario led all scorers Tuesday night with 19 points on 7-of-11 shooting and 2-of-4 from 3-point land in 36 minutes of action. Rosario regularly plays over 35 minutes a game, and with the game well in hand on Tuesday, she stayed on the floor until Dacko took her out with just over two minutes left in the game. She considered herself fortunate to have the last two minutes off.

"My legs are tired just because it's a lot of minutes, and we never stop running," she said. "It's good to get a break for the last two minutes. When I'm not playing, I have to stretch all of the time."

Rosario is averaging 14.3 points per game this season (an improvement from last year's 10.9) and is ranked 10th in the A-10 in scoring.

Rosario is also helping out with rebounding duties this season, as she has improved from a 3.1 rebounds

See HOOPS on page 10

KAREN WONG/COLLEGIAN

Pam Rosario dropped 19 points and hit a pair of 3-pointers in UMass' victory over Siena on Tuesday night. She is 10th in the A-10 in scoring.

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890

The Daily Collegian

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 2, 2005 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM VOLUME CXVI ISSUE 58

Candidates hold open forum for UMass students

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

The first of three candidates for the new post of the associate vice chancellor for the center for student development at the University of Massachusetts held one of the three scheduled open forums last night in the Campus Center.

Dr. Bryan D. Samuel, who is currently the interim director for the office of multicultural affairs and the coordinator for multicultural recruitment at the University of Nebraska at Kearney, applauded UMass' diversity goals and its effort to continue working to broaden the scope of diversity in the curriculum and campus life.

"I believe that students need to be ready to live as global citizens when they leave our institutions," said Samuel. "They need to know how to interact with people from different walks of life, how to view and appreciate different perspectives even when they don't necessarily agree with them."

Samuel also unveiled ideas on helping students to cope with increasing debt brought upon by student loans.

"I don't think students should be leaving our institutions with $60,000 or $70,000 worth of debt. Many of them are paying that debt over 15 years or 20 years and it's terribly detrimental to take on other competing priorities, such as buying homes, raising children and saving for their children's college education," said Samuel.

"We have to get to a point where we are advising students to stray from taking out loans when they don't necessarily need them," said Samuel.

Samuel also touched on points of his dissertation he wrote while gaining his Ph.D. at the University of Nebraska.

In his dissertation, Samuel explained the burden of student loan debt placed on the life choices of black bachelor's degree graduates.

"We need to educate students on the use of student loan care. Right now we have some systems in place, but they mainly concern paying back student loans," said Samuel.

"It's very interesting to me that the guarantee in student loans is that your guaranteed to pay it back, not guaranteed to actually get the loan. A lot of students don't concentrate on the total amount of debt that they are obtaining."

As vice chancellor for the center for student development, Samuel's objective is to formulate, coordinate and implement university policies, programs and services pertaining to the educational, personal, cultural and general welfare of the student body, providing guidance on diversity and multicultural issues.

Samuel also expressed his desire to attempt to bridge the gap between the campus life experience and the curricular experience.

"We have to have students talking and interacting within the classroom and that interaction has to carry over into campus life," said Samuel.

"We have to bring the planners, the people who are developing the curriculum, into the picture as well as the students."

Samuel previously served as the executive assistant to the school's vice chancellor for student affairs. He has also coordinated student support services and the scholastic enhancement program at Miami University in Ohio. Samuel earned his B.S. and M.Ed. at the University of Tennessee at Chattanooga.

The remaining open forums are scheduled for Mon., Dec. 5 at 1:45-3:15 p.m. with Mr. Byron Bullock, and Thurs., Dec. 8 at 1:45-3:15 with Dr. Miriam Feldblum.

The forums are held in room 917 of the Campus Center, all undergraduate and graduate students are invited to attend the open forums.

UMass holds vigil to remember Rosa Parks

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

A vigil in honor of Rosa Parks was held yesterday, on the 50th anniversary of the beginning of the Montgomery bus boycott.

Rosa Parks, who died earlier this year, is most well-known for her refusal to offer her seat to a white man on a segregated bus in Montgomery, Ala. This action helped to set off the civil rights movement and the boycott of the Alabama buses for nearly a full year.

The vigil was called, "Rosa Parks: Commemorating a Civil legacy," and was organized by the Office of ALANA Affairs. The event began when more than 100 students gathered at the Shirley Graham Du Bois Library in the New Africa House to watch the film, "Eyes on the Prize."

This movie explored the roots of segregation in the United States, particularly the South and the events surrounding the start of the civil rights movement. The main clip of the movie was about the Montgomery bus boycott which was organized almost overnight, right after Parks was arrested for her actions on the bus.

Next, the groups of students crowded onto three buses to ride in honor of Parks' memory. Students started up the front entrance of the bus before being sent to board the back entrance. This signified those blacks on segregated buses who paid their fee at the front of the bus and then were forced to board at the back, not even allowed to walk through the front section reserved for white passengers.

In fact, this rule was the first one Parks violated on the bus, according to Joyce Vincent, one of the speakers at the event. Years before her famous stand in 1955, Parks was thrown off of a Montgomery bus when she walked down the aisle, through the area reserved for whites, to the back of the bus instead of going outside as blacks were expected to do.

Vincent also discussed the "mythology" of Parks that is being perpetuated by the media. Vincent reminded students that Parks was not some meek, quiet woman. She was educated and acted as secretary for the NAACP.

Although the myth seems to be that Parks remained in her seat because her feet were tired, Vincent said, "Parks was not a meek woman, she was a strong woman and when she took action, she took it for a reason, not just because."

Vincent also reminded students that although great strides had been made in the movement for racial equality and integration, "We still have a long way to go." Some students said they feel isolated when they're the only minority students in their classes.

Jolie Conn told students to ask their relatives who had experienced bussing to white neighborhoods when schools were being desegregated, "Ask them what it was like to have eggs thrown at their buses and to be spit on." Conn told students to remember experiences like this and to educate others about their history.

Students seemed impressed with the vigil and the discussion of Parks' life. "I think it was a good experience," said Gregory Sparks, a legal studies major. "A lot of the time, people of color forget where they came from and all the things that happened in the past and stuff like this helps remind us."

After the vigil, several students headed to the Malcolm X Cultural Center to continue commemorating Parks' impact on the civil rights movement.

The UMass Transit Authority also held their own, day-long commemoration of Parks and of the boycotts she helped inspire. On each bus, one of the front seats remained empty yesterday, marked with a placard reserving the space for Parks. The drivers and bus staff also wore badges and kept their headlights on all day in honor of the events that occurred 50 years ago today.

Several students crowd onto three buses to ride in honor of Rosa Parks' memory. In honor of Parks, students who entered the bus began sitting in the front of the bus before being asked to move to the back.

French doctor performs first 'face transplant'

By Carole Bianchi
Associated Press

LYON, France — Doctors in France said they had performed the world's first partial face transplant, forging into a risky medical frontier with their operation on a woman disfigured by a dog bite.

The 38-year-old woman, who wants to remain anonymous, had a nose, lips and chin grafted onto her face from a brain-dead donor whose family gave consent. The operation, performed Sunday, included a surgeon already famous for transplant breakthroughs, Dr. Jean-Michel Dubernard.

"The patient's general condition is excellent and the transplant looks normal," said a statement issued Wednesday from the hospital in the northern city of Amiens where the operation took place. Dubernard would not discuss the surgery, but confirmed that it involved the nose, lips and chin.

"We still don't know when the patient will get out," he said. A news conference is planned for Friday.

Scientists in China have performed scalp and ear transplants, but experts say the mouth and nose are the most difficult parts of the face to transplant. In 2000, Dubernard did the world's first double forearm transplant.

The surgery drew both praise and sobering warnings over its potential risks and ethical and psychological ramifications. If successful — something that may not be known for months or even years — the procedure offers hope to people horribly disfigured by burns, accidents or other tragedies.

The woman was "severely disfigured" by a dog bite in May that made it difficult for her to speak and chew, according to a joint statement from the hospital in Amiens and another in the southern city of Lyon where Dubernard works.

Such injuries are "extremely difficult, if not impossible" to repair using normal surgical techniques, the statement said.

"For pushing the bounds of science, they are to be applauded, as long as they have got full informed consent from the patient and the donor's family," added Dr. Iain Hutchison, chief executive of the London-based Facial Surgery Research Foundation.

Scientists around the world are working to perfect techniques involved in transplanting faces. Today's best treatments leave many people with facial disfigurement and scar tissue that doesn't look or move like natural skin.

A complete face transplant, which involves applying a sheet of skin in one operation, has never been done before.

The procedure is complex, but uses standard surgical techniques.

Critics say the surgery is too risky for something that is not a matter of life or death, as regular organ transplants are.

The main worry for both a full face transplant and a partial effort is organ rejection, causing the skin to slough off.

"It is not clear whether an individual could be left worse off in the event that a face transplant failed," said Dr. Stephen Wigmore, chair of the ethics committee of the British Transplantation Society.

Complications also include infections that turn the new face black and require a second transplant or reconstruction with skin grafts, perhaps even one or two years later. Drugs to prevent rejection are needed for life and raise the risk of kidney damage and cancer.

Such concerns have delayed British plans to attempt the operation. In France, ethics authorities rejected an application to try a full face transplant last year, but left the door open for a partial procedure involving the mouth and nose.

In the United States, the Cleveland Clinic is among those planning to attempt a face transplant.

The French surgery "doesn't change our plans," said Cleveland surgeon Dr. Maria Siemionow. "We are really looking for the right candidate," which she

See FACE on page 2

Learning, 24 hours a day

UMass students take advantage of the W.E.B. Du Bois Library's new 24-hour a day schedule while making use of the library's new learning common area.

Receding groundwater threatens Beacon Hill's historic legacy

By Ken Maguire
Associated Press

BOSTON — The dried-out wooden pilings beneath Lewis Lloyd's multimillion-dollar Beacon Hill town house were rotting out from under him.

"You could stick a screwdriver in up to the handle," said the 67-year-old retired media executive.

Groundwater levels have been dropping for years in some Boston neighborhoods, exposing the wooden supports that have propped up the city for more than a century. Without the protecting embrace of water, the pilings quickly rot, posing expensive problems for property owners.

The water level below Lloyd's house — in the same affluent neighborhood that U.S. Sen. John Kerry and former General Electric boss Jack Welch call home — was two feet below the tops of his pilings.

Had he done nothing, he risked major structural damage. So Lloyd paid $250,000 to "underpin" the five-story building, a job that entails digging up the basement, cutting off the rotted tops of the pilings and replacing them with steel beams wrapped in concrete. Insurance doesn't cover any of it.

"I didn't think it was going to cost as much as it did," he said.

Much of the city — including the Back Bay and parts of downtown Boston — is built on tidal flats that were filled in during the 19th century to create neighborhoods that would house the city's exploding population.

Because the landfill alone couldn't support the buildings, pilings the shape and length of telephone poles were driven down until they hit solid clay. The foundations were then built on top of the pilings. Structures as big as the imposing Trinity Church, in Copley Square, were built in this manner. One estimate puts the value of properties sitting atop pilings citywide at $10 billion.

The pilings can last hundreds of years — as they have in some European cities — as long as they remain submerged. But leaks in underground infrastructure, like sewer lines, subway tunnels and garages, have lowered the groundwater level, exposing the pilings.

Above ground, streets, sidewalks and parking lots redirect rainwater into storm sewers instead of being absorbed into the ground.

Milwaukee has experienced similar troubles in its downtown, as have Amsterdam, Oslo and Stockholm.

"But there was no place that was filled as extensively as Boston," said Jim Lambrechts, an engineering professor at Wentworth Institute of Technology, who is studying the problem.

Historians worry about the long-term impact on the city's architectural heritage.

"If nothing were done, a substantial part of the housing stock of the city of Boston and the history of Boston would be threatened," said Elliott Laffer, executive director of the Boston Groundwater Trust, a city-funded organization that monitors water levels. "People come to Boston to look at and study our historic buildings. Nobody comes here for the weather."

After years of complaints by property owners and citizens' groups, something is finally being done. Neighborhood

See WATER on page 2

ARTS & LIVING
WELCOME TO "NOLLYWOOD"
Nigeria's film industry continues to grow.
PAGE 4

EDITORIAL/OPINION
PARKING VIOLATIONS FUND
Money collected from parking violations goes to the parking services scholarship fund.
PAGE 3

WEATHER
TODAY Snow/Rain, H40°, L24°
TOMORROW Sunny, H37°, L22°
SUNDAY Partly Cloudy, H38°, L21°

SPORTS
HOFSTRA EDGES UMASS
The Minutewomen fell 59-58 last night.
PAGE 8

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Michael Busack
MANAGING EDITOR Cameron J. Woods
BUSINESS MANAGER Hirak Shah
PRODUCTION MANAGER Nicholas Belanger
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Sherri Wolnik
ADVERTISING MANAGER Kerri O'Grady
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Lauren Egavian
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Amanda Allen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Matthew O'Rourke
COMICS EDITOR Amanda Allen
EDITORIAL EDITOR Allison Edles
NEWS EDITOR Dan O'Brien
PHOTO EDITOR Kate Sachsenmaier
SPORTS EDITOR Jeff Howe
CIRCULATION MANAGER Thomas Hecht
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Nick Gleason
FINANCE MANAGER Daniel Conti
HUMAN RESOURCE Phil Smoller
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Caren Tortorici
ASSISTANT REPORTS Nathan Chomko
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Mackenzie Isler
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Ian Jones
ASSISTANT NEWS Megan Daley
ASSISTANT NEWS Matt Bellisveau
ASSISTANT PHOTO Elizabeth Caristi
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eric Athas
ASSISTANT SPORTS Dan Duggan
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Kristen LaCasse

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1903, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1936. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL 413-545-3500 BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 5:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Allison Edles
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Elizabeth Caristi
COPY EDITOR
Ian Jones
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Nicky Belanger
PRODUCTION STAFF
Sarah Belanger, Shawn Duram

Charity to beneift domestic abuse victims

The second annual Mayor Higgins' Hot Chocolate Run in Northampton will be kicked off Dec. 3 with a 5K run and a two mile walk.

The event benefits Safe Passage, which provides "non-judgmental support, shelter, counseling and an abundance of resources to women, children and families affected by domestic violence," according to the center's Web site, safepass.org.

Safe Passage was established in 1977 and offers a number of services to benefit victims of domestic violence, including crisis support, a 24-hour hotline, advocacy, support groups, legal services, a safe house and individual counseling.

The first 600 enrants in the Hot Chocolate Run will receive a collector's mug designed by cartoonist Hilary B. Price and all participants will be given complimentary hot chocolate donaied by Northampton Coffee. The event will also be emceed by 93.9 The River's Kelsey Flynn.

According to the event's Web site, prizes include an overnight stay at the Clarion hotel, running shoes, running watches, a half-hour massage with Rachel Hannah, a one week pass to Kinetics Adult Fitness at Kidsports and various gift certificates.

Northampton Running Company, Jonathan Wright of Wright Builders and Northampton High School track coach Jim Clayton are also encouraging students to participate by offering prizes for top middle and high school runners.

The walk will begin at 9:30 a.m. and the run at 10 a.m. from the People's Institute at 38 Gothic Street in downtown Northampton. The student cost to participate is $8 in advance and $10 on the day of the race, and for others the cost is $12 in advance and $15 on the day of the race. Visit hotchocolaterun.com to sign up or for more information.

—Meghan Murphy

Doctors criticized over new surgery

FACE from page 1

described as "severely disfigured patients which have already had the conventional treatment" and for whom a transplant is the last chance.

Dubernard, who is also a lawmaker in France's lower house of parliament, collaborated in the operation with the Amiens hospital's Dr. Bernard Devauchelle.

Weekly news magazine Le Point reported that the recipient lives in Valenciennes, in northeast France, and that the donor's facial organs were removed in a hospital in Lille, about 60 miles from where the transplant was performed.

In 1976, Dubernard performed Europe's first pancreas transplant. He also led teams that performed a hand transplani in September 1998 and the world's first double forearm transplant in January 2000.

The hand transplant recipient, New Zealander Clint Hallam, later had it amputated. Doctors said he failed to take the required drugs and his body rejected the limb.

The double-forearm recipient, Denis Chatelier from France, said in 2003 that he had regained "normal usage" of his hands and was even able to shave himself. His forearms were severed in a model rocket accident.

Doctors from Jinling Hospital in Nanjing, China, reported that in September 2003, they transplanted two ears, part of the scalp and other facial skin from a brain-dead young man to a 72-year-old woman with advanced skin cancer.

Four months later, there were no signs of rejection or tumor recurrence, but it is not known how the patient fared after that.

Doctors around the world have performed partial face transplants using the patients' own skin, but these don't require anti-rejection drugs.

Beacon Hill homeowners file suits over receding groundwater damage activists began pressuring elected officials after several Chinatown homes had to be torn down in the 1980s because of rotted pilings.

WATER from page 1

In September, eight city and state agencies accused of contributing to the problem with their leaky pipes and transit tunnels agreed to find and fix the breaches. The agreement is non-binding and assumes no responsibility. Separately, the Groundwater Trust is overseeing the installation of 800 monitoring wells across the city, a process that is now nearly complete.

In an odd contrast to the pumping of water from New Orleans streets following Hurricane Katrina, the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority is paying $35,000 a year to pump water back into the ground in the city's South End, where its Orange Line subway tunnel is thought to be leaking.

MBTA spokesman Joe Pesaturo said the agency is footing the bill "as a gesture of good faith."

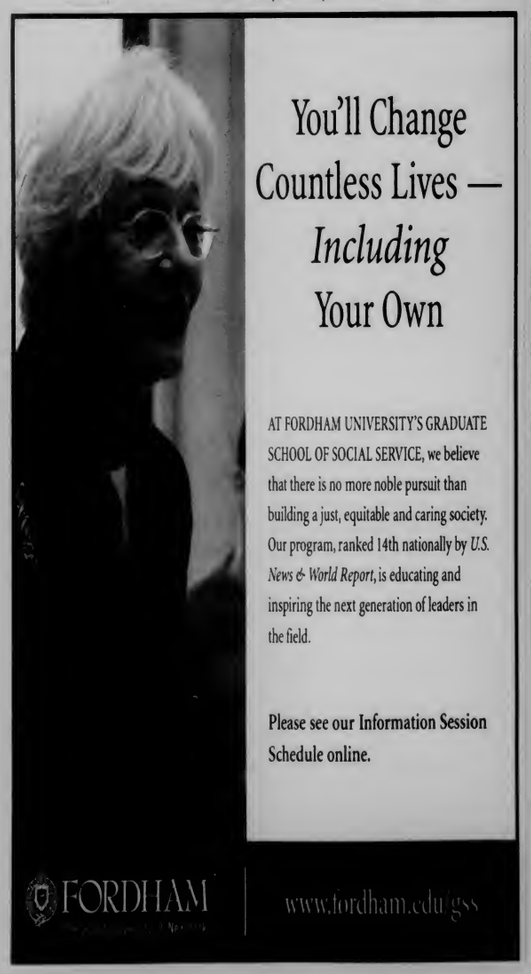
"No study has been generated to indicate that a transit tunnel is the primary reason for groundwater levels dropping in any particular neighborhood," he said.

Mike Naime, who lives nearby, paid a few thousand dollars to have engineers dig up his back yard and look at the pilings under his home. The diagnosis: minor damage. The water being pumped by the MBTA has restored the water levels around his pilings at no additional cost to Naime.

"In three or five years our pilings would have rotted," said Naime, who can now check his water levels through a monitoring well. "You'd have a real mess on your hands."

Despite evidence that water levels are dropping, lawsuits seeking to hold the city and state responsible for personal property damage have so far been unsuccessful because there's no law guaranteeing a right to groundwater, said James W. Hunt, Boston's chief of environment and energy.

More than a dozen Beacon Hill homeowners sued in the 1980s, claiming government agencies were responsible for the damage to their pilings after the state built a highway underpass on nearby Storrow Drive. That case was settled out of court and others are pending.



The owners of a waterfront office building have sued the Massachusetts Turnpike Authority, claiming the notorious Big Dig lowered groundwater levels and damaged its pilings.

But although the $14.6 billion project created miles of new highway tunnels under downtown Boston and has been famously leaking ever since, it has so far contributed little to the problem, said Lambrechts. The comparatively tiny Storrow Drive underpass, for example, poses a greater threat to groundwater than the entire Big Dig.

One possible solution is to put barriers in the ground to prevent the groundwater from escaping, Lambrechts said. But such a solution would be costly and it's unclear who would pay.

Homes that have stood in Beacon Hill since the 19th century now stand in severe structual danger due to Boston's constant loss of groundwater, exposing the wooden supports that hold up the homes.

You'll Change Countless Lives — Including Your Own

AT FORDHAM UNIVERSITY'S GRADUATE SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SERVICE, we believe that there is no more noble pursuit than building a just, equitable and caring society. Our program, ranked 14th nationally by U.S. News & World Report, is educating and inspiring the next generation of leaders in the field.

Please see our Information Session Schedule online.

FORDHAM

www.fordham.edu/gss

Invest in your future.

Earn 1, 2, or 3 credits in less than a month

Classes begin January 4

English Comp I and II
Intro to Dance
Intro to Ethics
Modern Physics
Psychology
Public Speaking
Self Defense for Women
Spanish Skills
French Skills

CLICK or CALL
gcc.mass.edu
(413) 775-1801

GREENFIELD Community College

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 2, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it"
-Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Parking services bank on students

Jennifer Lane

I'm making all my Christmas gifts this year, and before you wave me off as the next Martha Stewart wannabe, hear me out. I've already made four polar fleece scarves and bath salts. I've also decided to make change purses and here is where you come in. Parking services puts these adorable folders over their tickets and I was looking for a few extra. I'm going to cover them with fabric. I've discovered they fit toll and gas money nicely in your glove compartment and I would love to make them pretty for the holidays.

I know you have these folders, because I've seen them on every other car at UMass. True, that's an exaggeration, but I believe it's a requirement to have at least one ticket before you graduate from UMass.

My roommate discovered last week that you couldn't park on Thatcher Way (the road behind Worcester DC) during the day. There is a sign on the Sylvan entrance of Thatcher Way noting what time of day it is acceptable to park on that particular street. However, there is no sign when entering from the Orchard Hill entrance.

On the way back to her car, seven of the 10 cars she saw had the folders (that I'm looking for) on their windshields. At $25 per ticket they've just made $175 in five minutes. Where does this money go, you ask? Well, if you look on the parking services Web site and your parking ticket, it clearly states that all the citation money goes directly into the parking services scholarship fund. Who is that for and where do I sign up? I would like to get most of my money back and maybe this scholarship fund can help.

> Where does this money go, you ask? Well, if you look on the parking services Web site and your parking ticket, it clearly states that all the citation money goes directly into the parking services scholarship fund. Who is that for and where do I sign up?

In terms of money, parking services seems to be rolling around and playing in it. Let's underestimate for a moment. There are 3,950 students in Orchard Hill alone. If 1,000 of those students bought yellow lot permits and 250 bought purple lot tickets, that would be $203,750. That's less than one fifth of our campus. I could only imagine how much money is collected by the end of the year.

Not only do they ticket, but keep an eye on your car. They will tow anyone. In fact, I've been towed three times and this is only my third semester. Granted it was my fault twice, but in the winter it's freezing and dark. Being a girl and alone, parking in the yellow lot is sometimes just not an option. It seems unfair that they're receiving $203,750 just from Orchard Hill students and the yellow lot isn't paved. There's no pavement, no lines, no specific parking spaces and no lights. If we're paying upward of $150 for a parking permit, it should be in a safe area.

Not only should our permits be for a safer area, but it also doesn't seem fair that you cannot park anywhere on campus without paying more money. We already pay more than $150 for our permits. Why should we have to pay another four dollars a week in parking meters to do our errands on campus? Of course, parking services would like to see us walk, but if it's snowing outside and I have my vehicle that I'm paying to have on campus, it only seems fair that there should be more available parking.

Parking services, as they have said in a few previous Collegian articles, are "doing the best they can." If they need any suggestions, I have plenty. Lower ticket amounts to 8 to 10 dollars to give the students an idea they were wrong. Pave the yellow lots, or figure out some sort of parking divider system that should replace the non-existent lines. Or maybe make more parking available for the amount of money we are paying. We've been well-behaved, or so I think. We deserve this gift much more than our parents did. My father, who visited UMass many years ago, said they used to throw things at the meter maid. Because we've been good this year, I think we deserve more parking spaces.

The reason I'm making my Christmas gifts this year is because I have a smaller budget. The reason I have a smaller budget this year is because of parking services. Maybe if we were informed about where our money is going, or if we had a safer parking area and less amounts on our tickets, we would have a happier and more plentiful holiday. Happy holidays, parking services. I hope you like your change purse, because you'll be receiving one in the mail within the next 7 to 10 days.

Jennifer Lane is a Collegian columnist.

Law enforcement strips our rights

Evan Mowery

I know what you are going to say when you are finished reading this column, for the story that I am about to tell is nothing new. It is not an isolated incident. It is something you probably have seen on television. It is something that might have happened to someone you know. It may even have been something you have experienced first hand.

It is an old subject that will not change by my writing of this column, but it is something that must be acknowledged and retained in the back of everyone's mind. I am referring, of course, to the daily occurrence of unfair treatment by our law enforcement.

One such incident occurred the other evening to me and I feel now that I must record it and remind us of the travesties that occur more often than we like to think about.

My main source of employment, as of now, is the position of delivery driver for the Hangar. This job requires me to traverse the Amherst area for nine to 10 hours a day and cover every road and even those that are only loosely referred to as roads. Encounters with the local law enforcement are difficult, obviously, to avoid in such an endeavor.

That particular evening (morning, actually, because it had recently turned 1 a.m.), I was returning from one of the many deliveries of the night when I carelessly rolled through a stop sign. Not in a dangerous manner but only slowing enough to confirm that there were no vehicles in the immediate vicinity. Given the lateness of the hour and the desolation of the roads it seemed reasonable and not at all dangerous.

An officer in a parked cruiser, however, nearly invisible to the passersby, observed my actions, and, as expected, turned on his lights and pulled me over. Nothing unreasonable. I deserved it for not obeying the traffic laws.

The officer approached my vehicle and requested my license and registration. I fumbled through the trash that perpetually occupies my car, finally producing the piece of paper confirming that this was actually my vehicle and that it was registered. The officer, observing this fumbling, somehow perceived it to be suspicious and began to accuse me of acting strangely.

You know, that's funny. I did not know the officer knew me so well as to be able to tell when I am acting strange. I personally think I act strange 24 hours a day, seven days a week, and this was just me being me. The officer thought differently, however, and instructed me to get out of the vehicle.

> . . . the enforcers do not want us to know our rights, and if we do, they have been trained to find loopholes and sly maneuvers with which they can trick us into getting what they want anyway.

He then promptly searched me without my permission. When he asked whether there was anything he should know about in my vehicle because he was going to search it anyway, I informed the officer that my actions did not merit a search. To this, he said, "Oh, so you wanna play that game, do you?" and searched my car, opening the glove compartment and rummaging through the closed center console.

What could I do, say, "yes, I want to play that game?" I was powerless, utterly stripped of my right to privacy. It was here that I began to realize a major flaw in our law enforcement system.

We have a system that produces individuals that are trained to serve and protect the well-being of people. For this, I most heartily appreciate them. The system is one, however, that also trains the said enforcers to use whatever means necessary to get what they are after. These means include, but are not limited to, intimidation, word twists, not allowing those they deem obstructers of the peace full knowledge of their rights and the opportunity to be treated in a fair manner because of their ignorance. In other words, the enforcers do not want us to know our rights, and if we do, they have been trained to find loopholes and sly maneuvers with which they can trick us into getting what they want anyway.

This is not a serious incident. I was not beaten senseless for no reason. I was not taken to jail. I was only fined a little bit unreasonably. I know that there are many things that are happening in this world that make this event seem very insignificant. But, in such an insignificant situation, the officer took full liberties, and what is more, he will continue to take them. I do not know about anyone else, but this thought frightens me, for now we have a law enforcement system that contains some individuals that will stop at nothing until our rights are stripped away.

Not all is lost, mind you, for I have met some very decent officers. But the presence of those rogue enforcers with practically nothing to stand in their way frightens me. Is this a police state? Not yet, but without restriction, who knows what the future will bring?

Evan Mowery is a UMass student.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

STICKING UP FOR SHEEHAN

It is almost reassuring to learn that your columnist David B. Lawrence ("Mother exploits own son," Nov. 29) is perpetuating a particularly obnoxious and often insidious rhetorical strain in American conservatism with such talent here at UMass Amherst. Perhaps Lawrence has congratulated himself for striking a blow against the alleged "liberal" consensus in American academia.

Unfortunately, it is more likely that Lawrence will congratulate himself long before he realizes how truly execrable and repulsive was his pathetic diatribe against Cindy Sheehan. His sentiments would be laughable if his hollow paeans to "noble sacrifice" did not become so venomous when he used them to tarnish someone with Cindy Sheehan's integrity.

Instead, Lawrence intimates that Cindy Sheehan has somehow dishonored her son's sacrifice by speaking so loudly against the war. I rather think she has earned the right – perhaps more than many of us – to express her opinion on the war in Iraq and the man who initiated it without real provocation or necessity.

As far as I'm concerned, any parent who has lost a child to this waste of a war has earned a certain amount of credibility in expressing any kind of opinion about the meaning of their child's death to themselves and the society at large. Apparently Mr. Lawrence extends his respect for the political speech of dead soldiers' parents only to those parents who would share his puerile platitudes about "heroes" and "sacrifice."

How dare David Lawrence come between Cindy Sheehan and her own dead son? If your columnist really believes that the cause for which Casey's life and future was so callously wasted (along with the other 2,109 killed GIs) is so heroic and noble, than why does he not enlist tomorrow? Why not waste any time, Mr. Lawrence, and enlist today? Perhaps when you return from Iraq, with post-traumatic stress disorder, bereft of one of your arms or legs or in a body bag, maybe then you will have earned the right to denigrate Cindy Sheehan with the odious disregard that you displayed in your last column. Perhaps then someone might even call you a hero.

Justin Jackson
UMass student

WHY THE YOUNG REALLY LEAVE PITTSFIELD

Through four years at the University of Massachusetts, I never imagined writing for or to the Collegian. Furthermore, being from Pittsfield, I never imagined writing in defense of the city. However, I must object to Joseph Drury Jr.'s editorial titled, "How I Became a Socialist," from Nov. 30. Mr. Drury paints a very grim picture of the city as it stands today, and while his statistics may be accurate, it is my opinion that he draws the wrong conclusions from them.

It is true that General Electric left Pittsfield a mess. As a Superfund site, GE did leave Pittsfield polluted and destitute with, as Mr. Drury puts it, suspiciously high cancer rates. The fish cannot be eaten, and I wouldn't swim in Silver Lake if you paid me. However, for all the bad, there is hope. GE is bearing the costs of its mistakes, paying for the clean-up of the Housatonic River and surrounding PCB dump sites. Whether one agrees with the clean-up process or not, at least something is being done to help the situation. This is much more than anyone can say about greenhouse gas emissions or acid rain.

While I do not wish to defend GE in any way, I would like to offer another viewpoint. Mr. Drury is portraying GE as a heartless, greedy monster. By actually talking to people who worked at GE in the 1980s and 1990s, one will hear that the vast majority of employees did very little on a day-to-day basis other than rack up hours and collect pay.

Employee unions wanted more money for their workers, even though they were doing less actual work. Unions have made great strides towards workers' rights, but unfortunately this was not one of those strides. GE could not afford to pay anyone $50 to change a light bulb. While there may have existed other contributing factors to GE's diminishing finances, GE saw no option but to lay off many workers, streamline operations and try to survive.

Mr. Drury vastly oversimplifies the problem of young people leaving Pittsfield. Here, Mr. Drury places blame on GE once again, stating that layoffs throughout the 1980s have affected this seemingly ongoing trend. "There is no future in Pittsfield," states Mr. Drury, referring to his opinion that young people leave Pittsfield in great masses in search for corporate jobs elsewhere.

In reality, this is not the only factor for the aging population in Pittsfield. In recent years, the Pittsfield City Council has vetoed, down-played, stopped progress on or delayed to the point of demolishing many projects that would have helped raise the economy of Pittsfield.

There is no nightlife, no social atmosphere left for young people in Pittsfield. For example, many nightclubs have been closed. Depending on who you listen to, this can be attributed to either "problems" occurring at the nightclubs in general, such as fights or underage drinking, or through complaints filed by neighbors who own very expensive houses within a mile radius of these clubs, becoming quite disgruntled by the sound of any loud music. As a musician, I can tell you that no matter how many people would come to your show, there is not one rock music venue in Pittsfield. The Berkshire Mall closes at 9 p.m., most restaurants stop serving between 9 and 10 p.m. and the only movie theater rarely plays a showing after 9:30 p.m.

Would you want to be in a college town that did not allow you to go out at night? Probably not. Then why would anyone "young" want to live in a town with no night life? While the GE layoffs may be a small contributing factor, they should not be solely blamed for the aging population of Pittsfield.

I am not defending GE. Rather, I am agreeing with Mr. Drury that GE did not help Pittsfield and has left it with quite a mess on its hands. I am, however, questioning Mr. Drury's logic. He has vastly oversimplified every problem he tried to tackle and did not give the reader a clear picture of the scale of Pittsfield's problems.

When all is said, the city is getting better. Projects such as the Art Show on North Street and the Storefront Artists Project have given hope to many who want to see Pittsfield become more cultural, such as Lenox or Stockbridge. Natural lakes and large amounts of forests add to the beauty of the area. The school system is excellent, and Pittsfield boasts one of the best community colleges in the nation. Things are turning around for Pittsfield. It's people with opinions like Mr. Drury's that prohibit that progress from happening any faster than a crawl.

Chris Mattoon
UMass student

Ed/Op Poll

Are you satisfied with the financial aid you receive from UMass?

A. Yes, I worked hard and I deserve it.

B. It's enough. Beggars can't be choosers.

C. Their financial aid couldn't cover my morning coffee.

D. I'm an out-of-state student. Enough said.

Go to www.dailycollegian.com to vote!

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 2, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Nigeria has become Africa's hottest ticket for cheap, quick B-movies

By Paul Salopek
Chicago Tribune

LAGOS, Nigeria — Chike Bryan, the hapless director of "The Last Sacrifice," had named his movie well.

Plagued by technical glitches, filming had dragged into its third week — an eternity by Nigerian standards. The unpaid cast and crew were holding the executive producer for ransom in his stuffy hotel room. (Grips and makeup artists hunched sullenly on the bed while their hostage, holed up in the toilet, begged for extra funds on his cell phone.) And now one of the movie's megastars, a 3-foot-tall actor stage-named Paw Paw, had abandoned the set.

He was last seen commandeering a visitor's car. Apparently, he went to look for a gold neck chain lost at a fast-food restaurant.

"I've got one scene left to shoot, then this happens," said Bryan, the haggard director, sighing and rubbing his fatigue-reddened eyes. "That's show business, right?"

At least Nigeria's scrappy version of it.

A wellspring of some 50 new films a week, home to a unique genre that might be called "romantic voodoo," and a cinematic assembly line that churns out blockbusters for as little as $8,000 apiece, bustling, turbulent Nigeria has emerged as the hottest new movie Mecca in Africa.

According to industry analysts, the country's brash young film industry — inevitably dubbed "Nollywood" — is raking in at least $200 million a year, making it the third-largest box office in the world after the United States and India.

Shot mainly in English with hand-held video cameras, then copied endlessly onto cheap compact discs, Nigerian titles have flooded video stores and dusty village markets across Africa, from Uganda to South Africa and beyond. Their popularity has even toppled the biggest obstacle to moviemaking on the polyglot continent: Nigerian films are in such high demand that they are being subtitled and watched in French-speaking Africa.

"We know we can't beat Hollywood on production values — not yet," said Cyprain Chukwunta, a producer with more than 40 movies, none of which took longer than a week to film, under his belt.

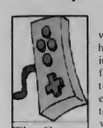
"But our quality is constantly improving," Chukwunta said. "I predict that one day we won't just dominate Africa, but the world. By 2010 we will be No. 2, minimum."

Born out of hardship, Nollywood got its start in the early 1990s, when Nigeria's economic crisis choked off the importation of Western action flicks and Asian kung-fu movies.

To fill the vacuum of escapist entertainment, local directors picked up a cheap new technology — video cameras. And a national experiment in grass-roots cinema began.

"We're not talking about works of art crafted for the Berlin Film Festival," said Jude Akudinobi, an African film expert at the University of California, Santa Barbara. "We're talking about movies for the masses. For the first time ever, local talent is giving Hollywood a run for its money. It's a real breakthrough for African audiences."

Indeed, Nigeria's offerings are quietly supplanting the B-grade vehicles of Jean-Claude Van Damme and Sylvester Stallone that once monopolized African movie screens.



One reason: cost. A typical video CD produced in Nigeria — say, "Oh! Woman" or "The Color of Emotions" — sells for $3 at local markets. Numberless pirated editions are even cheaper.

But Nollywood's biggest draw, many experts agree, are its African story lines. Love, romance, fidelity and family cohesiveness are recurring themes in Nigerian scripts. A whole new genre called "epics," set far in the tribal past, also taps into urban nostalgia for simpler, pre-colonial times.

Meanwhile, Africa's oral storytelling traditions also stamp Nollywood's outlook. Many films feature extremely

See NIGERIA on page 5

PlayStation 2's 'Shadow of the Colossus' explodes on screen

As of last week, gaming has stepped into that all too familiar limbo that occurs every four to five years when current generation game consoles are slowly replaced with the so-called "next generation" consoles. During this time period, which lasts about a year and a half, we start to see several really good games that really take advantage of the current generation's hardware. When the PlayStation 2 came along and rose to the gaming throne left vacant by its predecessor, the PlayStation 1, the public was given games that really didn't do a great job of showcasing what the PlayStation 2 could do.

One of the earlier releases for the PlayStation 2 was a little game called "Ico" that later grew to have a big cult following. "Ico" wasn't all that impressive to look at compared to what the PlayStation 2 has put out recently. The object of the game was simple: rescue your mute damsel from a large castle inhabited by shadow creatures that tried to grab her whenever you left her alone. The game was nothing more than a puzzle platformer, requiring you to solve environmental puzzles that would lead you to the exit of the large castle. None of the characters spoke, but the way the game was directed was enough to create a very deep bond between the player and the character, so that the player actually felt real feeling for the characters.

Fast-forward to today's console limbo. The Xbox 360 has been released and we are seeing visuals equal to that of a really good gaming PC. There is no real killer application out there for the Xbox 360 because its predecessor, the original Xbox, has produced some really good looking titles that rival those of its offspring. These games include "Half-Life 2," "Doom 3" and "Halo 2." The things that next generation titles need to provide gamers are beautiful, never before seen graphics as well as a brand new gaming experience when it comes to gameplay. This combination is out there in a video game already, but it isn't for the brand new Xbox 360, it's for the good, old PlayStation 2.

The game is "Shadow of the Colossus," and it comes from the same group of people that gave us "Ico" back during the early days of the PlayStation 2. "Shadow of the Colossus" brings a whole new level of graphical and mechanical achievement to the aging PlayStation 2 console. The game dares to challenge our prior notions of what video games are and should be by making the player think and act in ways never before imagined.

"Shadow of the Colossus"
PlayStation 2
Publisher SCEA
Developer SCEA
Action

The main character has no name besides Wanda. "Odd," you might think, because the main character is a guy and Wanda is a girl's name. The explanation for this is simple. The game was originally titled "Wanda and the Colossus," because Wanda is how the Japanese pronounce wanderer, thus making the character's name Wanderer. For the U.S. launch of the game, the marketing people simply dropped the Wanderer from the title and replaced it with Shadow. This is fine. Nobody ever refers to the character as either Wanda or Wanderer in the game, because despite the fact that the characters speak, they don't speak in English or Japanese or any other known language for that matter. All the dialogue is done in a made up language that we can interpret through subtitles. It is kind of like elvish in "The Lord of the Rings."

Your character arrives on horseback to a mystical land, bringing the unconscious body of a girl with him. He comes to this forbidden land because he has heard that within this land lies the power to bring her soul back to her body. He lays her down on an altar inside a very large temple in the center of the world and is told by a god that he needs to do a task for him in order to revive the girl, but there is a high price to pay for this task. The hero agrees and is told that hidden all over the land are sixteen colossi that must be defeated in order to save the girl. That sounds simple enough.

This is where the game starts to blow you away. These 16 colossi are the only enemies in the entire game. There are no henchmen, monsters or endless waves of enemies; just the hero, and 16 very, very intense bosses. You are armed simply with a sword. There are no magic spells or even hidden weapons to help you on your quest. This feeling of solitude is what gives the game ambience, because the world inside the game is intensely huge. If you play the game straight through you miss out on some of the most breathtaking visuals of landscape that you will ever encounter. It seems as though every angle the camera is at seems like it was intentionally designed to look grand and epic. This feeling is only amplified when you are in presence of the awe-inspiring colossi, some of which simply dwarf your character.

During a time when new game consoles are flooding the market, a new PlayStation 2 game has been released. "Shadow of the Colossus" is an action packed game full of epic battles and adventures.

The game can be divided into two parts: finding the colossi (they may be big, but they are really hard to find sometimes) and actually bringing each colossus down single-handedly. Once you find a colossus, the challenge becomes finding its weakness. There is no time limit; the game wants you to take your time and actually use your brain to come up with a way of defeating your giant opponents. Some of these guys are impossible to beat if you just run at them swinging your sword around. The defeat of the enemies is the greatest part of game. To simply explain a tiny bit how this is done would be giving away vital parts of the game's story. Imagine the most epic battle; now multiply that by 100. Never before have we seen boss battles this complicated and dramatic.

Playing this game feels like playing something from the so-called "next generation." This game challenges the player in ways previously unimagined and it is a shame that the game got released on the current PlayStation. If it had been released on the PlayStation 3, it would have made the visual aspect much more beautiful. The graphics push the limits of the PlayStation 2 by creating excellent real time visuals. This is painfully noticeable when a lot of action is taking place, because the frame rate ends up slowing to a crawl. Having this game the way it is now is just fine, though. Hopefully this is a good sign of what to expect from Sony in the future. The momentary slow frame rate is what keeps me from declaring this a perfect game. Also, the price for this game is a steal at just $29.99 when the average game costs 50 bucks and the next generation games cost $70.

Nigeria's film industry grows

NIGERIA from page 4

long patches of dialogue. Even Nigerian rip-offs of American blaxploitation pictures can seem, to Western viewers, like an odd cross between the ultra-violence of "Shaft" and the gabbiness of "My Dinner with Andre."

Finally, an obsession with juju or black magic pervades many Nollywood plot lines — as witnessed at a recent showing of "Hidden Murder 2." Screened in a palm-thatched theater on Nigeria's remote southern coast, the movie featured a villain who won love and wealth by tapping the occult powers of ritual murder.

Moths smacked against the theater's glowing TV screen. The village audience horsed around through much of the show. But whenever the zombielike victims appeared onscreen, the crowd watched raptly.

"We've been criticized for focusing too much on witchcraft and the lives of the rich," said Chinedu Ikedieze, the star of one of Nigeria's unique sub-genres, which features diminutive actors. "But we're just giving the public what it wants. It's part of our culture."

'Narnia' fuses fantasy and religion

NARNIA from page 4

Yet many pastors now say that churchgoers did more for "The Passion" than "The Passion" did for churches. For all of the "Passion" tie-in events, screenings and trinkets, church culture and membership didn't necessarily change.

Meanwhile, Disney's efforts at good faith, so to speak, already have paid off with parts of the Christian community. Late this summer the American Family Association ended its nine-year Disney boycott, in part because of the studio's involvement with "Narnia." The AFA, along with other groups on the religious right, had been protesting Disney for gay-oriented events at its theme parks (which haven't disappeared) as well as its ownership of Miramax, which released such iconoclastic fare as "Priest" and "Bad Santa" before the founding Weinstein brothers departed in September.

Chronicling 'Narnia': Disney's plans to take fantasy tale to church

By Mark Caro
Chicago Tribune

Until recently, if you saw "churches" and "Disney" in the same sentence, you might expect the word "protest" to be lurking somewhere in between. But now Disney, which has run afoul of certain evangelical groups in the past, is wooing those same people in an attempt to create a film franchise the magnitude of "The Lord of the Rings" crossed with "The Passion of the Christ."

For this equation to work for "The Chronicles of Narnia: The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe," however, Disney won't be the only party stretching its boundaries. It's one thing for a disenfranchised church-going audience to flock to an overtly religious statement such as Mel Gibson's "The Passion of the Christ." It's quite another for them to embrace something they've traditionally shunned: a Hollywood fantasy.

"The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe," which Disney will release nationwide Dec. 9, is the first feature-film adaptation of the late British author C.S. Lewis' beloved, immensely popular seven-book "Narnia" series. A tale of four siblings who discover a wondrous land through the back of a wardrobe — and become entangled in a classic tale of good vs. evil amid talking animals and other magical creatures — "The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe" has been a favorite of young readers since its 1950 publication.

Many of these readers have enjoyed this story and subsequent books as pure imagination-tickling fantasy. But the faith community also has long embraced "Narnia" and its author, considered an important religious writer for books such as "Mere Christianity," an argument for orthodox Christianity. They don't have to squint too hard to see the parallels between Jesus Christ and "Narnia" hero Aslan, the majestic lion who sacrifices himself for humans' salvation.

So the movie, directed by "Shrek" co-director Andrew Adamson and starring Tilda Swinton as the White Witch and Liam Neeson as the voice of Aslan, offers Disney a rare opportunity to reach two massive audiences: the young, fantasy-oriented moviegoers who turned the Harry Potter series and "The Lord of the Rings" into lucrative franchises and the often-movie-averse Christian population that propelled "The Passion of the Christ" to unprecedented box-office heights.

Disney thus has been attempting a tricky dance that involves assuring Christian higher-ups that "The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe" stays true to Lewis' Christian roots while telling everyone else that the movie has mass, secular appeal.

"We want every fan, regardless of how you're a fan, to come to the movie," said Dennis Rice, Disney's senior vice president of publicity. "The most important thing I'd like to stress is we are not going after any fan base at the expense of any other."

Disney even has released two "Narnia" soundtracks, one featuring the film's score, the other a compilation of Christian rockers offering "Music Inspired by the Chronicles of Narnia."

David Miller, entertainment analyst for the Los Angeles-based Sanders Morris Harris Group, estimated that Disney is spending about $180 million on "The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe": $100 million on the film, $80 million on marketing. "This is a series of books just like 'Lord of the Rings' that has universal appeal in languages all over the world, so it seems like a bet worth taking," he said. "But it's an expensive bet."

Rice said the "grassroots" outreach to Christian groups has gobbled up less than 5 percent of the movie's marketing budget, yet this campaign has been far-reaching nonetheless.

In fact, one striking difference between the campaigns for "The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe" and "The Passion" is that Gibson was screening his film to fellow religious travelers for months before it opened. The first time anyone saw "The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe" in its final version was at a press junket two weekends ago in New York.

Another key difference is the movies themselves. "The Passion" is a graphically violent account of Jesus' final hours. "The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe" is a family-friendly fantasy that can be read as a parable about Christ's love.

Disney's "The Chronicles of Narnia: The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe" hits theaters on Dec. 9. It hopes to attract both fantasy moviegoers and the Christian population.

Still, the new movie's investors can only hope "The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe" connects as effectively as "The Passion of the Christ," which grossed a whopping $371 million domestically and another $241 million overseas. "I think 'The Passion of the Christ' is definitely a watershed moment in the movie business," Rice said.

See NARNIA on page 5

Write for the Arts section Call Matt, Mack or Ian at 545-1361

D.P. Dough®
Delivers Calzones
The Pizza Alternative®
256-1616
96 North Pleasant Street
Amherst, MA 01003
Zone out at D.P. Dough!®
Monday - Wednesday 4pm - 2am
Thursday 4pm - 3am
Friday - Saturday 11:30am - 3am
Sunday 11:30 - 2am
Visa, Mastercard & OCMP accepted
coupons online @ dpdough.com

CINEMARK
The Best Seat in Town
CINEMARK AT HAMPSHIRE MALL 6
367 Russell St. 413-587-4233
Schedule for Friday 12/2/05 Thursday 12/8
DIGITAL SURROUND SOUND IN ALL AUDITORIUMS
Purchase Tickets Online @ cinemark.com
Aeon Flux(PG13) 11:40 2:05 4:30 7:35 9:55*
Rent(PG13) 11:05 4:15 7:25 10:20*
Pride and Prejudice (2005) (PG) 11:25 (On 12/9 show at 12:25 instead) 4:10 7:00 10:00*
Just Friends(PG13) 11:50 2:35 5:00 7:40 10:10*
The Ice Harvest(R) 11:45 2:00 4:15 7:35 9:50*
Yours, Mine and Ours(PG) 11:00 1:15 3:30 7:00 9:15*
In the Mix(PG13) 9:50*
Harry Potter and the Goblet of Fire(PG13) 11:00 12:00 2:30 3:30 5:00 7:00 8:30*
Walk the Line(PG13) 12:15 4:15 7:25 10:25
Zathura(PG) 11:10 1:10 4:10
Derailed(R) 11:20 1:40 4:20 7:30 10:05
Jarhead (R) 7:10 10:00
Chicken Little(G) 11:15 1:30 3:45 5:45 *no passes or supersavers
Senior Show 12/8 Pride and Prejudice @ 9am
Friday Night Rewind Dec 2nd Gremlins- Midnight
*NO PASSES NO SUPERSAVERS
Tickets & showtimes available at cinemark.com

comedy THIS SATURDAY!
CONNECTION
HUKELAU
413•593•5222
705 Memorial Drive in Chicopee
www.hukelau.com
From Comedy Central's "Chappelle's Show"
TICKETS ARE SELLING FAST!
CHARLIE MURPHY & FRIENDS TOUR

UMASS
Want to know the Future of Umass Football?
THE SCORE
THE MASS... MAGAZINE
SPALDING
WHAT UMASS ... ALL STAR HAS ... POTENTIAL?
DO YOU KNOW THE NEW BASKETBALL COACH?
COMING SOON....

UM has high hopes

TRACK from page 8

strong distance runner. She focuses on the 1,500-meter and 3,000-meter races and, in the 2004-05 indoor track season, she finished 11th in the 3,000-meter at the Atlantic 10 Championship, and ran a personal-best of 10:54.42 at the Boston University Six-Way Meet.

The Maroon and White is in the O'Donnell family blood. Her brother, Paul, played football at UMass from 1999-2003.

Suzanne Simmons is another distance specialist. She, however, only participated in the outdoor track season last year, placing 15th in the 10,000-meters at the Atlantic 10 Championships and eighth in the 5,000-meters at the UNH Invitational.

Despite such promise from the fourth-year students, a team cannot survive on seniority alone. Fortunately, Ostrando has confidence that juniors Jenna Elznic and Candice Murray, and sophomores Britt Canfield and cross-country star Christina DeRosa will assist in the winning efforts.

In addition to the upperclassmen, Ostrando has expressed hope that any of the 10 freshmen on this year's squad will make an impact.

Freshmen distance runners Beth Harlow and Lauren Noreen, who just finished up their first cross-country season, are expected to swing some points UMass' way during the 13-race schedule.

Harlow, a recent graduate of Melrose High School, was a four-year Massachusetts State Championship qualifier and was named to the 2005 Middlesex All-league indoor track team. Noreen is a recent East Longmeadow High School alumna and was an All-4 conference selection and Team MVP as a senior.

"I haven't seen [the freshmen] compete yet," Ostrando said. "So we'll find out on Saturday and Friday."

Two meets for Minutewomen

By Domenic Poli
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's track and field team is going to be busy this upcoming weekend, competing in the Rhode Island Pentathlon in Kingston, R.I. on Friday, and the Northeastern Invitational in Boston on Saturday.

Since training resumed about two weeks after the cross-country season ended, practices have gone "fairly well for most of the team," said UMass assistant coach Antoinette Otrando. "They've been working pretty hard and we just kind of use [the Rhode Island Pentathlon and Northeastern Invitational] to see where they're at."

Previously scheduled for Dec. 9, the Rhode Island Pentathlon was recently moved to Friday.

Otrando acknowledged that the schedule change was surprising, but said that it would provide a good means to evaluate her runners.

A women's track and field pentathlon consists of five events: 60-meter hurdles, high jump, shot put, long jump and the 800-meter run.

Ashley Creel placed third overall and first among UMass athletes at the event last season, finishing the day with a total of 2,784 points. Amanda Griffin and Katelyn Mitsock came in eighth and tenth place.

The list of schools to be represented is not yet known, but UMass coach Julie LaFreniere mentioned that only adequate pentathletes will be sent by their school. Some typical competitors are Boston College, Brown University and Rhode Island.

The Northeastern Invitational, set to take place the next day, consists of roughly 12 events which include the 400-meter, 800-meter and 5,000-meter races, as well as the 55-meter hurdles, pole vault and throwing. Each competitor specializes in two or three events.

Otrando mentioned specifically Creel, Elisabeth Budd and Marissa Kay Callahan as top competitors for UMass.

Creel, a pentathlete and high jumper, was a top-ranked multi-event athlete in the outdoor season. She finished third in the 100-meter dash at the UConn Invitational and she placed seventh in the heptathlon with a total of 4,051 points in the New England Championships in May.

Budd, who specializes in sprints and hurdles, was a top-ranked Mass sprinter in the 500 and was named the UMass Female Winter Scholar-Athlete. She also placed second in the 500 at the New England Indoor Championships last February.

Callahan, a graduate student finishing up her eligibility, has a knack for the triple jump, hurdles and sprints. Last season the 23-year-old aspiring neurosurgeon, born in Bangkok, Thailand and a graduate of McLean High School, set a personal best in the triple-jump event with a mark of 36 feet, 10.25 inches, and recorded a time of 15.98 in the 100-meter dash.

Otrando added that there are a lot of freshmen this year and she looks forward to seeing them compete this weekend.

Freshmen Chelsea Begin (distance), Liz Biehl (high jump), Christina MacMonegle (throwing) and Krista Siders (pole vault) have shown a lot of promise throughout training, and the two upcoming races will be a good test for them.

Ownership of ball still in dispute

By Mark Jewell
Associated Press

BOSTON – The Red Sox asked a judge to let the team keep the ball that Doug Mientkiewicz caught for the final out that clinched Boston's 2004 World Series title.

Ownership of the ball has been in dispute during the 13 months since pitcher Keith Foulke flipped it to Mientkiewicz, giving Boston a four-game sweep of the St. Louis Cardinals and its first World Series championship in 86 years.

Mientkiewicz, who clutched the ball in his glove and joined teammates in celebration, later put the ball in a safe deposit box and claimed ownership when the Red Sox asked for it. In January, after he was traded to the New York Mets, he loaned the ball to the Red Sox for one year. He would get it back "unless the ultimate issue of ownership has been otherwise resolved," the agreement said.

Lawyers for the Red Sox filed a lawsuit Wednesday in Suffolk Superior Court asking the court to keep the ball or place it in some other "secure location" until a judge decides the ownership question.

"The Red Sox continue to assert that their former employee, Mientkiewicz, obtained the baseball through the course of his employment, that he acquired no ownership interest and that the Red Sox are the rightful owners of the baseball," the lawsuit stated.

Thornton traded to San Jose

THORNTON from page 8

in the NHL in scoring entering Wednesday's games with nine goals and 24 assists, but Boston has lost nine of its last 10 games. The Sharks, who lost 4-1 to Dallas, are 6-7-3 in their last 10 games during one of the worst stretches in franchise history.

San Jose general manager Doug Wilson said he expects Thornton to be in the lineup Friday in Buffalo, where the Sharks will play the second game of a three-game road trip. Wilson agreed the trade was among the biggest in franchise history, alongside the trade of former captain Owen Nolan to the Toronto Maple Leafs in 2003.

While O'Connell phoned it in, Wilson flew to Dallas to speak to all three departing players personally.

"Players like Joe Thornton don't come available very often," Wilson said. "When you do a deal of this magnitude, character still has to be the No. 1 thing, and he'll fit right into our group. ... We thought he was almost untouchable. You think about him and you kind of wish, but don't think he'll be available."

Thornton and Patrick Marleau, the Sharks' captain and leading scorer, were the top two picks in 1997. Both joined the league that year as raw 18-year-olds, but eventually emerged as top NHL centers and teammates on several Canadian national teams.

Thornton has scored more than 20 goals in each of his last five NHL seasons, including two 30-goal campaigns. In 2003-04, he led the Bruins with 23 goals and 50 assists.

Sharks forward Scott Thornton is Joe Thornton's cousin. Their fathers are brothers, and they're already delighted by the possibility of making road trips together.

"I obviously know him," Scott Thornton said in Dallas. "He's one of the top 10 players in the league. He's a big, powerful forward. I expect him to be a giant on special teams."

Still, Scott Thornton expressed regret in losing Sturm, Primeau and Stuart, who were last-minute scratches from the lineup in Dallas.

"We lost three great teammates," he said. "The bottom line is we're all to blame for this. ... We should all feel guilty about this."

The departing Sharks are expected to play for Boston on Thursday night against the Ottawa Senators.

"We felt we needed to shake up the team and sometimes you have to make some difficult decisions to better the team," O'Connell said in a statement. "We feel we received three players who can help us immediately."

All three new Bruins are bona fide NHL talents – but all three also had flaws that contributed to the Sharks' malaise this season.

Sturm is the Sharks' second-leading scorer with six goals and 10 assists this season, but the speedy German forward still hasn't developed into the topflight goal-scorer most expected him to be. He missed the Sharks' playoff run in 2004 after breaking his leg late in the regular season.

Stuart, who has two goals and 10 assists, finished second in voting for the Calder Trophy as the league's top rookie following the 1999-00 season. But he has struggled for long stretches this season, prompting public criticism of his passing and physical play by coach Ron Wilson.

Primeau, a gritty fourth-liner, has five goals and three assists this season.

O'Leary turning UCF around

By Tim Reynolds
Associated Press

ORLANDO, Fla. – Less than three months ago, Central Florida was mired in the nation's longest losing streak, and expected to finish at the bottom of Conference USA.

Now, UCF is bowl bound for the first time. And George O'Leary's infamous resume is better than ever.

There's a reason Notre Dame hired him four years ago – O'Leary knows how to coach. He's proved that again at UCF, which he's transformed over the last few weeks from a punch line to a postseason team – one that will host the Conference USA championship game on Saturday against Tulsa. For the Golden Knights, it's been a breakthrough.

For O'Leary, it's been a rejuvenation.

"There's nothing I can do about what happened at Notre Dame," O'Leary said. "A mistake was made. I paid a dear price for it. But, as my mom used to always say, 'God doesn't close one door, he opens another.' I think this was a door that opened and I'm making the most of it."

UCF is 8-3 and 7-1 in league play. The school is in the midst of the second-biggest one-season turnaround in NCAA football history.

Only Hawai'i's 1999 team, which improved 8-5 games over its 1998 record, has exceeded what the Golden Knights have done this year under O'Leary – a national coach of the year candidate.

He got his dream job at Notre Dame in 2001, only to resign a week later after admitting to falsifying his academic and athletic credentials on his resume for decades. His claims of having a master's degree in education and being a three-year college player at New Hampshire were ultimately proved untrue.

But UCF had no reservations about giving O'Leary a five-year contract in 2003. Now, school officials feel like geniuses for putting their program in his hands.

"We didn't hire him because of how many letters he had at New Hampshire as a football player or whether he had a master's degree or not," said UCF athletic director Steve Orsini, a captain on Notre Dame's 1977 national championship team. "And he's more motivated than ever, both for himself to clear his record professionally, and to turn this program around."

That process has advanced faster than anyone – O'Leary included – could imagine.

Most preseason magazines ranked UCF near the very bottom of all the 119 teams in Division I-A football. The team's media guide offered probably the most positive outlook, saying the Golden Knights "enter 2005 hopeful to continue to lay the groundwork for a successful football program."

Hardly a ringing endorsement. And O'Leary's goal for the season? Six wins.

"I got a lot of twisted eyes looking at me when I said that," O'Leary said.

The Golden Knights opened with a respectable 24-15 loss at South Carolina, then lost by 17 to South Florida. The program went exactly 700 days without a victory, and it seemed even longer to the players.

"After the USF game, I know a lot of guys were thinking, 'Here we go again,'" said senior defensive end Paul Carrington, a tri-captain. "But the fortunate thing about seasons is, it's not how you start them, it's how you finish them. And again, that's something coach O'Leary has always stressed and instilled in us."

UCF's 17-game losing streak ended with a win over Marshall, starting a run of eight wins in nine games for the Golden Knights, who have only 10 seasons of Division I-A football history and are in their inaugural Conference USA campaign.

"It wasn't just a win, it was breaking a lot of bad records we had at the time," O'Leary said. "Continuous losses in the country. The first win with this staff, a new staff that was here. I told the kids, we're going to throw all that in the garbage pail, throw the lid on and keep it on."

UCF hasn't exactly outclassed its opponents. But if there's any positive to glean from an epic losing streak, it's resiliency. And the Golden Knights have clearly shown that.

Only one of their wins was by more than 10 points. They've won five straight games and trailed in every one, including a 12-point half-time deficit last week at Rice, and an 11-point deficit the previous week at UAB.

"It's definitely surreal, how everything's worked out for us," Carrington said.

Until now, UCF's biggest football accomplishment was the exploits of Daunte Culpepper, who threw and ran for 12,432 yards from 1995-98.

The school is planning a 45,000-seat on-campus stadium and has indicated that it will do whatever is necessary to keep O'Leary if any other program comes to woo the man who was 2000's national coach of the year at Georgia Tech.

"We're going to do the right thing," Orsini said. "He has earned us to step up now, too. He has done his job. It's time for us to do our job and do the right thing for him. He and his staff have earned that. He has a chance to create the program, the next big Division I program in the state of Florida."

Whether O'Leary stays or goes, the Golden Knights could have an extremely bright future. Most of the team is composed of freshmen and sophomores, with only a handful of seniors in key roles.

"When you come back to college and you go 0-11, I'm sure there was a lot of doubters," O'Leary said. "But I never doubted that we were going to win. And you know, could-ofs and would-ofs don't get it done. So I've moved on from what happened at Notre Dame. And I'm real happy for this program here."

PARADISE OF INDIA RESTAURANT
Lunch Buffet all you can eat!
Saturday and Sunday only
87 Main St. Amherst, MA, 01002
(413) 256-1067

Can you catch the crooks?
If you want to work in law enforcement, probation, courts or corrections, UMass Amherst offers a Certificate of Criminal Justice with a focus on criminal behavior by citizens and by government and corporate officials. Get valuable insight that'll help you advance in any area of criminal justice.
CRIMINAL JUSTICE
www.UMassULearn.net
413-545-2414
100 Venture Way, Hadley, MA
UMassAmherst Continuing Education

LONG RADIO
Quality Sales, Service, and Installation
Audio
Video
Sattelite Radio
NAV
Remote Starter
Alarms
Radar Detectors
Lazer Detectors
Performace Parts
30 Russell Street Hadley, Ma 01035 413-584-3259

Getting your degree by getting the credit you deserve.
You're beyond living the on-campus life, but you want to tap into the broad and deep resources of UMass Amherst to earn your degree. University Without Walls provides a guiding hand and gives you credit for life and work experience.
UNIVERSITY WITHOUT WALLS
www.UMassULearn.net
413-545-2414
100 Venture Way, Hadley, MA
UMassAmherst Continuing Education

Get the ballerinas on the stage and the paintings on the wall.
For the arts to thrive, it takes more than artistry – it takes business savvy. That's why UMass Amherst offers courses in arts management that show you how to plan, program and market the arts. There's an art to raising and managing money, thinking strategically and helping the arts become a vital part of any community.
ARTS MANAGEMENT
www.UMassULearn.net
413-545-2414
100 Venture Way, Hadley, MA
UMassAmherst Continuing Education

Bio-science or compassion?
In nursing and health care, you'll need both. You need to know bio-science and technology. And you must have compassion. That's why UMass Amherst offers courses in nursing and public health that provide a full foundation for a successful and rewarding career in health care.
NURSING and PUBLIC HEALTH
www.UMassULearn.net
413-545-2414
100 Venture Way, Hadley, MA
UMassAmherst Continuing Education

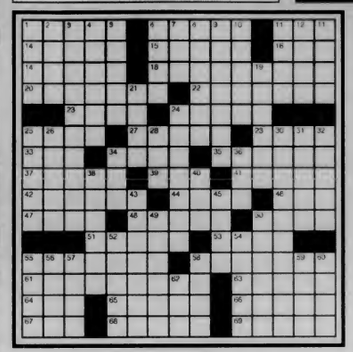
THE ZOO By Gabe Strine

ELSIE HOOPER By Robert D. Kryzkowski

A COLLEGE GIRL NAMED JOE By Aaron Warner

THE FAMILY MONSTER By Josh Shalek

TWO DUDES By Aaron Warner



ACROSS
1 Spicy dip
8 "As is" events
11 That girl
14 False name
15 Court-martial, e.g.
16 Vegetable sphere
17 Flashy outfit
18 U.S. citizens
20 Stage backdrop
22 Burnt offering
23 Agra royal
24 Prepare to be knighted
25 Pasture sounds
27 Take a step at 29 Fewer
33 Ship's tail
34 Foundation support
35 See the world
37 Postman's course
39 Likely
41 Gladiatorial site
42 Flat-bottomed boats
44 Tombstone marshal
46 Go bad
47 Dam up
48 Lading load
50 Greek harp
51 Plays the trumpet
53 Pickle
55 Shrill trumpet
58 Georgia fruit
61 Having a good memory
63 Know-how
64 In the past
65 Bottled spirit
66 Jittery
67 Pop's gal
68 Liver or kidney
69 Advanced gradually

DOWN
1 Droops
2 Actor Guinness
3 Creative writing
4 Finnish baths
5 Quaking tree
6 Hang around
7 Appendage
8 Passive protests
9 "The importance of Being ___"
10 Pizza piece
11 Bridge
12 Coop group
13 Comfort
19 Block of wines
21 Capital of Latvia
24 What finders are
25 Honored poets
28 Under way
28 Made in the ___
30 All of it
31 Sonora sir
32 List of candidates
34 Spelling competition
36 Eminem's music
38 Sound quality
40 "You're it" game
43 Kid's vehicle
45 Pinkish Iberian wine
49 Sunshade
50 Requiring a key
52 Jargon
54 Costume jewelry
55 Jam-pack
58 Toy block maker
57 Element component
58 Hammer head
59 Will there be anything ...?
60 Winter coaster
62 By way of

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

Submit your comic!
e-mail
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You will discover a huge supply of staples in your desk tonight.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Champagne is always a good present to give someone.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You will find a really gross bug in your room today.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
It's time to start rationing money for holiday shopping.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Today is a good day to make s'mores in the microwave.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Someone will give you a smiley face sticker today.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Make sure you don't forget your gloves and hat today.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
It would be best if you did all the extra credit you can in the next week.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
You will only have a really fun weekend if you don't spend it at home.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You should consider getting some heavy-duty snow boots.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
You will completely forget about a really important meeting tomorrow.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You will die a terrible, terrible death when your time comes.

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"Theatricality and deception are powerful weapons, Alfred."
—Batman Begins

★ Submit your comic ★
e-mail
collegiancomcis@yahoo.com

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Attention RSOs, Fraternities, Sororities, & Club Sports: Advertise for your events in the Classifieds! Inexpensive and effective. Call 545-3500 today.

APARTMENT FOR RENT

1, 2, 3 & 4 Bedroom spacious apartments, Great location, Bus Route, All utilities included No Fee Call 413-253-3000

EMPLOYMENT

Rent us your ears! Listening experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu Voicemail: 545-6837.

EMPLOYMENT

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience nees. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

Winter Break Employment at the Boston University Bookstore! Many jobs are available through January. Stop by our JOB FAIR Dec.6 at the UMass Campus Center Concourse or email your resume to bnhmnres@bu.edu

HAPPY BIRTHDAY

Attention UMASS! Teri Parlin is FINALLY 21! Happy Birthday T.P. Love, your Rookie Beyach

HAPPY BIRTHDAY

Wish your friends Happy Birthday in the Collegian! Call 545-3500 M-F 8:30-3:30 for more info.

HOUSE FOR RENT

For January, 2-3 Bedroom house. Walking distance to Northampton Center, close to bus. 1,000 + utilities, no pets. Skibiski Realtor 586-1827

ROOM FOR RENT

413-335-5226 Mo. to mo. $325 inclusive 20 min to campus

SERVICES

Computer Diagnostic Desktop $9.95 Laptop $39.95 413-584-8857

SERVICES

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance. 549-1906

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

TRAVEL

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499!

TRAVEL

Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

15 Day Fully guided tour of Italy leaving 7/20/06 $3,279 includes air hotels, breakfast and some dinners. If interested call Kathy at (413) 498-2490 or Carol at (413) 423-3654 Call by December 30th

ACT NOW – SPRING BREAKERS Book early & Save! Free meals/parties by 11/7. Lowest prices. Be a rep & TRAVEL FREE! Get the ultimate hookups with STA TRAVEL 413-256-1261.

WANTED

Leave your advertising needs to us!

Let our experienced advertising representatives and graphic artists take care of you!

Reach over 14,000 readers daily!

We offer a full range of ad sizes, as well as design services.

Contact our business department by calling (413) 545-3500. Or visit us in the Campus Center Basement.

Business Hours: M-F 8:30am - 3:30pm

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEEKEND

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 2, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Hofstra edges Minutewomen

By DANNY PICARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The final game of a three-game home stand did not go as planned, as the Massachusetts women's basketball team lost to Hofstra (3-2) by a score of 59-58 last night at the Mullins Center.

The Minutewomen (2-4) will be back in action on Sunday, as they begin a five-game road trip against New Hampshire at 1 p.m.

The Minutewomen were outplayed in the first half, as they were out-rebounded by Hofstra 21-15. UMass went into halftime down 39-25, and never held the lead.

The Minutewomen were down by 16 at one point, but were able to stage a dramatic comeback in the second half, coming within one point of the Pride.

"We came out too flat in the beginning," sophomore Kate Mills said. "We didn't play very good defense, and we missed easy shots. If we could have made half of our lay-ups, we would have won the game by 10 points, at least."

Mills scored a team-high 22 points in the game, with 16 of those coming in a second half splurge. Junior Tamara Tatham had a double-double, as she had 13 points and 11 rebounds. Sophomore Pam Rosanio played in all 40 minutes of the game, and had 15 points and 7 rebounds.

Although the Minutewomen came back and battled in the second half, UMass coach Marnie Dacko was still frustrated with the outcome.

"I'm extremely disappointed," Dacko said. "We knew we were going to be in for a very athletic game. We dug ourselves into a hole in the first half, came back in the second half and outplayed them, but we missed a ton of lay-ups. I had the kids raise their hand if they missed one, and six kids raised their hand. So that's 12 points right there."

Hofstra scored first in the second half with two free throws to make it 41-25, giving the Pride their largest lead of the game.

Rosanio gave the Minutewomen their first bucket of the half to make it 41-27. After a pair of offensive rebounds by Tatham, the Minutewomen could not capitalize, missing consecutive jump shots. Nelson tried to spark a Minutewomen offense that was struggling by burying her second three-pointer of the game to cut the Pride lead to 11 with less than 13 minutes remaining in regulation.

UMass got some much-needed energy when Mills made a shot off the glass and also went to the line after a foul was called with 11:04 remaining. Mills hit the shot to make it 47-37 Hofstra.

After that, UMass seemed more alive than ever, and Rosanio took the ball in the paint and made things happen herself. She had four consecutive points for the Minutewomen to cut the lead back down to 10.

Rosanio then hit a jumper to cut the lead to eight at 51-43, and her phenomenal play down the stretch sparked the Minutewomen.

A tremendous effort by Mills on the offensive boards led to two free throws, both of which she made, cutting the Hofstra lead to six.

The game went back and forth in the last 10 minutes of the second half, but a runner by Mills led to another basket at the line, cutting the Hofstra lead to five with fewer than five minutes to play.

After two free throws by Hofstra, Mills buried a jumper. Tatham then came away with a huge defensive rebound, and after she made two free throws, an errant shot by Hofstra led to another bucket by Tatham to cut the lead to one.

A Rosanio defensive rebound led to Alisha Tatham's attempt to give UMass its first lead of the game, but her jump shot rimmed out, and Hofstra ran the ball up the court and regained their three point lead with 1:31 remaining.

The Minutewomen cut the lead to one when Mills scored on a finger roll off the glass with 19 seconds remaining.

UMass then put on a full-court press and forced a turnover with 12.6 seconds left. An inbounds pass with six seconds remaining gave Mills a chance to take the lead, but she could not put it in, causing the Minutewomen to foul with 2.1 seconds left. A rebound by Rosanio gave them a last chance, but her launch from half-court came up short and the Minutewomen lost a heartbreaker 59-58.

Junior forward Tamara Tatham had 13 points and 11 rebounds in the Minutewomen's 59-58 loss to Hofstra last night at the Mullins Center.

Dacko's squad hits the road after loss

By DANNY PICARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's basketball team will begin a five-game road trip as it will face New Hampshire (4-1) at 1 p.m. on Sunday afternoon at Lundholm Gym.

The Minutewomen (2-4) are coming off of a heartbreaking 59-58 loss to Hofstra last night, and will look to re-group against the Wildcats.

UNH is coming off of a 74-52 win over Wagner last night, and are 2-1 at home this season. The Wildcats had a comeback of their own against Wagner, as they were down 20-13 in the first half, but were able to pull off the victory.

UNH is led by junior forward Danielle Clark, who averages 16.3 points per game and 6.0 rebounds per game.

The Minutewomen will also have to watch out for sophomore guard Ashley Cerniglia, who is second on the team in scoring with 11.3 points per game, and also shoots 52 percent from the field.

UMass will look to build on its second half run from last night, a run in which the Minutewomen battled back to cut a 16-point deficit down to one point.

The Minutewomen struggled in the first half, but were able to stage a dramatic rally in the second half to give them an opportunity to win. The game came down to a last second shot, but the Minutewomen could not get that final basket to put them on top.

The Minutewomen will have to capitalize on their opportunities, something that they did not do against Hofstra. It was the many missed lay-ups that cost UMass the game last night, even though they had strong showings from sophomore Kate Mills, sophomore Pam Rosanio and junior Tamara Tatham.

Rosanio has proven to be a work horse on the court, averaging 35.7 minutes per game, and playing the full 40 minutes last night. Rosanio is the Minutewomen's leading scorer and is ninth in the A-10 in scoring, as she averages 15.2 points per game.

Tatham had her fourth career double-double last night as she continues to have a strong season as well, averaging nine points. She is sixth in the A-10 in rebounding with 8.5 boards per game.

Mills is also coming off of a big game, as she had eight rebounds and scored a career-high 22 points against Hofstra, 16 of which came during UMass' second-half run last night.

On Tuesday night, Mills scored her first career double-double in a win against Siena. Mills is second on the team in scoring with 12.3 points per game, and is UMass' leading shot blocker with 12 on the season. She is third in the A-10 with 2.2 blocked shots per game.

The Minutewomen will need to convert on more shots than they did last night if they wish to get off on the right foot as their five-game road trip begins.

Tune-up meet for Atlantic 10s

By BRENDAN HALL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

If the Atlantic 10 Championships are the Super Bowl for the Massachusetts swimmers, then this weekend's meet would be the pre-game warm-ups.

This weekend's Brown Invitational meet, in Providence, R.I., will be done in the format of preliminary, semi-final and final rounds, each round on a separate day – the same format as the A-10's this February. Given the talent of the competing teams, which are comparable to the A-10, if not better, that can only mean one thing to men's head coach Russ Yarworth.

"This is basically a dry run for Atlantic 10s," Yarworth said. "I'll be evaluating the kids so that I can focus on my roster for A-10s. We have a limited roster to take [to Buffalo, N.Y.]. I'm trying to get them to focus on swimming faster."

And with good reason. Of the other four teams competing in this weekend's meet – Brown, Princeton, New Hampshire and Florida International – the two Ivy League teams (Brown and Princeton) compete in a conference that traditionally is very fast in the water and is one of the better conferences in the nation.

"They're fast," junior co-captain Mike Herald said. "I think that our guys can definitely compete with them. I think that we're going to do pretty well, but Princeton's a whole other league."

The Minutemen have had a little more rest than when they arrived at West Point and suffered a lopsided loss to the Army Cadets. While Yarworth has yet to give his players a full rest cycle, he has been giving them two-to-three days' worth of rest in order to have his men at full strength.

For the Minutewomen, the coin lands on the same side. They, too, are treating this as though it were the real thing, because in two months' time it will be the real thing.

"We treat it the same way [as A-10s] as far as swimming the same number of events and doing your event, and things like that," women's coach Bob Newcomb said. "In many ways, we treat it the same. We don't fully rest for this, but we gave them a little bit of rest to be able to see if we can get some good swims."

Playing out the real thing means playing some real competition – and Newcomb thrives on it. He picked some adequate competition in the Ivy League, which like the men's team fields women's teams that are speedy along the lanes. In the end, from a preparation perspective, they'll be better off in the long run.

"This is a big step forward for us," Newcomb said. "I like to be able to get into a competition that, in some respects, is above our heads ... I like going in and challenging the team enough so that when we get to the A-10s they've seen it all."

Newcomb added that he predicts either a third or fourth finish for his women at the Brown Invitational.

This will be the last meet for either the men's or women's teams for the fall 2005 semester. They will return to action on Jan. 7 in San Juan, Puerto Rico.

UM divers travel to Rutgers

By JOEY WHITE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts men's and women's divers will travel separately from the rest of the swim team this weekend. Since the Brown Invitational does not include any diving events in its meet, the UMass divers will travel farther south to New Brunswick, N.J. to compete in the Rutgers Super Splash Invitational.

The meet will feature only one other Atlantic 10 team, LaSalle. Also competing will be Drexel, Columbia, UConn and others.

"[This meet] is a perfect preface for the A-10 [Championships]," UMass diving coach Mandy Hixon said, "because the competition will be much better."

Today the men will jump off the three-meter board, while the women jump from the one-meter. After the preliminaries, the top eight of each event (out of 27 men and 26 women) will reach the finals later in the day. Tomorrow they will switch and the men will jump off the low board and the women the high board.

Hixon admits that the divers aren't as good this early in the season, but the high level of competition will get her divers "fired up" and that it should be a "good warm-up" for them for the A-10 Championships and the NCAA Division 1 Zone Qualifying Meet.

Both sophomore Reuben Rappe and freshman Karen Upperco have qualified for the zones at the end of the season. In his freshman year, Rappe placed 15th in the three-meter and 27th in the one-meter at the zone qualifying meet.

In her fifth year coaching at UMass, Hixon says that Rappe is the best of the Minutemen she has coached, and in her 20 years of coaching she ranks him in the top three. But she added that she thinks he can beat them purely based on his competitiveness.

"He's just a really good athlete," Hixon said. "He has to win, and generally does."

Rappe was the first Atlantic 10 Diving Champion in UMass history with a score of 304.30 in the one-meter last year, which stands as the fifth best time in UMass diving history. He has failed to win two events so far this year, finishing second in the one-meter against Boston University and second in the three-meter to Army.

As for her top diver on the women's side, Hixon says that Upperco is just "starting to scrape the surface of her potential" and that she "can be really dominant."

Besides Upperco, Hixon will have the rest of her Minutewomen diving squad at the event, as well: freshman Sarah Horstmann, and juniors Mary Jenkins and Melissa Pond. On the men's side, junior Kirk Scimone will also compete, but the Maroon and White will be without freshman Matt Hall.

"We have a strong team and I think we can go far," Hixon said. "No team can dominate us on the boards that we face."

Hixon admits that she doesn't know much about the divers that her squad will be competing against this weekend, but she says that they are looking forward to it and need to rise up to the occasion.

Season set to begin for UMass

By DOMENIC POLI
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Competitive running never seems to stop for the Massachusetts women's track and field team. Just weeks after the women's cross-country season drew to a close, the track and field team began training for its season.

Lead by coaches Julie LaFreniere and Antoinette Otrando and throwing coach Bob Otrando, the Maroon and White prepare to begin its schedule, which ends the weekend of March 4 with the ECAC Championships in Roxbury, Mass.

LaFreniere, a UMass alum, is in her 19th season coaching the Minutewomen. She was selected as the Atlantic 10 women's cross-country Coach of the Year six times (1991, 1992, 1995, 1996, 1997 and 1999), and led the team to seven Atlantic 10 cross-country championships. As for winter track and field, she was named the Atlantic 10 indoor track and field Coach of the Year in 1996, and led UMass to the A-10 indoor title in both 1996 and 1998.

She mentioned that she is excited that all of her cross-country runners are also doing indoor track.

Antoinette Otrando, who is in charge of training the runners for the hurdles, sprints, jumps and multi-events, is enjoying her fourth year of coaching at UMass. The Penn State graduate has had coaching stints at the University of Buffalo, Smith College, Rutgers University and the U.S. Naval Academy, and has a master's degree in Movement Science from Springfield College. She is excited to see the freshmen compete as well as the seniors.

"I think most [of the team] should do fairly well," Otrando said.

Bob Otrando is in his sixth year as the throwing coach and in his 13th as the strength and conditioning coach at UMass, supervising over 600 student-athletes in all 22 of the school's varsity sports. He has had brief coaching experiences with Kent University, Brown University and the New England Patriots.

Even though indoor track and field has about 12 different events, Antoinette Otrando stressed that each girl specializes in two or three. "There are different people in different events, and they have their strengths," she said.

Otrando mentioned that she expects to see some great things from seniors Ashley Creel, Elisabeth Budd and graduate student Marissa Kay Callahan.

Creel, an exercise science major, was a top-ranked athlete on the team competing in the heptathlon, pentathlon, high jump and the 55-meter/100-meter hurdles. She finished tenth in the pentathlon at the New England Championships last year with 2,861 points.

Budd, who is double majoring in psychology and history, has "done well," Otrando said. "She was an A-10 [500-meter] champ two indoor seasons ago. So she's one of our best 400/500 meter runners."

Callahan, a graduate student finishing her eligibility, is a star in the triple jump and the hurdles. Callahan posted her best time in the 100-meter hurdles with a time 15.69 seconds in the Atlantic 10 Championships last year.

The team also consists of four other seniors, Maxine Dube, Jennifer Marine, Erin O'Donnell and Suzanne Simmons, all of whom are expected to turn in solid results this season.

Dube is a jumping specialist and last year posted a season-best 15-feet, 8.25 inches in the long jump at the Boston University Six-Way Meet to finish 11th overall.

Marine is a dominating sprinter and boasts a personal best of 32.04 in the 200-meter race, which she achieved at the UConn Invitational in 2004.

Erin O'Donnell, a transfer student from Assumption, is a very

See TRACK on page 6

Thornton 'blindsided' by move

By GREG BEACHAM
ASSOCIATED PRESS

Joe Thornton was the cornerstone of the Boston Bruins for eight years – until he was abruptly shipped off to the West Coast with a dinnertime phone call.

The San Jose Sharks acquired the power forward Wednesday night, parting with Marco Sturm, Brad Stuart and Wayne Primeau in a trade between two last-place franchises desperate to shake up their dismal seasons.

As a rising superstar, a probable 2006 Canadian Olympian and the face of the Boston franchise for several seasons, Thornton was stunned by the rather graceless end to his tenure with the team that drafted him with the No. 1 overall pick in 1997.

General manager Mike O'Connell called Thornton's cell phone after he had just finished dining with his parents in Boston.

"I was blindsided," Thornton said in a conference call. "On the one hand, it's disappointing; and on the other, it's good to start over again. When you don't win, there's going to be changes."

The 26-year-old star signed a three-year, $20 million contract in August with Boston, where he was the club's captain for the last three seasons. Thornton was less than complimentary of O'Connell and coach Mike Sullivan, whose jobs both are rumored to be in jeopardy.

"Obviously [the Bruins] believe in their coach and their general manager, and I'm next in line, so I've got to move on," he said. "I came back here to win, and we haven't been winning. Whose fault is that? I'm not sure, but I'm out of here, so it must be mine."

Thornton was tied for 11th

See THORNTON on page 6

Joe Thornton was traded by the Boston Bruins to the San Jose Sharks on Wednesday. Thornton played eight seasons in Boston.

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY · EST. 1890

The Daily Collegian

MONDAY, DECEMBER 5, 2005 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM VOLUME CXVI ISSUE 59

Man charged in stabbing case withdraws plea

HADLEY — One of the suspects involved in the Oct. 2 stabbings on "Frat Row" withdrew his guilty plea in court on Thursday.

Cuong Ly, 18, the only adult charged in the stabbings, had pled guilty to two charges of assault and battery, which stemmed from a fight that led to the stabbings of six people on North Pleasant Street, just outside the campus of the University of Massachusetts.

Ly's guilty plea was classified as an "unagreed plea." This means that the plea would be presented to the court in order to test the waters, and see the possible punishments it could hold.

Ly's attorney, Daniel Sandell, asked that Ly be sentenced to 30 days in prison. He also requested that a charge of assault with a dangerous weapon be continued without a finding.

The prosecution, District Attorney Kevin Maltby, however, asked that Ly be sentenced to one year, with six months to be served in prison and six months to be suspended.

Ly withdrew his guilty plea after Eastern Hampshire District Court Judge Nancy Dusek-Gomez said she would follow Maltby's proposal.

Now, Ly is being held on $1,000 bail and is set to have his case go to trial.

In an interview with the Republican, Sandell said his client would claim self-defense during his trial. He said that, although Ly admits he did strike two people with his fists and pick up a metal object that could cause bodily harm, he was only defending himself against attackers.

Police say that the fight originated in the basement of the Pi Delta Psi fraternity and moved outside, growing in volume and begetting several other fights. Members of the Zeta Beta Tau fraternity were also involved in the fight.

Pi Delta Psi has been placed on a deferred suspension by UMass since the incidents, meaning the fraternity cannot invite non-fraternity members to any of its social functions. Zeta Beta Tau has been cleared of all charges by the University.

The fights led to a total of six stabbing victims, according to police, including Ly's brother.

Two juveniles from Amherst Regional High School have also been charged in relation to this case.

—Megan Daley

Library welcomes students, day or night

By BILL DONOVAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Now that the Du Bois Library is open 24 hours a day, University of Massachusetts students can study whenever they want.

Recently, the library implemented their new 24-hour, 5 day a week schedule to allow students more accessible study time.

"We've always had trouble closing the building at night, people always wanted to stay longer," said Jay Schafer, Director of UMass Libraries. "We realized dorms aren't the ideal place to study, with people living off-campus, who have families and roommates. This provides an ideal place for them to go."

The idea of expanding the hours of operation came from an online-campus survey officials of DuBois administered. In the spring of 2004, the survey, LibQUAL+ was emailed to undergraduate and graduate students asking how they felt about the library, its services, and its selection.

"Among many comments, there were requests for extra hours, better-lighting, and more comfortable-seating," said Emily Silverman, Director of Development and Communication. So we've changed all the lighting in the building according to the Energy Efficiency Plan. With the new furniture added to the Learning Commons, we encourage students to move it around. That's what its there for."

Schafer and Silverman are surprised with the amount of students coming through the doors each day. According to them, 284 people came in on Thursday, Dec. 1 from midnight to 6 a.m.

"Overall-use of the library is up 25 percent," Schafer said. "The second-floor quiet-study area is booming. We knew students would love the technology-side of the Learning Commons. But we are enthused the non-tech west-side is being used, where the large study-tables are."

Students are also taking advantage of the variety of services available in the Learning Commons.

"The Writing Center and Peer Tutoring Learning Resource Center are very successful," Schafer said. "This collaboration here is so unique because we've brought in so many services, such as OIT and the advising-folks. They are being used more than they usually would in their usual places."

A third-shift staff has been created to manage the library during late-night hours. A total of six students working each night monitor the operation desk and other facilities.

"There will be no more loud-bells ringing at 12 a.m. indicating we are closing," Silverman said. "For students who need to be escorted to their cars or dorms at night, UMass Public Safety provides accompaniment to anywhere on campus."

Schafer also discussed the progress of the Du Bois plaza. According to him, outside construction will end after the north-side garden is finished and after concrete pouring.

"Benches are being put in next to all of the planters outside," Schafer said, "Heaters are currently being installed at the entrance of the lobby. It just looks so great outside now, very different than it was 10 years ago."

Three to four handicapped-parking spaces are also being created near South College and Gallaudet and bicycle-racks also have been added near the library-entrance.

"The class of 1955 garden is really taking shape," Schafer said, "That side of the library is going to be so beautiful with the monumental staircase and two ramps with ample seating in the middle. It'll be a nice place for students to meet up at the library."

Students expressed their optimism towards the newly-renovated library schedule.

University of Massachusetts students use the new Learning Commons at the W.E.B. DuBois Library. The library has recently began to stay open 24 hours, five nights a week.

See LIBRARY on page 2

US may see troop reduction in Iraq next year

By NEDRA PICKLER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The United States may be ready to reduce troops in Iraq next year if Iraqis continue making progress at the current rate, President Bush's national security adviser said Sunday.

Stephen Hadley appeared on a round of Sunday talk shows to follow up on President Bush's speech on Iraq from the U.S. Naval Academy last week. Hadley echoed Bush's statement that decisions about troop withdrawals would be made when U.S. commanders there felt Iraqis were ready to govern and protect themselves without U.S. help, but said that could come as early as 2006.

"We think that if trends continue and we continue to make the progress and the Iraqis continue to make the progress we're making, we'll be in a position sometime next year for us to — for the commanders on the ground to make their assessments," Hadley said on ABC's "This Week." "And it may be at that point they will come to the president and say, we want to make some adjustments."

Hadley said the deaths in Iraq, now above 2,100, have been very difficult for the president. Still, he said Bush expects insurgent attacks will increase in the next couple of weeks before Iraq's Dec. 15 elections.

Hadley was repeatedly asked on "Fox News Sunday" whether Vice President Dick Cheney was wrong when he said last May that the insurgency was in its last throes, but he would not directly answer. "Clearly, there's a lot more work to do," he said.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said he also thinks it is possible to bring U.S. troops home in the next year or two, "but it's going to be tough." He said one of the biggest mistakes that the Bush administration made in fighting the war was to have too few troops in Iraq.

"We've made serious mistakes, and I'm frustrated by them, and most Americans are, too," McCain said on "Meet the Press." "But most Americans, I think, still appreciate that if we had some kind of premature withdrawal that the consequences would be very severe."

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Richard Lugar, R-Ind., said Bush has an uphill struggle to convince Americans that he can be successful in Iraq. He said civil war there is possible. "That would be catastrophic, not only for Iraq but the Middle East and for our interests," Lugar said.

Some Democrats criticized Bush for not being more aggressive about troops withdrawals.

Bush's former campaign rival, Sen. John Kerry said it's more dangerous for the mission to keep troops in Iraq in such large numbers. The Massachusetts Democrat has called for Bush to bring home 20,000 troops if the December elections are successful and he said Sunday that there should also be a political summit in the region immediately.

Kerry said if he would not have voted for the resolution authorizing war if he knew then what he knows now.

"They misled us and misled the nation," Kerry said.

President George W. Bush, shown here giving a speech in the White House Rose Garden, expects the U.S. may see a reduction of troops in Iraq as early as 2006, according to his national security advisor.

Mt. Holyoke student pleads "not guilty" in car crash case

HADLEY — A Five-college student charged with vehicular homicide pleaded innocent Friday in court.

Tania Ahmed, 22, a senior at Mount Holyoke College and a native of Pakistan, was ordered to surrender her passports and was then released by Eastern Hampshire District Court Judge William McDonough on $20,000 personal surety after her arraignment.

Ahmed is accused of driving a 2002 sport utility vehicle on Wednesday into the wrong lane on Rt. 116 in Granby. Her vehicle struck a Kia Sedan driven by Karen M. Zahradnik, 44, of Pelham, according to police.

Zahradnik was taken to Baystate Medical Center in Springfield and was pronounced dead upon arrival. Ahmed and her passenger, A. Lindsay Wesley, 21, were also taken to the hospital, where they were treated and released.

Ahmed has been charged with negligent operation of a motor vehicle, driving without a license and failing to stay within marked travel lanes, according to police.

Police also reported finding empty alcohol bottles behind the driver's seat of Ahmed's vehicle, however she has not been charged with driving under the influence.

In an interview with "The Republican," David G. Mintz, Ahmed's defense lawyer, said that it was "much too early to say exactly what we are dealing with here," noting that the accident investigation is incomplete.

—Megan Daley

Baby panda draws crowds in D.C.

By KERI FULTON
UWIRE DC BUREAU

WASHINGTON — Tai Shan, the 4-month-old panda cub at the National Zoo in Washington, D.C., has become a national favorite with fans across the nation scrambling for tickets to see him.

"It's amazing to me personally, the volume of enthusiasm and interest the cub is receiving from the public," said National Zoo spokesman John Gibbons. Gibbons said the cub has also generated interest from people around the globe who send emails asking about Tai Shan.

Why is Tai Shan so popular?

"I can tell you first hand that he really is just as cute as you think he is," Gibbons said. "He really is the celebrity at the zoo right now."

Tai Shan put on a show for the media last week, playing on the rocks in his exhibit and creating photo opportunities for publications across the nation. The cub now weighs 21 pounds and is becoming more active and independent, Gibbons said.

But aside from being a cute little furball, Gibbons said Tai Shan is also a rarity. He is the first panda cub to have come this far at the National Zoo.

Gibbons said that while pandas have been successfully born and raised in captivity, there are major obstacles along the way. The first obstacle the zoo faced was getting Mei Xiang, his mother, pregnant. According to Gibbons, female pandas have a small window of time when they can get pregnant: only one day a year.

The scientists at the zoo had to

See PANDA on page 2

10 Marines killed in bombing

By ROBERT H. REID
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq — A roadside bomb killed 10 Marines and wounded 11 others on a foot patrol near Fallujah, the U.S. military said Friday. It was the deadliest attack against American troops in four months.

The Marines from Regimental Combat Team 8, based at Camp Lejeune, N.C., were ambushed on Thursday. The unit has suffered some of the highest casualties of the Iraq war.

Also Friday, three U.S. soldiers from the 48th Brigade Combat Team were killed in a traffic accident south of Baghdad, and the military said an Army soldier assigned to the 2nd Marine Division died of wounds suffered the previous day when his vehicle was struck by a rocket in Ramadi, 70 miles west of the capital.

The 14 deaths announced by the military Friday brought to at least 2,127 the number of U.S. service members who have died since the beginning of the war in 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

The attack in Fallujah came a day after President Bush outlined his strategy for victory in Iraq, and at a time when there are growing calls for an exit plan for U.S. troops.

Hours after the military announced its grim news, Al-Jazeera broadcast a videotape and statement in which the kidnappers of four Christian peace activists threatened to kill the hostages — two Canadians, an American and a Briton — unless all prisoners in U.S. and Iraqi detention centers are freed by Dec. 8.

The roadside bomb in Fallujah, the

See MARINES on page 2

ARTS & LIVING
'FLUX' IS A VISUAL TREAT
"Aeon Flux" offers stunning visuals and a well-told story through one-dimensional characters.
PAGE 5

EDITORIAL/OPINION
THE YEAR IN REVIEW
One columnist gives grades to many of this year's memorable moments/people
PAGE 4

WEATHER
TODAY Partly Cloudy H36° L23°
TONIGHT Late Snow Showers L23°
TOMORROW Snow, H33°, L14°

SPORTS
LEADING THE PACK
Christina Derosa has been the top runner for UMass track and cross-country since arriving to UMass.
PAGE 10

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Michael A. Busack
MANAGING EDITOR Cameron J. Woods
BUSINESS MANAGER Hirak Shah
PRODUCTION MANAGER Nicholas Belanger
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Sherd Woliuk
ADVERTISING MANAGER Kerry O'Grady
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Lauren Egavian
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Amanda Allen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Matthew O'Rourke
COMICS EDITOR Amanda Allen
EDITORIAL EDITOR Allison Edles
NEWS EDITOR Dan O'Brien
PHOTO EDITOR Kate Sachsenmaier
SPORTS EDITOR Jett Howe
CIRCULATION MANAGER Thomas Hecht
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Nick Gleason
FINANCE MANAGER Daniel Conti
HUMAN RESOURCE Phil Smoller
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Caren Tortorici
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Nathan Chomsky
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Mackenzie Isler
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Ian Jones
ASSISTANT NEWS Megan Daley
ASSISTANT NEWS Matt Bellweau
ASSISTANT PHOTO Elizabeth Cirisi
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eric Athas
ASSISTANT SPORTS Dan Duggan
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Kristen LaCasse

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS MASSACHUSETTS AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE WEEKLY. IN 1907, THE COLLEGIAN BECAME THE COLLEGE NEWS. IN 1911, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN. IN 1914 AND 1917, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN. IN 1936, PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967. THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Michael A. Busack
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Kate Sachsenmaier
COPY EDITOR
Dan O'Brien
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Melody Natal
PRODUCTION STAFF
Jackie Ronan, Irving Mercado

Roadside bombing in Fallujah results in U.S. soldiers' deaths former insurgent headquarters west of the capital, was fashioned from several large artillery shells, the military said.

MARINES from page 1

Sen. John Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, called the ambush a "very serious attack," saying "it appears that this group of Marines had collected — which is always a dangerous thing — in sort of one location."

The military statement said seven of the wounded later returned to duty and that the rest of the team was conducting "counterinsurgency operations throughout Fallujah and the surrounding area" to improve security for the Dec. 15 elections.

The statement also did not give the precise location of the attack — the single deadliest against U.S. troops in Iraq since 14 Marines were killed Aug. 3 when a bomb destroyed their vehicle near Haditha, 140 miles northwest of Baghdad.

Maj. Cliff W. Gilmore, a spokesman at Camp Lejeune for the II Marine Expeditionary Force, said the victims of Thursday's ambush probably came from hometowns across the country rather than from one area.

"Here at Camp Lejeune, we pause, we stop, we feel it, and then we carry out with the mission," Gilmore said. "Those folks in Iraq, they probably didn't even have time to pause and think about it. ... The folks that are on patrol right now might not have even heard of it."

U.S. forces have stepped up military operations throughout the Sunni Arab regions west of Baghdad to cut off the flow of weapons, ammunition and foreign fighters entering the country from Syria and to reduce insurgent activity.

As part of that campaign, the U.S. military on Friday launched a new offensive — Operation Shark — in Ramadi, capital of the insurgent-ridden Anbar province. About 200 Iraqi army soldiers and 300 U.S. Marines were taking part in the offensive, the fifth in Ramadi since Nov. 16.

On Thursday, insurgents allowed a local AP television news cameraman to film gunmen as they strolled briefly through empty streets, kneeled with their weapons at the ready and issued a declaration claiming they were "controlling the city." Ramadi has been the scene of repeated insurgent attacks but the U.S. military disputed claims the rebels control a significant area of the city.

Fallujah, located about 40 miles west of Baghdad, was an insurgent bastion until U.S. forces overran the city in November 2004 in the most intense urban combat of the Iraq war.

Since then, the U.S. military and the Iraqi government have been working to rebuild Fallujah and limit the return of insurgents, many of whom slipped out of the city during the siege and moved into nearby towns and villages outside the security cordon.

Regimental Combat Team 8 is a part of the II Marine Expeditionary Force. In the nearly three years since the war began, 147 Marines from II MEF have died in combat, according to 2nd Marine Division spokesman Lt. Barry Edwards. Regimental Combat Team 8 has been in Iraq since the beginning of February.

U.S. officials hope the operations will enable Sunni Arabs to vote in the parliamentary elections without fear of insurgent reprisals — which the Americans blame in large part for the Sunni boycott of the January balloting.

Washington hopes a big Sunni turnout will produce a government that can win the trust of the Sunnis, the backbone of the insurgency, and convince more of them to lay down their arms. That would hasten the day U.S. troops could go home.

However, many Sunni politicians fear that military operations so close to the election will have a negative impact by frightening voters away from the polls and deepening hostility to the Americans and their Iraqi partners.

A major Sunni clerical group, the Association of Muslim Scholars, appealed to the Arab League and human rights organizations to intervene with the Americans to stop "the massacres in Anbar." The Association is believed to have ties to some Sunni insurgent groups and is an outspoken critic of the American role in Iraq.

U.S. casualties have been increasing in recent weeks at a time of growing discontent within the United States over the Iraq conflict.

American commanders say they have been making gains in the war. On Thursday, Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, a coalition operations officer, said suicide bombings declined to 23 in November because of successful military operations in the Euphrates River valley west of the capital.

However, U.S. and Iraqi officials have also predicted an increase in insurgent attacks as the election approaches. As part of security measures for the vote, Iraq's Interior Ministry has banned all non-Iraqi Arabs from entering the country, officials said Friday.

The decision was made Tuesday by Interior Minister Bayan Jabr, said two senior ministry officials who spoke on condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to speak to the media. They said the ban is expected to be lifted two days after the election.

On Friday, Jordan's airline prevented an Associated Press correspondent of Egyptian nationality from boarding a plane to Baghdad. Royal Jordanian officials said they had orders from Iraqi authorities.

Panda draws crowds since first appearance estimate when this day was by examining Mei Xiang's urine. Once they thought they had the day nailed down they brought in a male panda that was sexually "inexperienced" according to Gibbons.

PANDA from page 1

Gibbons chuckled that the male experienced difficulties with the logistics of mating with Mei Xiang.

Since the scientists had only 24 hours to get the job done, they turned to artificial insemination, Gibbons said. After one try, the scientists crossed their fingers that the procedure had worked.

The second obstacle for the zoo was a successful pregnancy for Mei Xiang, one of the few panda's in the world who is trained to be awake during an ultrasound.

Gibbons said images from ultrasounds are especially difficult to read when looking at a panda fetus, so zoo officials were excited when the little panda cub was born on July 9 of this year.

After the successful birth, the zoo faced the final obstacle of Tai Shan's post-birth development.

Gibbons said newborn pandas are far less developed than many other mammals, so care after the birth is extremely important.

Mei Xiang was a first-time mother, so the zoo was concerned about how she would adjust to her new role.

"Fortunately, Mei Xiang was a textbook mother and did everything she was supposed to do," Gibbons said.

Within five minutes after giving birth, Mei Xiang was nursing Tai Shan. "We are also very fortunate that Tai Shan was a textbook cub and did everything he was supposed to do."

Tai Shan will make his fist public appearance Dec. 8, and it is already a sold-out performance. His visitors will go through his exhibit in groups for 10 minute intervals.

E-mails after Katrina overwhelm officials

BATON ROUGE, La. (AP) — Dan Rather and Oprah Winfrey wanted interviews. An outspoken congresswoman wanted a security escort in the flooded city. Cuba's dictator offered medical help; Venezuela's president wanted to chat with the governor.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco's top aides were inundated with requests from around the world, from celebrities, dignitaries and people whose relatives were trapped in the city, according to documents released Friday.

"FYI, the shooting of looters in Jefferson Parish is still unconfirmed," said an e-mail message from a state police lieutenant to Bob Mann, Blanco's communications director, four days after the storm struck.

The contents of Mann's e-mail inbox from Aug. 23 through Sept. 6 — hundreds of messages each day — make up part of the estimated 100,000 pages of documents Blanco's office sent this week to two congressional committees investigating government failures in preparing for and responding to Katrina.

—Associated Press

Corrections

Due to a reporting error in the article titled "Professor urges SGA action on war in Iraq" that ran in the December 1, 2005 edition of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, University of Massachusetts professor of psychology Marvin Daehler was mistakenly quoted throughout the entire article. The professor that spoke was Richard Bogardz, also a professor of psychology. Mr. Daehler was in no way involved in the Student Government Association meeting on that day.

Due to a reporting error, The Daily Collegian reported in the November 17th edition, in an article titled "SOM students pack Responsibility Fair," that "free trade allows the company to pay as low as 10 cents per pound of coffee." This was factually incorrect. What was meant is that growers receive premiums of 10 to 15 cents for each pound of coffee.

Library open 24-hours a day

LIBRARY from page 1

"You can go in anytime for an exam," said Ali Abubakar, a finance major, "It's all the help you need right there."

"It's good because you can get that last-minute research done that you just remembered to do," added Shaun Connolly, a Portuguese major.

"Students have unlimited-time options now," said Kelly Scimto, a Russian Studies major, "They can go now whenever it fits their schedules."

Plans are in the works now for enlarging the 23,000 square-foot Learning Commons. Du Bois officials are looking at establishing an Integrated Science and Engineering Library at the Lederle low-rise.

"But everything takes time," said Schafer, "I would like to have something by next fall. It all depends on funding and support."

Also, a "Loaner Program" is in the works at the Library. Students will be able to borrow tablet-pc laptops up to four-hours. Soon 16 will be available on reserve according to Schafer.

The Learning Commons holds 400 laptop ports, 13 rooms for group study, 164 workstations, and 16 email kiosks. It is a one-stop center for students looking for research and reference aid, as well as many other services.

"We're amazed at how high-quality this environment is," said Schafer, "We feel very thankful for the works of the Provost and Chancellor and

Invest in your future.

Earn 1, 2, or 3 credits in less than a month

Classes begin January 4

English Comp I and II
Intro to Dance
Intro to Ethics
Modern Physics
Psychology
Public Speaking
Self Defense for Women
Spanish Skills
French Skills

CLICK or CALL
gcc.mass.edu
(413) 775-1801

GREENFIELD Community College

Accelerated Culinary Arts Certificate Program

THE CULINARY INSTITUTE OF AMERICA

Raise the Bar on Your Career Possibilities

Increase the Marketability of Your Bachelor's Degree in Hospitality and Tourism Management, Food Science, or Nutrition

In just 30 weeks of cooking, studying wine, developing menus, and exploring culinary trends, you will:

- Gain new skills and insight into culinary techniques, ingredients, and cuisines
- Heighten your ability to work with chefs and lead a culinary operation
- Learn in an inspiring setting in the heart of America's wine country

Program Dates:
July 24, 2006–March 9, 2007

Space is Limited, so Apply Now!
Applications are due May 1, 2006.

www.ciaprochef.com/acap
707-967-2497

The Culinary Institute of America at Greystone
Napa Valley, California

The CIA at Greystone is a branch of the CIA, Hyde Park, NY.
©2005 The Culinary Institute of America

Status of gay unions unclear in other states

By DAVID CRARY
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — In more than one sense, Brian Rice and Jason Kelliher are pioneers. They were among the first same-sex partners in the nation to marry legally — last year in barrier-breaking Massachusetts — and now are among the few such couples to forgo their much-prized rights by moving to another state.

Their new home, Connecticut, is among the most liberal on the issue; its legislature has approved civil unions that extend marriage-like rights to gay couples. But that option doesn't tempt Rice and Kelliher.

"We've already reached the pinnacle of what a couple can hope for — a marriage license," said Rice, a lawyer. "Civil union is a second-class citizenship. ... We don't want to take a step backward."

Yet Rice and Kelliher know that if they venture to any other state — except back to Massachusetts — their status wouldn't improve. While a few states have recognized same-sex couples, many more are strengthening bans on gay marriage. Conservatives in some places — including Michigan and Ohio — are now taking aim at existing domestic-partner benefit policies.

"There are lots of families in states where it's harder to be a strong family, where the state does everything it can to weaken you," said David Buckel, an attorney overseeing marriage issues for the gay rights group Lambda Legal. "It's challenging, it's discouraging, at some points it's enraging."

Rice, 27, and Kelliher, 29, moved from Boston in August 2004 because of a job offer for Rice in Stamford, Conn. Kelliher now works for an apartment management company, and qualifies for domestic-partner health benefits from Rice's law firm.

They initially hoped Connecticut would recognize their marriage, but the state decided otherwise. They can't file joint state tax returns, as they could have in Massachusetts, and worry that they need to execute a will because Connecticut wouldn't consider the survivor a spouse in the event one of them died.

"There are very few attorneys who specialize in these issues, and the law is very unsettled," Rice said. "If you're moving from state to state, or traveling, protections you had in one state may not be available in another."

Despite the uncertainties, the couple sense they are better off in New England than in the dozens of other states that have explicitly outlawed gay marriage. Many have enshrined such bans in their constitutions; several also forbid civil unions.

"We're fortunate not to be facing some of the challenges couples are facing elsewhere," Rice said.

Among those challenges:

—In Michigan, Republican Attorney General Mike Cox and several conservative groups are arguing in court that the gay-marriage ban approved by voters in 2004 should be interpreted as barring local governments and public universities from providing health insurance to partners of gay workers.

—In Nebraska, state officials are trying to reinstate a ban on same-sex marriages that was struck down by a federal judge and is considered by gay-rights advocates to be the harshest such ban in the nation. Approved with 70 percent support in 2000, the constitutional amendment bars virtually any legal protections for same-sex couples, including shared health benefits for gays employed by the state. The amendment "made gay people into political outcasts," said American Civil Liberties Union lawyer Tamara Lange.

—In Ohio, conservatives who helped win passage of a 2004 ban on same-sex marriages and civil unions are now suing to stop a state university from offering health insurance to employees' same-sex partners.

That Miami University program "violates state law by creating a legal status for same-sex couples designed to mimic marriage," said lawyer Jeff Shafer of the Alliance Defense Fund. "Granting special legal status to newfangled nonmarital relationships is a state policy option rejected by the voters."

Lambda Legal lawyer Camilla Taylor said the lawsuit, if successful, would validate discrimination. "I'm sure gay and lesbian families are wondering if Ohio is the right state for them to live in," she said.

—In New Jersey, one of a handful of states with a domestic partnership law, activists were dismayed by two recent cases dramatizing the law's limitations. In one case, Ocean County officials refused to approve the transfer of death benefits to the lesbian partner of a cancer-stricken law enforcement officer, Lt. Laurel Hester. In another case, also involving lesbians who registered as domestic partners, 66-year-old Betty Jordan is suing the state because of a ruling that she is not entitled to the couple's home and cars after her partner's death in July.

Menino to remove controversial T-shirts from stores

BOSTON (AP) — Mayor Thomas Menino will move ahead with a plan to seize the controversial "Stop Snitching" T-shirts from city stores, despite complaints from the American Civil Liberties Union that the plan violates the Constitution's free speech protections.

Menino's spokesman, Seth Gitell, said Menino will try to stop the T-shirt sales because his top priority is the safety of Boston residents.

"These T-shirts promote lack of cooperation with law enforcement and, in some cases, the obstruction of justice," he said.

Menino said this week that he would have city employees seize the shirts or "strongly discourage" their sales. His announcement came after meeting Thursday with Police Commissioner Kathleen O'Toole and Suffolk County District Attorney Daniel Conley to discuss a recent rise in violent crimes and murders.

Police haven't identified a suspect in 70 percent of homicide cases this. They say many witnesses are reluctant to help because of a fear of retaliation, and Menino says the "Stop Snitching" shirts are part of the problem. The city has 66 homicides so far this year, matching a 10 year high.

M. Antonio Ennis, owner of Antonio Ansaldi Clothing in Boston, which sells the T-shirts, said if anyone confiscates them, "that's robbery."

"If the mayor really wants to stop the violence, then he ought to go into Smith & Wesson and pull the guns off the shelves, because my shirts aren't the ones killing people," Ennis told the Boston Herald.

Lawyers for the American Civil Liberties Union of Massachusetts sent a letter to Menino and O'Toole on Friday and asked them to abandon the plan.

They said they share the concerns about a surge in murders and other violent crimes this year, but that city officials have no right to bar the sales of the T-shirts.

That "is a form of official censorship which is fundamentally inconsistent with the constitutional guarantees of freedom of expression," John Reinstein, legal director for the ACLU of Massachusetts, said in a statement.

Some residents of high-crime neighborhoods reacted angrily to Reinstein's statements. Linda Barros, a Dorchester resident, said gunfire disturbs her sleep almost nightly.

"Maybe the people saying this don't have to feel threatened on a minute-to-minute basis," she told The Boston Globe.

—Associated Press

Mayor Thomas Menino, shown above, plans to remove the controversial "Stop Snitching" T-shirts from stores in Boston. The American Civil Liberties Union claim Menino has no right to ban the T-shirt sales.

McCain demands White House agree to ban torture

By JIM ABRAMS
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Sen. John McCain, a prisoner of war who was tortured in Vietnam, said Sunday he will refuse to yield on his demands that the White House agree with his proposed ban on the use of torture to extract information from suspected terrorists.

"I won't," he said on NBC's "Meet the Press" when asked whether he would compromise with the Bush administration. He is insisting on his language that no persaon in U.S. custody should be subject to "cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment."

The Arizona Republican said he had met several times with the president's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, on the issue, and both McCain and Hadley said Sunday they were working toward an agreement.

Hadley, on ABC's "This Week," repeated President Bush's assertion that the United States does not torture and follows international conventions on the treatment of prisoners.

He added, "We're trying to find a way ... where we can strike the balance between being aggressive to protect the country against the terrorists, and, at the same time, comply with the law."

"We're working it. We're not there yet," he said on "Fox News Sunday."

McCain, while saying he would not compromise on the torture language, said they were in discussions "about other aspects of this to try to get an agreement." He did not elaborate.

McCain, a Navy flier who was captured by the North Vietnamese and tortured during the Vietnam War, sponsored an anti-torture measure that has passed the Senate by a 90-9 vote.

But the White House said it could not accept restrictions that might prevent interrogators from gaining information vital to the nation's security and has threatened a presidential veto of any bill that contained the McCain language.

McCain noted that intelligence gained through torture can be unreliable and he said the practice hurts the U.S. reputation abroad.

Senator John McCain, seen here adressing reporters, has demanded that the White House accept his proposal to ban the use of torture in extracting information from suspected terrorists.

Remains of N.H. children identified

By ANNE SAUNDERS
ASSOCIATED PRESS

CONCORD, N.H. — The mother of two children who were shot to death and buried by their father 2 1/2 years ago plans to visit the shallow Ohio grave where their bodies were finally found last week.

The remains of Sarah Gehring, 14, and her brother Philip, 11, were identified Saturday by the medical examiner's office in Summit County, Ohio. The discovery of their wrapped bodies, each marked with a duct-tape cross as their father had said, ended Teri Knight's long search but renewed her mourning.

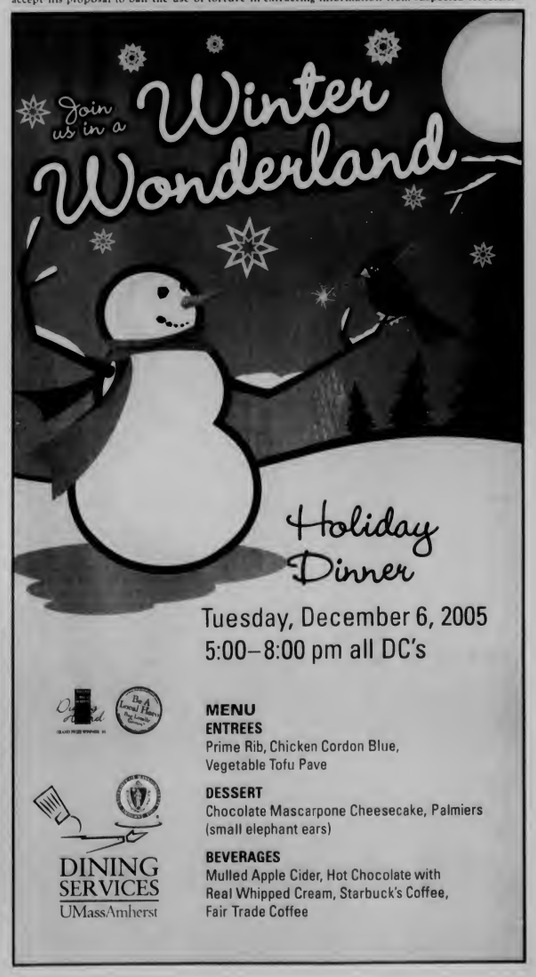
Her new husband, Jim Knight, said Sunday that the couple would decide in the next few days when to leave for Ohio, probably to have the children's bodies cremated there and then return home to New Hampshire with their ashes.

"At some point, we will have a funeral," he said. "These last items, it's just a series of things we need to do for ourselves."

The children were last seen arguing with their father, Manuel Gehring, at a July Fourth fireworks show in Concord. After Gehring was arrested days later in California, he told authorities he had pulled off a highway the night of the fireworks show and shot both children, then drove for hours with their bodies in his van before burying them somewhere off Interstate 80.

He gave police several clues but said he couldn't remember the location, then committed suicide in jail before a trial.

Teri Knight never gave up hope of finding Sarah and Philip, and as she raised her young twin daughters, she spent as much time as she could searching. At one point, she came within five miles of their grave near Hudson, Ohio.



"I always knew it would happen someday," she said Saturday after learning the bodies had been identified as her children. "I was trying to figure out a way that I was going to be able to move forward in my life, and raise my daughters without having that be something that consumed my life."

The children's remains were found by Stephanie Dietrich, whose Boxer-Rottweiler Ricco led her to the burial site.

The autopsies revealed that Sarah had been shot in the head three times, and that her brother had been shot in each arm, the head and the neck, said New Hampshire Assistant Attorney General Jeffery Strelzin. Authorities believe Gehring used one handgun to shoot Sarah, and when that gun jammed, used another to kill her brother.

Manuel Gehrig, cenetr, has admitted to killing his two children, Philip and Sarah, also pictured. Recently, the children's bodies were found in Ohio.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

MONDAY, DECEMBER 5, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it" - Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

2005, your grades are in

Chris Eckel

For us here at UMass, final exams are coming up pretty soon. But never fear, to get you ready for reading your grades on SPIRE, I'm going to release my grades for the big movers and shakers this year. Let's hope nothing changes in the next month, or else Professor Eckel might have to reevaluate.

RELIGIONS – D

So the Catholic Church is leading the charge here. They've grossly misplayed the sexual abuse scandal. Instead of cleaning out their closet, they are more concerned with making priests who come out of the closet disappear. Parishioners (those who still have parishes left, at least) are becoming disgruntled, and if the Vatican continues to push away priests and parishes, then they might be able to do what 2,000 years of religious warfare couldn't: extinguish the Catholic faith.

But hey, let's not focus just on the Catholic administration. Those lovable right-wing Christians have had a banner year as well. They've continued their assault on gay marriage, and have even managed to create an attempt to sell a theory on the history of the world that has absolutely no scientific basis whatsoever. I'd sooner take etiquette lessons from Paris Hilton than give credence to "intelligent design."

VINCE VAUGHN – A

Stole a movie from right under the noses of Christopher Walken and "Doctor Quinn: Medicine Woman." Then he stole a kiss or two from Jennifer Aniston, who is apparently a bit attractive. Vince, I like where your head's at.

THEO EPSTEIN – B

So the Red Sox didn't win the World Series this year, but he did play a bunch of awesome concerts, and now he can pretty much get any job he wants.

SGA – I

Yes, an incomplete. I work for the Collegian, and I used to be involved in the SGA, and even I haven't heard anything from them all year. Considering the last few years, I'm still trying to decide whether that's a good thing or a bad thing.

KANYE WEST – A+

He had one of the three best albums of the year. He has the coolest boss in the world. He even managed to rip Dubya on national TV and get away with it. Hey, we all know Bush has started wars for less, but Kanye seems to be in the clear.

CANADA – C

Bit of a bummer: For one day, the United States did not have the most inefficient, most self-destructive government in North America. On the plus side, the NHL is back.

JOHN KERRY – B+

So he lost an election, you say? No worries, that was in 2004, and plenty changes from year to year. In 2005, he was apparently a totally awesome jury foreman. So I'd say things are pretty much working out all right for Boston's favorite heir to a ketchup fortune.

UMASS – B+

We are poor, we are violent and we don't have any place to put students except for local hotels, but we have new dorms on the way, we have some intelligent leadership and the state is bound to give us some money someday, right? Unless Mitt decides to steal our budget for his 2008 presidential campaign, in which case we might have to burn library books since we couldn't afford the heating bill.

JESSICA SIMPSON – B-

She's getting divorced. Apparently reality love is just like everyday love. But, on the plus side, before advising her to break up with Nick, her parents did some good research and found that, apparently, divorce doesn't ruin the star power of most in Hollywood. After all, kids, fame is more important than love, so she's a winner.

FRANCE – B

You know that kid who works hard and does well all semester, but then gets a horrible case of mad cow disease the night before the final and slips up? That's kind of France, in a nutshell. A country full of great people, but they had horrible luck this year. First they lost the 2012 Olympics bid. Then decades of racial tension exploded into weeks of rioting. Admittedly, France has its problems, but it doesn't get nearly enough credit from the rest of the world. Hopefully 2006 will be a bounce back year.

So there it is folks, the report card for some of the big newsmakers in 2005. For the record, I'm giving myself an incomplete — I'm still working on some things. Here's hoping that you're all on your way to earning As. Good luck with finals, UMass.

Chris Eckel is a Collegian columnist.

Holiday season ownership

Matthew Giancola

Being in New England during December, one can feel the spirit of the holidays in a way that is different from the rest of the country. I seldom like the snow or walking in the cold, but when the wreaths and the lights line houses and trees on Main Street, it suddenly becomes the only possible atmosphere that feels right. I could not imagine spending the holidays in southern California or the Arizona desert.

This is the time of year when we should be extending our hand to the less fortunate, offering our goodwill to all mankind, but lately, there seems to be a lot of fighting about the true meaning of the holiday season. Should we say "Happy holidays" or "Merry Christmas?" If a town places no nativity scene on its commons, does that mean the government is anti-Christian? Is it ok if the nativity is next to a menorah? Hey, don't forget about Kwanza.

All this bickering about whose holiday we should be celebrating more, read: whose religion is better, is leaving a mark on the time of year when we need to come together. Jerry Falwell and his band of Christian fundamentalists have sworn to sue companies that refuse to say "Merry Christmas" to their customers. These groups have hired over 1,000 attorneys to go after "secular" businesses.

Wal-Mart, not exactly a bastion of progressive ideals, had a policy of having its employees say "Happy holidays" to their customers, on the off chance that maybe the customer doesn't celebrate Christmas. They were attacked by far right groups such as the American Family Association. The reason the chairman of the AFA, Donald Wildmon wants "Merry Christmas" said to all customers: "This is an overwhelmingly Christian country." What does he say to those that celebrate Hanukah, or Kwanza, or any other holiday even? "Tough luck." Donald, I think you need to work on your goodwill-towards-others. Wal-Mart caved to the protests, as did Lowe's and Macy's.

Boston recently changed the name of the "Christmas tree" to the politically correct "Holiday tree." There was an uproar from the man who cut down the tree and asked that it be sent back. Bostonians were not pleased with the name change, either. The tree ironically is a gift from the people of Halifax, Nova Scotia, for Boston's help with a deadly 1917 explosion.

So where should we draw the line on celebrating the holidays in the public realm? When does celebrating the traditions of one holiday amount to supporting its respective religion over all others?

> It is smart economically, however, that [businesses] try to appeal to as many different customers as possible by acknowledging their holiday. Saying "Happy holidays" accommodates everyone; it leaves no religion behind.

Businesses have a right to sell religious or nonreligious decorations; there is no law saying they have to cater to different religions if they do not want to. It is smart economically, however, that they try to appeal to as many different customers as possible by acknowledging their holiday. Saying "Happy holidays" accommodates everyone; it leaves no religion behind.

As for the government and public lands, the Constitution forbids the government from sponsoring or supporting any religion over any other. Conservatives will frequently argue that the separation of Church and State was included in the document so that the government would not create a Church of the United States. But many of our founding fathers were very suspicious of organized churches. Thomas Jefferson rejected many of the tenants of Christianity, such as hell and the trinity. John Adams signed the Treaty of Tripoli, which stated that "The government of the United States is not in any sense founded on the Christian religion."

One of the things that make this country great is the fact that all cultures can co-exist together and create a society that works. This can only happen, however, if we can at the very least, respect the beliefs of others. Sure, there may be more Christians than Jews or Muslims in the United States, but would it hurt to simply say "Happy holidays" so that we can include everyone? By saying that, we aren't, as Jerry Falwell thinks, lessening Christmas, but rather, bringing all people together in the spirit of the season.

According to a new Fox News Poll, 48 percent of the country believes that Christmas is not under attack while 42 percent do. There is no great assault on Christmas, but by saying so, Dobson and his friends can stir many to give generously to their organizations.

Growing up, I looked at the holidays as a time where people helped others and respected them for the simple reason that it was the right thing to do. In today's world there are many that need our help. We are rebuilding cities in the South and Americans are fighting in foreign lands. Maybe we need to stop bickering over who owns the season and instead get down to dealing with the problems of the world.

Matthew Giancola is a Collegian columnist.

On war and its malcontents

Robert L. T. Miskell

The pursuit of peace is among the most laudable endeavors which man can undertake. And yet, what is peace? The true peace, which all should seek, is that whereby we are freed from reasonable fear of attack by our known and/or likely adversaries. How is this accomplished? It is accomplished by placing our enemies beyond the capacity to harm us. One achieves this through coercion.

War has been a central feature of human society since the dawn of civilization, if not even earlier. It is, as Carl von Clausewitz says, "...the continuation of politics [or diplomacy] by other means." Diplomacy itself is an art founded upon the threat of violence. It is undertaken — and its deliberations and agreements are (at least temporarily) accepted — by adversarial parties because each acknowledges the perils of open, armed conflict. As long as humanity retains a degree of diversity, and natural resources remain relatively finite, there will be incidents of resentment and hostility; and they will sometimes erupt into warfare. As a result, pure pacifism is the ultimate political impracticality. In fact, it is self-destructive to society.

> Whether one agrees with ongoing actions or not, it is unpatriotic, and perhaps even treasonable, to target the military itself. The Armed Forces serve, irrespective of the reigning party, for our common defense. To oppose them is to be an enemy against the commonwealth.

Our current situation has presented an interesting case. We are currently engaged in a war on terrorism. Although I'll mostly leave aside consideration of the long-range commitments such an undertaking includes (terrorism is something of a Hydra), I will say that, despite the sizable resources necessary to combat this threat, it is one that we must face and overcome. They attacked us. We must destroy them, utterly. The United States, despite being the lone superpower (or as some liberal critics frame it, "hyper-power"), cannot afford to have such an insidious foe appear to successfully injure us and escape a definitive, dramatic judgment. Such would naturally weaken domestic morale and give succor both to our current enemies and to rising rivals, such as China.

The Bush administration, despite the concerted efforts of the Democrats and their allies, won the presidency, again, in the last election. He was the first candidate in some time to win more than 50 percent of the vote. Although this still represents only half of the population, a brief look at the nation-wide county breakdown reveals that "the nation" voted for George W. Bush, while, largely, it was a collection of densely populated pockets that voted for John Kerry. What this demonstrates is that the nation democratically voted to return Bush to office, knowing his record and stance on ongoing military operations in Iraq.

Considering the validity of this particular action in the larger war on terrorism, it must be admitted that it was not an unreasonable argument that Saddam Hussein represented a threat to the security of the United States. He survived the Gulf War, and had made at least one attempt on the life of a former president, George H. W. Bush. In older days, this in itself, as a symbolic attack upon America, would have been cause to go to war. In our present, somewhat less chivalric culture, matters of honor often take second seat to pragmatism and (heinous) political correctness. The government framed the invasion of Iraq in terms of removing the widely-feared threat of Saddam's possession of extreme and unconventional weaponry, and liberating the Iraqi people from his tyranny. Both were praiseworthy undertakings.

In terms of the recent rhetoric of the anti-war faction, I must say that I am not impressed. My own misgivings about the Iraq war derive from obedience to the Pope and practical concerns regarding the stretching of the military's resources. That said, I believe that, had the administration framed the war in other, "older," and more historically insightful ways, it would have met the theological criteria. But apart from that, I am humble, intelligent and mature enough to acknowledge that the sitting president generally has a better knowledge of the strengths, vulnerabilities, and potentialities of the U.S. military than the regular citizenry.

The Constitution, rightly, grants responsibility for diplomacy and military strategy to the executive branch. The legislative branch, in these regards, merely serves to confirm treaties and provide counsel, funding and symbolic public support. And yet Congress has repeatedly sought to gain further control of military policy and operations, while many liberals at the municipal level presume to make official declarations, or stage "village" votes, against President Bush's policies and have moved to oppose military recruitment efforts. Still more attempt to hijack college campuses, either in the form of professorial dogmatism, administrative apathy or open attacks upon military recruitment efforts. Whether one agrees with ongoing actions or not, it is unpatriotic, and perhaps even treasonable, to target the military itself. The Armed Forces serve, irrespective of the reigning party, for our common defense. To oppose them is to be an enemy against the commonwealth.

In the end, we come back to the basic fact that war happens, and it is not about to stop because of the belligerent protests of some rebellious college students, disenchanted graduate students, tenured ideologues and opportunistic politicians. Nor would the abolition or diminishment of the U.S. military achieve temporary global peace, let alone utopia. If you are religious, total peace will likely come only with a definitive supernatural changing of the world; if you are an atheist, you can only dream of forcibly changing human nature. War is a fact of human sociality. As Flavius Vegetius Renatus said, "If you want peace, prepare for war."

Robert L. T. Miskell is a UMass graduate student.

Problems and no end in sight

Marc Pacheco

As the end of the semester approaches, I feel a need to comment on some observations I have made in my time here at UMass. As a recent transfer student who has been here for approximately 1.95 semesters now, I feel I have the requisite experience to make such observations.

First, is it just me or are the Dining Commons, especially Worcester, very crowded during peak hours? It seems like every student on campus is in there at the same time. With Berkshire closing, won't they become even more crowded? What about the new residence halls being built? Dining services should have a plan to open more space, like the Oak Room, for more hours. As far as I can tell, there is no plan to have more dining common space available in the northern part of campus. Are they expecting everyone in the new dorms to eat using the kitchenettes there next year? Come on, administration, use your heads. Students are not going to want to cook every day.

Which brings me to my next topic, the new dorms, which I believe are going to be called the North area. I think it should be called Sylvan West. Not only does it sound better, but it will restore dignity to the much maligned name "Sylvan," which as a resident in Sylvan, I know much about. To those of you who do not know, the noise from the construction of the Sylvan West dorms irritate many of us in Sylvan. You must understand, that it is not the machinery, cranes, jackhammers and the like that is so irritating, it's all the damn singing. Now don't get me wrong, some of the construction workers have lovely voices, but there is only so much "O-E-O" and "Gonna Build Me a Dorm" one can take. I mean, "O-E-O" doesn't even have lyrics, just syllables.

> In the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, bicycles need to follow the same rules of the road as cars do. Sometimes I'd like to carry around a big stick to shove into the front spokes of these oblivious bikers, to flip them over like in the beginning of Blade and in Indiana Jones.

But, ah yes, the snow and cold is indeed here. I dislike the cold as much as the next guy, but at least the cold and snow will cut down on the amount of mindless kamikaze bicyclists rocketing down the pedestrian walkways. I'm sure you all have had your own close encounters. These people think that you need to move for them, and that 25 mph is perfectly fine on a narrow walkway. They ride through dense crowds instead of walking their bicycle, some even oblivious to their surroundings because they're wearing headphones.

And I'm sorry, people, crosswalks are for pedestrians, not bikes. In the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, bicycles need to follow the same rules of the road as cars do. It's true, look it up. Sometimes I'd like to carry around a big stick to shove into the front spokes of these oblivious bikers, to flip them over like in the beginning of Blade and in Indiana Jones and so many other good action movies. So if you happen to be one of these people, please don't run us pedestrians down, and please slow down around other people.

Last, but not least, the SGA. Students, please. I thought you were there to represent my interests, but every week you go off charging after windmills on some quixotic quest to change the world. As a student I care about classes, life on campus and little things like why the pavement of the roads around here are worse than the streets of Beer Pong, I mean Beirut. I don't really want my representatives spending their time fighting Wal-Mart or protesting the war. Please keep your personal politics out of my student-fee-funded student legislature.

Marc Pacheco is a UMass student.

The Collegian is hiring an assistant Ed/Op editor for the Spring semester.

Come down to the Collegian newsroom to apply!

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

MONDAY, DECEMBER 5, 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The world in 'Flux'

"Aeon Flux"
Directed by Karyn Kusama
Starring Charlize Theron Martin Csokas
Paramount Pictures
Rated PG-13
97 mins.
Grade B+

COURTESY PARAMOUNT PICTURES

'The Squid and the Whale' offers stripped down take on real life

By Peter Frisman
Collegian Staff

"The Squid and the Whale"
Directed by Noah Baumbach
Starring Owen Kline Jeff Daniels Laura Linney
Samuel Goldwyn Films
Rated R
80 mins.
Grade A-

"The Squid and the Whale" was penned and directed by Noah Baumbach, the co-writer of Wes Anderson's "The Life Aquatic with Steve Zissou." In reciprocation, Anderson is one of "Squid's" producers. Baumbach's film shares plenty of common ground with Anderson's work: Families in turmoil, angst present in youth or the young at heart, quirky characters and dialogue. But while Anderson strives to create immaculate oil paintings of his movies, Baumbach isn't afraid to get his hands dirty.

In mid-1980s Brooklyn, a chain reaction is started when Joan Berkman (Laura Linney, "Mystic River") explores freelance writing — and soon achieves more success than her writer husband, Bernard (Jeff Daniels, "Pleasantville"). His jealousy causes their marriage to become increasingly unstable, until they finally have to announce their divorce to their two sons, the teenage Walt (Jesse Eisenberg, "Roger Dodger") and the younger Frank (Owen Kline, "The Anniversary Party"). Instead of either parent gaining custody, a ridiculously complicated plan is set up where Walt and Frank spend one day with their father and their mother the next. The rift between their parents takes its toll on the kids. Walt plagiarizes a Pink Floyd song and later sings it for a cash prize in a talent show (which he accepts with no traces of guilt), and has trouble being intimate with his new girlfriend and refraining from looking at other girls. Meanwhile, Frank, after seeing "Blue Velvet," imitates the habits of the film's eponymous villain (complete with a can of Pabst Blue Ribbon) and engages in sexual activity that rivals that of the kids in Solondz's "Happiness" in terms of unwatchable perversity.

Baumbach strips all the unnecessary (according to him) flourishes from his film — everything from original music to tripods for the cameras. Nothing is left but the barest of essentials, as evidenced by the film's length of 80 minutes. What's also notable is what was not taken out of the film — ambient noise, camera shake, all the marks of a homemade movie. The influence of the French new wave upon this film is palpable, and there's even a direct reference to Godard's "A Bout de Souffle" when an injured Bernard murmurs "degoulasse" to his ex-wife.

While the film focuses on the topic of divorce and asserts that "joint custody blows," there is little to suggest whether the film should be taken as a sermon against divorce. Rather, the film simply explores a possible aftermath of a divorce, and never implies that the consequences shown are the norm. The film was based upon Baumbach's own experience, and it is doubtful that he had any other goals other than to present the audience with a story from his past.

"The Squid and the Whale" stands in stark contrast to the gloss of Hollywood, which presents what can be accurately referred to as "optimum reality." The typical Hollywood movie glazes over the uncomfortable parts of life in an effort to show the viewer what she wished life could be like, pristine except for an easy-to-identify antagonist. Someone who has learned all he knows from high-budget Hollywood fare wouldn't know anything about problems with a first kiss, let alone premature ejaculation (provided he hasn't seen any teen sex comedies).

"Squid," however, is brutally honest about life, and is successful in entertaining the audience while presenting them with what they encounter every day, and not a polished, trumped-up version of it.

Jeff Daniels and Laura Linney star as a couple torn apart by jealousy over their success at work in Noah Baumbach's "The Squid and the Whale," which is produced by Wes Anderson, director of "The Life Aquatic."

Kweller and Nathanson show UMass next great Ben and Matt duo

By Allie Roth
Collegian Staff

Forget Affleck and Damon, there's a new Ben and Matt duo in town: Ben Kweller and Matt Nathanson. On Friday, they performed at the University of Massachusetts Campus Center Ballroom.

Matt Nathanson came on stage first, sporting a shirt of the band My Morning Jacket. He exhibited comedian-like banter in the midst of a seven-song set of old tunes and newer ones. Matt proclaimed to the audience that there was no place he'd rather be than in Amherst for the next 35 to 40 minutes, and then compared his music to an orgasm that "the whole audience would be achieving by 11 o'clock p.m."

He opened with "Bare" from the album "Beneath These Fireworks" and then went on to play "Church Clothes," "Car Crash," "Beni," "All Been Said Before" and "Lost Myself in Search of You." During the last song, "Answering Machine," he persuaded the audience to sing along to the chorus, "I can fall alone if all if I can fall away." At that point, the whole atmosphere became one of a campfire, just without the marshmallows or annoying bugs. He even prompted to ask if the house lights could be brought up so that he could "connect with the audience more." Matt's down-to-earth attitude allowed the audience to cozy up to him and his sweet songs.

After Matt's set, it was time for Ben Kweller. As the song "Blister in the Sun" by the Violent Femmes was blasted through the speakers, it seemed that no one knew what was going on, so everyone just sang along. All of a sudden, Ben danced on to the stage to applause and cheering. He first played his song, "BK Baby," which is an introduction tune that incorporates a verse of the song "Ice Ice Baby" by Vanilla Ice into its explanation of how Ben plans to "rock the mic like a vandal." He went right into "Walk on Me," followed by "Commerce, TX" and then moved to the keyboard and played "How It Should Be (Sha Sha)." After this song, he went back to the mic, with guitar in hand, sipping on some UMass water. Surprisingly, Ben quickly spit it out and tried to cover up his mistake by saying that the water was only truly enjoyed if spit out.

Kweller's set included a lot of moments of chit-chat. He disclosed a story about growing up in Texas and playing a game where they would throw pennies on the train track prior to playing a new song entitled "Penny on the Train Track." This song, along with another new song called "Fight," allowed his country boy side to shine through. In an interview with the Daily Collegian before the show, Ben disclosed that "art is a reflection of the artist's life ... the things you hear, see, touch, feel." It seems obvious that Kweller's Texas upbringing had an effect on the sound and subject of his new songs.

At one point in the set, Ben took requests from the audience. The audience called for everything from "Just Pretend" by The Bens, "Undone — The Sweater Song" by Weezer and "Free Bird" by Lynyrd Skynyrd. Oddly enough, Ben honored the request for Metallica. He turned it up to 11 and rocked out in a metal band-inspired way as he played "Enter Sandman." During this request time, he played "Lizzy," as well.

He closed out the set with "Problems," "Falling," "I Don't Know Why" and "The Rules." Ben left the stage briefly with only a slight wave of the hand. Moments later, he reappeared to play an encore of two songs starting off with "In Other Words." Ben shared how he had just become aware of the fact that Talib Kweli "borrowed" the chorus of "In Other Words" for his new song, "Miss Hill," without Ben knowing. It was quite the rap meets indie-pop conundrum. The encore ended with "Wasted and Ready," which was the perfect end to a perfect set, full of randomness and good music.

Ben Kweller played at the Campus Center on Friday night with Matt Nathanson opening up for him. Both put on a show displaying their humor and ability to please an audience.

Worcester DC offers up some of the best dining hall food at UMass

By Matt Baskin
Collegian Correspondent

This is part one in a series of reviews of UMass dining commons

From the wee hours of the morning to nightfall and beyond, Worcester Dining Commons bustles with human traffic.

Though most students head for the Hillside Room, equipped with wall-mounted flat screen TVs usually broadcasting sports or news in subtitles, many frequent the Oak Room, its downstairs counterpart. Scattered windows allow sunlight to brighten the Hillside Room, creating a cheery, sanguine atmosphere. Tables — some long and rectangular, others small and square — are equipped with reasonably comfortable chairs and make up the seating arrangements. That is, with the exception of a string of booths that extends along the back wall of the room. While the tables create a cafeteria-like atmosphere all too reminiscent of high school, the booths are a breath of fresh air and a small but sturdy confirmation that we have, in fact, graduated. The Oak Room features similar accommodations, but forgoes flat screen TVs in favor of faux leather upholstery on all booths, creating a ritzy atmosphere amidst the squalor of college life. Boisterous and animated, Worcester is not the dining hall for students seeking a quiet meal to study by. Dinner dates are not advisable, though neither are dates to dining halls in general. However, the hall makes for an excellent eating experience for large groups, small clusters and even the solo diner.

Worcester's service satisfies and often exceeds expectations. From the smiling UCard swipers to the student staff that often serves meals directly to diners as they pass down the line, Worcester's workforce is one to be reckoned with. One exception to this quality service exists, though: the faceless dish cleaners who receive used trays and plates. Represented only by their extremities due to the narrow tray return window, these staff members seem rushed and unfriendly.

Though their anonymity may play a role in this perceived lack of charm, the problem can ultimately be traced to Worcester's poor tray return setup. Diners must return trays in single file, pausing to remove any paper products and utensils and deposit them in the appropriate bins. As a result of this cumbersome process, many a hurried student will forego protocol and shove their tray into the return window without clearing it, forcing the staff to rush through the process themselves so as to be ready for the next tray, which will undoubtedly hold a fresh set of paper and utensils. This leaves little time for friendly interaction, and coupled with the fact that these staff members appear to be nothing but arms with a torso, damages Worcester's usually positive aura.

Worcester's narrow, single file food lines represent another ergonomic inefficiency. Though staffed by friendly, visible members of the student body, the process by which one must obtain food makes for a frustrating experience. Due to this setup, only one student can be served at a time, slowing down the process and creating a stressful segue into dining.

As far as food goes, though, Worcester trumps all. The Oak Room specializes in Asian cuisine and provides an abundance of quality international meals. While most dining commons simply offer up a dish or two with an Asian theme, the Oak Room offers a variety of dumplings, noodles and various spicy dishes every day, a breath of fresh air to students tired of downing the same stuff day after day.

For breakfast in the Hillside Room, offerings of dining hall staples such as French toast, kielbasa and scrambled eggs make up the commons' morning offerings. In addition, eight varieties of cereal, various fruits and breakfast pastries are available. Coffee, hot chocolate, milk, juice and, yes, soda, are neatly presented in the back of the room, between booth sections.

For lunch, a wide variety of foods that can at worst be labeled acceptable are offered. Hamburgers, though often dry and overcooked, are a popular selection. Hotdogs, which gleam an intimidating shade of purple, are not. Various chicken sandwiches await consumption in the same area. A station towards the end of the food line serves pizza, both regular and topped. Fries, sometimes spicy and sometimes regular, are offered daily as a side. Pasta dishes as well as vegan options, including delicious falafel balls, round out Worcester's lunch time selections, though specialty meals are served on a rotating basis.

Dinner culminates Worcester's daily culinary efforts. By now the sun has set and natural light has given way to its artificial counterpart, maintaining the commons' bright atmosphere. Though some lunchtime holdovers remain, such as pizza and those dreadful hamburgers, specialties reign supreme at dinner time. Depending on the night, various forms of steak, chicken, shrimp and other delicacies rare to the college world are served.

Though available in other campus dining halls, Worcester offers the best quality when it comes to these specialties. Usually absent of fat and always abundant in flavor, these dishes aim to please and succeed. Sides of vegetables, potatoes and other smaller items complement all main courses. Desserts such as ice cream, cake and various pastry bars provide tasty conclusions. As an added bonus, a popcorn machine stands near one exit, inviting diners to top off their dinner with a snack for the road.

Though not without flaws, Worcester Dining Commons represents the best of UMass' dining services. With two dining rooms, one specializing in non-Western foods and the other serving generally excellent traditional meals, Worcester leaves little room for improvement in terms of fare. Though some processes could be smoother, and some accommodations improved upon, Worcester should be commended overall for a job well done.

The Hillside Room is open Monday to Thursday 7 a.m. to 10 p.m., Friday 7 a.m. to 9 p.m. and 8 a.m. to 9 p.m. on weekends.

The Oak Room is open Monday to Thursday for lunch from 11:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. and dinner from 4:30 p.m. to 7 p.m., Friday for lunch from 11:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. and is closed on weekends.

Students line up to serve themselves dinner in the Hillside Room in Worcester Dining Commons.

If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!
Insurance Replacement Rates FREE PICK-UP
POTTERS AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL
• Direct Billing to Insurance Company
• Locally Owned & Operated
• 7 & 15 Passenger Vans
• UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates
North Amherst Motors
Collision Repairs & Glass Replacement
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
(413) 549-RENT (7368)
www.northamherstmotors.com
(One mile North of UMass - on bus route)

GRADUATING SENIORS
Be part of UMass Amherst history and have your photo and name recorded forever in university yearbook!
Senior picture Sittings begin on Monday December 5 2005 in the Campus Center
Log on to www.ouryear.com (UMass Amherst's code is 147) or call 1-800-OUR-YEAR to schedule an Appointment
Schedule for This Semester
December 5 to 9
- Campus Center RM 174 - 176
There will be more dates next semester
QUESTIONS? call 545-0848 or leave a message at our office 304 student union
INDEX UMASS YEARBOOK

ROADHOUSE C•A•F•E
The Roadhouse Cafe features
"WHERE BAY ROAD MEETS ROUTE 9"
A Healthy Place To Eat!
Organic fruits and vegetables
Healthy and nutritious homemade meals
Custom-baked cakes
Mention this ad and receive $1.00 off a breakfast special!
Sit by our cozy fire, enjoy great food, relax, and catch up on some reading. We are happy to serve you. The sky's the limit!
OPEN: Monday-Friday 6 to noon; Sat.-Sun. 7 to 2 p.m.
BELCHERTOWN, MA • 323-6175

555 deal
Three Medium One-Topping Pizzas $5 Each!
Domino's Pizza
413 - 256 - 8911

Bring this ad in for 1/2 off our panini!
Rao's Coffee Roasting Company
17 helleqq Ave. Amherst, MA 01002
(413) 253-9441
www.raoscoffee.com

Regency Hair Stylists
"Get a new look for fall"
$ 5.00 OFF a haircut
Monday - Thursday
Bring this ad and your Student ID.
Call for an appointment or stop by the salon
253 - 9526
189 N. Pleasant St
Amherst, MA 01002

THE SOURCE
(the sorz) n. key to discovering the weekly happenings of New England
Compiled by Monica Gleberman

MondayDecember5

"Credit Reporting and Scoring 101" will be in Flavin Auditorium in Isenberg School of Management starting at 7 p.m. Speaker Eric Ellman, Director of Government Relations for the Credits Data Information Association, will discuss the dangers of not knowing about personal credit and the immense impact this has on all of our lives.

"Incident at Oglala: The Leonard Peltier Story" will be showing in the Josephine White Eagle Cultural Center in Central. For more information call Tiffany Joseph at 545-4932.

"House of Desires" will be playing in the Rand Theater beginning at 8 p.m. This high comedy turns on one playwright's insights on love, honor and passion — not bad for a 17th-century nun celebrated as one of Mexico's great writers. For more information visit umass.edu/theater.

"The Miraculous in the Everyday" will be showing in the Fine Arts Center. This exhibition explores the work of three renowned conceptual and installation artists, Tom Friedman, Felix Gonzalez-Torres and Gabriel Orozco, whose use of modest, humble materials celebrate the mundane in contemporary life. For more information visit umass.edu/FAC/universitygallery.

TuesdayDecember6

STEM Eduction Institute Tuesday Seminar will be in Hasbrouck starting at 4 p.m. "Developing Diversity Sensitive Dispositions in Long Island Science Teachers" by S. Maxwell Hines, Secondary Science Education, Hofstra University. For more information visit umass.edu.

Turkish Movie Night: "Insaat (Under Construction)" in the Campus Center starting at 7:30 p.m. The Turkish movie "Insaat (Under Construction)," directed by Omer Vargi, will be shown by the Turkish Graduate Student Association. Free admission. For more information visit umass.edu.

"You Can't Judge a Book by Looking at the Cover" will be in Bowker Auditorium. In "You Can't Judge a Book by Looking at the Cover," Junebug Jabbo Jones is the narrator of stories, this time mostly about others, especially "Phillip Anthony Tatum, called 'Po' Tatum, because he liked to eat spuds." For more information call FAC at 545-2511.

WednesdayDecember7

Technology Innovation Challenge: Keynote Speaker on Quantum Investing will be speaking in the Isenberg School of Management 210 beginning at 5 p.m. Steve Waite will be the keynote speaker at the first annual Technology Innovation Challenge. Free admission.

"Double Band Spectacular" will be performing in the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall starting at 8 p.m. UMass Amherst Symphony Band and Amherst Regional High School Wind Ensemble join forces in concert. For more information call the FAC at 545-2511.

ThursdayDecember8

"Star of Bethlehem, Legacy of the Magi" will be given in the Newman Center starting at 3 p.m. Astronomer and priest Doug McGonagle discusses the subject of the book by Michael Molnar. First century Geo-politics, Hellenistic astrology and the Zoroastrian priesthood come together in a plot worthy of a Dan Brown novel. For more information visit umass.edu/catholic.

Tom Friedman Lecture and Opening Reception will be in the Fine Arts Center at 5 p.m. The University Gallery will host a lecture by artist Tom Friedman followed by the opening reception celebrating the exhibition "The Miraculous in the Everyday." For more information call the FAC at 545-2511.

"Evolution of New England Turtles" will be given in Morrill III starting at 5:30 p.m. Dr. Al Richmond will be speaking about the evolution of New England turtles. Free Admission. For more information contact Kevin Kao at (508) 207-0389.

2nd Annual Hanukkah Bash will be in the Campus Center beginning at 7 p.m. An amazing night of music, dancing, food, games and entertainment by two Jewish student groups: KOLOT and Track 5. For more information visit umass.edu.

FridayDecember9

UMass Photography Society will be in Flint Lab beginning at 10 a.m. This event is free admission. For more information visit www-unix.oit.umass.edu/~photosoc.

"The time has come to weigh those things..." will be displayed in the Student Union Art Gallery. Free admission. For more information contact Liz Unterman at 545-0792.

SaturdayDecember10

The Basement will be having the Lonesome Brothers performing at 8 p.m. There is no cover charge for this event. For more information about this concert visit iheg.com/basement_main.asp.

SundayDecember11

Percussion Ensemble In Concert will be playing in Bowker Auditorium at 8 p.m. A concert by UMass Amherst's dynamic Percussion Ensemble, with Eduardo Leandro conducting. For more information visit umass.edu/music/calendar.

World Sounds will be performing at the St. John's Episcopal Church beginning at 4 p.m. A concert of choral music from around the world by the UMass Amherst Chorale and Women's Choir. For more information visit umass.edu/music/calendar.

Cadwell Memorial Forest Winter Walk will be in Cadwell Memorial Forest beginning at 1 p.m. Learn to identify common trees, shrubs and birds during the winter. Free admission. For more information contact Brenda McComb at 545-1764.

Remembering singer Sam Cooke and his great ambitions

By Robert K. Elder
Chicago Tribune

CHICAGO — Sam Cooke was here.

Here, in Chicago, on the South Side's Bronzeville, Sam and his younger brother L.C. — the middle children of eight — sold the Chicago Defender door-to-door. It was here on 35th Street and Cottage Grove Avenue at the end of the streetcar line that a 12-year-old Sam sang Ink Spots songs, while L.C. passed the hat.

Sam Cooke — the 1950s-1960s pop and gospel star behind "Wonderful World," "Chain Gang" and "A Change Is Gonna Come" — is still here, in a sense. Though born in Mississippi, Sam spent his formative years in Chicago, singing in various gospel groups and performing for his minister father's congregation at Church of Christ (Holiness) in Chicago Heights.

But Sam had not only bigger aspirations, but a plan, says brother L.C., 72, sitting in Bronzeville's Negro League Cafe.

"He had 12 Popsicle sticks, and he'd stick 'em in the ground," L.C. remembers. "He'd say, 'L.C., this is my audience. I'm going to learn to sing in front of these sticks, so when I get older, I won't be afraid to sing for people.' And that's how he did."

It's this sense of Sam, this force of will and artistic drive, that attracted Peter Guralnick to write "Dream Boogie: The Triumph of Sam Cooke" (Little, Brown and Company, $27.95).

Sitting next to L.C. ("it don't stand for nothin'") in the Bronzeville restaurant, Guralnick says his research brought Cooke into sharp relief, especially when talking to friends and family.

"When they spoke of him, when they quote him — it's not their voice ... it's Sam's voice," he says. "He was as fresh to them today as he was then. They were still trying to communicate with him, to understand him. They knew him very well, but he was deep enough and he was complex enough that there were many avenues to explore."

In the follow-up to his seminal Elvis Presley biographies ("Last Train to Memphis" and "Careless Love"), Guralnick reveals Cooke as a civil rights pioneer and recording entrepreneur who, like Ray Charles, infused gospel sensibilities into pop music. Jimi Hendrix, Bob Dylan and Muhammad Ali ("This is the world's greatest rock 'n' roll singer," said the heavyweight champ of his friend) have walk-ons in the 750-page biography.

But Chicago itself is a central character in Cooke's early biography, as well as the Cook family history (Sam added an "e" to the end of his name because he thought it looked "classier." L.C. added the "e" shortly after).

Sam was a product of Bronzeville, "an instigator" who didn't always follow their father's strict dictums against sports and movies, L.C. remembers. Enterprising at an early age, Sam not only sold copies of the Chicago Defender, but persuaded his "gang" to tear the slats off backyard fences so he could sell the pieces to their owners as firewood.

Despite the mischief, Bronzeville of the early 1940s was a tight-knit community.

"Our little circle was Bronzeville, it wasn't Chicago," says L.C. "We had a block that we ruled. Just anybody couldn't come in our neighborhood."

Guralnick adds: "Everybody looked out for everybody. It was the same way Jesse Jackson talks about it ... if your momma and your papa weren't around, you had 12 mommas and papas."

"That's right," L.C. says. "'Cause everybody would whup ya, then take you home, and you'd get whupped again. In my neighborhood, everybody was your momma and your papa."

Guralnick and L.C., now a retired performer who lives in Calumet City, Ill., spark off of each other and finish each other's sentences like old friends, reflecting the 15 years Guralnick spent researching Sam's life. After completing "Careless Love," Guralnick spent the last "six or seven years," he says, writing and researching "Dream Boogie."

Though many of the Bronzeville landmarks Sam grew up with have since vanished, Guralnick and L.C. spent time driving around the old neighborhood, including 36th Street and Rhodes Avenue, where Sam was discovered by two teenage brothers in 1947. Lee and Jake Richards recruited the 16-year-old Sam to sing for a fledgling gospel quartet (eventually called the Highway QCs) after hearing him serenade a neighborhood girl with The Ink Spots' "If I Didn't Care."

Cooke left Highway QCs in 1950 to record with the Soul Stirrers, a seminal gospel group on a national contract with Specialty Records. Seven years later, he moved from Chicago to Los Angeles, where he jump-started his pop career with the hit "You Send Me."

To L.C., it was all part of a plan Sam concocted when he was 9 years old.

L.C., then 7, remembers Sam saying, "Hey man, I ain't never gonna work."

"I figured out the system," Sam said to L.C. "Look, man, the system is designed to keep you working from Friday to Friday. Come Friday, you're broke. The system isn't designed for you to keep no money. Come payday, you broke."

Sam told his brother, "I ain't gonna be broke, I'm gonna have money in my pocket every day ... I'm going to sing for a living."

And he did, eventually founding his own record and publishing companies. According to L.C., Sam found his true voice, his emotional release in music. Despite his charm, L.C. says, Sam didn't often express himself well outside his music.

Sam funneled his social conscience and frustrations with civil rights struggles into a final masterpiece, "A Change is Gonna Come," just before being shot to death by a night clerk at a $3 motel in the fringe of Los Angeles in 1964. Intoxicated and stoned at 2 a.m., Sam was furiously searching for the prostitute who had robbed him. Enraged by the theft, Sam flew at the female night attendant, who shot him through the lungs and heart with a .22 pistol.

"Lady, you shot me," Sam said.

He died at age 33.

Characteristically, Guralnick writes a detailed account of Sam's final hours but doesn't use the end to define the man. For his part, L.C. is happy to have the whole story told, to have his brother's legacy finally given its due.

"Sam wasn't no saint, but we tell it like it was," L.C. says.

But the biography's subtitle remains "The Triumph of Sam Cooke," not "Tragedy of." Sam should be credited for not only bringing sexuality to gospel music, but charging his rock 'n' roll with gospel sensibilities, Guralnick contends.

Peter Guralnick and L.C. Cooke hold a copy of Guralnick's biography of L.C.'s brother, legendary singer Sam Cooke.

MOUNT SUNAPEE • OKEMO
SHRED MARK
College Pass
MORE MOUNTAIN LESS MONEY
STRATTON
Only $299*
With a combined 1,437 rideable acres of terrain, 272 trails, 41 lifts, and 9 terrain parks, you can't beat this deal. Take a break from the books and get free with the Stratton/Okemo/Sunapee College Pass. Ski and ride three of New England's best mountains, with one pass, all season long for as little as $299. College students must provide proof of full-time status with documentation from the Registar's Office.
Purchase By 12/9/05
Good 7 Days A Week - No Blackout Dates
STRATTON 1.800.STRATTON STRATTON.com
OKEMO MOUNTAIN RESORT 1.800.78.OKEMO OKEMO.com
MOUNT SUNAPEE NEW HAMPSHIRE'S RESORT 1.603.763.2356 MOUNTSUNAPEE.com
* If purchased before 12.9.05. $399 thereafter. Tax not included. Must be 25 or under.

Derosa not slowing down

DEROSA from page 10

KAREN WINSLOW/COLLEGIAN

Christina Derosa's work ethic has paid off for her, as she continues to be the Minutewomen's top runner. The Sound Beach, N.Y. native placed 34th at the NCAA Regional meet.

best friends," Derosa says. "I've established good friendships and I'll probably know them forever."

The girls have pasta parties the night before every meet. Last year the Maroon and White had their pasta parties at Pasta e Basta in the center of Amherst. This year they're slurping pasta at the home of senior Jennifer Marine and junior Jenna Elznic.

Derosa liked coach LaFreniere and that was one of the main reasons why she came here. But what did LaFreniere think of her?

"She did not have a fantastic senior year, she went down from her junior year," LaFreniere says. "We signed her, she wasn't doing well, and so the red flag went up for me."

LaFreniere was worried about her addition, and then got some troubling e-mails from Derosa. So LaFreniere advised her to get her iron checked, and sure enough she was very much anemic. The doctors couldn't believe she was running, and it takes a good six to eight weeks to recover from iron therapy.

Derosa ended up losing her indoor season and didn't really want to participate in the outdoor season her senior year, but LaFreniere convinced her to because she missed her indoor season and she would be more prepared for when she would come to UMass and compete at the college level.

Derosa trusted LaFreniere already by this time that she asked her to coach her, and to apply the Minutewomen's workouts. LaFreniere suggested that she do her what her high school coaches recommended, and then Derosa ended up getting hurt and consequently had a bad outdoor season as well.

"So I went 'oh no', and more red flags went up...I signed a dud," LaFreniere says. "She was ready to go though, and the first day of practice she did great.

"Christina's a hard worker, she's very enthusiastic. She comes to practice with a very upbeat, positive attitude, and that helps with the whole atmosphere, makes the workout a lot more fun. She's not afraid to work hard. She's the type of athlete that goes to the meets and charges out there as long as she can hold on. She's very competitive, and very aware of who her competition is."

Derosa competes with sparkly ribbons in her long brown hair, which is quite notable from afar. She stands out, and according to LaFreniere, it matches her personality perfectly.

"She's a sparkly person," LaFreniere says.

Even when being asked questions about her, Derosa just won't stop talking about the team and their achievements and how they're improving. She is really a team player, a team player in a sport that many who are not close to the sport would know about.

"It really is a team sport," Derosa says. "If you can't do it for yourself, then you do it for your team. Get them to pass the next person."

Not only does Derosa help her fellow teammates out, but with her sparkling personality, she also helps the coaching staff.

"I love having her on the team; I'm enjoying the whole team. The team loves her, they're a tight squad, and she's a big part of that squad," LaFreniere says. "I honestly enjoy my job, but people like Christina make my job easier."

The Minutewomen are like family to Derosa, she bleeds Maroon and White, but speaking of blood, what about her real family? Did I say real family? What I meant to say was fans. Her parents, Anthony and Alice, are her number one fans and they try to make it out to as many meets as they can and they are far from those intensive parents you hear about on the news.

"They're really supportive," Derosa says. "They're more upset when I'm mad at myself. They remind me that it's just running."

So what's left for the future of this Minutewoman? Is she going to give the Energizer Bunny a run for its money after college?

"I would have to get a lot faster," Derosa says. "I want to compete after college in like marathons. But right now I'm just having fun."

LaFreniere in her 19 seasons at the helm of the UMass teams has coached some great runners, like Kelly Liljeblad who was the first UMass track and field All-American when she placed fifth in the 10,000 meter at the NCAA Championships in 1995. And she says that it all depends on where Christina's heart is, and if she wants to, then she's capable of doing so.

The best thing for Derosa, and the Massachusetts women's cross-country team, is that the squad (Derosa's best friends) is all coming back with the exception of one senior. That means more pasta parties and sparkly ribbons.

Minutewomen get dropped by Wildcats

W. HOOPS from page 10

but nothing has sunk in for this young squad.

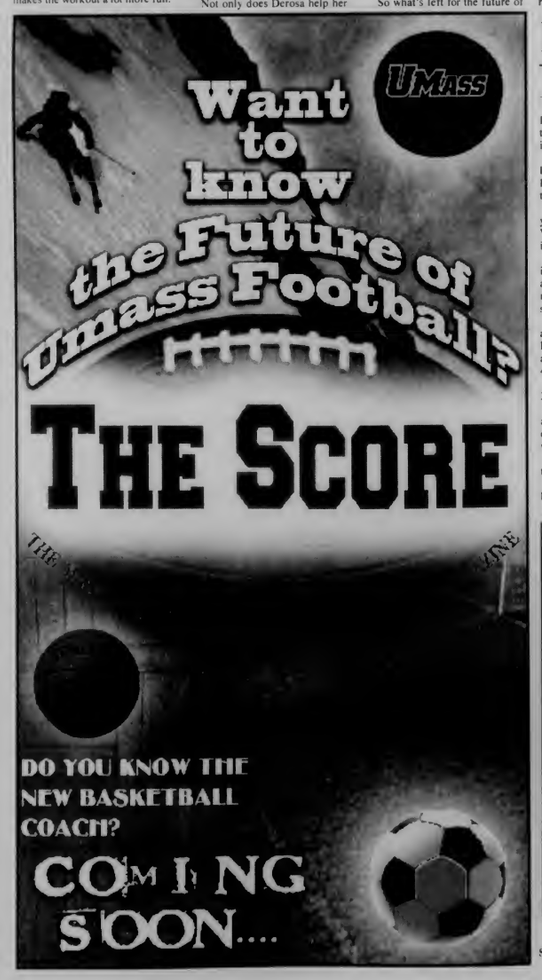
"They're working very hard and the payback isn't coming at game time," Dacko said. "We've got to find what's going on and we're looking for some leadership on the court. There's a lack of confidence due to the poor shooting performances. You've got to be able to knock down open shots."

Putting the ball in the basket seems like a pretty simple concept, and the benefits for a team that scores a lot may seem obvious. But for this squad it has been all mental, and the Minutewomen haven't had the luxury of consistent scoring this season. Dacko believes that seeing the ball go in will help UMass in several ways, including confidence and allowing her team to set up some different defensive sets — opposed to opposing teams running fast breaks of off UMass misses.

"I think mental imagery and visualization, and getting our players to believe in themselves [will help]," Dacko said. "I am someone who coaches with positive energy. I think mental imagery and visualization is going to be something that we have to incorporate.

"Being able to score, you're able to set up multiple defenses," she added. "Putting the ball in the basket does a whole lot for the team. For our team right now I think it would certainly help a great deal."

UNH set up a 2-3 zone against UMass yesterday, and the Minutewomen know that most teams will want to set up in a zone defense against them. But yesterday the Maroon and White committed 24 turnovers against the Wildcats and put themselves on the defensive from the start of the game.



"We can't afford to make those mistakes because we really have a hard time finding ways to score," Dacko said. "There wasn't a lot of pressure [on the ball], they were sitting back in a zone and we were playing against UMass. UMass was going against UMass."

The Minutewomen have to get out of their own way if they want to get a victory against a perennial powerhouse Boston College team on Thursday night at Conte Forum.

KAREN WINSLOW/COLLEGIAN

Sophomore Pam Rosanio totalled six points against UNH yesterday, but it proved to be not enough as the Wildcats knocked off UMass.

Patriots handle Jets in snow

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBOROUGH, Mass. – The New England Patriots won the battle of banged-up teams with contributions from two running backs who returned from injuries.

Corey Dillon scored on a 1-yard run and Kevin Faulk made three big third-down catches, leading New England to a 16-3 win Sunday over the New York Jets that kept the Patriots' AFC East lead at two games.

A Patriot who hasn't missed a game in his 10 years with the team set a club record for points. Adam Vinatieri kicked field goals of 21, 34 and 22 yards, giving him 1,134 points, four more than Gino Cappelletti.

Dillon missed the previous two games with a calf injury, and Faulk, his backup, sat out eight straight with a broken foot. They helped the Patriots (7-5), who have nine players on injured reserve, take control in a light snow that fell for much of the game.

The Jets (2-10) have 10 players on injured reserve and lost their seventh straight game while their NFL-low average dropped to 11.9 points a game. They managed only 164 yards against a team that allowed at least 400 in seven of its previous eight games.

But the Jets tied the game 3-3 on Mike Nugent's 38-yard field goal late in the second quarter.

With no timeouts, the Patriots faced a third-and-10 at the Jets 40. Tom Brady passed to Faulk, who raced out of bounds after an 18-yard gain, stopping the clock with 16 seconds left.

Three plays later, Vinatieri's 34-yard field goal put the Patriots ahead to stay.

The Jets punted on the first possession of the second half and the Patriots began on their 15. On third-and-11 at their 47, Brady and Faulk hooked up for a 13-yard gain. Dillon ran on the next two plays, gaining 11 yards.

On third-and-6 at the 25, a 10-yard pass to Deion Branch coupled with a roughing the passer penalty moved the ball to the 7. After a 6-yard completion to Troy Brown, Dillon scored his eighth touchdown of the season and finished with 65 yards on 16 carries.

Another third-down catch by Faulk kept alive the drive that ended with Vinatieri's last field goal, a 22-yarder with 14:02 left.

The Jets struggled on the ground with center Kevin Mawae and tackle Jason Fabini on injured reserve. They began the day with the NFL's third worst running attack and rushed for 41 yards. Former Patriot Curtis Martin was held to 29 yards on 15 carries, one week after becoming the fourth NFL player to rush for 14,000 yards in his career.

The Patriots have been hit hardest in the secondary, where six players are on injured reserve, and began the day with the second worst pass defense. But Brooks Bollinger, playing because of injuries to three other Jets quarterbacks, struggled.

He completed 15 of 37 passes for 135 yards, one week after throwing for a career-high 251 yards in a loss to New Orleans. Brady was 27-for-37 for 271 yards, a week after throwing four interceptions in a loss at Kansas City.

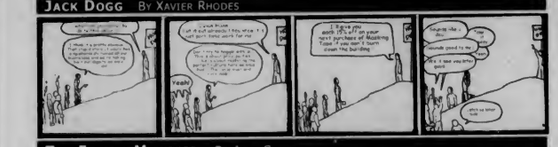
New York failed to score a touchdown for its fourth consecutive road game, and Martin didn't get into the end zone for his eighth straight game against New England.

The Patriots lead Miami (5-7) in the AFC East and end the regular-season at home Jan. 1 against the Dolphins.

JOHN SLEEZER/KANSAS CITY STAR

The Patriots held the lead in the AFC East yesterday as they ousted the Jets out of Gillette Stadium 16-3. Corey Dillon led the way with 65 yards rushing on 16 carries and one touchdown.

Pulp By Richard Martelly



Elsie Hooper By Robert D. Kryzkowski

Functional Dystopia By Zeid Rusan

Jack Dogg By Xavier Rhodes

The Family Monster By Josh Shalek

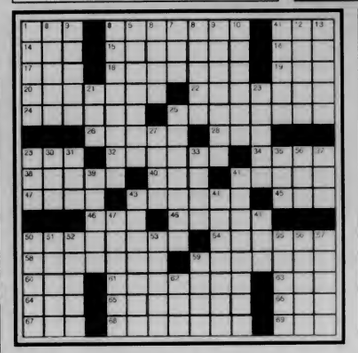
Quote of the Day

"If everyone demanded peace instead of another television set, then there'd be peace."

—John Lennon

ACROSS
1 Cookie holder
4 Wrecker's tool
11 Health club
14 Lemon drink
15 Female lead
16 Tentacle
17 Hep dude
18 Abnormal location of an organ
19 Fizzle out
20 Asian asses
22 Stunning
24 Capital of Colombia
25 Spiritual instructors
26 Like some cereals
28 Rolodex info
29 " Bravo"
32 Prime
34 Folk stories
38 Pulp writers
40 Set up a setup
41 Phooey
42 Not fooled by
43 Upper house
45 Heggard novel
46 Took off
48 Fireplace framework
50 Unfounded
54 Bribe successfully
58 Left on the plate
59 One who asserts without proof
60 Rural stopover
61 Asian expanse
63 Lilly or Whitney
64 Put a on it
65 New Jersey river
66 Pipe elbow
67 Plaines, IL
68 Do the town
69 Mingo or Maglie

DOWN
1 Man with a ladder
2 Hersey's bell town
3 Mark sale items
4 African predators
5 Repack for reshipping
6 Repast remnants
7 Court
8 Animal with two feet
9 Senile state
10 Brazilian port
11 Hawkins Dance
12 Monastery officer
13 Ending words
21 Sentimental drivel
23 Window bases
25 Finales
27 Bronte heroine
29 Greek letter
30 Writer McEwan
31 Halloween mo
33 Culture base
35 Sounds of surprise
36 Stadium shout
37 Wooly female
39 Divided nation
41 Peevish
43 Look down on
44 Dramatic scene
47 Clerical tables
49 Optic orb
50 Physique
51 Actress Potts
52 Dispatches
53 Trapper's device
55 Molding curves
56 Bub
57 Ruffled border
59 Regarding
62 Tumbler rim



Find today's answers online

www.dailycollegian.com

Don't like what you see? Draw your own!

e-mail collegiancomics@yahoo.com

Submit your comic!

e-mail collegiancomics@yahoo.com

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You'd have a lot more pencils if you'd learn not to share.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
You should definitely go with the black dress and strappy heals.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Let's just say you're elevator doesn't go to the top floor.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
It really isn't safe for you to have access to staplers.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
You will hook up with someone named Adam tonight.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Those chem goggles really look stunning on you.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You will discover at the age of 26 that you have an amazing super power.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Somehow you will pull off a decent GPA this semester.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
All that food you stole from the DC yesterday will be gone by tonight.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Don't fret, your future husband will find you.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Flip to the news section for a change. You might learn something.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You will dream about rainbows and unicorns tonight.

New in town?
Amherst Hairstylists
Caren's Place
You can trust us with your hair.
- Haircuts & Styling
- Hair Coloring (Free Highlighting Consultations)
- Multi-Color Highlighting
- Body & Facial Waxing
- For Both Men & Women
- Walk-ins Welcome

www.carensplace.com

Get it done right the first time!
Fall Semester Coupon Specials!
10$ Clipper Cut
Free blow dry with haircut (straightening extra) or 10% off a regularly priced cut.
10% Discount on Body & Facial Waxing
* only with this coupon *
debit - visa mc $
40 Main St. Downtown Amherst (Next to Northern Comfort)
Monday - Friday 10-6 Saturday 10-4
(413) 253-1200

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Announcements

Attention RSOs, Fraternities, Sororities, & Club Sports: Hosting an event? Big match coming up? Running a charity drive? Advertise it here! It's the inexpensive and effective way to get the word out. Call 545-3500 today!

Apartment for Rent

1, 2, 3 & 4 Bedroom spacious apartments. Great location, Bus Route, All utilities included No Fee Call 413-253-3000

Employment

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience nees. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

Employment

Winter Break Employment at the Boston University Bookstore! Many jobs are available through January. Stop by our JOB FAIR Dec.6 at the UMass Campus Center Concourse or email your resume to bnhmnres@bu.edu

Rent us your ears! Listening experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu Voicemail: 545-6837.

Happy Birthday

Wish your friends Happy Birthday in the Collegian! (413) 545-3500.

House for Rent

New Salem 3 Bdrm 10 Acres easy commute $1,000+ 549-4401

For January, 2-3 Bedroom house. Walking distance to Northampton Center, close to bus. 1,000 + utilities, no pets. Skibiski Realtor 586-1827

Lost and Found

ipod Found. 545-4369 ask for Ray

Room for Rent

413-335-5226 Mo. to mo. $325 inclusive 20 min to campus

Winter Break is fast arriving! Looking to sublet or have someone sublet your apartment? Advertise here in the classifieds! Special discounted rates for students. Call 545-3500 to place your ad today!

Room for Rent

Services

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance. 549-1906

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

Services

Computer Diagnostic Desktop $9.95 Laptop $39.95 413-584-8857

Travel

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

Wanted

Wanted: Your home-drawn comic strips! For publication in the Collegian. Submit your comics to collegiancomics@yahoo.com

Wanted

Leave your advertising needs to us!

Let our experienced advertising representatives and graphic artists take care of you!

Reach over 14,000 readers daily!

We offer a full range of ad sizes, as well as design services.

Contact our business department by calling (413) 545-3500. Or visit us in the Campus Center Basement.

Business Hours: M-F 8:30am - 3:30pm

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTSMONDAY

MONDAY, DECEMBER 5, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Derosa leads the way for UMass

By Joey White
Collegian Staff

On a calm and cool Saturday afternoon in the fall, you will find many New Englanders glued to their television sets watching the end of the baseball season and the beginning of the football season without the slightest worry of the outside world.

But if you listen carefully to what's outside your dorm room and building, you will hear a stampede. That stampede is the pitter-patter of over 200 pairs of shoes, and those shoes are on the feet of the Massachusetts women's cross-country team.

Watch closely, and the first pair of shoes you always see cross the line belong to Christina Derosa.

Derosa, a sophomore, has been the Minutewomen's lead runner every single meet she has ran. Derosa, who is originally from Sound Beach, N.Y., attended Miller Place High School and was an All-New York Cross-country runner as a junior and senior.

As a senior she was the captain for both the cross-country and indoor track teams and finished her senior season as the 19th ranked cross-country runner in New York.

Derosa, as she was known by her high school teammates and is still called by her college teammates, led her track teams to two league championships and guided her cross-country team to four county titles (eight consecutive for the program, but was not able defend the year after Derosa graduated).

Derosa admits that she is not a physical athlete, which is why she never got into soccer or field hockey. She started running in junior high school.

"I just always liked it and always had fun with it," Derosa says. "All my friends stopped after high school, but I love to compete. I couldn't do college without a sport."

Derosa, who is an exercise science major and wants to get into the field of sports physical therapy, was not actually recruited by UMass. She decided to swing by the campus as she was visiting other colleges that included Boston College and Northeastern, and she liked the school and coach Julie LaFreniere so much that she decided to enroll and signed on in November of her senior year in high school.

"It just felt right, I didn't put much thought into it. It seemed like a good fit," Derosa says.

A good fit is an understatement — it's been more or less a perfect fit for Derosa at UMass, as she has been the first to cross the finish line for the Maroon and White in every race.

In her freshman season as a Minutewoman she had three top ten finishes highlighted by a first-place mark at the UMass Invitational where she ran an 18:12 on the home course. She was twice named Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week when she placed 25th overall at the New England Championships and also when she recorded a ninth-place finish at the Albany Invitational.

Derosa finished second overall at the Syracuse Orange Classic with a time of 19:33.14 and ran a 22:45.3 at the NCAA Northeast Regional meet to finish 63rd overall. She just missed Atlantic 10 All-Conference honors as she finished 12th overall at the league meet running an 18:35.

As for a sophomore slump, the 5'3" New Yorker seems to not be choking in her second year in the Maroon and White. At the Dartmouth Invitation (9/10) she finished 14th with a time of 20:29.3. A week later UMass hosted Maine and Vermont at Amherst College due to the home course under construction, and Derosa finished second overall with time of 19:07. With a time of 22:02.9 at the Paul Short Invitational she placed 75th and at the New England Championships she recorded a 21st place finish; both meets featured over 300 runners.

Why is Derosa so successful? What keeps those little feet going and going and going like the Energizer Bunny? What's the key that fits in the hole so well for her as a Minutewoman? And the answers to those questions are the other Minutewomen and the friendships she has gained from running at UMass.

"I'm really happy to come to team here," Derosa says. "I know a lot of people who don't enjoy it anymore. I'm doing well because of the friendships, I wouldn't be as successful without them."

If you are not a collegiate athlete, or do not know or talk to collegiate athletes, you may not know how much work they put in and how much they see their teammates. Derosa and the Minutewoman cross-country team are running miles while the rest of the campus is sleeping and dreading the day of classes ahead. They wake up at 6 a.m., they train together, they push each other, they hang out with each other, and they care for each other.

"I have a lot of fun, they're my

See DEROSA on page 8

KAREN WINSLER/COLLEGIAN

Sophomore distance runner Christina Derosa has been the No. 1 runner for the Minutewomen since her arrival to UMass as a freshman. Derosa is on the cross-country, indoor track and outdoor track teams.

Minutewomen slashed

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team (2-5 0-0 Atlantic 10) is struggling right now. It dropped another game yesterday at the hands of the New Hampshire Wildcats, 59-43, and the Minutewomen were down by 27 at one point in the game.

The defeat came on the heels of a heartbreaking loss against the Hofstra Pride on Thursday, after UMass climbed back to within one point of the Pride, overcoming a 14-point halftime deficit. A baby hook-shot by sophomore Kate Mills to take the lead hit the back rim and bounced out, and then it was off to UNH for the seventh game of the season and the first on UMass' five-game road trip.

The Minutewomen were down by nine at halftime against the Wildcats and shot 35 percent from the field in the first half. But New Hampshire buried UMass with an 18-0 run to start the second half and increasing the UNH lead to 27.

Games have become out of hand at times for the Minutewomen this season. They have frequently sat on big leads and let teams crawl back into games (Holy Cross), or they have let opposing teams build leads only to pick up the intensity later in the game (Hofstra).

UNH	59
UMass	43

Some teams that have these kinds of lapses are able to get away with it because of talent, but for a UMass team that has shooting troubles, big deficits will not bode well for the win-loss record.

"We're really struggling," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said after yesterday's loss. "Our practices are pretty good. We're going hard at practice and it's not translating."

Dacko has addressed these lapses with her team, and has made a concerted effort (including devoting entire practices to it) to have her team show emotion and play with energy. She said that the Minutewomen have been working hard in practice,

See W. HOOPS on page 8

KAREN WINSLER/COLLEGIAN

Despite her seven points and two steals, junior Tamara Tatham and the UMass women's basketball team fell to UNH 59-43 yesterday.

Diving teams take control at meet

By Joey White
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's and women's diving squads went into the Rutgers Super Splash Invitational not knowing what to expect, but in the end came out with their heads above water.

This individual "spotlight" two-day meet featured only one other Atlantic 10 Conference team besides UMass, and that was La Salle. Other schools that competed were Drexel, UConn and Columbia.

"[It was the] only championship-like meet before the A-10, [and was] a great meet to be in this early in the year," UMass diving coach Mandy Hixon said. "It was really good for them to be in a meet like this, it is a higher quality meet than the A-10."

UMass will not return to action for another month when they travel to San Juan, Puerto Rico Jan. 7 to compete at the Sacred Heart Invitational.

The only winner for the Maroon and White came on Friday when sophomore Reuben Rappe scored his personal best on the three-meter dive with a score of 301.70. On Saturday, Rappe placed fifth out of 27 divers on the one-meter (272.80). Also diving for the Minutemen was junior Kirk Scimone who placed 13th on both the high and low boards scoring 338.50 and 218.85, respectively.

"Both [Rappe] and [freshman] Karen [Lipperco] almost beat the school record," Hixon said. "Which is pretty amazing for a meet like this."

The Minutewomen dove off the low board on Friday and the high board on Saturday. Upperco placed fifth on the one-meter and third on the three-meter with scores of 227.75 and 465.55, respectively.

"I was just really impressed," Hixon said about Upperco's first championship-like performance. "It was a situation where she had to dive well under pressure. She was just terrific and a great competitor."

Also plunging in the water for the Minutewomen were freshman Sarah Horstmann, and juniors Melissa Pond and Mary Jenkins. Horstmann finished 13th on the one-meter (177.35) and 15th on the three-meter (311.20). Pond placed ninth on both boards, with a score of 188.25 on the one-meter and 358.65 on the three-meter. Jenkins earned a fifth-place spot on the three-meter with a score of 397.05.

Only one diver on the weekend from the A-10 rival, La Salle, placed ahead of the Maroon and White.

With this meet under her belt now, Hixon says that it helped her see where her team stood at this point in the season and what they need to improve on come the end of the season for A-10 Championships and the NCAA Zone Qualifying Meet.

UM women's track turns in mixed results at invitationals

By Domenic Poli
Collegian Staff

Members of the Massachusetts women's track team had their hands full last weekend at the Rhode Island Pentathlon in Kingston, R.I., on Friday and the Northeastern Invitational in Boston on Saturday.

The only runners to go to Rhode Island were the team's multi-eventers, sophomores Jennifer Curtin and Amanda Griffin, and senior Ashley Creel, who finished seventh, ninth and 12th.

This meet marks the first of the 2005-06 season for the Minutewomen.

"Nobody qualified for [the] New England [Championships] and that was their goal," UMass coach Julie LaFreniere said.

However, LaFreniere seemed a little happier about the "good performances" at the Northeastern Invitational on Saturday.

She mentioned the work of sophomore Christina DeRosa, who won the 5,000-meter event with a time of 17:30, which qualifies her for both the New England Championship on February 24 and 25, and the ECAC Championships on March 4 and 5.

"That's coming off a strong cross-country season, and that's a big, huge [personal record] for [Derosa]," LaFreniere said.

The coach also commented on grad student Marissa Callahan and senior Elisabeth Budd.

Callahan, an aspiring neurosurgeon, won the triple jump event with a mark of 34.10 feet — a new personal record. The Bagkok, Thailand native is participating in her last year at UMass, and is currently a graduate student.

Her performance on Friday was Callahan's best since recording a jump of over 37 feet during last season's A-10 championships. Prior to Friday's meet, that was her personal-best.

Budd, a psychology and history double major, placed second overall in the 500 meter event, with a time of 1:17.36.

"Basically, [those were] the most outstanding events," LaFreniere said.

The Invitational did hold some disappointment, however. Sophomore Kristen Bakanowski, a pole-vaulting extraordinaire, failed to clear the 11.5-foot jump in her competition.

"That's not good for her, Kristen is capable of jumping, you know, twelve feet and over, so she's upset," LaFreniere said. "She's not using this as an excuse or anything, but I know she hasn't felt well. She's going to see a doctor tomorrow."

Bakanowski is not the only Minutewoman feeling a little under the weather.

"I had a lot of people not come this weekend," LaFreniere said. "We're not very healthy right now. We have a lot of ear infections, [mononucleosis], and sore throats, so there's a virus that's been going around."

The Minutewomen's next race is not until Jan. 18, but the coach knows exactly what her team's training regimen will be.

"We have one more week of practice that we're aloud to have," LaFreniere said. "So this week will be the last week, and then the students are going to be taking their finals and we bring the kids back [to practice] on January 15, but we send them home with workouts that they're expected to do and when they come back."

The Minutewomen have seven more meets before heading to Kingston, R.I. for the A-10 championships on Feb. 18.

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Senior Elisabeth Budd grabbed second-place in the 500 meter event with a time of 17.14. Budd is a two-time A-10 All-conference selection.

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Tuesday, December 6, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXVI Issue 60

Candidate for vice chancellor holds forum

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

The second of three candidates for the new post of the associate vice chancellor for the Center for Student Development at the University of Massachusetts held the second of the three scheduled open forums yesterday afternoon in the Campus Center.

One of the candidates, Byron Bullock, currently the dean of enrollment management at St. Augustine's College in Raleigh, North Carolina, said that he was drawn to UMass because it's "going in the right direction" concerning not only student issues, but issues of diversity as well.

"UMass has a vision to improve diversity. There are many institutions that deal with issues differently, won't take the next step to the point of inclusion," said Bullock. "The Center for Student Development is a great idea to infuse a new idea and a give the institution a chance to take the next step."

The CSD, which has replaced the Student Activities Center as part of the Campus Action Plan formulated last spring, aims to retain the Student Activities Center's commitment to RSO support while consolidating administrative support and increasing collaboration with event planning and academic affairs to make events highly efficient and more rewarding.

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Michael

See CANDIDATE on page 2

Students race to benefit women's organization

By Meghan Murphy
Collegian Staff

More than 750 walkers and runners came out on Saturday to benefit Safe Passage by participating in the Second Annual Mayor Higgins Hot Chocolate Run.

The event consisted of two races, a two-mile walk and a five-kilometer run, on specified routes around Northampton. Both started in front of the People's Institute on Gothic Street.

"[The Hot Chocolate Run] netted more than $12,000 for Safe Passage," said Marian Kent, executive director at Safe Passage. "We had twice as many runners this year than last year … and 50 percent more walkers."

The proceeds from the Hot Chocolate Run benefited Safe Passage, an organization that "has empowered women who have experienced domestic violence to make informed choices for themselves and their children" since 1977, according to its brochure.

"People in the community tend to think of us as an organization that provides shelter for battered women and their kids," said Kent. "But we also provide a wide range of other services … [a] 24-hour hotline, individual and group counseling including a focus on Spanish-speaking women and women with disabilities, services for children who have witnessed domestic violence, on-call advocates who are available to victims of domestic violence, police calls [and] legal services."

Safe Passage also recently began a program with the Men's Resource Center for Change in Amherst in which "men from the Men's Resource Center will come to our shelter to mentor and provide positive male role models for boys residing there," said Kent. She says it is "crucial for men and women to work together against domestic violence."

People gathered from all over Western Massachusetts to run, walk, or even cheer on the Hot Chocolate Run despite the flurries of snow. Participants included families, high school track and cross country teams, young children and even dogs.

There were many students and faculty from the University of Massachusetts who braved the cold as well. Sisters Elisabeth and Sarah Krill, UMass students, participated in the run.

"It was my first race, so it was a really great way to get involved with the community as well as support a really wonderful cause," said Elisabeth. "I wasn't expecting it to be that cold, but the hot chocolate was a perfect alternative to water after the race."

The event was emceed by 93.9 The River's Kelsey Flynn. Along with the music, walkers and runners enjoyed food and hot chocolate. Many received mugs designed by cartoonist Hilary B. Price, and children were given stickers and balloons.

Prizes were awarded to top-finishing men and women from the under-40 and 40-and-over groups in the five-kilometer run, including hotel stays, running shoes, gift certificates and even a half-hour massage.

Top high school and middle school runners were also awarded prizes donated by local businessman Jonathan Wright of Wright Builders, dentist and Northampton High School track coach Jim Clayton and Northampton Running Company.

According to Kent, the Hot Chocolate Run and a "spring gala featuring entertainment and a silent auction" are the two major fundraising events of the year, and she stressed the importance of both to the survival of the center.

"Fundraising is a huge thing for us — we have a large fundraising goal for the year. Over $100,000 of our budget has to be raised directly by our staff and board through fundraising," she said.

"We've been successful so far this year, and it's very important."

MEGHAN MURPHY/COLLEGIAN

Runners participate in the Second Annual Mayor Higgins Hot Chocolate Run, to raise money for Safe Passage, an organization that helps victims of domestic abuse.

Condoleeza Rice defends US terrorism policy

By Anne Gearan
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice turned the tables on European critics of tough U.S. tactics in the war on terror Monday, maintaining that intelligence gathered by the CIA has saved European as well as American lives.

Responding for the first time in detail to the outcry over reports of secret CIA-run prisons in European democracies, Rice said the United States "will use every lawful weapon to defeat these terrorists."

In remarks delivered as she got ready to leave on a trip to Europe, she steadfastly refused to answer the underlying question of whether the United States had CIA-operated secret prisons there.

"We cannot discuss information that would compromise the success of intelligence, law enforcement, and military operations. We expect other nations share this view," Rice said in a statement at suburban Andrews Air Force Base, Md.

President Bush has denied that the United States engages in torture in the war against terrorists, but Rice's statements Monday represented the most detailed public comment the administration has yet offered on this vexing issue.

Information gathered by U.S. intelligence agencies from a "very small number of extremely dangerous detainees," the secretary said, has helped prevent terrorist attacks and saved lives "in Europe as well as in the United States and other countries."

She provided no specific examples of instances where the CIA had foiled terrorist plots. But in October, the White House said the United States and its allies have prevented at least 10 major plots by Al Qaida in the last four years, including plans to use hijacked planes to target the West Coast in 2002 and the East Coast in 2003 and another to bomb several locations in Britain in 2004.

The State Department, meanwhile, said it was difficult to be specific about lives being saved because of the nature of intelligence.

Spokesman Adam Ereli said "the point the secretary was trying to make is that the cooperation we have with our European partners and with our partners throughout the world has resulted in our frustrating the planning and operations and attacks of terrorists, including in Europe."

Ereli declined also to say whether the United States operates secret prisons. "There is information that we just don't discuss," he said.

Reports of the existence of the secret prisons has caused a trans-Atlantic uproar. The European Union has asked the Bush administration about these reports.

By suggesting whatever the United States did had the cooperation of European nations, Rice may have imposed pressure on their governments to explain to their people whether they violated national or international laws.

And that could make Rice's stops in Europe even more difficult.

"It is up to those governments and their citizens to decide if they wish to work with us," she said, "and decide how much sensitive information they can make public."

"They have a sovereign right to make that choice," she said.

British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said Monday that Rice's comment "makes clear" that the United States does not torture its detainees and said, "All of us must work together within the rule of law to use every tool at our disposal" to counter terrorism.

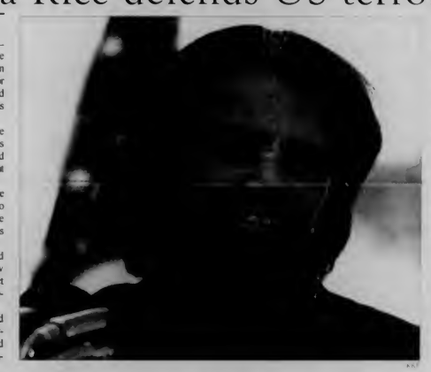
Britain sent a two-paragraph letter to Washington late last month demanding more information about reports that the CIA detained and interrogated terrorism prisoners in Soviet-era compounds in Eastern Europe.

In Germany, her first stop, a government spokesman, Ulrich Wilhelm, said his government had a list of more than 400 overflights and landings by planes suspected of being used by the CIA. He told reporters "we are hoping that all of the facts will be discussed" by Rice with Chancellor Angela Merkel.

Rice said the United States does not permit or tolerate torture under any circumstances.

"The United States has fully respected the sovereignty of other countries that have cooperated in these matters," the secretary said. "The United States is a country of laws. My colleagues and I have been sworn to protect and defend the Constitution of the United States. … The United States must protect its citizens."

The reference to sovereignty implies that any European democracies that may have provided secret prisons did so willingly.



"So now before the next attack," Rice said, "we should all face the hard choices that democratic governments face."

Human rights organizations and legal groups, both in the U.S. and abroad, have accused the United States of allowing a practice known as "rendition to torture," in which suspects are taken to countries such as Egypt and Saudi Arabia where harsh interrogation methods are used.

Rice did say the United States has long participated in the movement of terror suspects between countries.

European governments have expressed outrage over reports of a network of secret Soviet era prisons in Eastern Europe where detainees may have been harshly treated and that flights carrying al-Qaida prisoners went through European airports.

In Berlin, a government spokesman said Monday that Germany has a list of more than 400 overflights and landings by planes suspected of being used by the CIA that it plans to ask Rice about during her visit to the German capital.

AP

Secretary of State Condoleeza Rice, shown here during a press conference. Rice has defended the tactics of the United States against terrorism.

MA father accidentally shoots son

WARE, Mass. (AP) — The father of a 10-year-old killed in a hunting accident said the boy was shot as the two descended a hill and the elder man slipped. The shotgun he was carrying went off, striking the boy in the back.

"I was sliding," Raymond J. Libby Jr., of Ware, told The Republican newspaper on Sunday, a day after his son died during a father-and-son outing.

"That's when the gun went off. It hit some branches. I didn't have my hand on the trigger … I jumped up quick and I ran to him before he collapsed."

Libby asked his son, Raymond J. Libby III, if he was hit, and his answer "yes" would be the last word the father would hear him say.

He said he carried the boy at least 200 yards to the area where their truck was parked, where another hunter who heard the shot was emerging from the woods in the town of Hampden, south of Springfield. That man used his cell phone to call for help.

Hampden police, who received a 911 call at 9:30 a.m., said the fourth-grader was pronounced dead at Baystate Medical Center.

"He was my hunting and fishing buddy," the father said. "I mean, he always waits for me after work."

Police were investigating, but said it appeared to be an accident.

The father said the safety on his shotgun was on as he and his son, who carried a BB gun, went down the hill. The elder Libby said the boy always walked behind him, but had gotten ahead when the father slipped and fell Libby and his wife also have a 12-year-old daughter, Amber.

— Associated Press

Cha-cha-cha...
Members of the University of Massachusetts Ballroom Dance Club teach students the Cha-cha at their final meeting of the year.

Former 9/11 panel: US not ready for future attack

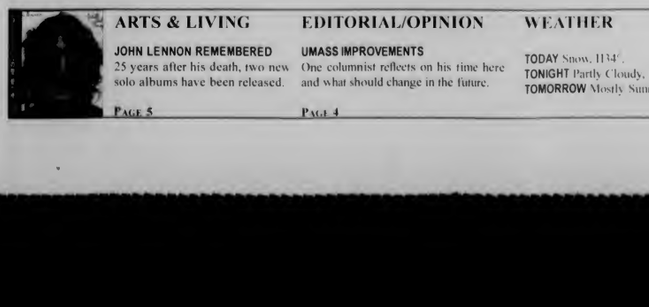
By Lara Jakes Jordon
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Time, money and ever-present terror threats have done little to close gaping holes in the nation's security system, the former Sept. 11 Commission said Monday in accusing the government of failing to protect the country against another attack.

The panel cited disjointed airplane passenger screening methods, pork-barrel security funding and other problems in saying the Bush administration and Congress had not moved quickly enough to enact the majority of its recommendations of July 2004.

"We're frustrated, all of us — frustrated at the lack of urgency in addressing these various problems," said Thomas Kean, a Republican and former New Jersey governor who was chairman of the commission.

"We shouldn't need another wake-up call," Kean said. "We believe that the terrorists will strike again; so does every responsible expert that we have talked to. And if they do, and these reforms that might have prevented such an attack have not been implemented, what will our excuse be?"



Rather than disbanding like most federally appointed commissions when their terms expire, Kean and the other nine commissioners continued their work as a private entity called the 9/11 Public Discourse Project.

Wrapping up more than three years of investigations and hearings, the former commission issued what members said was their final assessment of the government's counterterror performance as a report card. It gave failing grades in five areas, and issued only one "A" — actually an A-minus — for the Bush administration's efforts to curb terrorist financing.

The five "F"s were for Failing to provide a radio system to allow first responders from different agencies communicate with each other during emergencies.

See COMMISSION on page 2

ARTS & LIVING
JOHN LENNON REMEMBERED
25 years after his death, two new solo albums have been released.
PAGE 5

EDITORIAL/OPINION
UMASS IMPROVEMENTS
One columnist reflects on his time here and what should change in the future.
PAGE 4

WEATHER
TODAY Snow, H34°, L27°
TONIGHT Partly Cloudy, L18°
TOMORROW Mostly Sunny, H31°, L11°

SPORTS
BREAKING ONTO THE SCENE
Freshman Chris Lowe has made an impact in his first season with the Minutemen.
PAGE 10

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Michael Busack
Managing Editor Cameron J. Woods
Business Manager Hirak Shah
Production Manager Nicholas Belanger
Night Supervisor Sheryl Wolnik
Advertising Manager Kerry O'Grady
Advertising Production Lauren Egavian
Editorial Production Amanda Allen
Arts & Living Editor Matthew O'Rourke
Comics Editor Amanda Allen
Editorial Editor Allison Edles
News Editor Dan O'Brien
Photo Editor Kate Sachenmaier
Sports Editor Jeff Howe
Circulation Manager Thomas Hecht
Distribution Manager Nick Gleason
Finance Manager Daniel Conti
Human Resource Phil Smoller
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Carrin Terrorici
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Asst. Arts & Living Mackenzie Isler
Asst. Arts & Living Ian Jones
Assistant News Megan Daly
Assistant News Marnie Bellowau
Assistant Photo Elizabeth Caristi
Assistant Sports Eric Athas
Assistant Sports Dan Duggan
Assistant Editorial Kristen LaCasse

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the The Weekly Collegian in 1956. Published daily since 1967, The Collegian has been broadsheet since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call weekdays between 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Cameron J. Woods
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Julie Teese
COPY EDITOR
Katie Huston
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Nick Belanger
PRODUCTION STAFF
Tiffany Van Langen, Jessie Sussman

Vice chancellor candidate talks to students in open forum

CANDIDATE from page 1

Gargano says that the new Center for Student Development is designed to create opportunities for students.

The candidate hired will be asked to lead and control the CSD entity.

When asked if he was concerned about coming from St. Augustine's College, which has a current student population of 1400, to a much larger university, Bullock explained that he spent over five years as associate vice president for student affairs at James Madison University, which had an enrollment of over 15,000 students.

"Similar with UMass, at JMU we held a very small but significant minority population of 800 to 900 students," said Bullock.

Bullock also expressed his advocacy for Greek life. Bullock, who developed the Greek consul at JMU, claimed that he planned to suggest fraternities promote their organizations collectively.

"We need to preach our own story. We need to promote our service projects or fundraising efforts through a newsletter or Web site," said Bullock.

Bullock had great success organizing and improving Student Affairs in his creation of the Virginia Student Transition program at JMU. The program took "at-risk" students, students that were normally accepted into the University, but raised concern within the admissions committee of what their "success rate" would be, which was determined by the students' scholastic aptitude test scores or the educational quality of their high school.

The students were required to take two credit-based courses during the summer. The six-week session was designed to have speakers meet with students explaining the various academic processes such as the registar's office and financial aid process.

"At the end of the program, those students were 'super freshmen,'" said Bullock. "Statistically, the students held a stronger graduation rate compared to students that had not taken the course, and, as an added perk, developed relationships with not only the administrative staff, but their peer group from the session as well."

"Helping students from the onset gives them a head start, to get comfortable in the environment," Bullock said.

Bullock also expressed his desire to understand and listen to what students want.

"I am a student advocate, so I can't be effective in what I do unless I understand what students think," said Bullock. "I need to interact with students. I want to sit in on student government meetings."

Bullock also expressed some of his concerns with the UMass administration.

"We've got some people that have been here a long time, resistant to change, helping them understand that change in inevitable," said Bullock.

But Bullock did state that, while change is inevitable, he cannot make the final call.

"I can't make the administration change, but I can provide them with the info to help them in the right direction," said Bullock.

Bullock lived in Hartford, Connecticut for nearly five years and has lived in Raleigh, North Carolina for the last six years.

US is not prepared for terrorist attacks

COMISSION from page 1

—Distributing federal homeland security funding to states on a "pork-barrel" basis instead of risk.

—Failing to consolidate names of suspicious airline travelers on a single terror watch screening list.

—Hindering congressional oversight by retaining intelligence budget information as classified materials.

—Failing to engage in an alliance to develop international standards for the treatment and prosecution of detained terror suspects.

The panel, which has operated as a nonprofit group since disbanding last year, also gave the government 12 "D"s and "B"s, nine "C"s and two incomplete grades.

Congress established the commission in 2002 to investigate government missteps that led to the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. Nearly 3,000 people were killed when 19 hijackers organized by al-Qaida flew airliners into New York City's World Trade Center and the Pentagon and caused a crash in the Pennsylvania countryside.

Asked about the panel's final report, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said, "It's important to look at some of what they're talking about."

He also related the commission's findings to the administration's campaign in Iraq. "By taking the fight to the enemy abroad, and by doing so, that is keeping them from plotting and planning to attack inside America," McClellan said.

On Capitol Hill, Republican and Democratic lawmakers alike agreed that Congress has not done enough to shore up security. Many lawmakers focused on the security funding formula to states — an annual fight between the House and the Senate.

The former commission endorsed the House plan, which distributes money first by risk. By contrast, the Senate proposal — approved by 71 senators as part of an appropriations bill — allocates money by risk only after all states are ensured funds.

The Homeland Security Department awarded $2.5 billion in security grants to states last year.

Studies show final exams add to daily stress

By Meehala Sofsky
The Daily Athenaeum (West Virginia U.)

MORGANTOWN, W.Va. — With the stress of finals mounting, it's almost impossible for West Virginia University students to ignore the toll it takes on the mind and body.

For most students, college is a transitional phase that can often become more than they can handle.

Trying to juggle work, school, sports and often many other outside activities, students can become overwhelmed by many stressors, spanning from financial anxiety to tension with a roommate.

According to Dr. Sue Hodgeson, a staff member at the WVU Carruth Center for Counseling and Psychological Services, experiencing stress is a daily occurrence from which no one is exempt.

Everything from getting out of bed in the morning to going to sleep at night involves a certain amount of stress.

Over the years, a stigma has grown around simply asking for help. According to Catherine Yura, Ed.D. and director of the Carruth Center, this problem has become a concern that isn't easy to ignore. "Students need to understand that this is a transitional period where they are vulnerable," Yura said. "Asking for help at this time in your life is normal."

The Carruth Center at WVU houses a confidential program focused on helping students recognize their own stressors and make the necessary changes to find healthy coping mechanisms using their own values.

Anxiety is most often caused by many of the stressors of daily life, and even though there are places to go for help, there are many ways to recognize stress individually.

The symptoms of anxiety can range from muscle tension to heart palpitations to backache and are often easy to identify.

Psychologists at the Carruth center believe it is important for people to know that these normal stresses can sometimes become extreme and can also be the reason that students drop out of school or turn to unhealthy coping methods for relief.

KRT

Pennsylvania State College students Kim Powell and Kristen Bocar study for final exams. Studies have shown that final exams add to the daily stress for students.

Hofstra University offers you a future of excellence.

- With more than 140 unique programs in five schools, Hofstra has a program for you in:
  Frank G. Zarb School of Business: M.B.A., M.S., Executive M.B.A. and advanced certificate programs
  School of Education and Allied Human Services: M.A., M.H.A., M.S.Ed., Ed.D. and advanced certificate programs
  Hofstra College of Liberal Arts and Sciences: M.A., Au.D., Ph.D. and advanced certificate programs
  School of Communication: M.A. in Speech Communication and Rhetorical Studies
  New College: M.A. in Interdisciplinary Studies
- With an outstanding, dedicated and accomplished faculty and state-of-the art educational facilities, Hofstra's resources are among the finest in the country.
- Hofstra is ranked 14th on The Princeton Review's ranking of America's Most Connected Campuses.
- A student-faculty ratio of 14 to 1.
- New technologically-advanced facilities in Hagedorn Hall and C.V. Starr, such as SMART Board™ interactive whiteboards and wireless locations.
- And our location, 25 miles from Manhattan, affords students a suburban setting within an easy commute to the resources of New York City.

For more information, or to arrange a campus tour:
Hofstra University Graduate Admissions
105 Memorial Hall
126 Hofstra University
Hempstead, NY 11549
Phone: 1-800-HOFSTRA, ext. 657
E-mail: graddean@hofstra.edu

HOFSTRA UNIVERSITY.
Hempstead, New York 11549 • www.hofstra.edu

police

Police recieve reports of vandalism

Friday

Credit rates on the rise, students finding debt hard to deal with ing debt

"Credit card companies market aggressively to college students, in spite of documented concerns that many students are incurring unmanageable amounts of credit card debt as they are graduating from college with huge debt loads," said Brad Heavner, who headed the study.

"Universities are not doing enough to limit credit card marketing or to educate students about the dangers of misusing credit cards," he said.

Jeanette Tucker, family economist for the UM AgCenter, said small card companies recruit on college campuses because college students have a high future earning potential.

"Most people tend to hang on to their first credit card rather than get a new one, so a credit card company can potentially have a customer for life," she said.

Ali Wilbert, a business sophomore, said she is constantly bombarded by credit card advertising.

"There are always people offering free gifts in exchange for applying for credit cards," she said. "There's always a credit card ad on the Reveille website."

Ms. Wilbert has resisted the temptation to apply for a card.

"I like the piece not having debt hanging over my head," she said.

Dana Smith, kinesiology sophomore, said high college expenses make it necessary for her to use credit cards.

"I'm not a big spender, but everything in college is so expensive, so before I knew it, I had a large balance," she said. "There's not much that I can do about it until graduation, though."

Tucker recommended that students have a credit card to build credit history and for emergencies but not for "friends, fashion or fun."

"Frivolous purchases on credit card cards can significantly change a student's quality of life for the worse," she said. "Students that build up high debt find that they work long hours, can't go to class, get little sleep, and so their GPA suffers."

Tucker said some universities lose more students to credit card debt than to academic failure.

"If you have a $1,000 balance and only pay the 2 percent minimum payment, it will take you 12 years and four months and cost you $2,352.93 to pay down the balance," she said. "As you can see, how you use your credit card during college really can impact the rest of your life."

Witnesses offer their accounts at Saddam Hussein's trial

Thursday became 'Judgment Day' and Dujail has become a battle front."

"Shootings started and nobody could leave or enter Dujail. At night, intelligence agents arrived headed by Barazan" Ibrahim, he said.

Ibrahim interrupted him: "I am a patriot and I was the head of the intelligence service of Iraq."

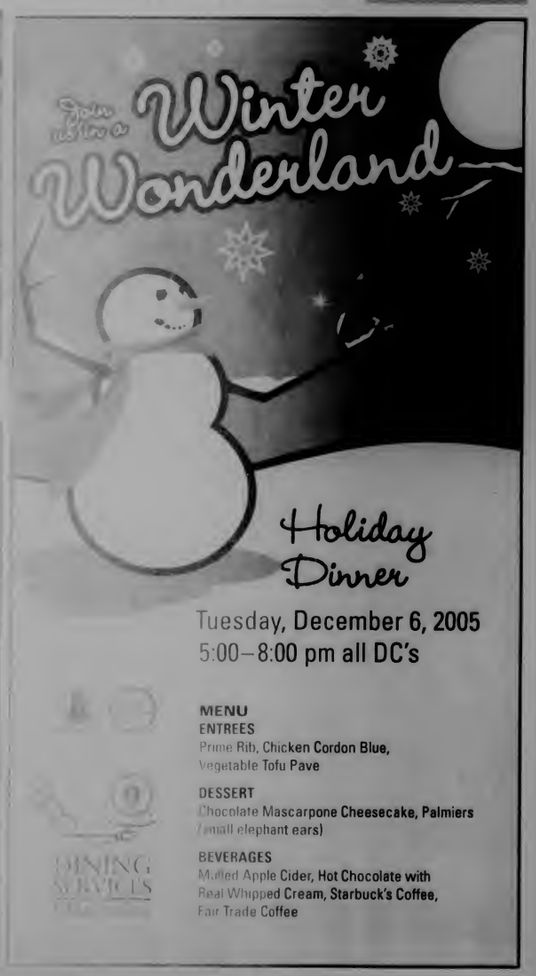
"...replied Ibrahim, who ...intelligence chief at the time.

"...and your children go to ...business replied.

"...judge then asked them to ...exchanges.

...testimony continued. ...prosecutors objected that ...in the visitors' gallery was ...threatening gestures and ...removed. Ibrahim leapt ...out in the direction of ...and shouted, "These are ...friends."

...judge ordered the person ...from the gallery.



...returned, fighting back tears, ...how there had been "ran... ...arrests in the streets, all the ...of the (Baath) party, and

CORRECTION

In the November 29th issue of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, it was incorrectly stated in an ed/op by Mike Sances that Ayad Allawi was the former president of Iraq. In fact, he was the former prime minister.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 6, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it" Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Final reflections on UMass

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz

These last years that I have been at the University of Massachusetts have been important ones. Since transferring from Greenfield Community College as a sophomore and looking forward mostly to the hedonistic lifestyle in Southwest, I have been moved by a series of changes brought on both by my classes and academic environment as well as changes in the composition and administrative leadership of the university itself. Spending a year abroad was no doubt an important piece of my development, and certainly one that I highly recommend for all of my peers.

The acquisition and sharing of knowledge across a variety of cultural and linguistic contexts is a tremendously rewarding experience, and represents a deepening of the learning process that cannot be articulated except through actually doing it. It is an experience that I have found to be increasingly enlightening as I repeat it.

I now believe that finding a comfortable but intellectually challenging community apart from the community of room and hall mates is crucial to personal growth in the university context.

Yet it has been here in Amherst that the vast majority of my college-years formation has taken place. I still find it interesting that academic programs and the residential areas have relatively cohesive and distinct cultures maintained over extended periods of time. I have had the opportunity to partake in many of these cultures, double-majoring and spending time in all of the residential areas.

It has been interesting to observe the reactions of the different UMass cultures to changes in the university administration and to world events. I now believe that finding a comfortable but intellectually challenging community apart from the community of room- and hall-mates is crucial to personal growth in the university context. And it is important that these communities are active. Inactivity leads to lethargy at a time when we as individuals and as members of the greater UMass community can least afford it.

The most important part of learning is engaging the lessons personally: good teachers and dedicated learners are able to inspire passion about course material and carry the ideas with them beyond the classroom and into other arenas of their active life. Emotionless learning is less effective and certainly less important than inspired education.

Many consider the empty transmission of information to be a waste of time, since without passionate engagement there is no challenge, no wisdom and no spiritual transformation. It is important, therefore, that instructors are able to make course material appealing to the lives and emotions of their pupils, and that the students are able to devote themselves beyond the minimal degree of mental autopilot needed to coast through the semester.

As UMass students we do this to varying extents. Those who are most successful are the ones apply intellectual theory in their everyday activities, particularly those who recognize problems in their environment and use education to acquire the tools to address them. The most laudable examples of this are seen every day in and around the student union where social justice advocates are engaged in lasting campaigns for the ideals that are not met at our university and in its surrounding world.

Praxis — the process of doing whereby theory informs action and vice versa — is an essential educational component that many programs attempt to include through internship requirements, theses and community involvement projects. However, praxis is not nearly integrated enough into the vast majority of UMass curricula and remains underdefined and without intellectual context even where it is included.

The lack of importance given to praxis is functionally part and parcel of many of the other important issues requiring redress at our university. Ethno-racial diversity, autonomy of student enterprises, the rising cost of tuition and fees, poor funding of social outreach programs, and horrendously low wages and benefits for graduate student employees are among the myriad worsening concerns that a greater classroom emphasis on the practical would empower students to address and resolve together with a willing university administration.

Yet just as curricula needs reformulation to better meet the practical needs of students, so has the current administration antagonized and alienated itself from the student body. Zero-tolerance policies, constitutionally-dubious picketing codes and power-grabbing policies in the name of noble causes are disempowering to the most engaged of students and have led to an ongoing battle between students and administration, when in reality one is there to serve the other.

Substantive actions aside, a true shortcoming of this administration has been its inability to assuage student concerns or even engage in any sort of constructive dialogue. Closed-door policymaking behind the back of the undergraduate, graduate and even faculty assemblies has been a sudden and startling interruption of long-established democratic processes at UMass. As I leave this university for life's next chapter, the fight for democracy at UMass will be the main issue that draws my attention back to my alma mater. Though I'm sure it won't be necessary, I wish strength and resolve to those engaged in the struggle.

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz is a Collegian columnist.

Politicizing the death penalty

David B. Lawrence

Kenneth Boyd didn't want to be remembered as a statistic. "I don't like the idea of being picked as a number," he remarked. "I'd hate to be remembered as that."

Boyd's comments, and his story, made national press last week when he became the thousandth person to be executed in the United States since a moratorium on capital punishment was lifted in 1977. Early Friday morning a deadly trio of chemicals was injected into his body by the North Carolina Department of Correction as punishment for a 1994 double murder. He died shortly after 2 a.m. Unfortunately, Boyd's wishes have not been honored by the popular press, and he is sure to be remembered with the dubious distinction of being number 1,000.

This milestone does not mark the thousandth execution in U.S. history; rather, it marks the thousandth since capital punishment came back into use in 1977, following a 10-year lapse. Between 1968 and 1976 no executions were carried out in the United States, though criminals were still subject to death sentences. The moratorium was not officially ordered; it resulted from negative public perception of the death penalty and a host of legal questions that surrounded the practice at the time.

In the late 1970s, at a time just after the unofficial ban on capital punishment was lifted, Stanley "Tookie" Williams co-founded a gang now known as the "Crips." In 1979 he killed four people with a shotgun in a robbery that made him only a few spare bills. Williams was convicted of the crime and sent to death row, where at the time he planned to continue making trouble as he had always done. The gang he co-founded has since grown to become one of the largest gangs in the country, which controls drug trafficking and is responsible for thousands of deaths and robberies. Some of the guards at the prison where Williams has waited decades for his sentence to be carried out maintain that he still calls some of the shots from within prison. He denies these claims.

In fact, Williams claims to have been reformed. He has educated himself, developed a conscience, and tried to help right some of the wrongs he has done. He says that he is a changed man. "There is no part of me that existed then that exists now." Williams has co-authored children's books from within prison that warn against the dangers of gang life and suggest ways to avoid becoming involved in gangs. He's spoken about these topics through telephone broadcasts, and he's said to have forged a truce between rival gangs in New Jersey. He's been nominated for a Nobel Peace Prize, and has become a model of reform and hope in the criminal justice system to many people.

The politicization of the death penalty is among its most troubling components. If the execution of a man can be politically influenced, can we be sure that we have made the decision to kill with the level of objective surety appropriate for such a severe punishment?

Williams is seeking clemency in a hearing with California governor Arnold Schwarzenegger on Dec. 8. Groups which support Williams' request for clemency and groups which do not are both petitioning the governor to help influence his decision. Supporting groups say that Williams has become a valuable citizen, helping to steer youngsters away from gang violence with his books. Those who favor his being put to death seek "justice" for the families of those killed, and suggest that Williams wrote the books as a ploy to gain clemency so that he can continue to pull the strings in the violent Crips gang.

Whether or not Stanley Williams earns a spot just below Kenneth Boyd on the "U.S. executions since 1977" list, people will be angry at the governor or at the legal system for making a mistake. The politicization of the death penalty is among its most troubling components. If the execution of a man can be politically influenced, can we be sure that we have made the decision to kill with the level of objective surety appropriate for such a severe punishment? Perhaps it is this uncertainty that has made our thousandth recent execution a story, rather than a statistic.

David B. Lawrence is a Collegian columnist.

Praise for 'Primetime'

Mike Sances

"Do you feel safe out there?" No doubt many of us have been asked some variant of this question, as I was over Thanksgiving break, in the wake of a recent ABC News report ranking our school as more criminally violent than any other in the country. While many have denounced the report and rejected its claims by providing first-hand accounts of feeling pretty darn safe indeed, I feel I must break with the vocal consensus that this report has generated and admit that I, for one, do not feel entirely at ease here. It's hard to feel safe when you have campus police officers carrying loaded guns and mounted on horses you are almost sure could crush your skull with their hooves, if they were so inclined.

But I realize that's not what the fuss is all about, and to be honest, I can't say I've ever felt at risk from violent crime here. How could I? I reside on a campus whose ultimate tranquility is affirmed every time someone refers to this place as a "zoo" or as "ZooMass." For despite the strange connotation of a zoo as something wild and unpredictable, what is a zoo, really, but a prison, one of the safest, most boring places imaginable?

Many other parallels can be found in that always popular phrase, none we should be too proud of. But recall that the defining characteristic of a zoo, or a prison for that matter, is predictability. Any deviation from the institutional norms is impossible — punishable, in the case of an actual zoo's inhabitants, by death. Likewise, every instant of our days at this school has been planned out ahead of time by someone else. There are choices, sure, but there is little or no opportunity to construct our own alternatives should we find ourselves unhappy with the options currently available.

This includes thought. Despite the ideal of a university as a bastion of free exchange, independent thinking is moribund on this campus. The incoming first-year student can choose between either the College Republicans or the University Democrats. Soon, it becomes clear that the purpose of joining such a group is not to provide a forum where students can discuss matters of importance to them, or how to construct a better world out of the utter disaster we have inherited from our parents. On the contrary, the purpose of joining the local affiliate of a national party is to mechanically and faithfully recite that organization's talking points, and ultimately to curtail critical thinking by making it less necessary.

What I can say with certainty is that if, as has apparently been feared, ABC has succeeded in frightening prospective students away from attending here, then I think that is a positive development.

Moving to the Student Union in general, this same student will find public spaces, once occupied by student groups, increasingly dominated by banks and corporations. Where once might have stood a pamphleteer passing out revolutionary literature now stands a cardboard promotion for the Apple iPod. Civic participation is supplanted by a culture of consumption. Democracy becomes less a choice of how society is run and more a choice of what new product to buy and what new style to wear.

Now, I don't watch television news magazines myself, so I won't offer an opinion as to the veracity of the ABC special's claims, besides my own experiences with campus safety that I mentioned above. But what I can say with certainty is that if, as has apparently been feared, ABC has succeeded in frightening prospective students away from attending here, then I think that is a positive development. This campus is too crowded anyway, and admission has only been increasing since I started here in 2002. As more students attend, and while services either stagnate or decline, tuition and fees increase.

So where has all that new revenue been going? I certainly haven't seen any of it: my financial aid has been declining every year. So, while I congratulate all those who have taken breaks from their busy schedules of not protesting the war in Iraq, or the ongoing presence of a member of a terrorist group (the FBI) on campus, or the aforementioned increase in both fees and student population, or imminent cuts in federal student loans, etc., to defend the administration against attacks by "Primetime," I have to say that I'm having trouble understanding what all the fuss is about. In the end, if the result of the ABC report is that UMass attracts less people whose prime source of news is a program like, well, "Primetime," then that can hardly be a bad thing.

Mike Sances is a Collegian columnist.

Police misgivings at UMass

Aleksander M. Murshteyn

From the standpoint of the law in Amherst, help me work through the logic here. Police officers knock on the door of a house in Puffton Village, responding to a noise complaint. Minutes later, I witness several arrests of "uncooperative" residents. Mind you, at least one of these people walked outside to learn what was going on. (That's simply all I saw, as I walked out with him.) "Are you a resident?" asked the sergeant.

"Yes," replied the resident. "Take him away," said the swift sergeant as another officer went on to execute the actual arrest. I do not understand what type of cooperation is demanded from a resident whom the police have just notified of a noise complaint. But "Did the resident understand?" is the actual question that one should be asking the officers.

While [police] have the power to arrest in order to execute goals, [they] also have a responsibility to think before [they] do. This is not a war zone, but a university. Be proactive, not reactive. [They] have the luxury and we have the right.

Furthermore, I simply don't understand why it is that not only the Miranda Rights that are not being read, but why offences for which one is being arrested are not openly cited to arrestees. In fact, I specifically don't understand the arbitrary and imprudent exercise of "discretion" by the local police. If you are an officer of the law and are placed in a position where you might suggest how an "unruly" resident might prevent his own arrest, why not do it? If, as an officer of the law, you are asked to disperse a loud party, for example, won't you try to take initiative by informing the "partiers" of your intention to arrest?

You are at work. Your job is not to perform an arrest, it is to break up a party, and even that is an arguably dubious working objective to begin with. In any case, you were called to respond to a noise complaint. While you have the power to arrest in order to execute your goals, you also have a responsibility to think before you do. This is not a war zone, but a university. Be proactive, not reactive. You have the luxury, and we have the right.

And please allow us to understand how your actions can be justified in the following two circumstances, taking the noise-complaint-that-turns-out-to-be-a-late-night-party as a case in point. Firstly, have you ever seen visitors from, say, Boston, staying over at their friend's house in Amherst? Secondly, have you seen visitors who avoid leaving when the resident asks them to leave? Did you know that a resident's visitors cannot be kicked out if they have no place to go? If the only place such a visitor might go to is their car (seeing how it is physically irresponsible to stay out in the cold and noting that there is no one else a visitor might know living next door), visitors are effectively being compelled to drive drunk.

Hopefully such an evicted visitor won't actually drive (and especially not back to Boston). But to warm up the car, it is not inconceivable that one might have to at least turn it on. So at this point — with the keys in the ignition and a drunken ex-visitor in the seat — any officer witnessing this is certainly observing an arrestable offence. How ironic. For your records: the amount of visitors that four residents living in Puffton Village can legally (according to their lease) have staying over may create what would be a wild party to some, but a dinner party to others. In any case, it can apparently create drunk drivers as well.

Furthermore, any party can create a situation that no resident can control. One might be inadvertently subjected to the presence of visitors — "friends of friends" — whom one does not know. If there is a noise complaint, one may not have the power to remove all said visitors from the premises — not in time to avoid one's own arrest. Officers, perhaps you'd be able to help?

There have been far too many arrests of this sort that I have born witness to in this area, which is simply preposterous. I am very surprised, and indeed dismayed, that a significant class action lawsuit has yet to be filed against this police department. College students often act like juveniles and deserve to be punished or arrested, but arbitrary arrests — the officers making them and the superiors who allow such systematically dubious arrests to be made in the first place — must be punished by the law as well. Legal Services can provide any student with free legal advice. If you have been arrested, it does not hurt to contact an attorney. It may eventually hurt the local police.

Aleksander M. Murshteyn is a UMass student.

The Collegian is hiring an assistant Ed/Op editor for the Spring semester.
Come down to the Collegian newsroom to apply!

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 6, 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

John Lennon's legacy continues with new reissues

John Lennon
Walls and Bridges
Capitol Records
8/10

With the 25th anniversary of John Lennon's death this Thursday, it seems only appropriate that the series of Lennon's solo album reissues should continue and spring forth with something new for the occasion. The newest releases are two of the least popular, and least acclaimed, albums in Lennon's catalogue, but they are given the same kind of treatment that marked reissues of his classic solo works. And while time has been kind to these records, it is still apparent why they aren't held in as high regard as "Plastic Ono Band" and "Imagine."

1972's "Some Time in New York City" was credited to both Lennon and Yoko Ono and is most notable for being the most radically and blatantly political album Lennon ever issued. "John Sinclair" and "Angela" are both written about political prisoners and "Sunday Bloody Sunday" and "Attica State" are references to then-current events. Even though some of the source material is outdated, the music still feels fresh and is as provocative as it was the day it came out. "Woman is the Nigger of the World," the opening track, is one of the best, and perhaps the one most likely to shock — despite the fact that it is carried by dreamy pop instrumentation and vocals. And while the often-blunt lyrics and heavy subject matter will unfortunately turn some listeners off, there is no denying that Lennon penned some solid songs for this album. "New York City" is an old-fashioned rock 'n' roller, and "John Sinclair" is based around an excellent slide-guitar riff and a folky feel.

In the process of reissuing the album some of the songs from the original pressing's second disc "Live Jam" were cut. Fortunately, however, three tracks featuring George Harrison made the track list. The added tracks are the non-album single "Happy Xmas (War is Over)" and it's b-side "Listen, the Snow is Falling." "Happy Xmas" stands as one of Lennon's best songs, and as the holidays approach, it is as seasonally, culturally and politically important as it ever was. "Listen..." is one of Ono's best songs as well, with jingling bells and chimes that add a wintry ambience to the track.

"Some Time in New York City" is not one of Lennon's most enjoyable albums, but it wasn't intended to be. It is as powerful and effective as ever, and while some songs fall short, many have a good place among Lennon's best. It is certainly one of Lennon's more provocative works — although musically it never touches upon the type of experimentation that Lennon and Ono had become famous for — and has a rightful place in Lennon's legacy.

BY NICK ROMANOW
COLLEGIAN STAFF

John Lennon
Sometimes in New York City
Capitol Records
7/10

The second in the latest series of reissues from John Lennon's solo catalogue, "Walls and Bridges," was released in 1974 following the previously reissued "Mind Games," and was recorded during Lennon's "lost weekend" separation from Ono. While it's regarded as one of Lennon's more mediocre releases, it is still a Lennon album, and a mediocre release from one of the greatest figures in pop music is still a great album.

"Walls and Bridges" sounds great in 2005, and it's more poppy feel is a stark, and refreshing, contrast to the somewhat harrowing "Sometime In New York City." While many of the tracks, from the groovy opener "Going Down On Love" to the rocker "What You Got," sound upbeat, Lennon's lyrics are anything but. "Scared" opens with a literal howl, a plodding riff and Lennon simply singing "I'm scared, I'm scared, I'm scared." "Nobody Loves You (When You're Down and Out)" also features great Lennon lyrics over a grand ballad arrangement.

"Walls and Bridges" features a live performance of "Whatever Gets You Thru the Night" with Elton John (who was featured on the studio recording as well), an acoustic version of "Nobody Loves You," and an interview with Lennon that served as a b-side to "Whatever Gets You Thru the Night" that is a brief, but great, reminder of Lennon's wit and playfulness.

"Walls and Bridges" is most notable as simply a collection of great songs. It doesn't have the groundbreaking scope or feel of Lennon's more acclaimed work, and the dismissal of the album at the time of its release has meant that most of these songs are unknown to all but Lennon's biggest fans.

However, the album has benefited greatly from the elapsed time. While, sadly, it stands as the last original album Lennon would release for five years, and the second to last album he would release in his lifetime, it sounds fantastic and has a lot of excellent Lennon material. "Walls and Bridges" isn't as astounding as some of Lennon's better known solo releases, but it is certainly a disc that any serious fan needs.

BY NICK ROMANOW
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Franklin Dining Commons loses its appeal when dinner arrives

By Matt Baskin
Collegian Correspondent

This is part two in a series of reviews of UMass dining commons

For those still longing for the friendly confines of old high school cafeterias but not knowing where to turn, fear not. Franklin Dining Commons has got you covered. It can meet the needs of any student nostalgic for crowded tables, poor lighting and sporadic supplies. Though Franklin sometimes offers up praiseworthy meals and always provides top-notch service, Central's main dining center leaves much to be desired, particularly during the dinner hour.

Breakfast and lunch are usually pleasant at Franklin. Wall-to-wall glass windows on each side of the Commons allow for plenty of sunlight, a pleasant perk that gives the dining hall's mood a lift. At breakfast, the sparsely populated and library-quiet hall provides the perfect place for hungry early morning studiers or those who simply want to read their newspaper in peace. The tranquil atmosphere makes for a soothing transition into an inevitably hectic day of classes and activities. Breakfast foods such as French toast, bacon, eggs and danishes are always decent if not better, with the possible exception of the eggs, the composition of which at times seems questionable. Service usually comes with a smile and is easily the hall's most endearing quality, as staff members bring a noticeable charm to the dining hall. Its cafeteria-like setup, where diners shuffle down an enclosed food line and take their seat at either a square, rectangular or round table, is not a major concern in the morning hours due to the lack of a crowd, but becomes one at lunch time for that very reason.

As some students return from morning classes and others head for the afternoon, Franklin becomes Central's hub of activity. Crowded but not packed, it is no longer an ideal spot for hungry scholars in search of a sanctuary with a buffet line. Though still bright, the hall's atmosphere takes a hit from the crowds now clogging the lunch lines like eager fourth graders restlessly awaiting their steaming hot helping of Shepard's pie. For students who simply want to get to the vegan options waiting at the end of the line, getting food in Franklin can be a tremendously frustrating endeavor.

Similarly obnoxious is the process of finding a seat, an occasionally difficult task depending upon the hour. Aside from the sporadic stir fry option, Franklin's lunchtime selections are par for the course and often above average. A well-stocked salad bar and pasta station are definite pluses, and staples such as hamburgers run aplenty. Lunch's major flaw is the way it is served and the crowd that it induces. Nevertheless, it does little to detract from Franklin's overall performance. Through breakfast and lunch, Franklin leaves little room for complaint, and is even worthy of a compliment or two. Unfortunately, dinner changes that.

Dinner can make or break a dining hall's reputation, and in the case of Franklin, it breaks it. At this point in the day, the hall's

See FRANKLIN on page 7

UMass students serves themselves food at the Franklin Dining Commons. Small lines are common to both breakfast and lunch. However, this dining common is packed full of students during dinner.

New Music Tuesdays

Week of 12/6 to 12/12

Eminem

8/10

Curtain Calls The Hits
Aftermath/Interscope

This past summer, rumors were circulating around hip hop circles that Eminem was retiring from the music world. To date, he hasn't publicly addressed the matter, but to fuel the fire, he released a greatest hits compilation. This is not just any compilation like Hilary Duff's, which was released earlier this year. This compilation is full of Eminem's hits, and is titled "Curtain Call," yet another piece of the puzzle spelling out retirement for the hip hop star.

Each of the songs on this album has dominated the music world. Starting right off with his debut single "My Name Is," Eminem came out of Detroit with his middle fingers flying and his mouth calling out celebrities and cursing them. Right away it was obvious that he was onto something and would not go away until he found fit.

Wherever Eminem went for the next six years, controversy followed, but he never seemed to mind. Being labeled as a violent lyricist for songs like "Way I Am," his second single off the "Slim Shady LP" which is also included in this collection, did not bother Eminem in the slightest.

Around the 1999 Grammy awards, when Eminem was called homophobic by the gay rights group Gay and Lesbian Advocates and Defenders, the world started following his every word. To fight back to GLAD and other critics, Eminem performed the song "Stan" with Elton John instead of Dido at the award show. John stood up for Eminem, declaring he was a fan of his music even though he is gay. Both this live performance and the version with Dido appear on "Curtain Call."

For the next six years, music critics and fans followed Eminem as he fell repeatedly into more controversial feuds. On his last album with original material, "The Eminem Show," he singlehandedly took on the Bush administration and the war in Iraq.

The end of the compilation, following the hits and live tracks, features a new song, "When I'm Gone," hinting yet again that maybe Eminem is retiring from the music world. If this is true, "When I'm Gone" showcases that he would be retiring in his prime. But maybe Kurt Cobain and Neil Young are right — maybe Eminem would be wiser to "burn out instead of fading away."

Korn

5/10

See You on the Other Side
Virgin Records

Nu-metal might be going away, but some of the genre's bands, like Korn, are still lurking around trying to prove to the world they have what it takes to be a band of longevity.

With the release of "See You on the Other Side," the band, minus original guitarist Brian Welch, has a new sound. New for them, that is — for anyone else, like Nine Inch Nails or Marilyn Manson the sound is pretty old and flat.

Welch, who left the band last year after he became a Born Again Christian, was replaced by a studio musician. Even though he is now on an alleged mission from God to convert rap mogul 50 Cent to Christianity, Welch might have made the best decision in leaving.

But that's not that important. What really is important here is that Korn is back again. After releasing a greatest hits compilation and a new album which featured a horrible version of the Pink Floyd song "Another Brick in the Wall, Part 2," Korn went back into the studio thinking their music still matters and has purpose beyond the 20th century.

On their new album, after the Marilyn Manson and Nine Inch Nails sound wears off, they are left desperately trying to mix the two into their own new sound. For what it's worth, the sound is consistent, but it's just bad. It has no energy to it. Jonathan Davis, the front man and mastermind behind the band, no longer carries the cry of angst he once had as he looks into himself for songs instead of the world around him. Davis should go back to Hot Topic to find motivation — or just his former self — in their packed Goth sets for sale.

Unfortunately, all of this effort is wasted. Their best work is behind them, just like the nu-metal genre they helped create in the 90's along with their friends in Limp Bizkit. Now the only thing they are good for is a joke in one of those retrospective VH1 specials that look back on last week or the decades of the past — even if they were only five years ago.

Lindsay Lohan

3.5/10

A Little More Personal (Raw)
Casablanca Records

Lindsay Lohan has quickly released the sequel to her debut album, "Speak," which was only released last year. The follow-up, "A Little More Personal (Raw), lives up to its title.

The first track is a piano ballad about Lohan waiting to get a letter from her dad in the mail with an apology he owes her, since sometimes he gets more bad press then she gets good press. Lohan carries her voice well with emotion throughout the song.

By now you're most likely asking yourself, can she really sing? The answer is yes, but don't forget that anyone can sing. Lohan sounds like a cross between Ashlee Simpson and her fellow ex-Disney star Hilary Duff. These are not the nicest comparisons, but they get the job done.

Lohan's album, like those of her counterparts, is just run-of-the-mill bad pop music. It might work with her sugary movies, but for an entire album it's just boring. Every song sounds like it came from the same manufactured formula: start off slow and build up towards the middle, then either stay afloat or sink back to quiet by the song's end. None of the songs on the album really scream "hit single." They are all too long and flat, although a group of three or four would be fine for her next movie if it's another "Freaky Friday" type.

The only highlight of the album is Lohan's take on "I Want You to Want Me." This cover is dime a dozen, but Lohan's rendition creates a nice karaoke feel. The version is closer to the Letters to Cleo version than the original, but then again, for the MTV generation the Letters to Cleo version is the original, thanks to the movie "10 Things I Hate About You."

Lohan should stick to movies. She isn't the best actress, but she's eye candy for some, and some insist she has potential in her career to become one of the greats. After all, she has been doing that much longer then this nu-trend of actresses also being pop singers has been around.

The Ike Reilly Assassination

8/10

Junkie Faithful
Rock Ridge Music

Remember that saying, "You can't judge a book by its cover?" Well, here is another similar saying for you to remember: you can't judge an album by its cover, either.

If you really judged The Ike Reilly Assassination by their name or cover, you would assume incorrectly that they are some post-hardcore band full of screaming vocals and fast instrumentation.

In reality, however, The Ike Reilly Assassination is just a poppy rock and roll band with a love for words and combining elements of various genres of music such as folk, rap, rock and pop. This combination creates a very fascinating release that is beyond its underground rock peers in more ways than one.

The Ike Reilly Assassination never claims to make any new form of music with their hybrid sound. In fact, the combination more or less creates a modern rock and roll sound, revitalizing the old "sex, drugs and rock and roll" in the pop world of today.

The highlight of the album is Ike Reilly, the front man/guitarist, who has a spoken word vocal style that changes speed and tone throughout every song to go with the rest of the band's instrumentation. Songs such as "Farm Girl" create a fun, jumping-around vibe; other songs, like "Suffer From The Trust," create a different feel. The varying vibes is what sets this album so far above the rest. At times the rest of the band fades quietly to showcase Reilly's vocals, such as in the song "Heroin," which mixes the themes of Christianity and drug use.

The lyrics of the band are smart — they even have wit at times — but they are very wordy. Ike Reilly is really a poet for the working class, and it shows with his politics and philosophy in each song. That is what rock and roll is about — being the voice for the voiceless, among other rock and roll clichés that can be used to describe this album.

The Ike Reilly Assassination may not be a household name yet, but with albums like this one, success must be right around the corner

By Tim McCall
Collegian Staff

Okkervil River

8/10

Black Sheep Boy Appendix
Jagjaguwa

Coming off of this spring's triumphant concept album "Black Sheep Boy," indie alt-folk band Okkervil River continue their reign with the newly released "Black Sheep Boy Appendix," a companion that fleshes out the story while expanding on the new sounds and styles that the band experimented with on the LP. "Appendix" is both a batch of fresh songs and something of a 25-minute reprise of the full-length disc. Melodies from the album are recalled at the end of "Black Sheep Boy #4" and in the instrumental "A Forest." "Another Radio Song," whose title recalls "In A Radio Song," uses a particularly ominous line that was used in the "Black Sheep Boy" closer, "A Glow." And, of course, all the songs have the same dark, almost-gothic feel that permeated the full-length. Front man Will Sheff sounds as impassioned as ever and continues his growth as a talented vocalist.

Within the "Appendix," there is even more to tie the album together. "Missing Children," the opening track, most bluntly states the central characters' crimes, which are alluded to only briefly on the LP. The kidnapped children return in the closing track, "Last Love Song For Now," which revolves around upbeat acoustic strumming, tambourine, and handclaps at first before taking a darker, if still curiously upbeat, turn in the second half.

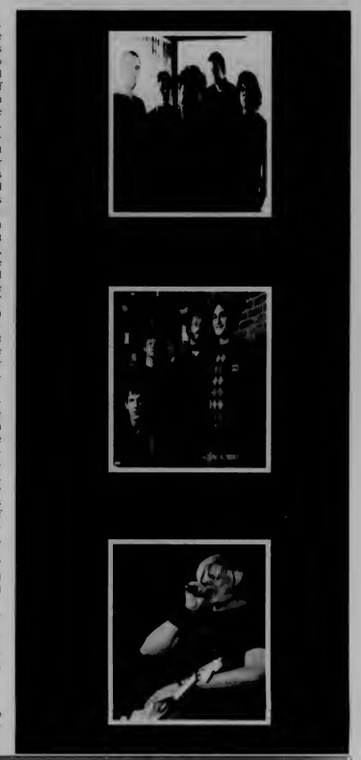
The most important thing to note about "Appendix" is not how well it ties into the preceding album, but how well it stands on its own. This is not a collection of out takes or songs dubbed unworthy of being on the LP. While many of these songs were written for the "Black Sheep Boy" sessions, they are all recordings from the past few months. As such, Okkervil's continuing growth and maturity as musicians is evident. "Missing Children" finds Sheff singing next to an organ, strings, and zombie-like backing-vocals that, combined with the terrifying lyrics of "Kids, its coming / Kids, its going to come," are reminiscent of Radiohead. The fast-paced "No Key, No Plan" has an R.E.M. feel, and the harmonies on "Black Sheep Boy #4" are perhaps the most delicate that Okkervil has ever put to tape.

"Appendix" is not the masterpiece that "Black Sheep Boy" was, but it is a worthy collection, both as a companion to the album and as a stand-alone piece. This final piece in this era of Okkervil River serves not only as closure to their most epic work yet, but also as an unresolved question mark as to what will come next.

Abandon Pools

5.5/10

Armed to the Teeth
Universal Records



In 2001 Abandoned Pools the guise of one-man band Tommy Walter — seemingly appeared from nowhere with "Humanistic," one of the biggest surprise alt-rock albums of the year. The album was moderately successful, though it never quite broke into the mainstream, and stands today as an unheralded and little-known gem from the turn of the century. The slightly futuristic, slightly electronic alternative rock of that album is back in full force on Abandoned Pools's second album, "Armed To The Teeth," but unfortunately it doesn't quite measure up to its predecessor.

"Armed To The Teeth" is oddly inconsistent, finding Walter alternately hitting creative and musical highs and lows, often within the same song. Opener "Lethal Killers" serves as the best introduction to Abandoned Pools 2.0, a band that now leans a bit more towards straight-ahead alternative, and Walter's new vocal direction, which finds him often sounding like a well-trained but slightly nasally and irritating emo kid. While his falsetto sounds perfect, he has more of a whine then ever before, which becomes a big turnoff.

Beyond that, Walter's lyrics fail to distinguish the album. "Armed To The Teeth" is both an explicitly personal and political album, which is an incredibly cool concept, but it often falls short of its goal. Both the lost-love and socially conscious lyrics bounce between laughable and great. "Tighter Noose" features bizarre couplets like "Up in smoke / This is a joke / Isn't it" and "You're so weak / Beat up a geek / To feel complete" while the repetition of the chorus phrase, "Who needs a tighter noose," is one of the more powerful moments on the album. Likewise, "Waiting To Panic" features a high-school whine about "the cool kids clique," and later features Walter lamenting, "Mobs of idiots, do what you're told to do" which immediately turns it into a clever plea, "Get away from superstition / Get away from boogiemen." Walter perhaps best explains himself on the excellent, bouncy "Sailing Seas," where he sings, "To hell with irony / To hell with subtlety 'Cause I don't have time / To mince words anymore." Coincidentally, this song goes on to feature emo lyrics about how the broken-hearted Walter can't listen to a CD anymore since his girlfriend left and let another man — gasp — finish her cigarettes.

Musically, Walter is more successful, though occasionally the arrangements sound bored with themselves. "The Catalyst," like many songs on the album, contains spacey atmospheric soundscapes beneath the distorted guitars, "Armed To The Teeth" features one of Walter's best hooks, and tracks like "Hunting" feature some of Walter's penchant for sonic experimentation. However, many songs feel like numb, post-grunge alt-rock. Where all the songs on "Humanistic" were instantly grabbing and packed with subtleties and details, "Armed To The Teeth" is easy to glaze over. Though the songs do grow on the listener, it never becomes wholly satisfying. This is by no means a bad record or an artistic failure, but while Walter threatens that he is "Armed To The Teeth," it is apparent he isn't prepared for battle this time.

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

New Music Tuesdays

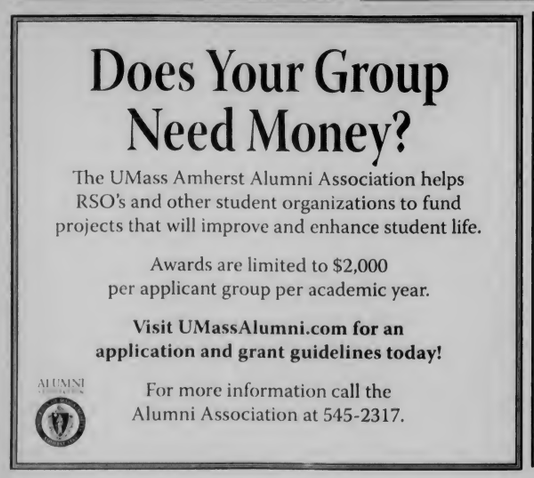
Week of 12/6 to 12/12

Breakfast and lunch haven for studiers

FRANKLIN from page 5

confines are stuffed to the gills. Forget the cramped, slow-moving food line. Just getting past the card swiper can be a formidable task. Though service remains stellar, from the friendly swiper who replies with a smile and a sincere "You're welcome!" when thanked to the students who wipe the tables, dinnertime at Franklin is otherwise subpar. Aside from the frequently long, slow lines, the hall suffers from a vast array of problems. Utensils, usually forks, run out frequently, leaving diners the unpleasant option of spoon versus bare hands as means of consumption. Instead of real knives, students are offered the flimsy disposable kind. Though this may make for an easy cleanup, cutting becomes a chore as a result. A variety of milks are offered, but the hall sometimes runs out well before dinnertime ends. Sunlight, long departed, gives way to dim and depressing artificial lighting that casts a similar atmosphere throughout the dining hall. Food, though on occasion excellent, usually flounders between average and just above. Sushi, stir fry and other specialties are a tasty, refreshing alternative, but more could be done to enhance culinary diversity. Dish disposal in Franklin is a mess. Though the hall has two dish rooms, only one is utilized, causing a tremendous crowd to form in front of the narrow drop-off window. Typical deserts like pastries and soft serve ice cream are available, but even sweets can't make up for Franklin's multitude of dinnertime problems.

Breakfast and lunch in Franklin are no sweat. Decent food, great service and acceptable accommodations make the day's first two meals Franklin's forte. Its weakness is dinner. High school cafeterias may be a distant memory for some, but not for students who frequent Franklin.



Lowe has arrived at UMass

LOWE from page 10

Ford says. "We had developed a good relationship with him, his family and his coach. When we got this job we knew we had the opportunity to get him because this is a bigger school and a bigger conference and he was still available. I obviously knew we needed a point guard, and it just worked out."

Things worked out very quickly, as Lowe signed with UMass less than three weeks after Ford took over the program.

While Ford, a standout point guard at Kentucky a decade ago, was happy to sign the point guard his team desperately needed, he has been tough on Lowe, making him earn everything he gets.

"I've been hard on him for the fact that we're not giving him anything easy," Ford says. "I've wanted him to come in here and earn his spot. We didn't want him to come in here and have things given to him too quickly."

"I think Coach has confidence in me," Lowe says. "I just have to produce and show everyone why he has confidence in me. I'm just working hard so he can keep me in the game in close times."

And while Ford has made Lowe work for everything, he knows it won't be long until the freshman cracks the starting lineup.

"He's gotten his minutes in the games, but we just haven't allowed him to start," Ford says. "It's going to come though; we eventually need to move him into the starting lineup."

Lowe, who has averaged 21.8 minutes played per game, has progressed rapidly, although he says the transition from high school to college hasn't been an easy one.

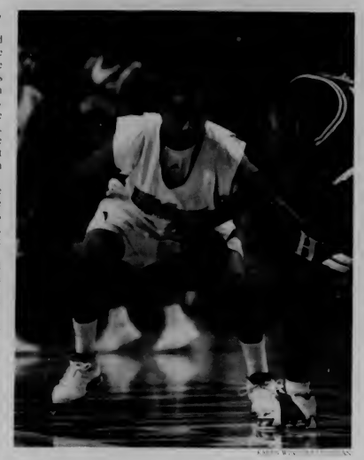
"The adjustment to the college game has been pretty tough," Lowe says. "I've had my ups-and-downs. I'm just working on playing harder."

"He's made the development physically very well," Ford says. "He's been a typical freshman, he's been up-and-down a little bit. He's been thrown in the fire pretty quickly and he's responded. He still has to get a lot better in a lot of areas, but physically he can play the game."

One thing that has helped Lowe has been the support he has received from some of the team's veterans. Lowe knows junior transfer Gary Forbes from their AAU days back in New York and says junior Stephane Lasme has also been supportive, but he considers junior Maurice Maxwell to be the teammate that has had the biggest impact on him.

"I look up to Maurice Maxwell," Lowe says. "He always helps me out. He calls me his little brother off the court, and he tells me everything about college basketball."

Maxwell has even shifted from his natural wing position to the point early in the season while Lowe has been making the adjustment to the college game.



"I've just been trying to help him get through things that I went through when I was a freshman," Maxwell says. "I never had a player to give me that positive reassurance on the court with me. I just try to help him and tell him stuff before it happens."

One of the biggest things Ford was concerned with in the preseason was Lowe's ability to be a vocal leader. In high school, Lowe led by example, but he has realized that he needs to be more vocal on the court at this level. And while Lowe still isn't the most outspoken player on the court, Ford believes that he has earned the respect of his teammates through his strong play.

"I think they're still looking for consistency out of him and more of a vocal leadership out of him," Ford says, "but I think they understand that he's a very good basketball player and he can help this team a lot."

Maxwell has also noticed the change, as Lowe has become more assertive on the court as the season has progressed.

"The last couple of weeks he's been trying a lot more [to gain the respect of his teammates]," Maxwell says. "I never let him be satisfied with where he's at because I tell him that he should be feeling like he's the best freshman in the conference. I want him to know that I don't expect anything but the best from him."

Freshman Chris Lowe has played strong defense for UMass this season. Lowe gained a reputation for his tough defense while in high school.

Not surprisingly, the thing that has impressed Ford the most has been Lowe's defensive ability. Lowe's offense has also been a pleasant surprise for Ford, as he has averaged 7.3 points and 3.8 assists per game while shooting 43 percent from the field.

"He's really understood that he can be a great defender no matter what grade he's in. He's been a great on-the-ball defender," Ford says. "He's also done a great job of penetrating into the paint and creating shots for others. He's shown some signs of doing some very good things."

How far Lowe has come will be tested on Thursday night, as the Minutemen (2-2) travel to Hartford to take on the No. 3 Connecticut Huskies. A key to the game for UMass will be controlling the tempo, and that all begins at the point guard position.

Earlier this season, Lowe struggled against the relentless pressure that the University of Alabama at Birmingham applied, as he had six turnovers and just one assist in an 86-77 loss.

While that game was certainly a negative at the time, Lowe understands that this year will be a learning process and he feels he gained valuable experience experience that should pay dividends in Thursday's game.

"I was just playing too fast for the game," Lowe says of his UAB struggles. "Sometimes when you're over-hyped you come out and make mistakes. I came out and made mental mistakes, mistakes that I know I wouldn't make if we played them again. The pressure got to me that game, but I learned from my mistakes."

If Lowe continues to progress at the pace he is on now, his future looks bright.

For now, he is more focused on what he needs to do in his four years at UMass than playing at the next level.

But who knows? Maybe with enough hard work, Lowe could match up with that other point guard from that state championship game. Only this time the meeting would come on a bigger stage than a high school gym.

"Everybody determines their own destination," Lowe says. "If I put in the work, maybe I can make it to the NBA."

Added motivation in facing former coach

HOCKEY from page 10

the same thing to just coach the hockey game," Cahoon said. "We've got to prepare to play against a team [instead of each other]. There is no real advantage because he knows my thinking, and I pretty much know the way he thinks. I have watched his team, and he has watched my team. There will be a little chess match, but aside from that, it's just a matter of getting your team to compete and execute. We'll go ahead with that in mind and not to make it a personal challenge."

UMass senior defenseman Marvin Degon, who played under Dennehy each of the last three seasons, also harped on the importance of keeping the team's solid play moving along in the right direction.

"It's important for us to keep going and get the Denver game out of our minds, but the fact that Dennehy is there gives us a little more incentive to stick it to them," Degon said. "He has those guys playing pretty tough so it's going to be a battle."

Senior forward Stephen Werner doesn't think the opposing coach matters nearly as much as earning the all-important league points.

"In our league, no game is more important than any other so we can't put too much emphasis on that," Werner said. "But at the same time, it's a Hockey East game, so we'll be excited to play whether Coach Dennehy is coaching or not."

Top teams to square off in championship

BCS from page 10

remember, in the pre-BCS days the two superpowers would be going separate ways for the postseason.

"Anytime we have a matchup that is widely lauded as being a great match-up in the championship game, you can really see the benefit of a system like this in which through the bowls we're able to bring together the No. 1 and 2 ranked teams that otherwise wouldn't have come together through the [old] bowl system," Weiberg said.

Now the Pac-10 champion Trojans (12-0) and Big 12 champion Longhorns (12-0) can determine which team is best in the Granddaddy of Them All.

With 2004 Heisman Trophy winner Matt Leinart and 2005 Heisman front-runner Reggie Bush, USC has won 34 straight games. The Trojans could make history with an unprecedented third consecutive national title.

Texas won last season's Rose Bowl with quarterback Vince Young leading the way. As he accepted the MVP trophy, he declared that the Longhorns would be back, and he came through on his promise with a brilliant season.

"The problem is [the Longhorns] have a lot of other players that play really well, too," Carroll said.

Hurricane Katrina forced the Sugar Bowl out of New Orleans and into the Georgia Dome, setting up a short and familiar trip for the Bulldogs and their fans. Georgia (10-2) won the Southeastern Conference title in the Georgia Dome and returns there to meet Big East champion West Virginia (10-1) on Jan. 2.

Bowden (359 victories) and Paterno (353) have combined for 712 career victories, ranking first and second in Division I-A.

When Big Ten champion Penn State (10-1) and Atlantic Coast Conference champ Florida State (8-4) face off in the Orange Bowl on Jan. 3, Paterno will be 79. Bowden will be 76.

"I hope it doesn't come down to where it's Bobby Bowden and Joe Paterno because he can't run and I run slower," Paterno said.

In his rookie season as Notre Dame coach, Charlie Weis has the Fighting Irish (9-2) in the BCS for the first time since 2001. They automatically qualified for a spot in the Fiesta Bowl on Jan. 2 by finishing sixth in the BCS standings.

"I think it's a great tribute to our coaching staff and our players that they were able to turn it around that fast," Weis said.

Ohio State (9-2) out of the Big Ten was assured an at-large bid by finishing fourth in the final standings released Sunday.

That left no room for Oregon, which had a better record and BCS average than the Irish.

Shaq visits Lakers

By Beth Harris
ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES - Shaquille O'Neal dropped in on the last-place Lakers, soaked up a standing ovation, and split before his former team eked out a win over the Charlotte Bobcats.

If he had stuck around, O'Neal would have seen Kobe Bryant make two free throws with seven seconds remaining for a 99-98 victory Sunday night.

O'Neal created a stir when he strode to his courtside seat during a timeout late in the second quarter. The quiet crowd suddenly erupted when O'Neal's smiling face was shown on the overhead screen.

"I didn't see him, but I heard the noise and wondered what was going on," coach Phil Jackson said. "It was great he came by."

O'Neal was in town ahead of Miami's game against the Clippers last night. He is still recovering from a sprained ankle and left at halftime.

At first, Bryant said he hadn't spotted O'Neal, with whom he shared a tenuous relationship during their years in Los Angeles. Then he admitted he had, but said the big man's presence had "zero" effect on the Lakers.

Bryant's 9-for-30 shooting didn't help matters, but he made 11-of-12 free throws and finished with 29 points.

"We were sluggish," he said. "Physically, it was tough to get going. My legs felt like they were in cement. I just had to keep pushing, pushing, pushing."

Jackson said, "He has to shoot better than that if he's going to take that many shots."

Chris Mihm added 21 points, and Lamar Odom tied his career high with 11 assists and 10 rebounds for the Lakers. Sasha Vujacic had a career-high 12 points.

Melvin Ely scored 20 points, Brevin Knight added 17, and Emeka Okafor grabbed 12 rebounds for the Bobcats, who lost their ninth in a row on the road.

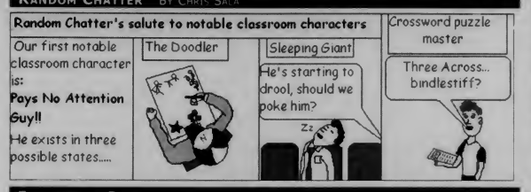
You heard it was coming,
Now it's here!
THE SCORE
THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN SPORTS MAGAZINE
Meet your favorite UMass Athletes
Win Prizes, special guest speakers, music by WMUA
ADMIT ONE YOUR COPY
PICK UP YOUR COPY BEFORE THE UMASS VS BC HOCKEY GAME
December 10th
4-7pm
Behind the Mullins Center

FRUSTRATED?
PUZZLED?
DO YOU HAVE:
- a grade dispute?
- teacher, roomate or job concerns?
- billing problems?
- harassment?
- ...or any other University related problems?

THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP
(confidentially, of course)
students, faculty, and staff are all welcome
823 Campus Center
Office Hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.
telephone: 413-545-0867
fax: 413-545-9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

NOW THROWING at PETE'S
NEW BURGERS
NEW MEAL DEALS
FAMOUS FOR 2 BURGS FOR 2 BUCKS
HAMBURGERS - HOT DOGS - GRINDERS
CHICKEN - SEAFOOD - FRIES
PHILLY CHEESE STEAKS
SHAKES - SMOOTHIES - FLOATS
HARD ICE CREAM & SOFT SERVE
PETE'S DRIVE-IN
287 Russell St.
Route 9 - Hadley
585-0241
petesdrivein.com

ARE YOU READY FOR THE SCORE?
SATURDAY!



PULP By Richard Martelly

ELSIE HOOPER By Robert D. Krysowski

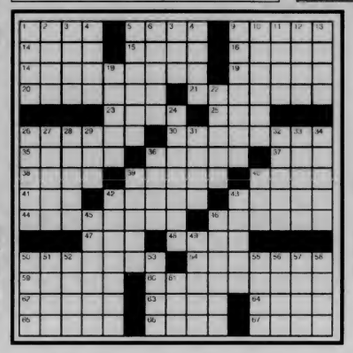
RANDOM CHATTER By Chris Sala

FUNCTIONAL DYSTOPIA By Zeid Rusan

THE FAMILY MONSTER By Josh Shalek

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"Nobody's happy in a poodle skirt and a sweater set."



—Pleasantville

ACROSS
1 Backgammon requirement
5 Trig function
9 Billiards shot
14 Scent
15 Egg-shaped
16 Splash
17 Weds again
19 Mapes
20 Use a yardstick
21 Plane curve
23 Silent assents
25 Lubricate
26 Easygoing
30 Food poisoning
35 Hunter in the sky
36 Mine cars
37 Neither's partner?
38 Telephone
39 Bird for cooking
40 Edison's middle name
41 Top trump
42 Restaurant bill
43 Peeresses
44 Belittling a retired woman
46 Intense competition
47 Long, long time
48 Noah spar
50 Exposes
54 Year of origin
59 Military blockade
60 Exactly the same
62 "Luck and Pluck" penner
63 Connection
64 Latvian capital
65 Phobias
66 Allows to
67 First garden

DOWN
1 Campus digs
2 ... like
3 Suspended consciousness
4 Time frames
5 Grief
6 Covered with climbing vines
7 Highland negative
8 Otherwise
9 Adherents of Islam
10 Hun leader
11 Ladder part
12 Stitches
13 Scottish Gaelic
18 Talk at length
22 Seems imminent
24 ... up (heatened)
26 Virtuous
27 Author Jong
28 Like notebook paper
29 Snip's diary
31 Piece of work
32 Shoreline indentation
33 Fictional work
34 Rub out
36 Arduous trip
39 Use one's head
40 Knack
42 Some relief pitchers
43 Lacking vigor
45 Test-pilot Chuck
46 Flashes on and off
49 Happening
50 Armed services grp.
51 Aiewan's river
52 Bucks or phone lead-in
53 Window ledge
55 Become weary
56 Corrosive stuff
57 Type of plum
58 Vivacity
61 Cease to function

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

THE HARP
NEW!! Wireless Internet
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted
Irish Pub
December Special!
$1.50 PBR Bottles; Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 A pint / $6.50 a pitcher
Tonight: • TRIVIA NIGHT!
Wed. • Cold Duck Complex
"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst
just north of the apartments

Submit your comic!
e-mail
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

HOROSCOPES

aquarius JAN. 20-FEB. 18
If frogs gross you out then stay away from bio classes.

pisces FEB. 19-MAR. 20
Do not attempt to cheat on your test tomorrow. You will be caught.

aries MAR. 21-APR. 19
The subjects of math and science are definitely not your strong point.

taurus APR. 20-MAY 20
You will spill milk all over yourself at lunch today.

gemini MAY 21-JUN. 21
You will be caught singing along to holiday music at an absurd volume.

cancer JUN. 22-JUL. 22
If you share your pizza with your friends you won't end up with a tummy ache.

leo JUL. 23-AUG. 22
Wearing a button-down shirt with sweat pants is never socially acceptable.

virgo AUG. 23-SEPT. 22
Your shoes will smell like soy sauce by the end of the day.

libra SEPT. 23-OCT. 22
You really need to vacuum your room before leaving for break.

scorpio OCT. 23-NOV. 21
You will never use all of those sandwich bags.

sagittarius NOV. 22-DEC. 21
It is not wise to give a fruitcake to someone unless you don't like them.

capricorn DEC. 22-JAN. 19
You may not know it, but winter is by far your favorite season.

★ Submit your comic ★
e-mail
collegiancomcis@yahoo.com

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Attention RSOs, Fraternities, Sororities & Club Sports: Hosting an event? Big match coming up? Running a charity drive? Advertise it here! It's the inexpensive and effective way to get the word out. Call 545-3500 today!

APARTMENT FOR RENT

1, 2, 3 & 4 Bedroom spacious apartments, Great location, Bus Route, All utilities included No Fee Call 413-253-3000

EMPLOYMENT

Carpenter's helper. Part-time. Pay equal to experience. Must be able to lift 50 lbs. 253-5351.

EMPLOYMENT

Winter Break Employment at the Boston University Bookstore! Many jobs are available through January. Stop by our JOB FAIR Dec.6 at the UMass Campus Center Concourse or email your resume to bnhmnres@bu.edu

Rent us your ears! Listening experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu Voicemail: 545-6837.

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience nees. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

HOUSE FOR RENT

New Salem 3 Bdrm 10 Acres easy commute $1,000+ 549-4401

For January, 2-3 Bedroom house. Walking distance to Northampton Center, close to bus. 1,000 + utilities, no pets. Skibiski Realtor 586-1827

LOST AND FOUND

ipod Found. 545-4369 ask for Ray

ROOM FOR RENT

413-335-5226 Mo. to mo. $325 inclusive 20 min to campus

Looking to rent out your room over break? Avertise here! 545-3500 M-F, 9-3.

SERVICES

Computer Diagnostic Desktop $9.95 Laptop $39.95 413-584-8857

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance. 549-1906

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

TRAVEL

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

SPRING BREAK FROM $569 BAHAMAS, CANCUN, ACAPULCO, JAMAICA! FREE PARTIES, FREE DRINKS. Sign up early and save. Organize a small group and you travel FREE. Or become a CAMPUS REP and GET PAID COMMISSION on each trip sold. Call today and get started 1-800-GET-SUN-1

WANTED

Leave your advertising needs to us!

Let our experienced advertising representatives and graphic artists take care of you!

Reach over 14,000 readers daily!

We offer a full range of ad sizes, as well as design services.

Contact our business department by calling (413) 545-3500. Or visit us in the Campus Center Basement.

Business Hours: M-F 8:30am - 3:30pm

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS TUESDAY

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 6, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Breaking onto the scene

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

Sebastian Telfair had already made it. The Brooklyn, N.Y. native was featured on the cover of Sports Illustrated while still in high school, and it was a well-known fact that the lightning quick point guard would be heading to the NBA when his high school career ended.

Telfair spent his senior year at Lincoln High School routinely dominating the top players in New York. The future lottery pick coasted through that senior season up until the New York State Class AA Federation Championship. That was where he ran into another one of the best point guards New York had to offer: Chris Lowe.

Lowe was a junior at Mount Vernon High School, which, like Lincoln, was a powerhouse program in New York. He, too, was beginning to gain something of a reputation.

He may not have been as flashy as Telfair, but Lowe still got the job done. And in that championship game, Lowe locked down the NBA-bound Telfair, holding him to a season-low 14 points and harassing him into 10 turnovers. Behind Lowe's defense, Mount Vernon prevailed 66-52, capturing the state championship.

Chris Lowe had arrived.

Fast forward to Nov. 18 of this year. Lowe was the only freshman and the only true point guard on a UMass squad expected to be much improved playing its first game of the season against Hartford.

With UMass and Hartford battling down to the wire, Lowe found himself on the floor in crunch time.

This may have been Lowe's first collegiate game, but it was far from the first big game he had played in, and he did not shy from the moment. Instead, he coolly led the Minutemen to a 67-62 victory.

It was mostly with his trademark defense, but he even knocked down a key jumper late in the game. Lowe finished the game with eight points, five rebounds and four assists.

Once again, Chris Lowe had arrived

...

You could say that Chris Lowe really arrived on the basketball scene when he enrolled at Mount Vernon High School. Mount Vernon had established a strong tradition and had produced numerous top players, including current NBA star Ben Gordon and Donald Russell, a 1985 UMass graduate who is the No. 6 leading scorer in school history.

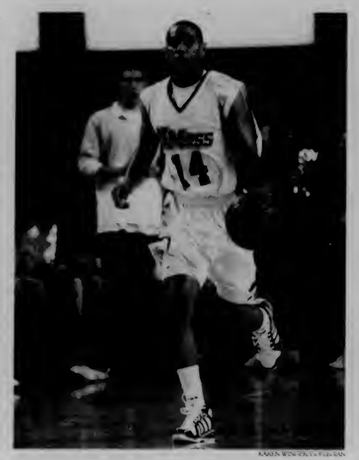
Lowe's high school team was no different, as his former teammates are currently sprinkled throughout Division I rosters, including schools such as Pittsburgh, St. John's and James Madison.

And while Lowe had played in some big games for the prestigious AAU New York Panthers, that Telfair matchup was the one that served as his coming out party.

"I was nervous because he came in with all the hype. My coach told me that I had to go out there and just block everything out and play my game," Lowe says. "I went out and thought about defense first. I was able to stop him and lead my team to a state championship.

I had hype before that, but that's when my hype really came — after that game."

With his increased stature in basketball circles, Lowe began to be targeted by college coaches. One of the first coaches that came calling was UMass's Travis Ford.



Ford recruited Lowe while he was still coaching at Eastern Kentucky during the summer before Lowe's senior year, but as Lowe's stock continued to rise and the bigger schools showed interest, Ford bowed out.

Lowe had narrowed his search to either St. John's or the University of Texas at El Paso during his senior year, but when Ford took over at UMass last March, things changed.

Ford knew he needed a point guard and he didn't have much time to recruit one, so he went back to Lowe now that he had a better opportunity to offer.

"He was my first phone call,"

See LOWE on page 8

KAREN SWINGER/COLLEGIAN

Freshman Chris Lowe has lived up to the hype since arriving at UMass. Lowe is averaging 7.3 points and 3.8 assists in his first season in Amherst.

Strong finishes for UM despite illnesses

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

After more than two months of hard training, the Massachusetts swimmers have grown sick and tired of it all.

Well, sort of.

In its final meet of the fall semester, in Providence, R.I. for the Brown Invitational at Brown University, many of the male and female swimmers came down with cold-like symptoms, putting an obvious strain on many of the athletes. Coupled with poor air circulation in the building, many of the Minutemen and Minutewomen had difficulty breathing.

Somehow and some way, both teams fought through it and ended up with strong finishes at the Brown Invitational, bringing new meaning to the term "getting down with the sickness." The men finished third, while the women placed fourth.

UMass returns to action on Jan. 7 when it heads to San Juan, Puerto Rico for the Sacred Heart Invitational.

The Princeton Tigers dominated both the men's and women's fields over the weekend. Princeton's men outscored host Brown by 546 points to take the field over Brown, UMass and Connecticut, while Princeton's women cushioned themselves by getting out to a huge lead on Day 1 en route to a victory.

Jake Hogue was the only event-winner of the weekend for the Minutemen, taking first in the 200-yard breaststroke final with a time of 2:10.84. Sophomore John Weaver was right behind him with a second place finish with 2:11.22.

"I said before the event [200 breast], 'Hey, we haven't won an event today,'" men's coach Russ Yarworth said. "Jake went out and changed all that, so that was cool."

Yarworth, who was feeling the cold-like symptoms as well, said he had a special reward for his men.

"I think when I talked at to them at the beginning of the year, part of our goal was teaching them and getting them acclimated," Yarworth said. "Their reward this weekend is to train hard until we break for Christmas. I think we're more focused than ever."

As for women's coach Bob Newcomb, he was pleased with his squad's performance. He predicted a third or fourth place finish before the event, and the Minutewomen responded by living up to his expectations, coming in fourth.

"I'm happy with the way we performed," Newcomb said. "Going into a meet against top Ivy schools, to be able to continually swim hard and register a lot of top times, I'm not disappointed at all. But it definitely brings up things we have to work on; we still have a lot of times to go. I'm real happy with where we are, but as a coach you always want to be better."

The Minutewomen had several of the top finishes for relay teams in the final rounds. Aimee Bourassa, Taryn Prout, Krista Narus and Kelly Hoffrage picked up fourth in the 800-yard relay with a time of 7:49.85, while the quartet of Allison Volpe, Melissa Stango, Narus and Nicole LeBarge picked up sixth in the 200-yard medley relay with a time of 1:52.21.

UMass to face former coach

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

It began with a cup of coffee in 1997.

Tonight, eight years later, Massachusetts hockey coach Don Cahoon and Merrimack coach Mark Dennehy will have their respective clubs battling for two Hockey East points at 7 p.m. in the Mullins Center.

After hitting the rewind button on your remote control to take you back to the time when Ace of Base was still on the radio, the Y2K bug was still scary and President Bill Clinton had the national economy ripe and roaring, you'll also see a time when Cahoon, then the head coach at Princeton, was looking for a new assistant coach.

Cahoon got some advice from an old coach at Boston University who mentioned that Dennehy was looking to move on from his volunteer coaching job here at UMass, and since Cahoon had once recruited Dennehy, a hot hockey prospect even in the eighth grade, he figured he'd give it another shot.

"Mark and I got in touch with each other," Cahoon said. "We ended up meeting, having a cup of coffee together and shooting the breeze. The next thing I know, I'm offering him a job at Princeton."

For Dennehy, it was his first official gig on the bench, and he took off running — or skating — with it. After three years in the Ivy League with Cahoon, Dennehy was hired to take the head coaching job at Fairfield before leaving to rejoin Cahoon when he was hired in Amherst back in 2000.

And then again last summer, the two parted ways — maybe for the last time — when Dennehy got the job in North Andover to rebuild a team that finished last season buried deep in the Hockey East basement after winning just a single league game in 24 tries.

Up until last week, it seemed that the more things changed in Merrimack (4-7-2 1-5-2 Hockey East), the more they really stayed the same, as the Warriors had lost 20 consecutive Hockey East games. But a week ago tonight, Dennehy's team finally broke the ice, knocking off New Hampshire 1-0 — shutting out the most explosive offense in the league and a team that was atop the league standings at that point.

And it didn't end there. Over the weekend, Merrimack skated to a pair of ties during a home-and-home series with Northeastern, meaning the Warriors pulled into a ninth-place tie with the Minutemen (4-8-0 2-5-0 Hockey East), who haven't played a conference game since their 2-1 win over Vermont on Nov. 22.

KAREN SWINGER/COLLEGIAN

Senior defenseman Marvin Degon and the Minutemen host Merrimack tonight at 7 p.m.

Since the teams in the lower half of the Hockey East standings are all stumbling a bit of late — with the exception of Merrimack's three-game unbeaten streak and UMass's three wins in four outings — a solid string of games before winter break could shuffle the league standings significantly.

"I've got to really block that out, and Mark will do

See HOCKEY on page 8

Ramirez headlines meetings

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

DALLAS — The winter meetings are back in Texas for the first time since 2000, when teams spent nearly $739 million on 24 free agents, including $252 million on Alex Rodriguez and $160 million to Manny Ramirez.

With many top free agents this offseason already committed, the focus this time around is likely to be on trades rather than signings.

Relievers Billy Wagner and B.J. Ryan, first baseman Paul Konerko, outfielder Brian Giles and shortstop Rafael Furcal already have agreed to contracts, with Furcal leaving the Atlanta Braves over the weekend to accept a $39 million, three-year offer from the Los Angeles Dodgers.

Top remaining players in a weak free-agent group include center fielder Johnny Damon and pitchers A.J. Burnett and Kevin Millwood. With a paucity of top talent available to sign, there will be plenty of trade talk going on at baseball's annual swap session, which had been devoid of big-name deals in recent years.

"This particular free-agent market is difficult," said New York Yankees general manager Brian Cashman, stymied in his search for a center fielder. "Because of that, it's going to promote a lot more aggressive trade discussions."

Ramirez, unhappy with life in Boston despite winning the World Series MVP award in 2004, is the biggest name available. But he can veto trades and is owed $57 million over the final three years of his contract, complicating efforts to deal him by the Red Sox, the only major league team without a general manager.

"He's still one of the top three or four hitters in baseball," Boston assistant GM Jed Hoyer said, adding that more than a dozen teams have inquired. "They haven't been able to meet the price that we would want for Manny. We're certainly not going in with the expectation that we're going to have to make a trade. Teams would have to step up and beat our expectations."

Florida has been the most active team in the trade market, dealing 2003 World Series MVP Josh Beckett and third baseman Mike Lowell to Boston, first baseman Carlos Delgado to the New York Mets and second baseman Luis Castillo to Minnesota.

Catcher Paul Lo Duca has joined Delgado on the Mets, and center fielder Juan Pierre appears to be available. "Obviously we have been very active. I would anticipate as we head to Dallas we're going to remain active," said Marlins general manager Larry Beinfest, who has cut about $32 million from a payroll that was $60 million at the start of last season.

Pitchers who could be switching teams include Boston's David Wells, Oakland's Barry Zito, the Mets' Kris Benson and Arizona's Javier Vazquez, who filed a trade demand last month.

Texas might part with a pair of All-Stars, second baseman Alfonso Soriano and third baseman Hank Blalock, as it seeks pitching. Tampa Bay catcher Toby Hall and Philadelphia's Bobby Abreu and Pat Burrell could possibly get dealt, as could outfielder Jason Michaels.

"We've had enough dialogue that something could happen," said new Texas general manager Jon Daniels, at 28 the youngest GM in the majors. Blalock could be a fit for Minnesota, looking for a third baseman and a designated hitter after acquiring Castillo on Friday.

"You can kind of compress exactly who you need to talk to," Twins general manager Terry Ryan said. "You diminish your needs a little bit, and now you can move on to the next."

Arizona, Baltimore, the Los Angeles Dodgers, Philadelphia, Tampa Bay, Texas head into the meetings with new GMs.

"There are so many people down there, it can be somewhat hectic," Oakland general manager Billy Beane said. "We all go into the meetings expecting a lot. Once a guy signs, that speeds up trade talks. With a lot of new GMs in place who are probably looking to do something, there is an atmosphere of anticipation."

Free agents still on the market include designated hitters Mike Piazza and Frank Thomas, relievers Bob Wickman and Trevor Hoffman, catchers Bengie Molina and Ramon Hernandez, and outfielder Sammy Sosa. Then there's Nomar Garciaparra, who appears willing to play just about any position.

Pitcher Paul Byrd and Cleveland agreed Monday to a $14.25 million, two-year deal.

Baseball's big free-agent deadline passes at midnight EST on Wednesday. Free agents not offered salary arbitration by their former clubs before the deadline can't re-sign until May 1. After the deadline, teams won't lose draft picks for signing any free agent not offered arbitration.

"It's quite possible it could be a dog and pony show until after Dec. 7," San Francisco Giants general manager Brian Sabean said late last week.

Teams that didn't land their top free-agent choices are trying other paths.

"We were looking at Konerko, but I think now what we're going to have to do is get some alternatives in place," Angels manager Mike Scioscia said. "If a magic bat isn't added to our lineup, hopefully we'll have some help from in-house."

Cashman said the narrowing of choices forces decisions.

"When people strike out on Plan A, B, C and D," he said, "they go into overdrive for the remaining opportunities. And, therefore, teams are more willing to do certain things in mid-December and January that they may not have considered doing in early November."

ROB TRINGALI JR./SPORTING NEWS-USA TODAY

Boston Red Sox left fielder Manny Ramirez is the biggest name available at the MLB winter meetings currently taking place in Texas.

Dream matchups for the BCS

By Ralph D. Russo
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — For once, the Bowl Championship Series gets to gloat.

With a glitzy lineup that gives the critics little reason to gripe, the BCS has never looked better.

The Rose Bowl is perfect with Southern California and Texas, the nation's only unbeatens.

The Orange Bowl is a game for the ages — and the aged matching septuagenarian coaches Joe Paterno of Penn State and Bobby Bowden of Florida State.

Notre Dame is back on the big stage, meeting Ohio State in a Fiesta Bowl soaked in tradition.

Georgia gives the relocated Sugar Bowl a "home" team in Atlanta, facing a West Virginia squad that even makes the Big East look good.

Only Oregon has a case to complain.

"I certainly understand that there are teams that are not in these four games that have had a great seasons, as we have every year," BCS coordinator and Big 12 commissioner Kevin Weiberg said Sunday. "I must say that there's a lot of consensus that we have quality matchups among highly regarded teams in this year's BCS games."

Seemingly on a collision course all season, USC and Texas will decide the national title in Pasadena, Calif., on Jan. 4.

"They do have the No. 1 team in the country," Texas coach Mack Brown said of the two-time defending champion Trojans. "They've just blown out people out right and left, and that will be challenge for us. But that's fun.

"For Texas not to be in the national championship game for 36 years and to see where [USC coach] Pete [Carroll] has brought their program the last three years, that's where we want to be. That's where we want to go."

The BCS has been hammered in the past for putting the wrong teams in its championship games. Two years ago, USC was left out and college football ended up with two champs. Last season, many felt Auburn should have played USC for the championship instead of Oklahoma.

The other common complaint is the BCS doesn't create compelling matchups beyond the title game. Well, it all worked out this season.

Yes, Texas and USC made it easy for the BCS. But

See BCS on page 8

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Wednesday, December 7, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXVI Issue 61

Four arrested in Southwest dorm burglary

Four men were apprehended in parking lot 11 in the Southwest Residential Area early Friday morning after burglarizing at least three cars, according to UMass Deputy Police Chief Patrick Archibald.

Patrick S. Ryan, 18, of 48 Farragut Avenue in Medford and Andrew Harley Kata, 18, of 494 Tiffany Street in Springfield were arrested and charged with breaking and entering at night to commit a felony, possession of a class D substance, larceny under $250 and possession of a burglarious instrument in relation to the incident.

Ronald Pena, 18, of 1 Chapel Lane in East Wareham and Jeffrey J. Cezo, 18, of 104 Eaton Place in Voorhees, N.J. were also arrested and charged with breaking and entering at night to commit a felony, larceny under $250 and possession of a burglarious instrument.

Plain-clothed UMPD officers on patrol in lot 11 observed four males acting suspiciously around 2:30 a.m., according to Archibald. Officers observed the men for about 15 minutes.

The police officers said the men did not appear to be going to any vehicle and were roaming around the lot. The males were then approached by the officers.

"[The officers said they] began to search the parking lot and found some items missing from one car, and another car was found to be open," Archibald said.

Upon searching the lot, police officers found that three cars had been burglarized: a 2002 Jeep Wrangler, a 1998 Honda Civic and a 1998 Pontiac Grand Am. At least five items were stolen from the vehicles, including a screwdriver, a cell phone charger, a car ionizer and a spare key to the Honda Civic.

According to the arresting officers, Ryan admitted to breaking into the cars with his friends. Police also say they found Ryan and Kata in possession of marijuana and a marijuana pipe.

"[Ryan] said he and others planned ahead… he was asked to bring tools just in case they would need them to break into the cars," Archibald said.

Police later got in contact with one of the vehicle's owners, who recovered the stolen items from the UMass police station.

—Dan O'Brien

Cheney warns nation about loss of nerve in Iraq

By Tom Raum
Associated Press

FORT DRUM, N.Y.—Vice President Dick Cheney told military troops Tuesday that terrorists can win in Iraq only "if we lose our nerve and abandon our mission." He rejected calls for a speedy drawdown of troops.

"This would be unwise in the extreme," Cheney told the troops, some just back from Iraq.

With snow falling outside, Cheney spoke in a cavernous aviation hangar on this base in northern New York, addressing an audience that base officials put at around 3,000.

It was the latest installment in the administration's effort to shore up slumping support for the war with a series of speeches ahead of Dec. 15 elections to pick a permanent Iraqi government.

President Bush, who gave a speech last week at the U.S. Naval Academy highlighting progress in training Iraqi army and police forces, was to speak in Washington on Wednesday on Iraq's recovering economy.

Cheney addressed a rally attended by the Army's 10th Mountain Division and the Army National Guard's 42nd Infantry Division, drawing frequent cheers and shouts.

He later sat down with about two dozen members of the 42nd Infantry Division to discuss their experiences in Iraq, telling them their work was "extraordinarily important ... and the subject of considerable debate, as it should be."

The Troy, N.Y.-based 42nd Infantry, whose commander oversaw a task force of 24,000 troops in north-central Iraq, had about 3,500 guardsmen return home in November.

Maj. Gen. Joseph Taluto, the commander, told Cheney the performance of U.S. troops in Iraq was inspiring. "Case closed," Taluto said.

Cheney praised recent comments by Sen. Joseph Lieberman, the Connecticut Democrat who was his vice presidential opponent in the 2000 election, suggesting that too hasty a U.S. withdrawal would erase nearly all the progress made by the United States in Iraq and the Middle East.

"He is entirely correct. On this, both Republicans and Democrats should be able to agree. The only way the terrorists can win is if we lose our nerve and abandon our mission," Cheney said.

Lieberman, at a news conference in Washington, urged support for Bush. "It's time for Democrats who distrust President Bush to acknowledge he'll be commander in chief for three more years," Lieberman said. "We undermine the president's credibility at our nation's peril."

Several other Democrats sent Bush a letter saying his speech Wednesday should include "a full and complete strategy for success with the political, economic and military benchmarks by which to measure the progress."

"Our concern is President Bush's policies are making us less safe, less secure," Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, one of the signers.

Bush's effort to rebuild support on Iraq comes as polls show Bush's approval rating at the lowest of his presidency: 37 percent in a recent AP-Ipsos poll, with a majority of Americans now saying the war was a mistake.

One of the administration's harshest critics in recent weeks has been Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., a longtime hawk on military matters who now wants U.S. troops to pull out of Iraq.

Murtha suggested Tuesday that the administration was trying to justify the U.S. presence in Iraq by saying it was necessary to fight terrorism. Instead, Murtha said the problem was insurgents rebelling against the U.S. presence and U.S.-backed government.

"When you fight an insurgency, you have to win the hearts and minds of the (Iraqi) people, and we've lost the hearts and minds of the people," Murtha told NBC's "Today" show. Once the U.S. withdraws from Iraq, he said, the Iraqis themselves would take care of terrorist groups.

Vice President Dick Cheney suggested that Americans patience in the war efforts is crucial to completing the war against terror, in a aviation base in northern New York, Tuesday.

Panel chairman took donations while lobbying

By Mary Clare Jalonick
Associated Press

WASHINGTON—Sen. Conrad Burns and his staff met Jack Abramoff's lobbying team on at least eight occasions and collected $12,000 in donations around the time that the lawmaker took legislative action favorable to Abramoff's clients in the Northern Mariana Islands, records show.

The 2001 donations to Burns, a Montana Republican, included money directly from Abramoff and a key garment company executive in the Pacific islands who was part of the coalition paying Abramoff's firm to fend off stronger U.S. regulations on the islands.

In addition, two Burns staffers had accepted a trip arranged by Abramoff to attend the Super Bowl in Florida earlier that year.

At the time, Burns served on the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee that was considering legislation the Marianas opposed. He also ran a Senate appropriations subcommittee that controlled spending for the Interior Department, which regulates U.S. territories including the islands.

On May 23, 2001, Burns voted against a bill in the Senate Energy Committee that would have phased out a nonresident contract worker program benefiting the Marianas' garment industry. The committee approved the bill, but it never saw action on the Senate floor. In 1999, it had moved through the same committee by unanimous consent without objections from Burns or any other member.

Burns' office told The Associated Press this week that he could not recall why he didn't object to the bill in 1999 but that his opposition in 2001 was prompted by a report indicating changes to immigration laws could hurt the islands' economy. He said it wasn't influenced by Abramoff or any donations.

Abramoff's billing records, which AP obtained from the U.S. territorial islands under an open records request, show that in the three months before the vote, the lobbyist's team met twice with Burns and several more times with his Senate aides to discuss Marianas issues.

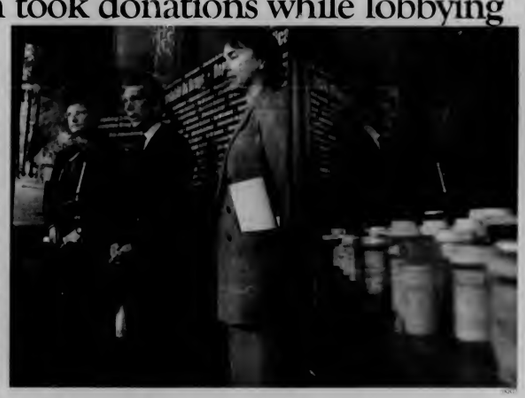
One of those meetings, between Burns' staff and Abramoff associate Todd A. Boulanger, occurred just six days before the vote.

Abramoff donated $5,000 to Burns' political action committee in February, just before the meetings started. His firm, Greenberg Traurig, donated $2,000 to Burns in March and Eloy Inos of Saipan donated $5,000 in April.

The Inos donation was first reported by Lee Newspapers on Dec. 3. Inos listed his employer as Tan Holdings, a member of the Saipan Garment Manufacturers Association, another Abramoff client.

The Justice Department is investigating whether Abramoff, already charged with fraud in a Florida case, won any undue influence through donations and favors.

Burns defended the meetings, saying they are part of the democratic process.



"Advocates, paid and unpaid, exercising their right to petition their government provide information on many issues but you always know that they are representing a particular position based upon their client or issue preference," he said Dec. 5.

In all, AP stories over the last few months have documented how more than four dozen lawmakers, Republicans and Democrats, took actions favorable to Abramoff clients around the time that they received large donations from the lobbyist and his clients.

Burns, who is up for re-election to a fourth term in 2006, received about $150,000 in donations from Abramoff, his firm and his clients between 2001 and 2004.

Burns said he hasn't been contacted by federal investigators in the Abramoff probe nor received any subpoenas. On Nov. 28, Burns wrote to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, urging that his conduct be reviewed so he could be cleared of wrongdoing.

Burns spokesman James Pendleton said he doesn't know whether Burns inserted the provision, but he did support it.

Sen. Tom Daschle, center, is flanked by Sen. Conrad Burns as he speaks in a news conference on Medicare. Burns is accused of collecting over $12,000 in donations for Jack Abramoff's lobbying team after taking questionable legislative actions.

Victims describe Saddam's brutal torture rituals

By Hamza Hendawi
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq—A woman whose identity was kept secret and voice masked took the stand in the trial of Saddam Hussein on Tuesday, testifying through tears that Saddam's men beat her as a teenager and forced her to take her clothes off.

Saddam sat stone-faced as the woman, identified only as "Witness A," told the court from behind a light blue curtain that she was taken into custody after the 1982 assassination attempt against the former Iraqi president in the town of Dujail.

The woman often cried during her testimony and repeatedly said she was forced to undress, implying that she had been raped but not saying so outright.

"I begged them, but they hit with their pistols," she said. "They made me put my legs up. There were five or more and they treated me like a bandy quet."

"Is that what happens to the virtuous woman that Saddam speaks about?" she wept, prompting the judge to advise her to stick to the facts.

The woman, who said she was 16 at the time of the Dujail incident, said Wadah al-Sheik, an Iraqi intelligence officer who died of cancer last month ordered her to take off her clothes.

"He continued administering electric shocks and beating me," she said.

The measures taken to preserve the woman's anonymity complicated the testimony. At first defense attorneys complained they could not hear her because of the voice distortion. Chief Judge Rizgar Mohammed Amin ordered the voice modulator shut off, but then the audience could not hear at all, so Amin ordered a recess, and the modulator was fixed, allowing the press and audience to hear.

Defense attorneys insisted on questioning the witness face to face and demanded that the defendants should also see her. So after she gave her testimony for over an hour, Amin ordered the session closed to the public, pulling screens in front of the press and visitors gallery and cutting the sound.

Amin said that defense attorneys would be told the identity of the witness but they must not pass the information to anyone outside the tribunal.

A second female, Witness B, then took the stand. After the 74-year-old began her testimony, the judge decided the voice modulator wasn't working properly and ordered it turned off and all of the electronic feeds from the courtroom cut, including to the press gallery.

Witnesses have the option of not having their identities revealed as a security measure to protect them against reprisals by Saddam loyalists. The first two witnesses — both males who took the stand Monday — allowed their names to be announced and their pictures shown.

Saddam and seven co-defendants are on trial for the killing of more than 140 Shiites in the town of Dujail north of Baghdad and could be executed by hanging if convicted. Monday's session was a stormy one, as Saddam repeatedly stood to chal-

See SADDAM on page 2

FEMA Email admits 'broken' Katrina response

By Lara Jakes Jordan
Associated Press

WASHINGTON—Facing a growing body count and shortages of food, water and ice, federal emergency officials braced for riots in Mississippi in the days following Hurricane Katrina, new documents reveal.

Federal Emergency Management Agency officials knew their response system had been shattered by the Aug. 29 storm and were unable to provide fast help — even when the needs were obvious.

"This is unlike what we have seen before," William Carwile, FEMA's former top responder in Mississippi, said in a Sept. 1 e-mail to officials at the agency's headquarters. He was describing difficulties in getting body bags and refrigerated trucks to Hancock County, Miss., which was badly damaged by the storm.

Carwile wrote that he personally authorized Hancock County to buy refrigeration trucks because "the coroner was going to have to start putting bodies out in the parking lot."

The next day, in another e-mail to headquarters about substandard levels of food, water and ice being distributed in Mississippi, Carwile reported, "System appears broken."

In a Sept. 1 exchange, FEMA regional response official Robert Fenton warned headquarters that the expected levels of water and ice being sent were far below what was needed.

"If we get the quantities in your report tomorrow we will have serious riots," Fenton wrote.

Responding, Carwile wrote: "Turns out this report is true. ... There seems to be no way we will get commodities in amounts beyond those indicated below. And it turns out these shortfalls were known much earlier in the day and we were not informed.

"Will need big time law enforcement reinforcements tomorrow," Carwile's e-mail continued. "All our good will here in MS will be very seriously impacted by noon tomorrow. Have been holding it together as it is."

The eight pages of correspondence among FEMA officials, provided Monday by a special House committee investigating the government response to the storm, followed the release last week by Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco of more than 100,000 documents. Taken together, the details from both states provide evidence of a system in disarray.

The House Government Reform Committee, chaired by Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., is reviewing hundreds of thousands of documents from local, state and federal officials who were involved in the disaster relief effort.

The committee is holding a hearing Tuesday to examine whether race and class issues affected the government's sluggish response. The hearing was requested by Rep. Cynthia McKinney, D-Ga., one of the few Democrats to participate in the investigation after their party leaders decided to boycott the inquiry, which they believe should be done by an independent commission.

The Louisiana documents released Friday revealed delays and state claims that requests for federal help weren't received, and reflected partisan battling between the Republican Bush administration and Blanco, a Democrat.

ARTS & LIVING

RULING TWO UNIVERSES
What makes musicians want to give up the dream of being a rock star in order to act?
Page 6

EDITORIAL/OPINION

NEW LIBRARY GREAT
With the new Learning Commons finally finished, students now have the library they always wanted.
Page 4

WEATHER

TODAY Mostly Sunny, H30°, L28°
TONIGHT Clear, H23°, L12°
TOMORROW Sunny, H31°, L17°

SPORTS

WARRIORS CONTROLLED
UMass hockey dropped Merrimack College and former Minuteman coach Mark Dennehey last night.
Page 12

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Michael A. Busack
MANAGING EDITOR Cameron J. Woods
BUSINESS MANAGER Hirak Shah
PRODUCTION MANAGER Nicky Belanger
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Sherel Wolnik
ADVERTISING MANAGER Kerry O'Grady
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Lauren Egavian
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Amanda Allen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Matthew O'Rourke
COPIES EDITOR Amanda Allen
EDITORIAL EDITOR Allison Edles
NEWS EDITOR Dan O'Brien
PHOTO EDITOR Kate Sachsenmaier
SPORTS EDITOR Jeff Howe
CIRCULATION MANAGER Thomas Hecht
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Nick Gleason
FINANCE MANAGER Daniel Conti
HUMAN RESOURCE Phil Smoller
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Caren Tortorici
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Nathan Chomsky
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Mackenzie Isler
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Jim Jones
ASSISTANT NEWS Megan Daley
ASSISTANT NEWS Matt Belliveau
ASSISTANT PHOTO Elizabeth Cariti
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eric Athas
ASSISTANT SPORTS Dan Duggan
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Kristen LaCasse

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS ACADEMIC SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE NEWS IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1936. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967. THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN AWARDED SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 5:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Michael A. Busack
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Jen Kennedy
COPY EDITOR
Dan O'Brien
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Amanda Allen
PRODUCTION STAFF
Matthew Fox, Allie Mamone

Saddam loses temper again, vows not to return

SADDAM from page 1

lenge the judge and witnesses.

But on Tuesday, the ousted leader and his former officials sat largely silently, listening intently as Witness A spoke.

She described four years in Saddam's prisons after she and other families were swept up in Dujail following the shooting attack on Saddam's motorcade. She said she was held and tortured at a detention facility there before being taken to the notorious Abu Ghraib prison outside Baghdad. Later they were taken to a desert facility outside the southern city of Samawa.

At the Dujail facility, she said she was thrown into a room with red walls and ceiling in an intelligence department building and that prisoners were given only bread and water to eat.

"I could not even eat because of the torture," she said.

At Abu Ghraib, the guards stripped one of her male relatives, a deaf mute, and tied a rope to his genitalia, pulling him into the cells where the women were kept, she said.

She said one of her relatives wanted to give birth in jail. "The baby was out. When some women tried to help her, the guards prevented them," and the baby died, she said.

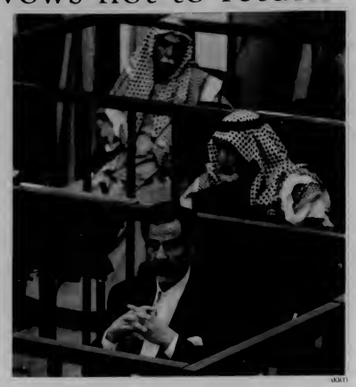
In Monday's session, a defiant Saddam sought to take control of the proceedings through boisterous outbursts, declaring at one point that "I am not afraid of execution" and denouncing the trial run according to "American rules."

Despite the sometimes free-for-all atmosphere Monday, the trial's first witnesses offered chilling accounts of killings and torture using electric shocks and a grinder during a 1982 crackdown against Shiites.

Ahmed Hassan Mohammed said he saw a machine that "looked like a grinder" with hair and blood on it in a secret police center in Baghdad where he and others were tortured for 70 days. He said detainees were kept in "Hall 63."

Mohammed recalled how security agents rounded up townspeople of all ages, from 14 to more than 70.

"There were mass arrests. Women and men. Even if a child was 1-day-old, they used to tell his parents, 'Bring him with you,'" Mohammed said.



The testimony drew an angry response from Saddam, who suggested that Mohammed needed psychiatric treatment and accused the court of bowing to American pressure.

"When the revolution of the heroic Iraq arrives, you will be held accountable," Saddam warned the chief judge.

"This is an insult to the court," Amin responded. "We are searching for the truth."

"How can a judge like yourself accept a situation like this?" Saddam asked. "This game must not continue. If you want Saddam Hussein's neck, you can have it. I have exercised my constitutional prerogatives after I had been the target of an armed attack.

When Mohammed objected to some of Saddam's remarks, the former president snapped: "Do not interrupt me, son."

Saddam Hussein and other defendents are charged with ordering the deaths of 148 young Shi'ite men in the town of Dujail, north of Baghdad.

police log

Two arrested for drug possession

Tuesday November 29

Joshua J. Aldrich, 22, of 23 Neale Street in Royalston was arrested at 8:28 p.m. and charged with operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license after he was observed driving his car through Lot 22 near Southwest.

Wednesday November 30

Ludlow police responded to a call of a burglary at Boyden gym at 7:48 a.m. A victim claimed to have had valuables stolen from an unlocked locker.

Alexandra C. Kayat, 20, of 104 East Street in Carlisle was arrested at 9:26 p.m. for assault and battery. Officers responded to Johnson Dormitory in Northeast on a report that a female had struck her boyfriend in the face. Police say a verbal argument between Kayat and her boyfriend became physical, and agreed that she had indeed struck her boyfriend.

Friday December 2

Mikhail Glazomitsky, 18, of 28 Cleveland Avenue in Wilmington and Ruddys A. Pimentel, 23, of 9 Ridge Street in Roslindale were both arrested by Massachusetts State Police in the town of Orange after an incident stemming from a suspicious activity call in the Southwest Residential Area at 9:01 p.m. Officers in plain clothes observed what they believed to be a drug transaction in Southwest, which involved students and a male, who was later identified as Glazomitsky. Glazomitsky left the area in a car after the alleged transaction and was followed by police. Eventually, the State Police were called in for assistance. State troopers stopped the car in Orange, before arresting the two men for possession of approximately one pound of marijuana.

Saturday December 3

Police responded to a report of breaking and entering at Lincoln Apartments on Lincoln Avenue at 11:45 a.m. A caller reported that someone had broken into a mechanical room. However, no items were reported missing.

Sunday December 4

Charalambus Alki Philippou, 19, of 10 Lake Street, Apartment 4E in White Plains, N.Y. was arrested at 1:17 a.m. and charged with operating a vehicle without a license and operating a vehicle on a sidewalk. An officer stated he saw a car driving southwest down the sidewalk in front of the School of Management Building. The officer stopped the driver, later identified as Philippou, who was unable to produce a driver's license.

-Compiled by Dan O'Brien

Offical wants to lower drinking age for troops

By Amanda Masker
The Daily Iowan (U. Iowa)

Despite the right to sign a lease, vote for the president, and lay their lives on the line, one thing 18-year-olds legally cannot do is have a beer.

New Hampshire state Rep. Jim Splaine wants to change that for a special sector of 18-year-olds in his state.

The Democrat has sponsored a bill to lower the legal drinking age for military personnel to 18, arguing that the United States is "disrespecting" the young men and women who are sent into harm's way by not allowing them a glass of wine before they leave for war.

"This is not a way to reward or thank the troops," Splaine said on Monday.

But the military does not seek such special accommodations, an official representing Iowa soldiers said on Monday.

"We wear the uniform to protect the rights of all people," said Lt. Col. Greg Hapgood, the public-affairs officer for the Iowa National Guard. "We don't want to be treated any differently."

The bill, if approved, will only affect people in New Hampshire, and an Iowa lawmaker said on Monday he would be surprised if similar legislation would pass in this state.

But Splaine argues that if 18-year-olds are being taught to use a weapon, they should be able to consume alcohol responsibly. In fact, he believes all adults should be able to legally drink but said he can only do one thing at a time.

Setting the drinking age set at 21 "makes alcohol a forbidden fruit," he said.

"We are creating a generation of criminals," he said, adding that young people drink regardless of the laws on the books.

Lowering the drinking age to 18 would provide the needed alcohol education to people that age, because they would then be able to drink in a safer environment, Splaine argued.

MULLET NIGHT!!!
Hockey vs. Boston College
SATURDAY 7pm
first 1,000 fans get free Mullet Wigs!
Toy Drive ... first 100 fans to donate a new toy get a free Popcorn courtesy of UMass Concessions.

UMASS MEN'S BASKETBALL
Men's Basketball vs. BU
MONDAY 7pm
ALL UMASS FACULTY & STAFF GET 2 FREE TICKETS. SHOW YOUR UMASS ID AT THE BOX OFFICE. FIRST COME FIRST SERVED...BASED ON AVAILABILITY.

Former professor acquitted on some charges of aiding terrorist

By Mitch Stacy
Associated Press

TAMPA, Fla.—In a stinging defeat for prosecutors, a former Florida professor accused of helping lead a terrorist group that has carried out suicide bombings against Israel was acquitted on nearly half the charges against him Tuesday, and the jury deadlocked on the rest. The case against Sami Al-Arian, 47, had been seen as one of the biggest courtroom tests yet of the Patriot Act's expanded search-and-surveillance powers.

After a five-month trial and 13 days of deliberations, the jury acquitted Al-Arian of eight of the 17 counts against him, including a key charge of conspiring to maim and murder people overseas. The jurors deadlocked on the others, including charges he aided terrorists.

Al-Arian, a former University of South Florida computer engineering professor, wept after the verdicts, and his attorney, Linda Moreno hugged him. He will return to jail until prosecutors decide whether to retry him on the deadlocked charges.

Two co-defendants, Sameeh Hammoudeh and Ghassan Zayed Ballut, were acquitted of all charges. A third, Hatem Naji Fariz, was found not guilty on 24 counts, and jurors deadlocked on the remaining eight.

The U.S. Justice Department had no immediate comment.

Federal prosecutors said Sami Al-Arian and his co-defendants acted as the communications arm of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad, spreading the word and raising money that went toward the suicide attacks that have killed hundreds.

Al-Arian was considered one of the most important terrorist figures to be brought to trial in the United States since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. His indictment in 2003 was hailed by then-Attorney General John Ashcroft as one of the first triumphs of the Patriot Act, which was enacted in the weeks after Sept. 11. The Patriot Act gave the government greatly expanded powers and broke down the wall between foreign intelligence investigations and domestic law enforcement. In the Al-Arian case, officials said, it allowed separate FBI investigations — one of them a yearslong secret foreign intelligence probe of the professor's activities — to be combined and all the evidence used against him.

Al-Arian, a Palestinian who was born in Kuwait, has lived in the United States since 1975. He was granted permanent-resident status in 1989 and denied U.S. citizenship in 1996. He was fired from the university shortly after he was indicted.

The federal jury heard from 80 government witnesses and listened to often-plodding testimony about faxes and wiretapped phone calls.

Demonstrators rally outside the Federal Court building in Tampa, Florida, in support of Sami Al-Arian, a University of South Florida professor. Al-Arian was acquitted of charges concerning aiding terrorists.

Scientists ponder new discovery in destruction of Titanic

By Jay Lindsay
Associated Press

FALMOUTH —For passengers clinging to life aboard the crippled Titanic, the fabled ship's terrifying final plunge to the ocean floor may have come much faster than previously thought, according to new research.

Previous researchers believed the ship broke in just two major pieces, the bow and stern. That's how the sinking was depicted in the 1997 film version of the catastrophe.

But the discovery of two large pieces of the Titanic's hull on the ocean floor, about 500 meters from the stern of the wreck, suggests that the ship sank much quicker in its final minutes than previously thought, researchers said Monday.

"What we assumed was it broke up because it sank," said David Brown, a Titanic historian.

The hull pieces, a crucial part of the ship's structure, make up a bottom section of the vessel that was missing when the wreck was first located in 1985, the researchers said.

After the bottom section of the hull broke free, the bow and stern split, said Roger Long, a naval architect who analyzed the find. The stern, which was still buoyant and filled with survivors, likely plunged toward the ocean floor about five minutes later.

Before the latest find, Brown estimated that the stern took 20 minutes to slide into the water.

"It turns out the Titanic was more merciful. It was over more quickly," Brown said.

The newly found hull sections, located about a third of a mile from the stern of the wreck, were examined during an expedition in August sponsored by The History Channel. On Monday, Titanic experts met at Woods Hole Oceanographic Institution to discuss their analysis of the find for a documentary to be aired on the cable channel on Feb. 26.

The sections, both about 40 feet by 90 feet, were once a single section and were found in good condition, with red bottom paint still visible. The missing sections had been believed to have fragmented into hundreds of small pieces.

The 46,000-ton ocean liner was billed as "practically unsinkable" by the publicity magazines of the period. But it struck an iceberg on its maiden voyage and sank about 2 1/2 hours later, on April 14, 1912. About 1,500 people died.

Explorer Robert Ballard found the bulk of the wreck in 1985, at a depth of 13,000 feet and about 380 miles southeast of Newfoundland. Ballard was not impressed with the expedition's find.

Before a crack split the ship down to the hull, Long said, the Titanic remained relatively stable. The hull remained intact for a while longer, but finally snapped under the pressure of water flooding into the ship.

Researchers said the apparent failure of the Titanic's hull, as revealed in the discovery, is not a reflection of the ship's engineering. Stephenson said the ship endured "unimaginable loads" before succumbing.

The discovery of two large pieces of the Titanic's hull on the ocean floor, about 500 meters from the stern of the wreck, suggests the ship sank much quicker than originally thought.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 7, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

New Learning Commons great with finals coming

The W.E.B. DuBois library is finally up to par with the expectations of the students it serves. With the new Learning Commons in full swing and now with the new extended hours, the library is now a place where students want to go to study. The layout, including the newly added group study rooms, is much more inclined to promote a good study environment. This is an atmosphere that University of Massachusetts students have been waiting for for far too long.

The changes to the library came after student suggestions were made as to what they would like to see differently. To accompany the Learning Commons, the library has also extended its hours. Now it will be open 24 hours a day, five days a week, in a response to the chief complaint being a request for extra hours. In a school where student requests and complaints go unnoticed on a regular basis, for the library staff to acknowledge the importance of having an accessible study atmosphere available when we need it is a necessity.

The Learning Commons, separate from the rest of the library's facilities, could not have been opened at a better time as final exam week begins to rear its ugly head. In addition to the added technology, the new layout of the Learning Commons has made it possible for the Writing Center and the Peer Tutoring Learning Resource Center to be made better known. For those students who are not in the English major or frequent the halls of Bartlett Hall, the Writing Center may not be very well known to the rest of the student body. Having it available in the library, a traffic center for the campus, will truly help students (not just English majors and those in the College of Humanities and Fine Arts) with their writing.

According to an article in the Daily Collegian, "The Learning Commons holds 400 laptop ports, 13 rooms for group study, 164 workstations and 16 email kiosks. It is a one-stop center for students looking for research and reference aid, as well as many other services." The services that the new library offers are not just set out to help students who wish to have a quiet atmosphere to study in, but also those who wish to do research or just get away from the dormitory environment. It serves as a safe haven for those who wish to get their work finished without the common distractions that come with living on a large college campus.

This improvement to the UMass community is just that, an improvement. This is only a first step in a long line of things that need to be accomplished in order to make this campus more student friendly. The renovations done to the Berkshire Dining Commons is also another step in the right direction. Hopefully UMass will continue with this chain of improvements and keep the student body in mind as they gear toward the future of this university.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

Privacy vs. safety

Greg Collins

The room and bag search policies under consideration by the administration raise important issues in balancing student privacy and student safety. In analyzing and debating these issues, students must control knee-jerk reactionary sentiments that stifle clear thinking. The feeling that the proposed policies reflect an authoritarian administration mindset is understandable. Yet, this sentiment promotes a closing of the human mind that is better opened up by encouraging alternative approaches to ensure campus safety.

UMass students are quick to point to statistics provided by UMass Health Services showing that most students drink responsibly. But a more inclusive view must be taken in order to evaluate the reasons why these new policies are under consideration in the first place. Reported incidents of public drunkenness, such as the Red Sox riots, and UMass' high ranking as a party school (it is doubtful that those Princeton Review grades evaluate the amount of apple juice consumed at parties) undermine student claims that the proposed measures are unnecessary. Would the administration be seriously considering implementing room and bag searches if irresponsible drinking leading to assaults, property destruction and harassment were not an escalating problem?

While statistics often expose the truth, sometimes the most accurate analysis develops from an empirical viewing of the issue at hand. It is true that alcohol is a problem on most college campuses and is not confined to UMass. However, a walk around campus on weekend nights exposes the ubiquity of the reckless and at times dangerous behavior of certain students. These students do more than abuse themselves and endanger others. They violate people's right to use clean public facilities and the expectation that they will not be confronted rudely by drunken students. Although the administration may curtail certain student rights if the room and bag searches are put into effect, it has not usurped the ability of students to demonstrate that these policies are unnecessary by conducting themselves in a responsible manner.

The motivation of the administration also deserves evaluation. Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano's e-mailed letter to students expressed a concern for the safety of UMass students. Yet the question remains whether the administration has a true moral desire to improve UMass safety and curb irresponsible drinking or whether it has a more urgent agenda to improve the public perception of UMass Amherst to outside individuals.

> Although the administration may curtail certain student rights if the room and bag searches are put into effect, it has not usurped the ability of students to demonstrate that these policies are unnecessary by conducting themselves in a responsible manner.

The public image of this university is very important, especially to Massachusetts taxpayers, but if the administration's paramount objective is to ensure campus security and safety, then why did it not take the initiative throughout the summer to ensure that room and bag searches would be implemented at the start of the 2005 fall semester? Surely the Red Sox riots were a strong indication of the potential danger excessive alcohol use can have on campus. Maybe it is because the recent national exposure of UMass as an unsafe party school motivated the administration to act more than the inherent issue of the safety and alcohol abuse on campus itself.

UMass students, including Student Government Association members, have raised concerns that new search policies may not withstand scrutiny under the United States and Massachusetts constitutions. This is a complex area, but students who feel that their rights have been violated for any reason, whether pursuant to a consistently applied search policy or a random search, should seek appropriate legal counsel. At this point, however, students can be more effective by proposing alternate approaches rather than pursuing threatening lawsuits.

Students may feel an additional amount of security if stricter alcohol policies do reduce the destructive behavior of students. Activist students courageously petition for various rights on this campus, but they are hesitant when defending a student's right to feel safe at a university when stricter alcohol policies are brought up as a possible remedy. Although not every sexual assault and battery on campus is a result of alcohol, and alcohol use should not be accepted as an excuse for such crimes, common sense suggests that limiting alcohol abuse will be a significant factor in curbing all abusive behavior.

The question UMass students should ask themselves is whether the decreased student privacy resulting from room and bag searches outweighs the potential benefit of increased safety on campus and the right of students to be free of violence and intimidating or harassing behavior. Numerous students, whether through the SGA or other forums, have promoted alternate initiatives, such as peer to peer counseling, improved campus lighting and transportation and safety awareness programs. If the new policy goes into effect, students could press for increased funding for legal counsel to protect student rights. While pursuing these activities, however, we should all remember that in our daily interactions with each other, we can by our own behavior set a tone that will make these policies unnecessary.

Greg Collins is a Collegian columnist.

One UMass student's bus story

Asif Khan

One of the things I appreciate the most about the Pioneer Valley, aside from the fall foliage and the open-minded attitudes of most people, is the PVTA and how students can ride the buses for free. I live in Northampton and I do not have a car. If I had to pay $2 everyday coming and going that would rack up to about $250 a semester which I save because of UMass and the PVTA. The buses also run until pretty late at night, especially on weekends, which is great when you have to go out because no one has to drive. The drivers are usually pretty friendly people and I always make sure I say "hi" to them and thank them when getting off.

I consider myself a pretty patriotic and proud UMass student. After working for development and fundraising here for four years, I have learned to appreciate the value of our institution and make sure I do not take it for granted. This last weekend my patriotism and pride of this school was badly hurt, and it was during a PVTA bus ride.

> After working for development and fundraising here for four years I have learned to appreciate the value of our institution and I make sure I do not take it for granted. This last weekend my patriotism and pride of this school was badly hurt, and it was during a PVTA bus ride.

This was the first time I took the bus back to Northampton at 10:30 p.m. on a Friday. Usually the bus back is quiet and I read or listen to music. This one started out the same way, but when we stopped at the Southwest stop, a large number of seemingly intoxicated kids got on. I have nothing against being seemingly intoxicated; many of us have been in that situation before I am sure and I commend them for taking the bus instead of driving in such a condition.

Since there were so many of them, the bus got a bit loud, which is also fine; there are a lot of loud talkers out there. But very soon the talking turned to screaming, people screaming from one end of the bus to the other and it was the kind of screaming that drowns out the music on your iPod at near full volume. Now I know that there are some times when we just have to tell our friends something important, no matter where we are. But I'm sorry, "Jake, I shouldn't have had those last three beers man" just doesn't quite cut it for me. The whole bus really did not need to know that. Jake could have waited for a little while.

Soon after these kids just got so loud and rowdy that the bus driver had to tell them several times to quiet down. Instead of listening to her, several beer and Smirnoff ice bottles started being kicked around on the floor and she was told to "Shut the f up." Now this lady drives the bus several times a night and is old enough to be our mother. And I can honestly say that, drunk or not, that is no way to talk to someone.

The whole situation got so bad that the middle-aged man sitting next to me wanted to "beat up these rude kids." If there has been any time when I wanted to teleport myself from a situation, it was then because being in the middle of a fight between an angry, older man and drunk college kids is not somewhere I ever want to be. He was also told to shut up and one very articulate young lady said that he "smelled like skunk."

The cable that one pulls to have the bus stop was not working, and as their stop was approaching they yelled rudely at the "f n driver" to stop the bus. She did, and they got off yelling more obscenities. The 10 minutes until the bus got to Northampton Center were almost as bad as the time spent with the people who had just gotten off the bus. The remaining people started to discuss the behavior of the people who had left. All my "defending UMass in front of private school kids" went out the window as there was nothing I could say in response because they were right.

Due to a group of students, the UMass name had once again been tarnished infront of other students and people. That bus driver is going to think twice before opting to take the UMass route; the man will be sure to tell everyone he knows how UMass kids behaved with someone more than twice their age and the Smith girls will be right when they say how trashy and offensive those UMass kids can be.

So please, take it as friendly advice, an observation or just a plain lesson in manners. You do not curse at someone who is firstly, much older than you, secondly a stranger and thirdly doing an important service for you free of charge, late at night. We all have the right to have fun and let loose but not at the expense of insulting someone's and our own dignity.

Asif Khan is a Collegian columnist.

Today's 'stab in the back' rule

Andrew Freeman

The general speaks to the legislature, explaining the military's defeat. He declares that the military itself was not dishonored in defeat — "No guilt applies to the good core of the army." Instead, it was "stabbed in the back," defeated by revolutionaries among the soldiers, rather than by the foreign armies.

It's Nov. 18, 1919. Field Marshall Hindenburg speaks to the German Reichstag, deflecting blame for the nation's loss in World War I from the military. From his speech comes the myth of the "stab in the back," which held that the army was betrayed by interior enemies, specifically leftists.

After the end of the Vietnam War in 1975, a similar myth arose in our country. The myth holds that the American military was winning the Vietnam War, but then anti-war protesters and a complicit liberal media created opposition to the conflict. This opposition resulted in the withdrawal of American troops, which in turn caused the ultimate collapse of our ally, South Vietnam.

It would take a whole series of columns to adequately rebut this myth. Suffice it to say, opposition to the war became widespread after 1968 for good reason — namely that many ordinary Americans were dissatisfied with the costs of the war — physical, psychological and moral. In USA Today polls taken from Aug. 7 to 12, 1968, a majority of Americans — 53 percent — viewed the war as a mistake, and that number grew as the conflict continued. As recently as November 2000, polls showed that 69 percent of Americans polled viewed the war as a mistake, with only 24 percent denying this. Nevertheless, the idea that the military was betrayed in South Vietnam by the public continues to the present, propagated throughout the Internet and conservative publications.

The notion of the "stab in the back" is relevant to our current situation in Iraq. Eventually our military will leave Iraq. If we do not emerge triumphant, then a new outcry will go out, and ultimately, the "true" enemies will be proclaimed — reporters, protesters and others who spoke out against the war — and implicitly, against the troops.

> Eventually our military will leave Iraq. If we do not emerge triumphant, then a new outcry will go out, and ultimately, the "true" enemies will be proclaimed — reporters, protesters and others who spoke out against the war — and impicitly, against the troops.

"The protester will do the work of the enemy, using the right of free speech against soldiers who are trying to deliver similar rights to the people of Iraq." This was written in an editorial by Thomas Bock, the National Commander of the American Legion, a veterans organization, in which he urged veterans to speak out against the anti-war movement.

Bock's claim is blatantly untrue. While members of the anti-war movement during the Vietnam War denounced soldiers and in some cases openly sympathized with the Communists, most people today that oppose the war support the troops. Significantly, the de facto speaker for the anti-war movement, Cindy Sheehan, is the mother of a soldier killed in Iraq.

Practically nobody in America supports Al Qaeda or the Iraqi insurgents, but opposition to the war is widespread. According to a USA Today poll taken last month, 54 percent of respondents believed the war in Iraq was a mistake.

The "stab in the back" mythology is a product of nationalism. The defeat in Vietnam, like the German loss in World War I, was a body blow to many nationalists. It undermined a previously unquestioned belief that we were right in our cause, that the U.S. military would always win and that our wars are just. Some people become distraught when their faith is crushed like this, while others seek a scapegoat to blame the defeat on. By targeting an individual or group for responsibility, the people, military and state are vindicated for the defeat.

Additionally, the idea of the "stab in the back" is often cynically propagated for political gain. General Hindenburg's idea undermined the newly established democratic government, which was dominated by Socialists. However, the military leadership had realized the necessity of surrender, knowing defeat was inevitable, and gave power to the Socialists to facilitate that surrender. Hindenburg, in 1919, was covering over his own culpability in the surrender of Germany. Similarly, the claim that all anti-war protesters hate American troops is a cynical political attack, meant to prop up an endeavor that many people rightfully oppose.

The "stab in the back" myth serves as a powerful rallying cry for disaffected nationalists, which can prove dangerous. In Germany, it was utilized rhetorically by the Nazi party, which claimed that the Jews had betrayed the nation and its soldiers, and caused the defeat of the German army. In our country, a similar myth is being used to smear the left and the wide array of people opposed to the war. In both cases, the "stab in the back" charge is cruel and antidemocratic.

Andrew Freeman is a Collegian columnist

The Collegian is hiring an assistant Ed/Op editor for the Spring semester.

Come down to the Collegian newsroom in the evenings to apply!
Ask for Allison or Kristen.

Sheehan: commander in grief?

Cameron MacPherson

Cindy Sheehan is at it ... again. This time, she's causing a ruckus in front of the White House and Crawford Ranch, hoping to gain more national attention by looking like the victim as she's tossed in the slammer by policemen doing their jobs. Now, on one hand, she has every right to be upset. Her son was killed fighting a war, which is loosing public support, and very well might be in violation of some international laws, and because of that, she has every right to be angry. But there is a big difference between being upset and running around the country taking pot shots at the bigwigs in charge in front of news cameras.

The problem with her actions is that she has sold out her son and his brothers in arms in order to further a political agenda. The grieving mom-turned political activist has met with liberal interest groups and people such as MoveOn.org, Michael Moore and other activists. Since when did grieving for one's son give someone omnipotent authority and credibility to make statements such as "Yes, [her son] was killed for lies and for a PNAC [Project for the New American Century] Neo-Con agenda to benefit Israel"? Her barnstorming has sunk down to the lowest levels of political activism: unsubstantiated cheap shots.

> What would [Cindy Sheehan's] son, or the thousands of other soldiers who have given their lives to make us safe, say to someone who used their deaths as a pawn to further a political agenda which uses half-truths and warped facts to make our president seem even worse in the national limelight?

What would her son, or the thousands of other soldiers who have given their lives to make us safe, say to someone who used their deaths as a pawn to further a political agenda which uses half-truths and warped facts to make our president seem even worse in the national limelight? The fact that our president may or may not be a few cards short of a full deck is definitely up for discussion, but the nature of our job in Iraq is not. Reality check: Saddam Hussein is most likely the largest genocidal maniac since Adolf Hitler, and whether or not he was in possession of weapons of mass destruction is subordinate to the fact that our troops put their lives on the line so that the Iraqi "Rape Rooms" and torture chambers no longer operate, and that Saddam stands trial for his collection of mass graves which are littered about the country, among other atrocities.

The only difference between the death camps run by the Nazis and Saddam's death squads is 50 years, 1,000 miles and total body count. Genocide's biggest ally is complacency, and anyone who would prefer to leave Saddam to his own devices rather than take him out is only assisting his hand in committing evil. I agree that Bush shouldn't have used the weapons of mass destruction excuse. He should have gone into Iraq on humanitarian grounds, and maybe Bush lied to us. Maybe the pre-war intelligence was skewed. That's wrong, but don't use our boys and girls as a tool to prove that, and Cindy Sheehan shouldn't use her son's headstone as a soapbox to further agendas of manipulative pigs like Michael Moore.

Politics can be an ugly business, but our soldiers are sacred, and they disposed one of the most evil men in recent memory. That shouldn't be forgotten, or belittled. To tarnish their efforts, to take away from their sacrifice and hard work in order to take a swipe at the president is not just dishonorable and cowardly, it spits in the face of what our soldiers fought and died for. Cindy Sheehan should be ashamed of herself, regardless of whether or not she is right about Bush. She went about it the wrong way. Over 2,000 soldiers have died fighting thugs, terrorists and people who tortured and murdered in cold blood. They should be respected and praised, not used as a stick to shake at the government. They went to Iraq to do a job. Let's not let their sacrifice be in vain.

Cameron MacPherson is a UMass student.

The holidays at finals time

Mike Anmuth

I remember grade school and making Christmas decorations out of paper, and hanging them up on clotheslines in the classroom. I remember middle school, and learning about the different December holidays, not just Christmas, but Hanukkah and Kwanzaa, too. Even in high school, we didn't learn about the holidays any longer, but work started to get more lax and less was due as our teachers wanted the holiday vacation as much, if not more than, we did. Then, I began college.

Somehow or another, the end of December does not mean celebration and making out a Christmas list anymore. It is not for good times with family and friends, under mistletoe and decorating the Christmas tree. It certainly is not for relaxing and counting the days until holiday break, when you're going home and welcoming a new year, but counting your blessings from the old one. No, the end of December in college is meant for just one thing: finals.

It would be inaccurate to say that I have even thought of Christmas, as it's the beginning of December and other things, mainly those academic such as final exams and final papers, have occupied me. As children in grade schools are coloring cut out pictures of Santa Claus and menorahs, I am trying to game plan on how to create the best studying environment while not completely forgetting that this semester will be over in a number of weeks, whether I am ready for it or not.

> As children in grade schools are coloring cut out pictures of Santa Claus and menorahs, I am trying to game plan on how to create the best studying environment while not completely forgetting that this semester will be over in a number of weeks, whether I am ready for it or not.

Obviously, due to the chronology of college courses, final exams have to occur at the end of the course each semester. I am lucky this semester to not have as many exams, and more final papers to complete, but the finals period scheduling through December 22 assures that some students here at the University of Massachusetts will dream of hanging stockings but instead be stuck in Stockbridge Hall. Candy canes and eggnog aside, students here will be filling in Scantron sheets and writing essays almost up to Christmas, itself.

When finals are scheduled is not up to students, and if you are like me and have one lone final during finals period, the rest of the days you are contemplating how nice it would be if you could self-schedule your finals when they would best fit your schedule, like at some schools. If UMass students were able to take finals when they fit best, perhaps we would not find ourselves using Christmas lights to study and instead using Christmas lights for their desired purpose, to decorate for said holiday. I admit, it would be a logistical nightmare with all of our students to self-schedule for final exams, so the system as it stands will have to do, despite my desire for a finals period that does not end up one or two days before Christmas.

In the spring semester, this impact is not as direct, since there is no holiday period in May that commences when our semester culminates. Even though students are anxious to finish the semester in the spring, there is no drive to get home in time for a holiday, and summer vacation lasts a lot longer than the January break. I know that when I go home during the winter break, there is more of a sense of urgency to leave campus due to the cold weather than in the spring where sitting on the lawn outside the pond to study does not sound like a particularly bad time.

Perhaps, as students, we could figure out a collective way to take our finals and celebrate the holiday season simultaneously. Some study guides under the Christmas tree, perhaps, or giving your Introduction to Physics book to a friend or neighbor after taking your final. In reality, there is no way to change the system to not have finals coincide with the holiday season and thus, they will continue to distract us from opening presents and seeing reindeer.

I hope that everyone has a wonderful holiday season and that your finals go well, so that you can rest merrily at home as opposed to worrying about how you did in your Intro to Physics class after you took the final and gave the book to your neighbor. The holidays only happen once a year, as opposed to finals, which happen once per semester. With this I say, merry finals to all and to all a good night.

Mike Anmuth is a Collegian columnist.

Do your part and vote for Sam

Tim Clarke

This university, from what the administration, faculty, student leadership and Collegian columnists would have you believe, is facing a crisis of confidence. It seems that everywhere we turn there is someone worried about bad press casting this fine learning institution in a negative light. Whether it's violent crime statistics, partying statistics, rioting statistics, sporting event attendance statistics, voting for SGA senator statistics or fourth amendment violations by the Vice Chancellor statistics, someone is worried that UMass will come across as more dangerous/crazy/apathetic/uninformed/unconstitutional than we really are. For those of you who share this sentiment, and only wish there was some magical way the dignified name of UMass Amherst could regain some of its luster, there is a solution. Vote for Sam.

> For those of you who . . . only wish there was some magical way the dignified name of UMass Amherst could regain some of its luster, there is a solution. Vote for Sam.

As you may or may not know, Sam the Minuteman is currently in the Finals of the Capital One Bowl Mascot Challenge. This contest, which has been running the majority of the school year, is a vote-getting competition between 12 mascots hailing from all across the nation. Those 12 teams have been whittled down to just two; and our beloved Sam is one of the last mascots standing. After finishing the round robin tournament in second place, Sam cruised to the final knocking off Tennessee's Smokey the dog. He now faces the juggernaut of a mascot, Herbie Husker, the University of Nebraska-Lincoln's representative who finished round robin play as the number one seed.

There is no denying this is an uphill battle for Sam. Herbie is the number one vote getter since the tournament began, and that's really no surprise. Other than planting corn, growing corn, tending corn, husking corn, eating corn, cobbing corn and corning corn, the only thing left to do in Nebraska is rabidly support college sports. This is a place whose college football stadium becomes the third largest city in the state on game days, and whose former coach became a Congressional representative on the platform, "I used to win a lot of football games." They eat, sleep and breathe college sports, and to defeat them will require dedication, commitment and an extreme excess of free time and a high-speed Internet connection.

With that being said, the onus is on us as a student body to rock the vote and propel Sam to victory. Voting requires almost no time or effort, and can be done once a day by computer or multiple times by text message. And let's all be honest, if you can text message your friend 25 times in a day to say "C U L8r 2nite" you can probably cast a vote or two for Sam. It doesn't matter if you are too apathetic to attend a basketball game, or root for our school; with three clicks of the mouse you can help regain the pride and class of Western Massachusetts' finest public state university. If you think about it, this sort of underdog match-up is just the sort of thing our forefathers and namesakes would have excelled at. The similarities between the two situations are virtually endless (Nebraska is known as the big red, 18th century British army was known as redcoats ... coincidence? I think not).

So this is our chance, UMass. Winning the mascot challenge would give this school just the sort of national recognition and positive press that we so desperately (apparently) need. The winner of this competition is going to be announced on national television at halftime of the Capital One Bowl. That means immediate national recognition for something good. A chance to actually chant "We're #1" and not be talking about fencing or felonies. With that much at stake, everyone should chip in and do their part. So go out there to capitalonebowl.com and vote. Vote every day. Vote twice a day. Get your friends to vote. Or even spread a vicious rumor about Herbie Husker having an extra-marital, interspecies affair with the St Joseph's Hawk. Because while winning this contest might not solve all of this university's problems, it will solve most of them.

Tim Clarke is a UMass student.

Living it up on your birthday

Rebecca Paskievich

Don't judge me for quoting her, but Paris Hilton once said, "Live every day as if it were your birthday." This past Monday, Dec. 5, I turned 19 and now feel that the ditzy celebrity might actually have a valid opinion.

The 24 hours that make up your birthday are a unique set of time experienced only once throughout the entire year. It is your day. The sense of confidence that surfaces on your birthday is amazing. The attention you get is so flattering that you feel on top of the world.

When you are bombarded with phone calls, voice mails of your friends attempting the happy birthday song, instant messages, text messages and Facebook messages, you are reminded of all the people who care about you. A smile coincides with each birthday wish and it sticks with you for the entire day. The presents are obviously a great bonus but I honestly think the notion of others who make the effort to wish you an incredible day is the greatest gift of all.

> On your birthday you don't feel like looking like a scrub. It's your special day so you pick out your favorite sweater and actually put on a little makeup before heading out the door. This extra effort makes you feel important; you deserve to be noticed.

On your birthday, you are typically in a good mood. This sparkle in your spirit is contagious to those around you. If everybody went through each day of their lives as if it were his or her birthday, the world would be a happier place. I caught myself holding doors for people and letting things that might typically annoy me just slide off my shoulder. I didn't get flustered when someone was walking ridiculously slowly in front of me at the DC. The chilly temperatures caused a cool puff of air with each breath, but instead of grumbling about the cold, I grinned just knowing that this day was upon me. While others stampeded to class with their heads down and hands shoved into their pockets, I glided along the snow-covered pathways with my head held high and a bounce in my step.

On your birthday, you don't feel like looking like a scrub. It's your special day so you pick out your favorite sweater and actually put on a little makeup before heading out the door. This extra effort makes you feel important; you deserve to be noticed.

Little things exceed your expectations and stupid moments add up to make the day more enjoyable. Grab n' Go didn't taste half as bad as usual. I caught myself writing 12/05/86 on my notes by accident and secretly smiled; I got giddy when I heard the newscaster say, "Good morning this is Monday, December 5th," — (that's my birthday).

Some people are cursed and say that on their birthdays they never have a good time. I've also heard that once you hit 21, the excitement of birthdays progressively declines. I hope that won't be the case with me. Each year we grow smarter and learn more about who we are as individuals. When I turn 73, I will be strutting around just as I did on my 19th.

On your birthday, life is good; the next day, the spark is gone. Remember how good you it made you feel when people got excited about your special day, and return the favor by doing the same for your friends. Make that extra effort to give him or her a call or make a goofy card; every little thing is appreciated and no special treatment, no matter how small, goes unnoticed on a birthday. I might take Paris' advice and try every now and then to think of a random day as my birthday. I'll keep the notion in my mind but it will be exposed through my mannerisms and mood. Hopefully my chipper mindset will catch-on to those around me.

Even if you can't muster up whatever it takes to live each day as if it were your birthday, make sure that on your real birthday you do live it up.

Smile big, stride with confidence and soak up the attention; you'll have to wait another 365 days to behave that way again ... with a legitimate excuse at least.

Rebecca Paskievich is a UMass student.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

A MILE IN SOMEONE ELSE'S SHOES

Today, in this world, I am a white, middle-class, female.

But in another place, in a "Twin Earth," I am a black man. A black man who has inherited slavery and segregation, and whose ancestors were lynched in the United States of America, a country that prides itself on human rights abroad (but that hushes injustice at home). I am a black man living in Boston, Mass., and when I look around I see mostly white people. White people who do not understand where my people have been, and where they are today. In a different place than white people. It is a place where I, as a young black male, do not have many role models to look up to.

It's commonplace to see my people in the newspapers, in the jails, on death row. A place where I (and the majority of my people) go to inner-city public schools, where education is not foremost, but where trying to survive a day without drugs or violence is an accomplishment. A place where it's not cool to be smart, to read a book, where it's not cool to wear "white man's" clothes. These clothes I wear, this music I listen to (because it's not cool to listen to country or pop or acoustic guitar) ... it's how I identify with my people.

I can't relate to the other parts of Boston – I live in either Roxbury or Dorchester, a place where not a night goes by without the sounds of sirens, without someone I know in my community ending up on the news or in a body-bag. I can't relate to those shows on TV with the happy (white) family sitting around the dinner table – no, because my family (and those of my friends) has no father, no provider. My mom is the "provider," the head of the household. She's the one stuck with taking care of me and my brothers and sisters. And the government complains that we're free-loaders? They have no idea.

I live in a place where no one, including myself, expects me to get a college education. How can I afford a college education? It's too much work, and what's the point? They say if I work hard ... if I put a little effort into it that I can "be somebody." They say it with such ease, such ignorance, because they don't know. But how come I see no black men with briefcases coming home from work in my neighborhood? How come in my neighborhood there are liquor stores on every corner? (Who owns these stores that perpetuate poverty and crime?)

I walk down the street and people pinch their purses, people walk faster, people are afraid of me and they don't even know me. It is a place where (white) cops constantly pull me over for going two miles over the speed limit, and yet they let their people go by with a warning (or wouldn't even pull them over in the first place). It is a place where people tell me to please leave a store ... when I haven't stolen anything (but they assume that I will). I live in a place where people high in power – white people – tell me that the world would be a better place, a safer place, if all black babies were killed. But this is the way it is – how can I change anything? I'm just a black man in a different world.

But that different world is right around the corner from "my world."

Lauren M. Lazar
UMass student

Write for Ed/Op!

e-mail editorial@dailycollegian.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 7, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

WHEN RULING ONE UNIVERSE ISN'T ENOUGH

By Barry Koltnow
The Orange County Register

Let's talk about fantasies.

No, not THAT kind of fantasy. Get your mind out of the gutter.

I'm talking about the rock-star fantasy, the one that starts when you're a little kid and you're standing in front of your bedroom mirror with a hairbrush in your hand. Or it might be the one when you're in your shower belting out a song into a bar of soap shaped like a microphone. Or maybe you are lucky enough to own a portable karaoke machine that allows you to act out your rock-star fantasy in the comfort of your own den.

They're all the same fantasy — you're a world-renowned musical star who sells out arenas, travels exclusively by limousine and private jet and lives on a grand estate behind high walls with electrified wire on top. You have groupies by the score, an entourage that could fill a presidential hotel suite and a flunky on your payroll whose sole responsibility is to remove the brown M&Ms from your dressing room.

Great fantasy, right?

So, why isn't it enough for some people? Why do some people who have achieved this ultimate fantasy feel the need to look elsewhere for thrills? Why can't they just be satisfied with what they've got?

Finding the answers to these questions has become a quest of mine.

And the great thing about being a celebrity interviewer is that I get an opportunity to ask those questions of the very people making those puzzling career moves.

I have sat down with dozens of music stars trying to make the leap into movies, and each time I ask them why.

The surprising thing is that none of them said that they always had been a secret fantasy of being a movie star. They all said they had the music-star thing done, and both decided to try movies, almost as an afterthought. I think that's insulting to the people who had the movie-star fantasy first.

Usher was the most famous music star I interviewed, and I asked him why being the biggest-selling recording artist in the world did not satisfy him.

"I want to try everything," he told me. "I don't want to stop until I am successful in all areas."

Well, it didn't work out that way. His first starring movie role — "In the Mix" — was a bust at the box office, and was painfully reminiscent of the experiences of Britney Spears ("Crossroads"), Mariah Carey ("Glitter") and Madonna (pick a movie, any movie).

Why do they do it? I suppose because they can. Music stars are treated like gods, and they start to believe their own publicity. Movie studios apparently believe it, too.

Al Jolson, the biggest singer of his day, was the first to think he could act. He starred in the world's first talking picture, "The Jazz Singer," and he has been followed by a cavalcade of singers down that same path.

There were some singers who made the jump successfully, such as Bing Crosby, Doris Day and Frank Sinatra. The cowboy singers — Gene Autry, Roy Rogers and Tex Ritter — also were successful in expanding their universe from singing to acting. Barbra Streisand and Bette Midler were no slouches, either. And who can forget Cher. She won an Oscar, you know.

I could include Judy Garland, Liza Minnelli and Julie Andrews, but they achieved success first in acting, and then became known primarily for singing. Pretty good at both, I might add.

Then there's Elvis.

The King embarrassed himself on the big screen. He looked great but those musical movies are hard to watch. I wish Col. Parker hadn't led him astray.

Will Smith made a successful transition from rapper to actor, and he set the stage for an entire generation of rappers who want to be actors. In fact, I'm not sure there's a rapper working today who doesn't have a movie deal in the pipeline.

I do admire a few singer/actors. For instance, I respect the work of Dwight Yoakam ("Sling Blade") and Steven Van Zandt ("The Sopranos") because they chose to go the character-actor route. It's more commendable than the ego-driven motivation behind most singers.

Tim McGraw and Jon Bon Jovi also show some promise in that direction.

As for Reba McEntire, she gets a favorable nod for starring in a sitcom on the WB. That doesn't require actual acting skills so it doesn't count against her.

I know that I've omitted plenty of names. I don't have the space to include every singer who didn't make the music fantasy was enough of an accomplishment.

Perhaps all these people need to remember what it was that drove them to become singers in the first place. Perhaps it's time for these people to get back in front of the mirror.

Berkshire Dining Commons offers friendly service and good food

By Matt Baskin
Collegian Correspondent

This is part two in a series of reviews of UMass dining commons.

In the heart of Southwest's concrete jungle lies Berkshire Dining Commons. One of two major dining halls in the Southwest area, Berkshire's all around quality, withholding some minor flaws, makes it one of the better places to eat on the UMass campus.

Friendly service, decent food and good accommodations all make for a great atmosphere. Combine this with the fact that Berkshire is open later than any other dining hall and it's no surprise that Southwest's best commons attracts crowds at all hours of the day.

Most people don't consider nachos an especially foreign dish, as the dining services website contends.

Berkshire's good service starts at the entrance to its kitchen. Staff members, seated behind a desk and a keypad, swipe UCard after UCard each and every night. Though they toil at an imaginably monotonous job, these workers never forget to smile and say hello to the students whom they serve so graciously. After passing through the entryway, a few bugs in Berkshire's system start to emerge. Firstly, dishes are only available in a single stack, slowing down the food line and creating a rather frustrating atmosphere. Additionally, glasses are stored in green cases that look as though they've been overcome with some particularly gruesome form of mold, a highly unappetizing sight.

Aside from slow moving lines and moldering glass storage, Berkshire has much to be proud of in terms of atmosphere. A series of partitioned dining rooms surround the kitchen and service room, allowing the sun to shine in from all angles.

Tables, some long and banquet style, others round or rectangular, can accommodate groups of any size. A salad bar, deli and pasta station and desert table are all easily accessible and well supplied. Utensils, a necessity when undertaking most forms of consumption, do not run out.

Meals, though certainly not home cooking, are pretty good for the college standard. Plenty of food is always available at breakfast, lunch and dinner. Though it doesn't stray from the norm, a la Worcester's Oak Room, Berkshire can be counted on to provide decent traditional food. Though there are international options, these are somewhat limited and often a hit of a stretch — most people don't consider nachos an especially foreign dish, as the dining services website contends. Quirkily, Berkshire's crowning jewel is its tray return setup. Instead of forcing students to stand in endless lines to dispose of their dishes, much in the same way that they acquired them, several bussing stations around the hall make for an easy drop-off and quick exit, a welcome deviation from the setup of most dining halls.

Berkshire, though already a good dining hall, will be under renovation during spring semester. With the changes that will come with the renovation, Berkshire may well become the top dining commons at UMass. The changes listed on the UMass news Web site include: a vegan station; a fruit, soup, and salad bar; a Pan-Asian station; a noodle bar; an on-site pizzeria complete with a brick oven making custom pizzas, calzones and sandwiches; a grill station; an on-site bakery; and a grab-n-go station on a lower level.

While these changes sound superb, at the same time they pose a problem. Many students will undoubtedly flock to Berkshire once the renovation is complete. This may have the unfortunate effect of lessening the number of students who frequent Southwest's other main dining hall, Hampshire. Should this be the case, the best way to increase Hampshire's attendance would be a renovation to that dining hall, which may be a financial impossibility. Despite this hypothetical conundrum, the renovation is a welcome project in the eyes of students and administrators alike. Progress, a sometimes forgotten concept in the world of college dining, is on the march at Berkshire.

One of the friendly UCard swipers at Berkshire DC in Southwest prepares for a mealtime rush of students.

Shopping online safely

Ask the Attorney
Michele L. Leaf

Q: I found a web site for the purchase of holiday gifts with great prices, but I have never heard of the company before. Is it safe for me to buy online?

A: The first thing you should do is make sure that there is a street address and telephone number for the company listed on the Internet site. Some Web sites make it very easy to place an order, but give no information about return policies or customer service. If you can determine where the company is located, then you can check with the Better Business Bureau or the state's attorney general to see if there is any history of complaints.

A legitimate business has nothing to fear in giving information about the business location. One problem for consumers is that it may be impossible to return items or get refunds if the business is not located in the United States. One common problem with Internet purchases is delay in filling orders. Many Internet merchants are able to keep prices low because they do not have warehouses or actually stock merchandise. As a result there may be an unanticipated problem in obtaining goods from suppliers.

By law, retailers are required to ship an order within the time stated on the Web site. If a company does not promise a time, then it must ship the order within 30 days. If this is not possible, the customer can consent to the delay or cancel the order for an immediate full refund. Although a business practice may not be against the law, it may amount to poor customer service. Having a good legal remedy is of little consolation when the merchant doesn't deliver a gift as promised.

Whenever you make an Internet purchase, it is important to make sure that your credit card information is protected. Before paying, confirm that the server is secure so that your credit card number will be encrypted and inaccessible to third parties.

In order to further guard against fraud, it is recommended to obtain an additional credit card for exclusive use on the Internet. Since the card will not be used for regular purchases disruption can be minimized, and any fraud will be more quickly noticed. Although your credit card is protected from fraud by the credit card issuer, and you can't be held responsible for unauthorized charges, this protection often will not apply to charges made in other countries. If this is a consideration, check with the card issuer before making the purchase. Happy shopping and happy holidays.

The information contained in this article refers to Massachusetts law and does not constitute legal advice. Please submit legal questions to asktheattorney@attap.umass.edu. If you need legal advice, seek out an attorney who can give you advice based upon your circumstances and applicable law. Fee paying UMass Amherst students with questions may call the Student Legal Services Office at 545-1995 to arrange an appointment, or come to 922 Campus Center to pick up more information.

Julie Andrews is always ready to talk about 'Music'

By Doug Nye
Knight Ridder

The camera glides across the gorgeous European countryside, past snow-covered mountains and then over a crystal-like lake. Finally, it zooms toward a green field seemingly nestled between the mountains. It moves closer and closer and we spot her; a small figure at first. Then, as the camera dips down even closer, we know for certain it is Julie Andrews.

Joy is on her face as she drinks in the beauty of the land. Then she swirls and begins to sing. We feel the joy, too. That opening to "The Sound of Music" (1965) remains among the most uplifting in cinema history and it continues to stir new generations.

The beloved musical recently has gone through a sparkling digital facelift. The result of that restoration is a beautiful two-disc, 40th anniversary DVD edition of "The Sound of Music" (20th Century Fox Home Entertainment, $26.98) that recently arrived in video outlets just in time for the holiday season.

After four decades, you might think Andrews would tire of talking about what is arguably her most famous screen role.

"No, never," Andrews said during a recent telephone interview. "I'm very proud of it."

Even so, it never occurred to her that people would still be discussing "The Sound of Music" 40 years later, but Andrews can give several reasons why she thinks the film has enjoyed lasting popularity.

"There is the beauty of the scenery and the wonderful score," Andrews said. "It is not only a musical but also a very great adventure story that stresses good values, dignity and decency and the importance of family. It is extremely well crafted. Then there's the editing and so much more."

When it was suggested that its star might have had something to do with the movie's success, you could almost hear Andrews blush a bit over the phone.

"Thank you," she said softly.

Andrews plays Maria, a nun in training whose playful and impetuous disposition seems out of place in an Austrian convent. On the advice of the Mother Superior (Peggy Wood), Maria accepts the job of governess for the children of the widowed Captain Von Trapp (Christopher Plummer). Maria soon wins over the youngsters and turns them into a singing family. Von Trapp is scheduled to wed a baroness (Eleanor Parker) but the marriage never takes place because he eventually falls in love with Maria.

But there are obstacles to overcome in 1938 Austria, where the Nazi movement is making its presence known. When Von Trapp is recalled to active duty to serve the Third Reich, he wants nothing to do with the Nazis. The captain knows that attitude will not be tolerated by the Fuhrer, so he attempts to find a way to get his family, which now includes his new wife Maria, out of Austria.

"While we were filming it, there was a very concentrated effort not to make the movie too saccharine," Andrews said. "I think we succeeded."

"The Sound of Music" garnered 10 Academy Award nominations and walked off with five Oscars, including Best Picture and Best Director. The movie was on the American Film Institute's 100 greatest of all time list and also on AFI's 100 top romantic list. Three of its tunes — "The Sound of Music," "My Favorite Things" and "Do Re Mi" — made AFI's top 100 movie songs.

Julie Andrews, star of "The Sound of Music," says that she will never tire of discussing her role in that film, which has become her most famous. Andrews also starred in Disney's classic "Mary Poppins."

Based on the true story of Maria Von Trapp and her family, "The Sound of Music" was a smash Broadway musical. It opened there Nov. 16, 1959, with Mary Martin as its star and ran for 3 years. "The Sound of Music" represented the last collaboration of the great team of Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein II, one of Broadway's most famous. Hammerstein died less than a year after "The Sound of Music" opened.

At the same time Martin was starring in the stage version of "The Sound of Music," Andrews was making a name for herself on Broadway. She left her native England for New York in 1954 to star in "The Boy Friend," a musical spoof of the 1920s. Her stock rose even higher when she played Eliza Dolittle in "My Fair Lady," which opened on Broadway in 1956 and ran for two years there and then 18 months in London. The Alan Jay Lerner and Frederick Loewe musical was based on George Bernard Shaw's "Pygmalion."

In 1962, Andrews accepted the role of Queen Guinevere in "Camelot," another Lerner and Loewe effort. Sandwiched in between was a 1957 American TV production of "Cinderella," written especially for Andrews by Rodgers and Hammerstein.

Walt Disney saw Andrews' performance in "Camelot" and offered her the role of "Mary Poppins," but she declined at first. She was waiting to find out if she got the role of Eliza Doolittle in the film version of "My Fair Lady." It went instead to Audrey Hepburn.

Andrews admits some disappointment but says "I really completely understood that it would have been an enormous gamble (to use me). But I was able to take Walt Disney's dream offer." Andrews not only went on to captivate audiences as the flying nanny Mary Poppins, but the role earned her the 1964 Best Actress Oscar. It also led her to "The Sound of Music."

Wise, looking for someone to play Maria, saw footage of Andrews in "Mary Poppins" and decided she would be just right in the role. It's something Andrews said has always made her feel "lucky."

"I have some wonderful memories of 'The Sound of Music,'" Andrews said. "The locations ... the people ... I still stay in touch with many of the children. Of course, they're not children anymore."

The DVD set includes "A Few of My Favorite Things," a retrospective documentary hosted by Andrews, an on-location featurette, a 40-years-later chat between Andrews and costar Plummer and a reunion of the actors and actresses who portrayed the seven Von Trapp children. One ironic clip features Andrews and Carol Burnett on a TV special doing a parody of "The Sound of Music," which was still playing on Broadway.

"That has come back to haunt me," Andrews said with a laugh. "But we did have so much fun doing it."

Academic unravels the origin of the Grateful Dead's lyrics

By John Rogers
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — By day he was a mild-mannered, buttoned-down reference librarian. By night — and on weekends and during vacations — David Dodd would shed his jacket and tie for tie-dye and morph into a Grateful Dead fan.

He was one of those multicolored, often-bearded people who, for what seemed like endless summers, followed the band from show to show in search of its holy grail — that elusive, transcendent musical moment.

Then one day, this scholarly fellow stumbled upon the perfect union for his two passions.

Dodd, who finds great joy paging through books and microfilm or surfing the Web to determine the exact origin of phrases and expressions, decided he would annotate the recorded works of the Grateful Dead.

Ten years later, he has come out with "The Complete Annotated Grateful Dead Lyrics." The 480-page illustrated book was published by Simon & Schuster's Free Press in October. It has a lengthy foreword by the band's principal lyricist, Robert Hunter, who came out of seclusion long enough to pay Dodd the ultimate compliment: He said the researcher got it right.

"It's a lovely book," Hunter remarked from his home in Northern California. "I thumb through it and find it actually of interest. ... I had no idea that all of these things he found had affected my songs."

Annotation, a scholarly study of the origins of phrases and references of literary works, has been applied to Shakespeare and other literary giants but, as far as Dodd can determine, never to a rock band.

"I don't try to interpret the lyrics," Dodd says. "What I try to do is not to be deconstructive but to illuminate it a little bit."

Hunter, a widely read man whose musical interests encompass all styles, found numerous references in Dodd's work that could be traced to Geoffrey Chaucer, Stephen Foster, T.S. Eliot, James Joyce, American and Irish folk tales, Appalachian mountain music, science fiction writers, a food recipe, films, politics, popular culture and numerous other sources. Although he has long cited Joyce and Eliot as among his major influences, Hunter was surprised to find so many names and places referenced in his lyrics connected to their work.

The lyricist, who wrote the words for melodies composed by late lead guitarist Jerry Garcia, also was delighted to see Dodd unravel the mystery to one of his verses from "Truckin'," perhaps the Dead's most widely known song: "What in the world ever became of Sweet Jane? She lost her sparkle, you know she isn't the same. Livin' on reds, vitamin C and cocaine. All a friend can say is, 'Ain't it a shame?'"

The inspiration came not from Joyce or Eliot, but from a Pepsodent toothpaste commercial he had heard in 1948, when he was 7: "Poor Millicent, poor Millicent, she never used Pepsodent. Her smile grew dim, and she lost her vim. So, folks, don't be like Millicent. Use Pepsodent."

"And nobody ever picked up on it, and, of course, they wouldn't," Hunter said, explaining the verse was an inside joke for the band. Then, with a chuckle, he said, "So maybe these books do serve some purpose."

For Dodd, the book began as a whimsical way to pass days he already spent looking up things.

"I thought at a certain point it would be fun to write down on old library cards what this stuff was," he said by phone from the public library in San Rafael, the San Francisco Bay area suburb where he is the head reference librarian.

He wanted to decode the peculiar references in the songs he loved: Who was Sheriff Benson, who was Crazy Otto?

He traced Sheriff Benson, from the Hunter-Garcia song "Candyman," to Sheriff Benson of the Leadhelly song "Midnight Special." Crazy Otto, from the song "Ramble on Rose," was traced to two piano-playing musicians who used that nom de plume in the early 20th century.

What began as a hobby eventually blossomed into a full-fledged research project when Dodd, then a professor at the University of Colorado, learned in the mid-1990s he had to publish research if he wanted to acquire tenure.

He got the university's OK for the Grateful Dead project and soon started a Web site to track his material. He also sought help from the band, which in the beginning was lukewarm to the idea. Dodd had launched the project in 1995, the same year Garcia died and the group stopped touring under the name Grateful Dead.

Then one day, after posting "a reference to my somewhat tortured work" on the Hunter-Garcia song "Mountains of the Moon," the researcher received a cryptic e-mail from Hunter.

"I was trying to figure out who the Marsh King was," Dodd recalls, "and he just sent a line saying, 'The Marsh King's Daughter' is a story by Hans Christian Anderson.'"

The band was on board and, eventually, became enthusiastic. As guitarist Bob Weir noted: "Now I'll never have to explain myself."

Critics also have responded positively for the most part.

"Even the most hardcore Deadheads will be impressed by this obsessively complete look at the Grateful Dead's lyrics," said Publishers Weekly.

Indeed, it is so complete it took Dodd 10 years to finish it. When the 48-year-old librarian is asked about future projects, he replies that his job at the library and maintaining his Web site will suffice for now.

"I can't really imagine starting over," he says. "I would love it if somebody would do the Beatles. But it's got to be somebody else."

RAIN
Three Clubs / DJs Under One Roof! Party Till 2 a.m!
HOT BODY CONTEST
Every Thursday Night
18+ College Night
HOT BODY FINALS
Male/Female winner will walk away with $500 cash and prizes!!!
Doors open at 9:00pm
WET & WILD FRIDAYS
19 + for Ladies encourage
Doors open at 9:00pm
3 DJ's/Clubs Under One Roof
Party till 2am!
Now Hiring: Bartenders, Waitstaff, Promotions and Security Staff
10 Stearns Square • Springfield, MA 01103 • (413) 827-9000 • www.RainSpringfield.com

Watroba's Liquors
79 Sunderland Road North Amherst (liquor store 11:00 AM - 11:00 PM)
Just before the Harp!
Watroba's Market
Red Bull 4 - Pack $7.29 plus deposit
▪ Corona and Corona Light Loose Case Bottles $20.99 + dep
▪ Jim Beam Kentucky Whiskey $19.99 1.75 ml Btl
▪ SKYY Vodka $14.49 750 ml Btl
▪ Svedka Vodka $17.99 1.75 ml Btl
▪ Mirassou Assorted Wines $7.99 750 ml Btl
▪ Pabst Blue Ribbon 30 Pack $13.99 + dep
▪ Genny Light 30 Pack $12.99 + dep.
▪ Vast array of HUGE Deli Sandwiches
▪ Coke 12 Pack Cans and Coke products 2 for $6.00 + dep
Jagermeister $20.99 750 ml Btl With FREE T shirt or FREE shot glass
KEG SPECIALS
Bud & Bud Light $63.99+
Michelob Lager & Ultra $63.99+
"Natty" Light & Ice $59.99+
Miller Lite $59.99+
Pabst Blue Ribbon $44.99+
Try our selection of European and Micro Brew Beers

Clippers 'scaring' teams

CLIPPERS from page 10

"They're a good team, and they're becoming a great team," Cavaliers forward LeBron James said last week.

"They are scaring a whole lot of teams," Nuggets forward Carmelo Anthony added.

The needed confidence was delivered on opening night, when the Clippers reversed a 13-point fourth-quarter deficit to defeat the SuperSonics.

"We were down big and (Cassell) just went on a tirade and hit shots and played defense and got us on a roll," Brand said.

The moment served as an epiphany, that Los Angeles' other team not only could be competitive, but with a lineup of Chris Kaman at center, Brand at power forward, Maggette at small forward, Mobley at shooting guard and Cassell at point guard, this is arguably one of the best starting fives.

It didn't take long for those in the know to catch on, including former Clippers guard Mike Woodson, who as coach of the Hawks has already lost twice to Dunleavy's team.

"They've got four legitimate guys that can score the basketball. Most teams only have two or three," Woodson said before last week's game in Atlanta against the Heat. "They've got a nice mixture of veteran guys as well as some young guys that they're grooming.

"They have a legitimate shot of making in the playoffs and perhaps winning some games there."

The last time the Clippers were at this level, Larry Brown was coaching them in 1992 and 1993 to the franchise's only playoff victories over 30 years.

Last week his brother, Hawks assistant coach Herb Brown, said a revival is at hand.

"They've got an inside player in Brand who's going to kick the ball out," he said. "And Cuttino is going to make that shot. Sam Cassell knows how to get to the basket. And Corey Maggette is as explosive as hell. Kaman is good inside. So they're a complete basketball team.

"Evidentially they knew what they were doing."

Garcia headed to Baseball Classic

By Dave Van Dyck
Chicago Tribune

CHICAGO — Country comes first, so Freddy Garcia will pitch for Venezuela in the 18-day inaugural World Baseball Classic that begins in early March while the White Sox are going through spring training.

The Sox had hoped Garcia might bypass the event to save his arm, which became tired at the end of last season. He told reporters during a celebrity golf tournament in Puerto Rico, however, that "I am very excited to represent my country."

Venezuela is scheduled to play the first round of the tournament in Arizona, although in the Phoenix area rather than in Tucson, where the Sox train. The tournament ends March 20 in San Diego.

Many players will forgo parts of spring training for the event, including Mets pitcher Pedro Martinez and Baltimore's Miguel Tejada, who will play for the Dominican Republic.

The White Sox World Series display at the Baseball Hall of Fame in Cooperstown, N.Y., has opened, including bats used by Scott Podsednik and Geoff Blum to hit game-winning home runs in the Series' middle two games.

The third-floor encased tribute has a jersey from Series MVP Jermaine Dye, who also is featured in a nearly life-size photo next the case, and a glove from third baseman Joe Crede, who made several outstanding defensive plays.

JOSE M. OSORIO/THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

White Sox pitcher Freddy Garcia will take part in the World Baseball Classic, despite pleas by the White Sox organization in an effort to conserve his arm.

Ng changing MLB management

MLB from page 10

Colletti.

Good decison? Time will tell. By then, though, Ng might be running another team.

"Take away the name Kim Ng and go ahead and take a look at her resume," Royals general manager Allard Baird said. "Just go off those qualifications. Then once you know her personality, you know she'd do a very good job.

"If you know baseball well enough, you can run a team."

There's the rub. What today entails baseball knowledge? Tobacco spit on the shoes or an abacus in the head?

"Traditionally, the general manager was an ex-ballplayer," said Jean Afterman, the Yankees' assistant GM and Ng's lone peer in that role. "Now baseball is going through this change. The traditional general manager now is a young guy from an Ivy League school. There's always evolution in baseball."

And what that evolution has wrought is an opportunity for women. Former Boston GM Theo Epstein didn't play baseball past high school and won a World Series. Texas GM Jon Daniels is 28 and has dealt more with contract negotiation than player evaluation.

The new breed of general manager values independent, objective evaluation — and nothing would be more objective than judging on accomplishments, not gender.

Ng got into baseball on a lark, applying for the White Sox internship while finishing school and a successful softball career at the University of Chicago. Future Dodgers GM Dan Evans, a wunderkind with the White Sox, mentored Ng. She showed a knack for arbitration, which led to more responsibility with Chicago, which led to a job as the Yankees' assistant GM in 1997.

Ng grew up in Queens, playing stickball on the street. Her father, Jin, who taught her about sports, died when Ng was 11. If only, she said, he could see what she accomplished a borough away. In her four years with the Yankees, Ng negotiated the contracts of Derek Jeter, Mariano Rivera and Paul O'Neill, helping GM Brian Cashman and personnel guru Gene Michael construct a team that won three championships.

"She has more jewelry than a lot of people across the game," Evans said. "She knows what it's like to win the last game of the season."

She's still learning. Ng regularly goes into the manager's office and discusses strategy following games. She trades information and talks through scenarios. She picks the brains of scouts who have been around far longer than her 15 years.

Before her interview, Ng called Cashman and Evans and Mets GM Omar Minaya and countless others she respects. Ng understood the gravity of it. She is the standard bearer for women in baseball operations, and she not only wanted to do right by her brethren, she wanted to do well for herself.

"It's never just about the candidate," Jamie McCourt said. "It's about the circumstances the candidate has to be involved with.

"At the end of the day, given everything the team has been through, Ned was the right guy at the right time."

The past certainly wasn't the right time.

"In a sport where 20 or 30 years ago there wasn't a woman anywhere, we've come a long way," commissioner Bud Selig said. "Do I hope we can do better? Sure."

In 1994, Elaine Weddington-Steward became baseball's first female assistant GM when Boston promoted her from the team's legal department. Four years earlier, Richard Lapchick, now director of the sports business management program at the University of Central Florida, had commissioned his first Racial and Gender Report Card.

The findings were ugly. Forget 20 or 30 years. Eleven years ago, there was one female vice president in all of baseball.

In 2004, 32 women held VP jobs. Sixteen percent of senior executives — vice president or higher in the league office and reporting to the GM or president at the team level — were women, according to figures provided by Major League Baseball.

The Racial and Gender Report Card also saw marked increases in the senior administration category, that included chief financial officers and public- and community-relations directors, and in the professional administration category with business operations, marketing, promotions and publications. For the first time, Lapchick awarded MLB with a grade of C. Ng's interview won't hurt the perception that it's the sport with the most opportunities for women with in-game operations.

Still, Ng knows that if she eventually runs a team, she knows she'll face more doubters, criticism and detractors than even the most embattled GM.

Famous sports newspaper missing

URBANA, Ill. (AP) — Rare copies of a sports newspaper that was credited with uncovering the infamous 1919 Chicago White Sox gambling scandal are missing from a University of Illinois library.

Librarians discovered that two bound volumes of Collyer's Eye from the 1920s were missing this fall, around the time the White Sox won their first World Series in 88 years, said associate university librarian Karen Schmidt.

"As there was more and more interest in what the White Sox were doing, we began receiving more questions about their history," Schmidt said. "As those questions began to mount...we began to understand the volumes were missing and that they are very, very rare."

University police are working with library officials to find the books.

Collyer's Eye was a weekly sports and gambling tabloid that wrote just days after the end of the 1919 World Series that games allegedly were fixed. Eight players were accused of participating in a gambling scheme to throw the series and banned from baseball for life in the "Black Sox Scandal."

The missing volumes contain copies of the newspaper from April 1920 to April 1922, and April 1924 to April 1926. The library still has the volume containing the earliest story on the scandal, from October 1919. But later stories on the case are missing.

Librarians and historians said the copies at the University of Illinois library could be the only publicly accessible reports on the scandal.

The library still has 15 other volumes of Collyer's Eye that were published as late as 1944, but they have been removed from shelves and cannot be checked out, Schmidt said.

"There really isn't anything out there exactly like this," Schmidt said. "It is not like you lose Time, but you still have Newsweek."

Associated Press

UMass Amherst
Center for Student Development
UP TO THE MINUTE

DECEMBER 7 & 8
Chillball
A game like no other. Are you more "chill" than your opponent?
Student Union Lobby 10am – 4pm FREE

DECEMBER 7, 8, 9
Student Union Craft Center
34th Annual Holiday Craft Fair
Professional artisans with hand-made, reasonably priced jewelry, pottery, prints, stained glass, and many other unique creations.
Campus Center Concourse, 9am – 4pm

FRIDAY, December 9
Women's Ice Hockey vs. Rhode Island
Mullins Center – Ice Rink, 7:30pm
Free for UMass Amherst students
$5 adults, $3 children

Something Every Friday
The Dukes of Hazzard
With Jessica Simpson
Student Union, Cape Cod Lounge, 9pm FREE

SATURDAY, December 10
Women's Ice Hockey vs. Rhode Island
Mullins Center – Ice Rink, 4pm
Free for UMass Amherst students
$5 adults, $3 children

Men's Ice Hockey vs. Boston College
Mullins Center, 7pm
Free for UMass Amherst students
Reserved $12, General $8

SUNDAY, December 11
Sunday Night Movie
The Dukes of Hazzard
With Jessica Simpson
Student Union, Cape Cod Lounge, 8 pm FREE

MONDAY, December 12
Men's Basketball vs. Boston University
Mullins Center, 7pm
Free for UMass Amherst students
$17 adult, $8 children

WEDNESDAY, December 14
Strain Drain
Come out on the last day of classes and we'll help relieve your stress! Enjoy a free massage and aromatherapy, or have some free coffee while your fortune is read.
Campus Center Concourse, 10am – 2pm. FREE

Student Union Craft Center daily hours:
Monday -Thursday 11am – 5pm, Friday 11am – 6pm, Saturday 1pm – 6pm.
Come create your own silver jewelry, stained glass, photos, silkscreening, leather, beading, and more. FREE

Support student businesses!
Located in the Student Union: the Bike Coop, Campus Design & Copy (CDC), Earthfoods Café, People's Market, Tix Unlimited. Located in the residence halls: Greenough Sub Shop, Sweets 'N More (Field), & Sylvan Snack Bar (McNamara).

Brought to you by Student Affairs and Campus Life
UMass Amherst Calendar of Events: www.umass.edu/umhome/even

Spiess and Pozar dominate

TENNIS from page 12

the top 10 in the 14 and 16-year-old and under age groups.

When it was time to decide on what to do after high school, she weighed her options and decided on coming to the United States to play collegiate tennis.

"If I wasn't going to go pro I was going to go to college," Pozar says. "I never had anyone actually come to me recruiting. I just made a video and sent it to everyone I liked.

"I wanted to be on the east coast, I felt that if I went on the west coast I'd be even further from home."

In the end of her search for a school, Masha decided on UMass.

"I didn't even go on a recruiting trip, I just picked it and came here," Pozar says.

One might think moving from Europe to America would be a culture shock. Europe and America both have different cultures and ways of living, so it's no surprise Masha noticed the differences right away.

"It is quite a culture shock, especially if you come from Spain," Pozar says. "Everyone in Spain is laid back; everyone here is always on the go. It took me awhile to get used to everything here."

For a young woman who can speak four languages — Slovenian, Croatian, Spanish and English — some things still are difficult in the American language. When Masha won her first Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week last year, she did not even know what the award was for.

"I didn't even know what rookie meant when I first got it. When I got the first rookie of the week I thought it was a bad thing," Pozar says.

With all the differences in ways of life between America and Europe, it is good that Masha has a supportive team around her. It also helped that she roomed with another European last year, Michele Spiess.

Spiess was born in Stuttgart, Germany and grew up playing tennis there. Like Slovenia, Germany's number one sport is soccer.

Like Pozar, Spiess was born into a tennis family and at the age of nine, Michele decided to play also. Michele attended high school in Germany and played in numerous tournaments around Europe. She was a two-time winner of tournaments in Frankfurt and Dusseldorf in Germany, and a tournament in Pilsen, Czech Republic.

Spiess never wanted to play professional tennis. Instead, she had a desire to play collegiate tennis and study abroad.

"I always wanted to study abroad and I wanted to play tennis," Spiess says. "I heard about scholarships, so started to apply to schools."

KARLIS WINGERT/COLLEGIAN

A native of Ljubljana, Slovenia, Masha Pozar has blossomed in the U.S. and more specifically at UMass on the tennis team.

Spiess first went to the University of Louisville where she was highly successful in her only year there. That year she was named the team MVP as well as to the Conference USA Second-Team.

After her first-year, Spiess decided to transfer to UMass.

"I had a friend who went to UMass, she pretty much brought me here," Spiess says. "I replaced her. She went back to Germany and I took her place."

While at UMass and Louisville, Spiess, despite knowing four different languages (German, English, French and Italian), suffered from being unfamiliar with the English language.

"I couldn't communicate with people," Spiess says. "I didn't have the words to describe what was going on inside of me, so it was pretty tough in the beginning."

Both Pozar and Spiess have noticed differences in how people live in America compared to how people do in Europe.

"I miss Europe in general, the lifestyle," Pozar says. "Sometimes I feel a little rushed here."

"The way we live in Europe is completely different, people are more laid back," Spiess says. "Here in the U.S. everything has to be fast. People are more friendly here, really warm people. People smile here more then in Germany."

While having to adjust to different lifestyles and a language barrier, they also had to deal with differences in the way tennis is played in America.

Both Spiess and Pozar grew up playing on clay courts, but once in the United States they had to start playing on hard surfaces.

"The hard surface is much faster," UMass coach Judy Dixon says. "The clay courts you need to have much more patience, power doesn't mean anything. On a hard court, power does mean something."

To make things even more difficult for Pozar and Spiess, the American way of playing tennis also differs from that of Europeans.

"American girls tend to hit flatter then Europeans do," Pozar says. "I think it's because of the clay courts different then the hard court."

Spiess finds that her different style of play is an advantage to her.

"A lot of American players don't like my game because I slice a lot," Spiess says. "They are not used to that."

Throughout all the differences on and off the court, both Pozar and Spiess can count on one thing – their team. Dixon tries to emphasize the team concept to her players, especially to make a comfortable environment for the international players.

"Particularly when you have international students, this is their family away from home," Pozar says. "We're like one big happy family, we get along so great. It helps you so much to have so many people that are there."

Spiess shares those sentiments.

"The team is great, we all help each other out," Spiess says. "It's like a family to me. I can talk to them when I have problems or when I'm sad or when I'm homesick."

Spiess and Pozar fit in perfectly with the rest of the team as all of them also care about academics. Both Spiess, a hospitality and tourism management major, and Pozar, a political science major, were Academic All-Americans last year. Spiess was also named to the Conference USA Commissioner's Academic Honor Roll and received the Red and Black Scholar Athlete Award for her one year at Louisville.

"Our team is very into academics," Pozar says. "We're really into working hard in school. We keep our priorities straight."

With all the differences in culture, language and customs between Germany, Slovenia, Spain and the United States, it's that tie of friendship and being part of a team that holds Pozar and Spiess together.

"They will not always remember if they individually did well or they did badly in a particular match," Dixon says. "But they will always remember the team and how the team did, and that's the most important thing to take from this."

Even though Spiess and Pozar hold the top two tennis spots on the team, it's not about the individual, but the team.

"I want to win so bad," Pozar says. "I don't feel like I play for myself. I feel like I play for the girls on my team."

KARLIS WINGERT/COLLEGIAN

Although Germany's most popular sport is soccer, Michele Spiess chose the path of tennis, and it has worked out for her as the top player for UMass.

Warriors dropped

HOCKEY from page 12

Gabe Winer, who has done it his whole career, made the saves he needed to make, the big ones."

The Minutemen got things started early in the second period with a two-on-one in the Merrimack zone that was set up by a Stephen Werner pass to Chris Capraro along the right boards.

Capraro quickly passed the puck across the ice to Chris Davis, who was all alone above the left point. Davis made a move left, got Warrior goalie Jim Healey to commit to that side, and the UMass freshman waltzed past the stunned netminder and easily slid the puck past him to light the lamp and give UMass a 1-0 edge 2:57 into the second period.

"Early on in the game, I was kind of frustrated because the goalie was making some lucky saves," Davis said. "I wasn't planning on deking him, but the way I brought it in there, the goalie pulled from one side to the other so I just pulled it the other way."

Just over 10 minutes later, the Mass Attack struck again to push their lead out to a two-goal advantage. Topher Bevis took a shot from the high slot that rebounded off Healey's left leg just in front of the crease.

Matt Anderson fought off defender Rob LaLonde to gain enough space to collect the rebound and bang it home at the 13:03 mark of the period.

The two-goal margin was short-lived, however, as the Warriors finally dented the scoreboard 96 seconds later. Winger Matt Johnson was camped out angled to Winer's right side, and Mike Alexiou found his teammate with a tight pass through the crease. Johnson banked home the one-timer to cut UMass' lead in half at 2-1 heading into the second intermission.

But with under five minutes remaining in the final period, the Minutemen put the Warriors away for good when Jordan Virtue won a faceoff in the Merrimack zone.

The puck came out cleanly, but deflected off Mark Matheson's stick out to Marvin Degon, who fired a rocket past Healey to put UMass ahead 3-1 with 4:36 to play.

Werner put a cap on the night's scoring when he added an empty-netter with 10 seconds to play in the game.

UMass freshman Cory Quirk and the Minuteman hockey team knocked off conference-foe Merrimack last night at the Mullins Center. The team will take on Boston College on Saturday.

WRITE FOR SPORTS!
CALL 545-0719

555 deal
Three Medium One-Topping Pizzas $5 Each!
Domino's Pizza®
413 - 256 - 8911

FRUSTRATED?
PUZZLED?
DO YOU HAVE:
- a grade dispute?
- teacher, roomate or job concerns?
- billing problems?
- harassment?
- ...or any other University related problems?

THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP
(confidentially, of course)
students, faculty, and staff are all welcome
823 Campus Center
Office Hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.
telephone: 413-545-0867
fax: 413-545-9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

Shakago
SPRINGFIELD'S HOTTEST NIGHT CLUB
Spanish Nights
-WEDNESDAYS
-Reggaeton / Salsa
Merengue
Legendary College Nights
-THURSDAYS
-DJ David Blazze
-18+ to Party / 21 to Drink
College Night Part 2
-FRIDAYS
-DJ David Breeze
-Only 18+ Party in Springfield
-Best In Hip Hop and Dance
Dress Code Enforced: No Hats, No Hoodies, No Excessively Baggy Jeans
21 Hampden St. Springfield, MA ▼ 413 781 8885 ▼ www.shakago.com

KAMINS
SPECIALIZING IN HOUSE AND APARTMENT RENTALS
LOOKING FOR A PLACE TO LIVE?
- PRESIDENTIAL APTS
- COLONIAL VILLAGE APTS
- PERRY APTS
- 177 N PLEASANT ST
- COLLEGE INN APTS
- LANTERN COURT APTS
- MILL HOLLOW
- CRESTVIEW APTS
55 S PLEASANT ST 253-2515 AMHERST

RAO'S COFFEE ROASTING CO
Bring this ad in for 1/2 off our panini!
*only 1 per customer Expires 12/10/05
Rao's Coffee Roasting Company
47 Kellogg Ave Amherst MA 01002
(413) 253-0441
www.raoscoffee.com

Clippers are heating up

By Ira Winderman
South Florida Sun-Sentinel

The season began just as the previous 21 have in Los Angeles, as a punch line.

"Players can't wear anything embarrassing to the league," Jay Leno told his "Tonight Show" audience of the NBA's new dress code, "like a Clippers uniform." The difference this season is that the laughter has been muted.

The franchise that has never finished higher than third place since joining the Lakers in Los Angeles in 1984 can be found at the top of the Pacific Division.

"They've got a legit team," said Miami Heat guard Gary Payton. "You can't go in there and say it's a win. You've got to take those guys seriously now."

"They're up there," Heat forward Antoine Walker said, "with the elite teams."

Considering this is L.A., one would expect Ashton Kutcher to pop out between Walker and Payton, snatch the reporter's pen and mock the implausibility of such comments.

But the only ones being punk'd these days are Clippers opponents.

With a mix of returning forwards (Elton Brand, Corey Maggette) and an offseason injection of veteran guards (Sam Cassell, Cuttino Mobley), the Clippers have been among the hottest since opening night.

The 9-2 start was the franchise best in a lineage that dates to the 1970 expansion inception of the Buffalo Braves and through Bob McAdoo's exploits in that initial home.

"Chemistry has been terrific, beyond my expectations," coach Mike Dunleavy said. "Sam Cassell and Cuttino Mobley have been great additions, terrific with our young players. They're inspirational and give a lot of confidence."

Understand, in many ways this nearly set up as an all-too-typical Clippers capsizing.

Forward Bobby Simmons, winner of the 2005 Most Improved Player Award, was lost to the Bucks through free agency. A decision was made not to retain free-agent point guard Marko Jaric. And then, prized second-year guard Shaun Livingston was lost in camp with a back injury.

Mobley was added at $42 million over six years, the largest deal ever offered by the Clippers to an outside free agent. Cassell was added in a trade with Minnesota, although it meant having to deal with his free-agent negotiations after this season. And Brand was convinced to drop 20 pounds, an effort that has him as the Clippers' first NBA Player of the Week since Freeman Williams 25 years ago, when the team was based in San Diego.

"The moves they made this summer were big," said Heat forward James Posey, who spent the first six pro years as a Western Conference rival of the Clippers. "It shows the direction they're headed."

Not just the Heat is aware.

See CLIPPERS on page 8

JERRY CORDEIRO/SS/PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER

Quinton Ross of the Los Angeles Clippers is one of the reasons why his team has been able to get off to a good start in the young NBA season. The team has been able to produce a 9-2 record so far this season.

Instant replay possible in high school sports

By Tim Leighton
Knight Ridder

ST. PAUL, Minn. – Right after Blake Hoffarber's bizarre shot in March, referee Mike Bronson immediately ruled that the overtime shot had beaten the buzzer.

But had Hoffarber, who was nearly flat on his back when he shot, just given Hopkins the Minnesota Class AAAA boys championship with a three-pointer? Or was Hoffarber not fully behind the arc, meaning the basket was worth two points?

Hopkins coach Ken Novak Jr. pleaded with Bronson to watch the TV replay. Bronson could not. It was against the rules.

It might not be for much longer.

The Minnesota State High School League's board of directors is expected to vote Thursday on whether to allow instant replay to be used for the next basketball and hockey state tournaments.

"I would have loved to have had some replay help," Bronson said. "There was so much going on. If you made the wrong call, you don't want to give a state championship to a team that didn't earn it all the way. To have the benefit of replay would have been nice."

MSHSL associate director Kevin Merkle, who believes the motion will pass Thursday, said Monday that replays primarily would be used when games are televised. For games not televised, such as basketball quarterfinals and girls hockey quarterfinals, in-house video used to show replays on scoreboards might be used, Merkle said.

"One of the reasons we are concerned about going down this path is where does it lead us?" Merkle said. "I don't think we are at a point where we want officials running to cameras in the crowd. The intent is quite tight on limited situations."

In basketball, a timing error, any baskets at the end of a game or a last shot at the end of the first half could be reviewed under the proposal. In hockey, goals could be reviewed.

Merkle said the idea of instant replay was discussed at a national federation meeting over the summer but was tabled. Minnesota might be the first state to enact replay, he said.

Moorhead boys hockey coach Dave Morinville hopes the proposal passes. The Spuds were on the wrong end of a ruling last year in the Class AA championship game against Holy Angels when a goal was disallowed in the final minutes.

"The biggest joke of it all was that after they disallowed it, we knew within a minute or so with all the people from Moorhead (who had seen the television replays) calling people at the arena on their cell phones," Morinville said. "The purists will say (calls are a part of the game), and I can see that argument. The game has changed, though. Things are faster than they were 15, 20 years ago. It is harder for those guys to make the right calls, to be in the right position."

Merkle said one concern is that the replay has the potential to show up an official.

"Getting it right is what it is all about," Woodbury girls basketball coach Dave Preller said. "I'm trying to think of the kids' benefit. I keep hearing too many excuses from officials that they can't see some of the play."

Bronson isn't worried about a replay overturning a call.

"You want to talk about getting shown up?" Bronson asked with a chuckle. "If we would have blown it, and with that shot being shown everywhere..."

Women making strides in baseball world

By Jeff Passan
Knight Ridder

KANSAS CITY, Mo. – She still remembers the day she became one of the boys.

Every tiny detail remains fresh to Kim Ng, down to Cory Snyder's on-base percentage in 1990. It was .268. And his wife was named Tina. Assigned his arbitration case as an intern with the Chicago White Sox, Ng studied all things Snyder, from the curvature of his mustache to the arc of his swing.

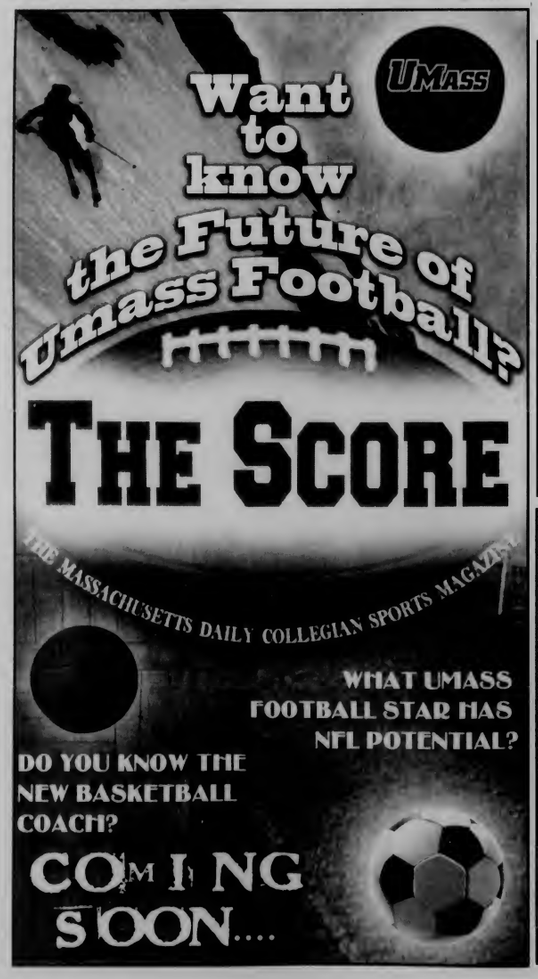
You think elephants have good memories? Never question a baseball man. Or, in Ng's case, a baseball woman.

Such things do exist, you know. Ng became one the afternoon of Feb. 19, 1991, when the White Sox won the case against Snyder and saved $202,000.

Careers start like that. And they end up here, in early November in Indian Wells, Calif., at the general manager meetings. Less than two weeks earlier, the Los Angeles Dodgers fired GM Paul DePodesta. With no one in place, they sent a team spearheaded by Ng, their 37-year-old assistant GM, to do business. She strode through the hotel like she belonged, scrawling notes on a pad because her Palm Pilot skills still aren't up to par, mingling, talking about whatever GMs talk about.

There are 30 general manager jobs in baseball, and everyone from owners to GMs to agents expects one of them to go to a woman in the near future. No woman has run the on-field operations of a major-league baseball team. Same goes for the NFL, NBA and NHL. Though professional sports have long struggled with minority hiring among top executives, the gender barrier is an Iron Curtain just starting to dissipate.

"It was exciting, and it was fun to think, 'Ugh, this is my decision,'" Ng said. "But you also realize that it's your reputation on the line. Your butt on the line. Some people take it as a challenge. Others shy away from it. I thought it was great.



"I'd like to think as women we're getting closer. If it will happen – I really don't know."

Because she's the consensus choice to be the first GM, perhaps Ng is being modest. Women have done most everything else in baseball. Margie Schott owned the Reds. Jamie McCourt is the Dodgers' president. Pam Postema umpired at Class AAA. Ila Borders pitched in the independent leagues. There are a handful of female GMs in the minor leagues.

And after the GM meetings, there was almost one in the big leagues. McCourt and her husband, team owner Frank, interviewed Ng for the GM position, the first time a woman had been courted for such.

Some questioned the Dodgers' wisdom. Others lauded their thinking. The job went to Giants assistant GM Ned

See KIM on page 8

Delivery:
413.549.0077
Tel: 413.256.8923
413.256.8924
Fax: 413.253.1173

103 N. Pleasant St.
Amherst, MA

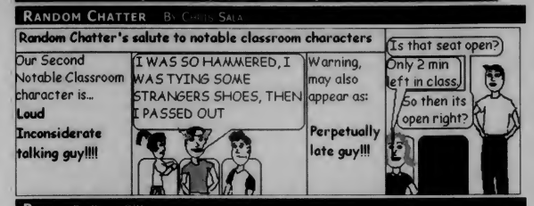
Panda East
Fine Chinese & Japanese Cuisine

Featuring:
- Vegetarian options
- Lunch Specials
- Sushi Bar
- "Light and Healthy" entrees

~ We Bring China Town to you ~
Semester Special

Bring in this ad and receive 10% off your total
*Cannot be combined with any offers, coupons or OCMP.
visit us at: www.pandaeastamherst.com

Shopping for a Health Club?
Do your homework first!
HAMPSHIRE FITNESS CLUB
Has it ALL for you!
JOIN FOR THE "WINTER SPECIAL"
13 WEEKS - $209 INDIVIDUAL
$377 COUPLE - $188 STU/SR
HAMPSHIRE FITNESS club
WHAT DO YOU GET?
Full Sized Indoor Pool • Aqua Aerobics
Cybex Nautilus Circuit • Cybex Free Weights
Full Court Basketball • Volleyball • Indoor Tennis
Cardio • Saunas • Indoor Cycling
Jacuzzi • Yoga/Pilates • Aerobics/Step/Bosu
COMPETITIVE BASKETBALL WITH JERRY MONDAY & THURSDAY 6-8 PM
NO INITIATION FEE OR LONG-TERM CONTRACT NECESSARY
90 Gatehouse Rd. (At Echo Hill) Amherst • 256-6446
Off Rte. 9, two miles east of Amherst College
OPEN 6AM-10PM MON-FRI • 8AM-9PM SAT & SUN



PULP By R. Rosen & M. Zim

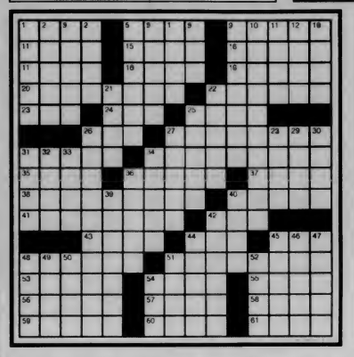
ELSIE HOOPER By R. Rosen & D. Krzykowski

RANDOM CHATTER By Carlos Sala

PAUL B.B. O'Kelly

TWO DUDES By Aaron Warner

QUOTE OF THE DAY



"You can't let crazy people decide whether you are crazy or not."

—Catch 22

ACROSS
1 Romanov title
5 Luge
9 One more time
14 Parcel of land
15 Actress Turner
16 Goody two-shoes
17 Marketed
18 Bit of physics
19 Noggins
20 Bridge supports
22 Birchbark boats
23 Desire
24 Came in first
25 Firewood measure
26 Indistinct
27 Woody
31 City near Bremen
34 Soy-in-the-sky
35 "... of Fish"
36 Eye-dropped?
37 Asian sea
38 Feared tigers
40 Odor
41 Subs
42 Guitarist Paul
43 Flit
44 Misfortune
45 CAB successor
48 Upper arm bulge
51 One-for-one deal
53 Arena happening
54 "M*A*S*H" co-star Loretta
55 Pluck
56 Knight's weapon
57 Core
58 Fairy tale heavy
59 Fed the kitty
60 "The African Queen" scriptwriter
61 Prognosticator

DOWN
1 Flavorful
2 Get a goal
3 Songwriter Harold
4 Cincinnati pros
5 Downhill ski race
6 Grow dark
7 "Hazzard" deputy
8 Lake maker
9 Barb
10 Baseball feats
11 Mobile starter
12 ___ Ewe
13 Capone's nemesis
21 Minnesota pro
22 Hollowed as apples
25 Pigeon shelters
26 Reliance
27 Expos
28 Trunk spare
29 Etc.'s cousin
30 Computer maker
31 Shade trees
32 Vegetarian taboo
33 Comic Carvey
34 Exhausted
36 Mixes
39 Altered to suit
40 Plant orvule
42 Abhor
44 Communicate by letter
45 Blacksmith's shop
46 Blazing
47 Fairy tale ender
48 Composer Bartok
49 Twister ruler?
50 Canadian coin
51 Young shoot
52 Prima donnas' problems
54 Masseuse's milieu

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

THE HARP
NEW!! Wireless Internet
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted
Irish Pub
DECEMBER SPECIAL!
$1.50 PBR Bottles; Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 A pint / $6.50 a pitcher
Tonight: • Cold Duck Complex
Thur: • 5th Pocket!
Fri: • Irish Seisiun
Sat: • Live Music! No Cover!
"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments

Submit your comic!
e-mail
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

HOROSCOPES

aquarius JAN. 20-FEB. 18
You will take a field trip to the aquarium at some point over winter break.

pisces FEB. 19-MAR. 20
You should integrate candy bars to your daily diet.

aries MAR. 21-APR. 19
Whatever you do, don't do the crossword puzzle in pen.

taurus APR. 20-MAY 20
Manatees are fascinating creatures that you should learn more about.

gemini MAY 21-JUN. 21
Your lucky lottery numbers today are 4, 7, 15, 21, 33, and 40.

cancer JUN. 22-JUL. 22
You will be sad you missed the Victoria's Secret fashion show last night.

leo JUL. 23-AUG. 22
You will be forced to watch hours of Bill Nye the Science Guy with your cousins.

virgo AUG. 23-SEPT. 22
It is unlikely you will do well on your next physics test.

libra SEPT. 23-OCT. 22
Just be happy you don't have any tests today.

scorpio OCT. 23-NOV. 21
You will end up accidentally watching FOX News for over an hour today.

sagittarius NOV. 22-DEC. 21
You are an excellent potato peeler, and you don't even know it.

capricorn DEC. 22-JAN. 19
If you aren't careful you will be tricked into joining a poetry club.

★ Submit your comic ★
e-mail
collegiancomcis@yahoo.com

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Attention RSOs, Fraternities, Sororities, & Club Sports: Hosting an event? Big match coming up? Running a charity drive? Advertise for it here! It's the inexpensive and effective way to get the word out. Call 545-3500 to place your ad.

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Spring Semester Sublet – Master bedroom in Puffton Village, $461/month plus cable/internet and electricity. Looking for a subletter Jan-May. Share apartment with two other roommates, partially furnished. Call 203-915-7679.

APARTMENT FOR RENT

1, 2, 3 & 4 Bedroom spacious apartments, Great location, Bus Route, All utilities included No Fee Call 413-253-3000

EMPLOYMENT

Carpenter's helper. Part-time. Pay equal to experience. Must be able to lift 50 lbs. 253-5351.

Rent us your ears! Listening experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu Voicemail: 545-6837.

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

HAPPY BIRTHDAY

Is your friend turning 21? Make sure everyone knows by placing a classified in the paper! 545-3500.

LOST AND FOUND

Lose something near and dear to your heart? Find something you think some one might really want back? Put an ad in the paper! Offer a reward. Or help someone find what they've lost. 545-3500.

HOUSE FOR RENT

For January, 2-3 Bedroom house. Walking distance to Northampton Center, close to bus. 1,000 + utilities, no pets. Skibiski Realtor 586-1827

HOUSE FOR RENT

New Salem 3 Bdrm 10 Acres easy commute $1,000+ 549-4401

ROOM FOR RENT

413-335-5226 Mo. to mo. $325 inclusive 20 min to campus

SERVICES

Computer Diagnostic Desktop $9.95 Laptop $39.95 413-584-8857

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

SERVICES

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance. 549-1906

TRAVEL

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed! Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

WANTED

Wanted: Your home-drawn comic strips! Drop them off at the Collegian graphics office or email collegiancomics@yahoo.com

WANTED

Leave your advertising needs to us!

Let our experienced advertising representatives and graphic artists take care of you!

Reach over 14,000 readers daily!

We offer a full range of ad sizes, as well as design services.

Contact our business department by calling (413) 545-3500
Or visit us in the Campus Center Basement.

Business Hours: M-F 8:30am-3:30pm

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 7, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The international Minutewomen

KAREN WINGER/COLLEGIAN

Masha Pozar (left) and Michele Spiess (right) both left their respective countries in Europe to play tennis in the United States. Members of the UMass team, the two have dominated in the top two slots, recording a combined record of 40-14 in singles play.

By Ben Hodgkins
Collegian Correspondent

Take a look at the current collegiate or professional tennis rankings and there will be a common trend – Europeans.

Since the modern lawn tennis began in England around the 19th century, Europeans have been a dominant force in the sport.

When one thinks of the greatest to ever play the sport, names such as Boris Becker, Bjorn Borg, Roger Federer, Steffi Graf, Martina Navratilova and Monica Seles come to mind. All of them happen to be Europeans.

Women's tennis has lately been filled with an influx of international tennis stars from Europe. Seventeen of the top 20 professional women's players are from European nations and 10 of the top 20 Division I women's players in the United States are European.

The University of Massachusetts tennis team has two European tennis players in its ranks. Sophomore Masha Pozar from Slovenia and junior Michele Spiess from Germany constitute the top two spots in the tennis rotation.

Both Pozar and Spiess have been attending UMass for only one year, but have already made a big impact at the university. In the 2004-05 season, they quickly became the No.1 (Spiess) and No. 2 (Pozar) players for the Minutewomen. Last year they accumulated a combined singles record of 40-14 and in doubles play together, a record of 15-10.

This past fall they quickly picked up where they left off, going 9-3 in singles play and 5-0 together in doubles.

Although both are from European nations and are currently on the UMass tennis roster, they took two different routes to get to where they are now.

Pozar grew up in Ljubljana, Slovenia, the capital of a country slightly smaller then New Jersey and with a population of a little more then two million people. It is located between Italy, Austria, Croatia and Hungary.

She was born into a tennis family and started to play around the age of six or seven.

While soccer is the number one sport in the country, tennis is close behind. Masha, however, decided to take her tennis elsewhere, going to high school in Barcelona, Spain at the Bruguera Tennis Academy.

At the tennis academy, she constantly worked on her game, living there with many other tennis players who were there for the same reason. The reason for being there was to improve your tennis game and that is what Masha did.

Masha competed in many national tournaments in her home country of Slovenia. She achieved a ranking in

See TENNIS on page 9

UM spoils former coach's return

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

New Merrimack coach Mark Dennehy's return to Amherst didn't turn out to be the merry reunion he was hoping for during the holiday season, as the Massachusetts hockey team (5-8-0 3-5-0 Hockey East) knocked off its old assistant coach and his Warriors (4-8-2 1-6-2 HEA) by a 4-1 score in front of 2,238 fans at the Mullins Center last night.

The Minutemen have now won three of their last four games and are riding high heading into their big home-and-home series with the Boston College Eagles this weekend. The puck drops at 7 p.m. in Chestnut Hill on Friday night before the teams shift back to Amherst for the same starting time on Saturday.

"We want this to be a great week, but it can't be a great week if we don't get it started off right," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "If we didn't take care of business [last night], it could have been a good week. But if we wanted to have a great week, it had to start off [with a win last night]."

UMass	4
Merrimack	1

KAREN WINGER/COLLEGIAN

Marvin Degon's goal in the third quarter was enough to give the UMass hockey team the 4-1 edge over Merrimack last night. The contest marked the return of former UMass coach Mark Dennehey, who now coaches for the Warriors.

The Minutemen were led by a balanced offense that saw four different players tally a goal, and 10 players scored at least one point during the win.

Goalie Gabe Winer was solid again in net for UMass, as he picked up his second win in as many starts while making 20 saves – nine of those coming in the third period.

"I thought UMass played a really good game," Dennehy said of his former club. "I thought they were disciplined and beat us to loose pucks.

See HOCKEY on page 9

Leinart has shot at another Heisman

By John Nadel
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES – Southern California was in deep trouble. The Trojans trailed Notre Dame 31-28 with 1:32 remaining, were stuck at their own 26-yard line and had just used their final timeout.
It was fourth-and-9.

The crowd of 80,795 at Notre Dame Stadium was going nuts, sensing the Fighting Irish were about to snap USC's 27-game winning streak and end the Trojans' hopes for an unprecedented third straight national championship.

USC's Matt Leinart never thought about that stuff because he had a big play to make. He would make the biggest play of his life.

The reigning Heisman Trophy winner called an audible before throwing deep downfield. Dwayne Jarrett was well-covered, but caught the perfectly thrown pass in stride and raced to the Notre Dame 13, completing a 61-yard play.

Leinart would later score on a sneak from inside the 1-yard line with three seconds to play, and the Trojans were winners in one of the most memorable finishes of the season.

No. 1 USC (12-0) has won seven games since, giving the Trojans a 34-game winning streak entering the Rose Bowl, where they'll face No. 2 Texas for the national title.

If USC wins, the argument can be made that Leinart will finish his career as the best quarterback in college football history for one simple reason – the Trojans' incredible record with the 6-foot-5 left-hander from Santa Ana at the controls.
Right now, it's 37-1, with the lone loss a 34-31 triple-overtime setback at California on Sept. 27, 2003.

"If just feels like we can't lose with him," USC offensive tackle Winston Justice said. "He's just so poised. When other quarterbacks would probably freeze up, Matt doesn't freeze up."

Leinart hadn't thrown a pass at USC when he became the Trojans' starting quarterback in 2003. He passed for 3,556 yards and 38 touchdowns with nine interceptions as a sophomore; 3,322 yards and 33 touchdowns with six interceptions last year, and 3,450 yards and 27 touchdowns with seven interceptions this season with one game left.

Although teammate Reggie Bush appears to be the front-runner to win this year's Heisman, which will be awarded Saturday in New York, Leinart believes he's much better now than he was last season.
USC coach Pete Carroll agrees.

"There is no doubt," Carroll said. "How many 300-yard games did he have last year?"

The answer is two. This year, Leinart has passed for 300 or more yards in six games.

"That's just one barometer," Carroll said. "He's much more controlled. Everything about him is better, every single aspect. He is stronger, faster. His arm is great, his understanding, his confidence, his speed, his quickness, and his ability to make decisions and get rid of the football, and his ability to audible."
Leinart, though, said he'll be happy to present his teammate with the Heisman.

"He's got my vote," Leinart said of Bush, whose 554 yards rushing in the last two games are the most ever by a USC player in back-to-back games.

As a Heisman winner, Leinart is one of the voters.

"I won last year, and I'm excited to go back so I can give him the hug he gave me," Leinart said.

Leinart passed up the opportunity to become an instant millionaire last January by deciding to return to USC for his senior year rather than making himself available for the NFL draft.

"This is everything I dreamed of coming back," he said after USC's 66-19 triumph over crosstown rival UCLA last weekend. "It's been a perfect season."

Leinart struggled at times early in the season because, he said, he was putting too much pressure on himself.

Perhaps there were other factors.

"There is a tremendous burden for him, and he's just a young pup trying to make it," Carroll said after the Notre Dame game.

Several weeks later, the coach said he and Leinart spoke about the player's outlook.

"Just shooting the breeze, but we talked about the buildup and the hype and the pressure and the expectations," Carroll said. "It was really simple, the conversation went to remind him about how great of a football player and a competitor and factor he really is. There are going to be ups and downs and you are going to have to deal with it.

"Fortunately, what is notable is that Matt was able to regain his composure and his confidence the way he has wanted to, and his performance has been rolling ever since."

Even when times got a little tough, Leinart said he never regretted his decision to return to USC instead of turning pro.

"I'd rather be here than there right now," he said last week, referring to the NFL. "I never think about the money, what I could do in the NFL. That time will come."

Leinart figures to be among the top picks in April's NFL draft. He'll be remembered at USC for more than just being an exceptional player.

"I just love him so much and I'm going to miss him," center Ryan Kalil said.

"It's just been a blessing to play with someone like Matt," Bush said. "He's a good person. He's done everything for our team. We love him. I'm going to be sad to see him go.

"He definitely will be remembered as one of the greatest quarterbacks to play college football."

Raiders pondering QB change

By Steve Corkran
Knight Ridder

ALAMEDA, Calif – It appears that Oakland Raiders coach Norv Turner is ready to take an extensive look at backup quarterback Marques Tuiasosopo now that the team has been eliminated from playoff contention.

Turner has been hesitant to play Tuiasosopo until now. Kerry Collins relieved Rich Gannon in Oakland's third game last season, after Gannon sustained a broken vertebra in his neck. Collins started the final 13 games last season and the first 12 this season.

A disappointing 4-8 record leaves the Raiders with four games to play. That's plenty of time to take a look at players such as Tuiasosopo, with an eye toward 2006 and beyond.

"We're going to look at the quarterback situation," Turner said Monday, "and say, 'Hey, is it time to look at Tui? With his mobility, would that help us?' That's something over the next two days, before we get to Wednesday practices, we'll look at it and see if that gives us a better chance.

"I wouldn't have brought it up if it wasn't something we're considering strongly. We're just going to make the decision in the next couple days."

Turner informed Collins and Tuiasosopo of the possibility of a quarterback switch. Collins was unavailable for comment. Tuiasosopo said he isn't getting too worked up over something that remains unsettled.

"I definitely feel like I have a better chance," Tuiasosopo said Monday. "That's always exciting."

Collins got off to perhaps the best start of his 11-year NFL career this season. He went four games without throwing an interception and threw 141 passes before getting picked for the first time.

He had only one interception in his first 236 pass attempts but has nine in his past 210. Collins has passed for 16 touchdowns and 3,118 yards, but he has completed only 54.9 percent of his passes and been sacked 32 times.

"This is part of what being a quarterback is all about," Collins said last Wednesday. "There are going to be times when things are not going well and people are going to try to get other people in there."

After Sunday's 34-10 loss to the San Diego Chargers, Collins said the following when asked if he remains the best option at quarterback:

"I am. I want to be in there as long as we're playing. I said it (last) week; I still feel like this is my team, and I'll go down fighting with everybody."

The Raiders selected Tuiasosopo in the second round of the 2001 NFL draft as the heir apparent to Gannon. But his progression stalled when the Raiders signed Collins before last season and moved him ahead of Tuiasosopo.

"I wasn't excited at all," Tuiasosopo said. "It's not something I was happy with. But it's part of the business."

This will be Tuiasosopo's second shot at proving himself. He started Oakland's eighth game in 2003, one week after Gannon sustained a season-ending injury to his right shoulder.

Tuiasosopo lasted less than a half against the Detroit Lions before leaving with a partial tear of the medial collateral ligament in his left knee. He got intercepted on his second pass of the game, was sacked once and fumbled before his injury. He hasn't played since, a span of 36 games.

"I don't think that Kerry's played in a way that suggests that he should be replaced," Raiders left tackle Barry Sims said. "But, at the same time, Tui's been here a long time and hardly played at all. It would be interesting to see how he handles himself."

Overall, Tuiasosopo has attempted 49 passes in eight games.

He can void the last year of his original six-year contract if he participates in at least 30 percent of Oakland's offensive plays this season, but that seems a remote possibility with just four games remaining.

More important, perhaps, are the long-term ramifications of Tuiasosopo's performance from this Sunday's game until the season finale Dec. 31. The Raiders visit the New York Jets this Sunday.

If Tuiasosopo bombs, he might get released, and the Raiders likely would stick with Collins or turn to rookie Andrew Walter. If Tuiasosopo plays well, that might end Collins' Raiders career.

Collins is slated to earn $6 million in base salary next season, as well as a $2.5 million roster bonus. He carries a prohibitive $12,987,688 salary cap figure, to boot.

The Raiders would save nearly $12 million against the 2006 cap by releasing Collins. Tuiasosopo's 2006 salary is $477,000.

Notes: Starting strong safety Jarrod Cooper's injury was confirmed as a strained left calf, Turner said. "It may not be as bad as previously thought," Turner said. Cooper got hurt late in the first half and missed the rest of the game. Initially, Turner feared Cooper might have sustained a torn calf muscle. . . . Center Jake Grove sustained a "stinger" in his right shoulder on San Diego's return of an interception in the fourth quarter. The injury was severe enough for the injured Brad Badger to replace Grove for the remainder of the game, but Grove said it was not something that will keep him from playing Sunday.

New England's Largest College Daily · Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 8, 2005 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM VOLUME CXVI ISSUE 62

How safe is UMass?

JAMIE LAU/COLLEGIAN

UMass police had to deal with many phone calls from concerned members of the community after an ABC News report labeled UMass Amherst as one of America's most dangerous campuses.

New campus security crew faces tough tasks in dorms

By Matthew Pilon
Collegian Staff

It's a cold Saturday night as eight student security supervisors gather on the steps of Dickinson Hall.

Carrying radios, flashlights, and binders full of paperwork, the group disperses in various directions, beginning their seven hour shifts that end at 3 a.m.

UMass junior criminal justice major Bryan J. Luszczki heads toward Southwest Residential Area with a group of three other supervisors. He has agreed to let this reporter walk with him as he makes his rounds.

A recent ABC broadcast featuring UMass Amherst as the most dangerous university of its size has left students, faculty, and the public wondering how accurately the report represents the University of Massachusetts's flagship campus. The ABC broadcast was closely preceded by an announcement by Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano that UMass would be hiring a private security company, Securitas, to supplement residence hall security throughout Southwest and in parts of Central Residential [illegible].

Luszczki explained that most [illegible] are at their [illegible] 8 p.m. Thursday. Student [illegible] but Securitas officers remain in certain dormitories until 3 a.m.

A short time into our walk, the smell of marijuana permeated the air outside of Thoreau dormitory in Southwest. Luszczki sniffed the air and explained that security supervisors are "not authorized to determine that smell." Contrary to common perception, student security supervisors are only responsible for enforcing the sign-in policy in dormitory lobbies and ensuring the safety of the desk monitors.

Upon exiting Emerson dormitory, also in Southwest, Luszczki encountered a man urinating in plain view.

"Are you aware that public urination is against the law?" Luszczki asked, shining a flashlight on the man.

He explained to the man that if a police cadet or officer had witnessed him, he could be put on the sex offender registry.

The man nodded a belligerent affirmative and we were on our way to Cance dormitory.

Luszczki explained that Southwest dormitories and Baker Hall in Central have been classified as "problem dorms." These dormitories are staffed by Securitas officers, with whom [illegible] are required to sign in. [illegible], guests who left [illegible] were required to [illegible] student security

See SECURITAS on page 4

JAMIE LAU/COLLEGIAN

The Pi Delta Psi fraternity received a deferred suspension from UMass after it was implicated in an incident that resulted in six people being stabbed near its house on Oct. 2.

the 311 concert at the Mullins Center complained about signing in for a second time.

"What's the difference?" one guest asked impatiently as Luszczki struggled to keep crowds from walking past the monitor desk in a Southwest low-rise dormitory. Many members of the crowd responded with "I live here." Luszczki demanded their IDs while telling others who had already signed in earlier to remain in the lobby until their hosts could "escort them upstairs."

Other people entering the building were critical as well.

"Security at this school is the wackest," yelled one student angrily, prompting an admonishment from cluster office workers.

After the crowd died down, Luszczki commented on the criticism.

"I've learned to shrug it off," he said. "Our job is to enforce the policy."

When asked, Luszczki explained that there is a "renewed importance" on hosts escorting guests from the lobby. The rule has always existed, but in the past has rarely been enforced, he said.

"We don't know the circumstances under which [the guest] left," he said. "The host may not want them to come back in."

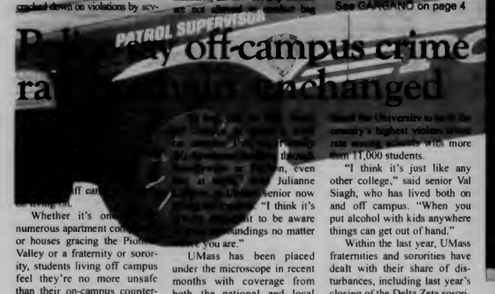
The other function of student

Vice Chancellor points out trouble spots on campus

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Since his arrival at the University of Massachusetts Amherst campus in 2002, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano has been responsible for some of the biggest changes on campus.

He was there for the increase of police officers and security during the Boston Red Sox and New England Patriots postseason games. He helped transform three dorms in the Southwest Residential Area into all-freshman buildings, and he cracked down on violations by several fraternities.



His latest action is the addition of extra security from 3 p.m. until 8 p.m. on Thursdays, Fridays and Saturdays in certain dorms on campus, specifically the five towers and several low-rise buildings in Southwest, and Baker dormitory in the Central Residential Area. The new security members are from the private security company Securitas. Residents and guests of the aforementioned dormitories must undergo identification checks while the Securitas members are present.

Despite these added security measures, the new security officers are not allowed to conduct bag searches on students, and persons over the age of 21 are still allowed to bring in a limited amount of alcohol into the dorms. Thus far, the added security has stirred controversy within the student body.

"I think it's unnecessary," said Mike Ford, a freshman who lives in Washington tower. "Do they really need someone guarding the door at three in the afternoon? Nothing happens [at that time]. Most of the shows happens after people leave the dorm when they're drunk and stuff."

"I see no change at all," said Devon Mallonis, a second-[illegible]

See GARGANO on page 4

off-campus crime ra[illegible] unchanged

[illegible] the University to be the university's highest violent crime rate among schools with more than 11,000 students.

"I think it's just like any other college," said senior Val Siagh, who has lived both on and off campus. "When you put alcohol with kids anywhere things can get out of hand."

Within the last year, UMass fraternities and sororities have dealt with their share of disturbances, including last year's closing of the Delta Zeta sorori-

See OFF-CAMPUS on page 4

Whether it's one [illegible] numerous apartment co[illegible] or houses gracing the Pio[illegible] Valley or a fraternity or sorority, students living off campus feel they're no more unsafe than their on-campus counterparts, in contrast to recent news reports.

[illegible] Julianne [illegible] senior now [illegible] "I think it's [illegible] to be aware [illegible] undings no matter [illegible] you are."

UMass has been placed under the microscope in recent months with coverage from both the national and local media. ABC's Primetime news magazine show claimed to have

Scholarship honors slain student

By Georgia Kelley
Collegian Correspondent

The Southwest Area Government's executive board has recently created a scholarship fund in the memory of a slain University of Massachusetts student.

Franklyn Nwachukwu, a popular UMass Nursing student was shot to death July 17 in Boston during an armed robbery. He is remembered as a light hearted, respectful and cooperative individual who was on his way to success. Franklyn, who worked as a resident assistant in Washington tower in the Southwest Residential Area, frequently attended events at the Malcolm X Center and was often found spending quality time joking with friends.

The Franklyn Nwachukwu Memorial Scholarship will be presented to both a male and a female from the class of 2007 and was created in order to recognize Franklyn's accomplishments and bring awareness to his tragic loss.

"There was never a time where we wouldn't have a conversation when we saw each other," said friend Tom Varghese of Southwest.

The Southwest Area Government had a scholarship fund established well before the current executive board's time, but it was Lieutenant Governor, Amy Ciaramitaro who thought that finally distributing the scholarship would be an appropriate way to memorialize Franklyn and all that he did.

"We collectively worked together to make this scholarship happen, and we are excited about this opportunity to financially assist individuals who has lived in Southwest. It is a unique way for an area government to give back to their constituents and those we represent," said Kraig Moore, Governor of Southwest.

The Southwest Area Government will award two recipients with a $3,000 scholarship each over the next three semesters.

COLLEGIAN FILE PHOTO

A scholarship fund has been created in the memory of deceased UMass student Franklyn Nwachukwu, pictured above in a photo taken by friends.

"Our reasoning is that it would be as if Franklyn would be able to graduate with them," said Moore.

The candidate must be a junior who lived in Southwest or are currently living in Southwest, possess strong leadership skills and be active in their community.

See SCHOLARSHIP on page 3

New recreation center slated for UMass students

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts has put plans back in motion to build a new student recreation center, according to Chancellor John Lombardi.

Lombardi spoke recently to the UMass Faculty Senate about the plans.

Students in past years voted to increase their fees to help finance the construction, which will cost around $50 million dollars. However, before the university could go ahead with its plans, it was hit with several cuts that caused a budget crisis. Students voted to postpone the planned recreation center so that the money could be used by the university to keep faculty members and avoid unnecessary teacher layoffs.

"Now it's time to put [the plans] back on track," said Lombardi. UMass is more financially stable, he said, and he felt it was time to give students the recreation center they had been promised.

Several polls have been taken since 1999 asking students about the kinds of assets they would like to see in the new building. The polls were conducted by Project Pulse of the Student Affairs Research Office, and asked students to rate existing recreation centers on campus, such as Boyden Gym, and collected input on the plans to build the recreation center.

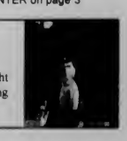
Plans for the new recreation center include a room with free weights, basketball courts, handball courts, a running track and locker rooms. All of these facilities were given high priority by the polled students.

Lombardi said that a new indoor pool will not be included in the new center because it is the most expensive request per square foot. He also said that the pool was one of the least requested things on the survey.

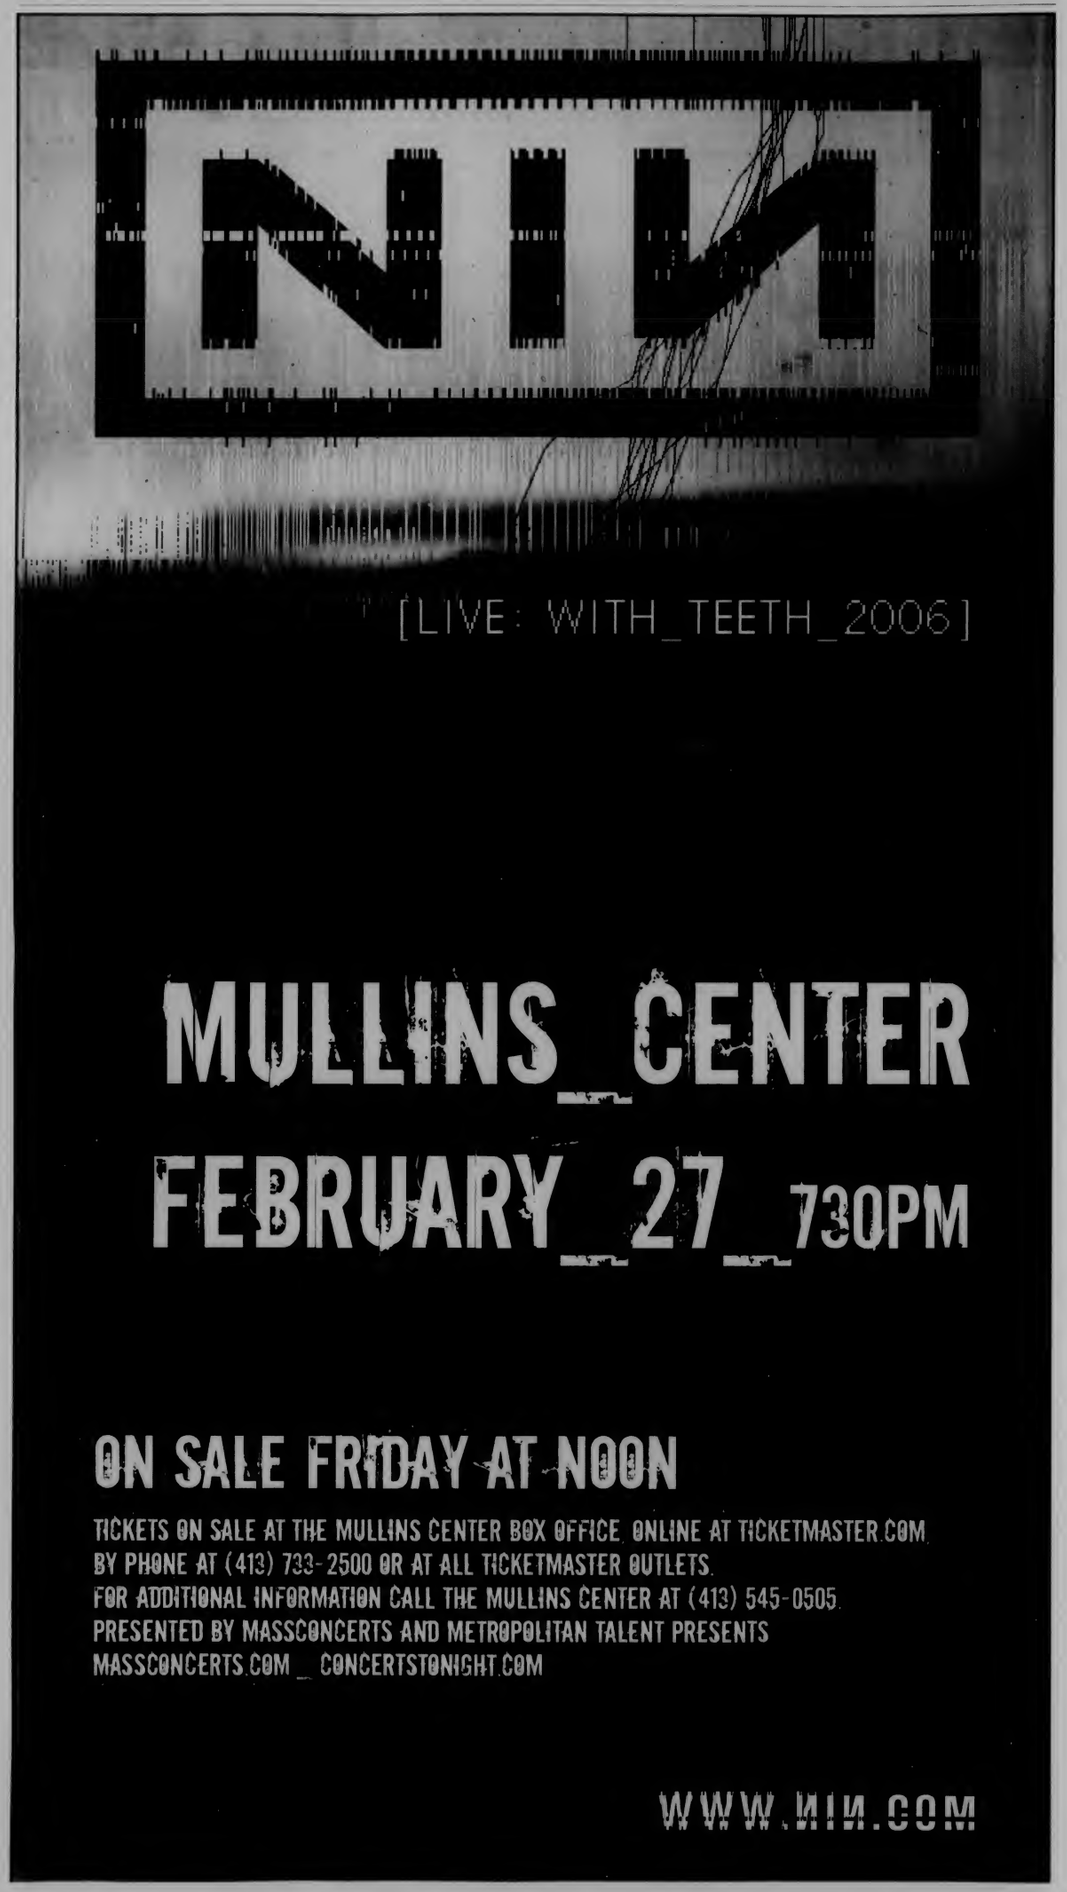
The Physical Plant will be responsible for the construction of the center, which is set to be built near the Mullins Center. At the planned location an existing old gray barn will be demolished and replaced with the three-story recreation center. Lombardi said the location was selected because students, when polled, said that they preferred a place within walking distance.

Lombardi said that the plan to build a new facility rather than adding to the current ones was made because he does not want the new center to be used as a place simply for athletes, but for all students.

"We want to make sure this is a stu-



See CENTER on page 3



ARTS & LIVING
A HOLIDAY CLASSIC
The Boston Ballet presents 'The Nutcracker' for the 37th year in a row at the Opera House.
PAGE 6

EDITORIAL/OPINION
A COLLEGIAN CHRISTMAS
One columnist writes out his Christmas wish list, with a special soft spot for Nick Lachey.
PAGE 5

WEATHER
TODAY Sunny, H32°
TONIGHT Partly Cloudy L19°
TOMORROW Snow H28, L16°

SPORTS
THE REMATCH
The Minutemen face UConn tonight a year after pulling their shocking upset.
PAGE 12

MULLINS_CENTER

FEBRUARY_27_730PM

ON SALE FRIDAY AT NOON

TICKETS ON SALE AT THE MULLINS CENTER BOX OFFICE, ONLINE AT TICKETMASTER.COM
BY PHONE AT (413) 733-2500 OR AT ALL TICKETMASTER OUTLETS.
FOR ADDITIONAL INFORMATION CALL THE MULLINS CENTER AT (413) 545-0505.
PRESENTED BY MASSCONCERTS AND METROPOLITAN TALENT PRESENTS
MASSCONCERTS.COM _ CONCERTSTONIGHT.COM

WWW.NIN.COM

New athletic center planned for UMass

CENTER from page 1

dent recreation center and not a student athlete training center," said Lombardi.

Several other schools across the country have built recreation centers over the past few years, and the addition of such a facility is considered a bonus for student life ratings on campus.

The current plans for the center are only in their first stage. If additional funding is provided, the center may be expanded to include more facilities, such as the pool and a rock climbing wall. Because of the center's planned location, Lombardi said, expansion and additional construction will be possible in the future.

Faculty Senate members expressed their pleasure that the recreation center plans were still going forward, saying they had feared the plans had been set aside forever. Lombardi said the Board of Trustees was also pleased with the preliminary plans and pictures they had been shown.

A copy of the survey done by Project Pulse in 1999 is available to download at their Website, umass.edu/sareo/pp_date.html.

The storage facility that sits across the street from the Mullins Center is planned to be converted into a new recreation center for students.

Scholarship created

SCHOLARSHIP from page 1

"The scholarship recognizes former and present residents who have and who continue to live their life like Franklyn did," said Moore.

Students can apply online by downloading an application through the Southwest Area Government's Web site swagumass.edu or by picking up a paper application in the Student Government Association office located in room 420 of the Student Union, the Southwest Area Government office in Hampden or any Area Office.

Applications will be due Monday, Dec. 12 and can be dropped off in the Southwest Area Government Office, one of the Southwest Area Offices located in Cance or Thoreau Halls or in the SGA office.

Despite the scholarship ending in the spring of 2007, Franklyn will always be remembered for his insightful mentoring, diligence in the classroom and the warmth that he radiated throughout the University.

Fierce discussion in Senate meeting over higher ed funding

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

Debate roared in the Student Government Association of the University of Massachusetts meeting last night concerning the approved recommendation to assist in mobilizing broad public support for the Free Higher Education campaign.

"This recommendation sends a political message that calls for free higher education as a right," said Mishy Leiblum, cabinet member and secretary of student affairs for the SGA.

The campaign claims that the federal government could fund tuition and fees for all public colleges and universities by rolling back President Bush's proposed estate tax repeal. According to the Web site freehighered.org, tuition and fees at two- and four-year public institutions in 2001 totaled approximately $32 billion. If the federal government eliminated the tax cut for the top one percent of earners in America, it would save $82.4 billion a year.

The Web site also claims that corporate tax loopholes passed by Congress in 2002 decreased federal revenue by $170 billion in 2003-04, more than enough to fund public education.

"If the U.S. government took just a fraction of the funds used in the war efforts, the entire nation could go to school for free," said Leiblum.

Former SGA senator Adam Szagjin also spoke in support of the recommendation. "Free higher education would create enormous potential, potential for the entire public to have access to higher education," he said.

Senator Melissa Lockett shared her concern with supporting the recommendation.

"If everyone was guaranteed the accessibility to higher education, it would that make college a joke," said Lockett. "We would be making the college diploma as valuable as a high school diploma."

SGA Chairman Sean McNair, who voted against the recommendation, criticized the SGA for putting national issues over campus issues.

"SGA senators are voted in by students to deal with campus issues, and there are campus issues that we have to deal with first," said McNair. "I'm driving over huge potholes around campus and worrying about not having paper towels in the Southwest dorms, and we're discussing national issues?"

Sean Bliss, SGA Speaker addresses the Senate at last night's meeting.

McNair also lashed out against SGA for representing certain political ideologies.

"SGA isn't supposed to be about Democrats and Republicans, it's supposed to be about breakfast sandwiches and soap in the bathrooms," said McNair. "If students want to support worldwide issues, they can create an RSO (Registered Student Organization) that fights for that certain cause and that RSO can be funded by the SGA. The SGA is a Massachusetts organization, not an RSO."

The Senate also voted to increase the maximum amount of money that the Finance Committee can allocate to RSOs without the approval of the Senate, going against the will of President Pavel Payano.

The motion allows the finance committee to allocate $1,000, an increase from the original amount of $750.

The finance committee, which is given $50,000 each year to give to RSOs, has seen an increase in the number of RSOs asking for funding.

According to Payano, the increase of needy RSOs can be attributed to the Ways and Means Committee drastically cutting RSO funding in their yearly budget.

"The reason that all these RSOs are coming up to the Finance Committee asking for funds is because the Ways and Means cut their budgets last year," said Payano. "Ways and Means is not going to cut the budget this year. RSOs will not need as high amounts of funding next year."

"I'm not comfortable with the Finance Committee having the power to allocate that amount of money to RSOs without Senate's approval. The Senate has to hear it, it has to see, and it has to be put up for approval," said Payano.

Corrections

In yesterday's Daily Collegian, the following errors occurred:

-The headline "Four arrested in Southwest dorm burglary" was factually incorrect; the burglary took place in yellow lot II.

-The UMass Police log incorrectly identified Ruddys A. Pimentell as being arrested for possession of marijuana. This error was the fault of the UMass Police, who incorrectly reported that information.

In Tuesday's "New Music Tuesday" feature in the Arts and Living section, writer Tim McCall incorrectly said the Gay and Lesbian Advocates and Defenders group called rapper Eminem homophobic. This mistake was due to a reporting error.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3499 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Michael Busack
Managing Editor Cameron J. Woods
Business Manager Hirak Shah
Production Manager Nicholas Belanger
Night Supervisor Sheryl Wolnik
Advertising Manager Kerry O'Grady
Advertising Production Lauren Egavian
Editorial Production Amanda Allen
Arts & Living Editor Matthew O'Rourke
Comics Editor Amanda Allen
Editorial Editor Allison Edles
News Editor Dan O'Brien
Photo Editor Kate Sachsenmaier
Sports Editor Jeff Howe
Circulation Manager Thomas Hecht
Distribution Manager Nick Gleason
Finance Manager Daniel Conti
Human Resource Phil Smoller
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Caren Tortorici
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Asst. Arts & Living Mackenzie Issler
Asst. Arts & Living Ian Jones
Assistant News Megan Daley
Assistant News Matt Belliveau
Assistant Photo Elizabeth Caristi
Assistant Sports Eric Athas
Assistant Sports Dan Duggan
Assistant Editorial Kristen LaCasse

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenues. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life, became the Collegian Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1904 and the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1936. Published daily since 1967, the Collegian has been broadsheet since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call weekdays between 8:30 a.m. and 3:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Sheryl Wolnik

PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Jamie Lau

COPY EDITOR
Katie Huston

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Nick Belanger

PRODUCTION STAFF
Chris Martin, Kristen LaCasse

Amherst police discuss violence

OFF-CAMPUS from page 1

ty after its national chapter charged it with "unspecific drug violations," and the Oct 2 incident of six people being stabbed outside on a section of North Pleasant Street more commonly known as "Frat Row."

Since the fraternities and sororities are "off-campus," Amherst's town police are responsible for responding to disturbances. While the most frequent disturbance is noise, Michael Kent, the officer in charge of patrol operations for Amherst police, has noticed the problems on Frat Row.

"We have had quite a few episodes with violent crime, such as the stabbing on Frat Row," said Kent. With regards to the amount of calls Amherst Police has received, Kent said, "I think we have had an overall increase in calls this year, but we haven't had any major disturbances."

While many students choose to live in Puffton Village and Brandywine, the heavily student-populated area hasn't seen an increase in crime. According to the town of Amherst's crime statistics collected annually, from 2002 to 2004, the amount of noise and assault calls made to police has either decreased or stayed roughly the same. These statistics dispel the notion of a crime-ridden Amherst that's getting more dangerous by the year.

Living in Puffton Village for the second consecutive year, UMass senior Dave Brewer said, "I've never had an issue walking around off campus. I've never felt unsafe living off-campus." He went on to compare his experience with last year's World Series riots and the riots that took place after the University of Connecticut won its men's basketball national championship.

"The riot there was as big, if not bigger than it was here for the Red Sox. We had a couple cars tipped over here on campus; they had cars tipped over in the city."

The extensive community service the fraternities and sororities provide often goes overlooked when incidents like the Oct. 2 stabbing take place. Due to the fact that Greek life at UMass is in the social spotlight, any incident has the potential for exaggeration.

"I think when it comes to the frats and sororities, when something happens, it tends to be magnified," said Michael Wiseman, director of the office of fraternities and sororities at UMass.

The Amherst police department is the center of law enforcement for all off-campus disturbances, including those that occur at UMass fraternities and sororities because those houses are technically located off campus.

While the stabbing incident earlier this year involved minors who did not attend the University, Wiseman believes this is a rare occurrence.

"The stabbing was so random, it's not much different than what happens on campus," Wiseman said.

Of the two fraternities involved, Zeta Beta Tau has been cleared of any charges stemming from the incident, while Pi Delta Psi hasn't been as lucky. They're currently on "deferred suspension," meaning they're still able to function as a fraternity, but cannot host any non-member guests at fraternity functions. The suspension is a very severe probation, according to Wiseman.

While living in an off campus fraternity or sorority, the reporting mechanisms for incidents aren't as extensive as in the dormitories on campus. However, while not all incidents are reported, the assurance of police patrols and other means keep students feeling safe.

"My old school (Savannah College of Art and Design) was way more dangerous, and I didn't feel safe there because it was an open campus. They weren't required to report any crime," said Marissa Alarie, a senior at UMass and member of Sigma Delta Tau. "I go to different off-campus parties and some frats and have friends at different ones. I've never been in any bad situation or felt threatened."

With UMass's population exceeding 23,000 students, cooperation between local and university police is critical. While the jurisdictional lines separating the two are clear, in situations such as last year's World Series riots, steps have been taken to ensure the safety of all students.

"We've signed a mutual [financial] aid agreement with UMass that spells things out a little more than when we assist them and they assist us," said Kent. "Every Monday I go to a meeting with the Dean of Students Office, where we go over the activities from the weekend, and vice versa. We helped them during the World Series last year and sent 20 officers up there to assist them."

Securitas faces many challenges security supervisors is to act as on-campus escorts for anyone who feels the need for one. Escort service usage statistics have remained steady since the fall semester of 2003, averaging about 49 uses per semester, according to Residence Hall Security Program Coordinator Jim Meade. He explained that there isn't a separate escort service on campus.

SECURITAS from page 1

"There's no budget out there for an escort service. I have between eight to 10 security supervisors to do the escorts," he said, describing that number as "adequate."

"We're never in a place where we're strapped for resources," he said.

When asked why UMass chose to contract with a private company rather than hire more student security, Meade referred to "a perception that student security isn't adequate."

Several years ago, security supervisors used to have a van available for escort purposes, but most people who called for an escort "just wanted a ride," according to Meade. Use of the van has since been discontinued.

On-campus travelers may call for an escort until 3 a.m. at 545-2123 with limited escort service available after that time. They may also request an on-campus escort by pressing the red "emergency" button on any campus callbox.

UMass official speaks about additional on-campus security freshman from New Jersey who also lives in Washington tower. "They're there to help out and stop crimes, but I was here last year, and everything seems the same to me, even with the added security. It's just more inconvenience."

GARGANO from page 1

Sitting relaxed in his third-floor Whitmore office overlooking the east side of campus on a cold Thursday afternoon, Gargano welcomed these concerns, offered his thoughts, and presented future plans for further campus reform.

After two and a half years as a Vice Chancellor at UMass, Gargano has identified what he calls "trouble spots" on campus. These include the towers and several low-rise buildings in Southwest and Baker dormitory in Central. On Thursdays, Fridays and Saturdays in these areas, he says, most of the incidents of campus occur at these spots, almost always tracing back to alcohol consumption or "some form of drug abuse."

Gargano expressed outrage against a "core group of students that just seem to enjoy this partaking in alcohol to abusive levels on a regular basis." The abusive levels include vandalizing bulletin boards and bathrooms and leaving trails of vomit, he said.

"I'm about ready to hand them a mop and let them clean it up themselves," Gargano said.

Not everyone on campus exhibits the destructive behavior he preaches about, however. The majority of students on campus who drink do so responsibly, to which Gargano smiles and says, "I think those are good students."

But then there is, of course, the mantra that comes with the college life — the party-'til-you-puke lifestyle pictured frame-by-frame in movies such as "Animal House" and "Old School." While it's true that not everyone yearns to follow this lifestyle, it's certainly a reputation college students have, which presents an obvious challenge. Living up to the hype gets in the way of Gargano's goals.

When asked about this challenge, Gargano made it known that he was aware of it and hopes to see changes in student culture at UMass. He announced the next step in his quest, what he calls a "social norms campaign." The campaign, set to begin when students return to school at the end of January, will be similar to the "First Week" celebration done at the beginning of the school year, but to a lesser degree.

Vice Chancellor Michael Gargano

"It's going to be different [than most social norms campaigns], because most social norms campaigns will say that 66 percent of the student body binge drinks," Gargano said. "This campaign is going to be different so that, in fact, it will highlight the positive things that students do. So it might say something of the fact that, you know, 42 percent of our students do not participate in drinking games, so that students can see that in fact what they believe, that everyone's doing it, is not in fact true."

Among other changes he brought to attention were the conversions of at least three more dormitories to all-freshman living. Starting next year, Thoreau dormitory in Southwest and Baker and Van Meter dormitories in Central will be freshmen-only.

With all these new security measures, the question remains: do they work?

One anonymous student reported that several of his guests were able to sneak into Washington tower through an unguarded back door. The same student also reported on a Thursday or Friday afternoon last week in the same building, during new security hours, that there was nobody to be seen at the security desk checking for identification.

Want that internship that you have been dreaming about?

Come Today!

INTERNSHIP INFO SESSION

Thursday Dec 8, 2005
3 pm
Calipari Room, Dubois Library

What is the difference between internships and co-ops?

How can I find avaible opportunities that interest me?

Learn the answers to these questions at today's info session!

phone: 413-545-2224
fax: 413-545-4426
www.umass.edu/careers
CareerServices
Career Services Office
UMass Amherst
511 Goodell Building
a division of Student Affairs & Campus Life

FRUGAL FRIDAY

Join us for our special sales event
ONE DAY ONLY!
Friday, December 9, 2005

Last BIG SALE before the holidays!

Buy 1 clothing or gift item and get an item of equal or lesser value 50% off!

UMASS AMHERST
University Store and Textbook Annex
Phone: (413)545-2619

follett.com ONLINE. ON CAMPUS.

*Does not apply to sale items, regular priced merchandise only. Not valid with any other offer. See store for details. In-store only. Select items only. Excludes textbooks, computer hardware and software, and professional reference.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 8, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it" -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

All I want for Christmas...

Matt Brochu

Well, it's December. Finals are on their way. Christmas is coming. The goose is getting fat, and so are we. Asking me to hop in the car and head to the gym is the equivalent of asking Tom Cruise to admit that psychology exists. It just isn't going to happen. So Merry Christmas, Gold's Gym. Consider this month's 40 bucks my holiday gift to you.

Over the course of the last few years, my Christmas list to my parents has been an unspoken one — socks, boxers, white t-shirts, anything Red Sox-related, and "Remember those two months when I couldn't make rent and you guys helped me out? Let's just call it even." This holiday season I figured I'd switch things up a bit, so Mom and Dad, if you happen to read this, the following is what I would like to see under the tree on Christmas morning.

I want an official Red Ryder carbine action two-hundred shot range model air rifle with a compass in the stock. I want Manny Ramirez in a Red Sox uniform next year. I want to know how the hell that partridge got in the pear tree. I want companies to stop advertising "Unrated/Director's Cut" DVDs as if they're completely different from the original, then justifying the title by throwing in one extra gratuitous boob scene. I want this campus to be less violent so I can once again cross the street at midnight dressed in black from head-to-toe without having to worry about getting hit by a car.

I want Nick Lachey to find happiness. There, I said it. Sure, he should be an absolute wreck after being canned by Jessica Simpson. Hell, he has every right to grow a disgusting neck beard and mope around in Cincinnati sweatpants for the next few months if he feels like it. But something tells me he won't be looping "The Hardest Thing" on his iPod, locking himself in his mansion and constantly watching Season One of "Newlyweds" with a box of tissues and a carton of Häagen-Dazs by his side in an attempt to figure out what went wrong. In fact, within five minutes of the breakup, I'm sure he called up his favorite USC quarterback Matt Leinart and had the following exchange:

Nick: "Hey buddy. How fast can you get the USC cheerleaders to that club on Sunset?"

Matt: "Dude, it's Thanksgiving morning.

Nick: (forlorn sigh)

Matt: "All right...give me a half hour. I can probably get a few Laker Girls. Plus, Kristen from Laguna Beach owes me a favor."

Nick: "Sweet. Bring 'em all. As always, the Miller Lights are on me. And dude, would it be weird if I wore your jersey?"

Let's face it. Whoever said, "Living well is the best revenge," clearly wasn't dumped by one of the most beautiful women in the world. Oh, he'll be living pretty damn well all right. Jessica made $35 million last year, and he is legally entitled to half of it. You see, before they got married, Nick — being the bigger star at the time — had his lawyers holla, "We want prenup! We want prenup!" at Jessica's people, and she — being the bigger idiot at the time — adamantly refused the offer. What a difference three years can make. Living well may be a perk, but in this case, it clearly isn't the best revenge. Leaking a sex tape involving Lindsay Lohan and "Dessert" (Jessica's edible cosmetic line) while using "The Sweetest Sin" as background music, on the other hand — now, that is the best revenge.

You see, before they got married, Nick — being the bigger star at the time — had his lawyers holla, "We want prenup! We want prenup!" at Jessica's people, and she — being the bigger idiot at the time — adamantly refused the offer. What a difference three years can make.

I want an ice cold case of Kidsbeer. That's right. Apparently inventing the kamikaze (the suicide bomber, not the drink) wasn't enough, so Japan went out and developed Kidsbeer, a frothy guarana beverage that looks like beer and tastes like coke, because (as the slogan states), "Even kids cannot stand life unless they have a drink."

If the "Animaniacs" were still on the air, Kidsbeer would be the focus of the next "Good Idea/Bad Idea" segment. You remember the premise. Good idea: Eating dinner. Bad idea: Eating dinner at the dining hall. Good idea: Attempting to enter Moore through the backdoor. Bad idea: Attempting to enter Michael Moore through the backdoor. Good idea: Manufacturing a non-alcoholic beer substitute for those who can no longer consume alcohol. Bad idea: Manufacturing a nonalcoholic beer substitute in order to teach kids to drink before they can walk. And while you do your holiday shopping, make sure to visit the Tomomasu Company's Web site to check out their other products: Crackpipes4Kids, KiddieCondoms and VIAGRAdeschool (now in cherry and grape chewables).

I want to go through a semester as a TA without hearing excuses involving computer viruses, broken printers, fictitious dead grandmothers, nonexistent religious holidays and unfortunate lawnmower accidents. I want a girlfriend who doesn't hog the comforter and roommates who don't think that MySpace is an acceptable way to find dates.

And if that's too much to ask, well, just give me a metal pole so I can celebrate a Festivus for the rest of us. Happy holidays, everyone. Don't shoot your eye out.

Matt Brochu is a UMass graduate student.

Comin' round the 'Mountain'

Paige Cram

'Tis the season for hanging stockings, buying presents, drinking eggnog and, of course, seeing the year's final blockbusters. December is always a big month for movie openings, but this holiday season there is one movie in particular which has been the topic of much debate. Starting Friday, "Brokeback Mountain" will hit the theaters and undoubtedly stir up the already boiling pot that is the gay rights debate in America.

The movie is based on an Annie Proulx book by the same title. Originally published in "The New Yorker" as a short story, this tear-jerker has won several awards. It's the tragic story of two ranch hands, played by Hollywood's favorite pretty boys Jake Gyllenhaal and Heath Ledger, who fall in love in a time and place where homosexuality is dangerously taboo. The movie is rated "R" due to its content, which includes some graphic sex scenes.

I was surprised when I heard how explicit the movie was planned to be. Is America really ready for such a film?

In the past decade, the entertainment industry has created dozens of supporting comic-relief type roles for gay characters. "Will and Grace," "Queer Eye for the Straight Guy," and movies like "Three to Tango" have made a fortune off of mocking gay stereotypes, but "Brokeback Mountain" marks a new chapter.

A blockbuster drama using Hollywood superstars will show to every action there is an equal and opposite reaction. Although Newton may have been thinking about physics, his theory is pretty accurate for social conflict as well. The legalization of gay marriage right here in Massachusetts in 2004 was the spark that set off a series of major events. New Jersey's governor, Jim McGreevey, came out of the closet on national television, and that same year, during the presidential election, the public learned that Dick Cheney's daughter was herself a lesbian. The "don't ask, don't tell" policy was officially history.

This will be a truly agonizing love story of "Titanic" proportions played on the silver screen for the first time by a homosexual couple.

All of this was met by a vicious backlash of conservative values as extreme as talk of a constitutional ban on same-sex marriage. States like Ohio, Michigan and Nebraska, to name a few, have all passed state laws restricting the rights of their gay citizens in the past few years.

Despite the already rocky terrain, director Ang Lee has decided that America is ready, and he's giving us a push. The release of the movie comes on the tail of World Aids Day and the recent success of "Rent" the movie. And in just two weeks, on Dec. 21, civil unions between same-sex couples become legal in England. To celebrate, worldwide celebrity Sir Elton John will wed his longtime partner on the very same day.

According to Newton, this latest chain of events will only provoke more response from the other side, and the already bitter battle will continue to escalate. For those of you who thought this debate was over, think again. It may have been simmering for a while, but the heat is being turned up and it's sure to boil over.

But maybe that's just what this country needs. Ideological battles can be stimulating, but when we're still treating part of our population as second-class citizens, it's time for action. And if Jake Gyllenhaal and Heath Ledger can re-ignite the spark in this country, then the cost of movie admission is a small price to pay. So buy your ticket and hang on, 'cause this is sure to be a bumpy trail.

Paige Cram is a Collegian columnist

The horrors of SPIRE

Bonnie Solomon

Enrolling for my courses last week was one of the most time-consuming, tedious things I had ever done. Since I'm a freshman, I get last dibs on choosing courses, and since I only have 13 credits, I didn't get to sign up until 2 p.m., when just about every other freshman on campus was signing up. I'm one of those anal people who started planning out their course schedule as soon as spring courses were available. I had my whole schedule set up; I was so excited for some of the higher-level courses that I would be able to take, and I was looking forward to being able to take courses that would help me towards my anticipated career.

So, I log onto SPIRE exactly at 2 p.m. with no problems, and then go to the "add courses" page. Well, I have to wait about three minutes before the page loads. This is with an Ethernet connection, mind you. I go to add in all the courses when I realize that I don't have the codes, I only have the names of the courses. Then I have to look through the course guide page and that takes, oh, half an hour when it should take less than two minutes because the creators of SPIRE do not realize that there are more than 10 people using SPIRE at one time.

I then find out that one of the art courses has one opening (yay), and I get very excited and immediately go back to the "add courses" page. Here I run into another problem: I enter the five-digit code of the class and click on the next empty box down. It takes about another three minutes just for the computer to confirm my class selection. I go down the line, adding all my courses, then click "submit." To my great exasperation, SPIRE redirects me to another page that makes no sense and is definitely not SPIRE.

I click "refresh." Nothing happens. I click "back," and then it says that I have to log back onto SPIRE again. This process takes another five minutes of my precious Monday afternoon. I then add the course code again for the art class, and SPIRE tells me that the course is full. At this point I start yelling and then apologize to it and pat the monitor to give it some encouragement.

I then add the course code again for the art class, and SPIRE tells me that the course is all full. At this point I start yelling at my computer, and then apologize to it and pat the monitor to give it some encouragement.

I abandon my efforts to get into any art class and try to sign up for classes for my major. This goes successfully, with just having to wait a long time for the system to load. I learned that you can only sign up for about two courses at a time for SPIRE to work properly and not implode upon itself. Then I realize that I forgot to sign up for an R2 course.

I log back onto SPIRE, and add my stats course. Then I realize that I need a lab to go along with it. I find one that fits perfectly into my schedule and go back to add it. I then bang on the numbers on my keyboard a little too vigorously to add the lab. SPIRE tells me that I have another problem, yet doesn't explain it. I then learn that the lab has to match the stats course, which no one ever told me. I go to search for another lab, and the only one that has slots that works with my schedule is one that goes with a lecture that is at 9 a.m. I swear some more at the computer and decide that it's being too mean to apologize to it. I sign up for the class.

All in all, this whole ordeal took me about three hours. By the end of it I swore that I would never deal with SPIRE again ... until next year. But I must say to you juniors and seniors who get to sign up early — you are so lucky. Until then, I'll just sit here in front of my computer for three hours next semester swearing at the evilness of SPIRE and forcing myself not to punch a hole through my computer.

Bonnie Solomon is a Collegian columnist.

Want to work for New England's largest college daily?

An assistant Editorial/Opinion editor is wanted.

Apply today!
We are located in the Campus Center
In the basement

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

A BACK TURNED TO THE STUDENT BODY

To defend the "Primetime" piece slandering UMass is to turn your back on the student body of the university. I write in response to the Ed/Op from Tuesday's Collegian by Mike Sances, a Collegian columnist, in which Sances claimed that the "Primetime" segment slamming our good name was a good thing. I am not defending the police or security that run the university more like a prison than a place of higher education. I write only to defend the student body, most of whom were barely graduating high school when the statistics on crime at UMass was gathered (the data was gathered in 2002, when, for instance, I was a junior in high school). The students who now have to deal with the extra 15 hours of added security every weekend, anal-retentive/boy scout RAs, and a Gestapo-like police force that needlessly goes undercover to make that extra arrest — those are the students that I would defend, not a news story slamming them.

Yes, everyone knows that even with the overbearing police force present, crimes do exist. That is part of life. However, we are not nearly the "zoo" of our predecessors, nor should we atone for their crimes. The problem is that Sances had not even seen the ABC show. He admittedly "doesn't watch television magazines." So how then, do I ask, can one defend what they have not experienced? It is greatly unwise to speak of what you do not know — especially if it is the misappropriation of facts to get a story at the expense of a student body that pays for it with added, unneeded security.

Sances changed the agenda of his piece to talk about the shortcomings of this school and how we have no choice in our time here. You know as well as I do that our school is not perfect. The food is less than desirable, my clothes have not been completely dried from the dryers all year, and I have been stuck in an elevator for more than an hour on three occasions, but for said columnist to say that we have no opportunities and choices is absurd.

If you are not satisfied with the course of your academic career, you can change your concentration in that major, or even the major itself. If there is not a major that meets your liking, a major can be created (for instance, a student who created a major having to deal with the aerodynamics of a Frisbee went on to create the aerobe and made millions). You can also take classes at other schools in the area at no extra charge. If the dorms are overcrowded, you can move off campus to a larger room without the stress of having to deal with campus security. If you really cannot stand the food from the DC, there are at least a dozen restaurants to order from to suit your needs. Thus, if you cannot be satisfied after all of these opportunities and choices, perhaps you should find another school, but you'd be hard-pressed to find a school with as many opportunities as this one for the same price.

The writer claimed that the "Primetime" piece was good for the university because it had "succeeded in frightening prospective students away from attending here." The columnist also complained about the rising cost of tuition, as well as corporations' hands in the university. If fewer students come here, revenue the school gets from tuition will decrease. Where are they going to make that up from? I'm going to guess yours and my pockets and they will let corporations further commercialize the school.

As far as speaking to the legitimacy of the "Primetime" piece, TV news magazines such as "60 Minutes" and "Primetime" are usually quite fair. However, these programs, as objective as they usually are, sometimes go against their nature and put a spin on the facts to get a story. This is the nature of the business, and the writer from Tuesday, who is a Collegian columnist, should know that just as well as any writer.

To criticize aspects of this school, which are actually opportunities, is a slap in the face to those who have worked hard to get here in the first place. If you cannot make this place of learning and opportunities work for you, you should not take it out on the rest of the university by backing attacks consisting of misappropriated facts.

George Kennedy
UMass student

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 8, 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Giving life to a Christmas classic

By Matt O'Rourke
Collegian Staff

"Christmas time is here, happiness and cheer..."

The holiday season, with the 40th anniversary rebroadcast of "A Charlie Brown Christmas" and its brisk wintry weather, is finally upon us.

While "Charlie Brown" may be an enduring American classic, Tchaikovsky's "The Nutcracker" however defines the holiday internationally, and has for nearly 100 years. The Boston Ballet's rendition, now in its 37th year, combines elements of traditional ballet with innovative ideas, breathing new life into a Christmas standard.

The Boston Ballet's 42nd season lineup serves up some of the finest dancers in the world, with talent coming from as far away as Russia and Japan. Over 200 children from the Boston Ballet School are also participating in this year's "Nutcracker."

Artistic Director Mikko Nissinen's choreography adds a fresh layer to the traditional ballet, incorporating an almost urban element into the Trepak dance, performed by Christopher Budzynski, Daniel Sarabia and Xzavier Cave. He integrates international flair into the various groups (Chinese, Spanish and Arabian) of dancers who grace the stage, while upholding the classical Russian tradition. The graceful lifts and partnering grant the seasoned ballet aficionado something to appreciate.

Clara's godfather Herr Drosselmeier (Viktor Plotnikov), the phantom-esque toymaker who gives life to not only the Nutcracker but the entire fantastic world around Clara (Elizabeth Powell) as well, is a virtuoso performer whose actions speak louder than words ever could.

The children, who fill most of the stage early in Act One, aren't always perfectly synchronized, but this adds an element of realism to their performance. Powell leads them graciously, dancing around with their gifts as every Christian child does on Christmas morning.

The pas de deux between Roman Rykine and Larissa Ponomarenko (the Snow King and Snow Queen), under a massive tree-laden landscape, is elegant and simple, featuring deer-like leaps and gentle lifts.

The Sugar Plum Fairy, danced by Lorna Feijóo, is everything one would expect, as delicate and straightforward as ballet gets.

Then, of course, there is Carlos Molina, the Nutcracker. He exemplifies talent with every move — from his football mascot-like mask and Tin Man-rigid march to his charm as a prince, flying through the air and approaching every partner with the same refinement. Molina (and his partners) epitomize a technical mastery of ballet, no matter the scene.

From the moment you step into the Opera House, the atmosphere engulfs you, with its incredible ornate Romanesque pillars and Victorian-era detail. The setting is ideal for the visual storytelling of "The Nutcracker." Helen Pond and Herbert Senn's set design is simply fantastic, bringing to life the bustling streets of the 1800s where peddlers sell their wares to far-off magical places where castles are nestled in the sky. The beautifully adorned, cathedral-style Christmas tree in Clara's home lights up the stage on more than one occasion, demanding the attention of the viewer from the moment it appears.

Special effects will dazzle all who attend, from firecrackers bursting during the battle between the Nutcracker and the Mouse King to snow falling in the forest. At the end of Act One, Clara and Herr Drosselmeier fly away in a balloon across the stage, rising high into the upper lighting. As the curtain rises after intermission, the feet of the dancers seemingly disappear under clouds as fog permeates the stage.

The costumes, brilliant in colors of every hue, shine and project. Charles Heightchew, Boston Ballet Manager of Costumes, thoroughly researched his dancer's attire. As multitudes of dancers (at any given moment, there can be over 20) enter the spotlight, the viewer will be struck by the sheer variety of costumes. Conventional European dresses, the two-piece garments of Arabian belly dancers, and customary Chinese outfits are astoundingly detailed. The mice and dancing bear are not overdone, so they don't look too Disney-ish.

Finally, no ballet is complete without the music. Tchaikovsky's pieces, from the "Dance of the Sugar Plum Fairy" to the Russian dancers' joyful march, is well played. Mark Churchill (who alternates as conductor with Jonathan McPhee) led his orchestra through each moment — as dancers frolicked, the music did too, with tenderness in the violins. During scenes of battle, gongs smashed and timpani roared. Dynamics were near-perfect, never overpowering the events on stage.

The Boston Ballet's Nutcracker provides something for every viewer — young and old, musician, dancer or casual observer. Perhaps it's no surprise that attendees come back year after year, as this company brings youthful energy to a timeless masterpiece.

Boston Ballet
'The Nutcracker'
Now-Dec. 30th
$22.50-$107.50

Hampshire Dining Commons charms from the inside out

By Matt Baskin
Collegian Correspondent

This is part four in a series of reviews of UMass dinig commons.

Named after a county famous for rolling hills and gorgeous foliage, Hampshire Dining Commons does not live up to the natural beauty its namesake is famous for.

Though it's true that none of the dining halls around campus are particularly attractive, most have quirks which mask their architectural shortcomings. Franklin looks as though it was designed by a NASA engineer. Worcester juts into the side a hill. Even Berkshire, Hampshire's Southwest neighbor, evokes a certain concrete charm, as it closely resembles a converted bomb shelter. Hampshire, on the other hand, leads a charmless existence.

Until you step inside, that is. What Hampshire lacks in exterior beauty is made up for by its warm confines. An expansive paneled lobby with two staircases that lead up to a second level creates an atmosphere of rustic comfort. Upstairs, Christmas decorations are already in place, making for a cheery reminder of winter break. Large posters promoting college athletics create a warm, nostalgic environment reminiscent of cozy high school cafeterias. However, aside from these posters and the inevitable food line, comparisons between Hampshire and high school cafeterias end there. Unlike some UMass dining halls, Hampshire strives to create an urbane, adult atmosphere. Though it has its flaws, not the least of which is its edificial unsightliness, Hampshire's successes overcome its failures.

The hall maintains an atmosphere of cleanliness and efficiency without feeling sterile, a feat few other dining halls accomplish. Decorations abound, including the occasional piece of pottery. Dining rooms, which are partitioned and surround the main serving room, have floor to ceiling windows which let in plenty of sunlight. Some rooms contain only circular tables; other larger dining areas contain long, rectangular ones. Neither one is especially suitable for solo diners or couples, but they adequately accommodate the usually large groups that frequent Hampshire.

A large room immediately outside of the serving area contains a salad bar and deli station, stocked with a variety of fresh vegetables and meats. Two cereal stations stand at the back of the room, ready for action should any perpetual breakfasters crave their services. In one of the smaller dining rooms sits a built-in sushi bar offering up the best of the Japanese delicacy, a nicety which sets Hampshire apart from other dining halls. Typical desserts such as brownies and the ever-present soft-serve machine leave students happy in the junk food department. Other dining hall commonalities like a toaster, a waffle iron, and a pasta station allow only the most critical of critics to complain about a lack

See HAMPSHIRE on page 7

While Hampshire may not have the best aesthetical looks from the outside, like many other buildings on campus, its comfortable interior and cleanliness easily makes up for its shortcomings.

Winter coats of many colors, textures, styles lure buyers

By Elizabeth Wellington
Knight Ridder Newspapers

For further evidence that designers hope to entice shoppers with all things plush, lush and ornate, we need only look at this winter's coat styles.

Speckled tweed prints, gilded brocades, leather patches with deconstructed edges and soft cashmeres are just some of the details intended to make true fashionistas long for as many different coats as possible to match as many outfits as possible.

We can celebrate the chill with more sophistication in women's outerwear than has been seen since the 1940s. The silhouettes run from popular three-quarter-length "walkers" that cinch at the waist and dress up jeans to ankle-length cloak-like looks with billowy sleeves to cover evening frocks.

"They are really something you can coordinate your outfit ... your look with," said LaVelle Olexa, senior vice president of merchandising for Lord & Taylor.

"Coats are much more fashionable now than they've been in years. The tweed coats are coming from the designer market, a definite part of this very ladylike trend," Olexa said.

Last winter, designers from Karl Lagerfeld for Coco Chanel and Oscar de la Renta to younger colleagues such as Tracy Reese and Behnaz Sarafpour dressed coats up and down. They used worsted wools in bright oranges and muted purples. Some added silky linings with popping black and white polka dots or pink and green stripes.

Tapestry coats were paired with cuffed, menswearlike trousers and simple white shirts. Plaid coats were the featured piece in pants and skirt suits.

And now, just in time for post-Thanksgiving and pre-Christmas sales, your favorite shopping haunts, from Marshalls to Banana Republic, have a coat or two priced to fit into your budget. Retailers nationwide say they have more cloth coats, and more styles, in stock this year.

"It just seemed like a new shape," said Manayunk designer Paula Hian, whose fall collection boasts 16 coats that range in price from $900 to $1,800.

"I started to see these coat shapes in my mind to go with other pieces I'd already designed. I looked at the unbelievable textures of the tweeds, furs, and wool trims," Hian said.

The lofty expectations of designers and merchandisers that we'll NEED several coats to get us through the winter fashionably is more proof that we see clothing as disposable, said Sigrid Weltge, professor emerita of design and fashion history at Philadelphia University. Until recently, coats, even more so than dresses or good suit, were considered investment pieces.

Basically, there was the Sunday coat, which became the everyday coat when you bought a new Sunday coat.

"As with many things in fashion, this ... needing to have so many pieces of outerwear has to do as much with affluence as it does with fashion," Weltge said.

It used to be, she said, that coats "were something you passed on to your relatives. They had great details ... silver buttons, were beautifully tailored. That's where the phrase 'great coat' came from. This was big money."

The first coats were born of the collarless cassocks worn by male aristocrats in the 15th century. By the late 17th century, men donned three-quarter-length coats with contrasting vests and tights fashioned with brocade, velvet and embroidery. (Sound familiar?)

Women, who traditionally stayed warm in long capes, cloaks and shawls, didn't wear "masculine" coats with any regularity until the late 1800s, when activities such as horseback riding, croquet and tennis took them outside the home more often. Even then, the cut of a coat allowed for a bustle, and coats were worn for more serious evening occasions and for church.

It wasn't until the 1920s that coats became staples in women's wardrobes, Weltge said, because then women, too, could wear them in different lengths, coordinate them with specific outfits, and show off coordinated tights.

With each subsequent decade, a new coat style came into vogue: the woolen topcoat in the 1940s; the toggle coats in the 1970s; and the shearlings of the 1980s and 1990s.

These days, it seems all styles are fashionable. But gone are those practical, staid black or brown coats. Matchy-matchy is truly over; the more prints you can mix, the better.

Julie Marcus Paul of Villanova, Pa., said she has a coat for every occasion. This year, the 35-year-old stay-at-home mother added two Paula Hian designs to her collection of 11, which includes two minks, a poncho, and a cape.

Generally, Paul said, she fancies herself a T-shirt-and-jeans type. But the coats, she said, add that extra punch to her outfits.

"Coats are essential," Paul said. "When I come downstairs and open the closet ... I pick my mood and that's my coat. My coat "is my mood."

Brown and grey stripped felted wool coat from Heather (left). Fur and crochet trimmed sweater coat from Sears (right).

'Hotel Sarajevo' depicts war-ravaged Bosnia

By Alex Butler
Collegian Staff

A panel discussion and a play reading on the effects of the Bosnian War throughout its course will take place at Smith College today.

The panel discussion, "Staging Resistance: Theatrical Representations of Wartime Bosnia," will be held at 4:30. It will feature Artistic Director Marcy Arlin, acclaimed director Peg Danithorne, and local author Marisa Michelson.

The play will be performed in the Earle Recital Hall and Sage Hall at 8 p.m. Titled "Hotel Sarajevo," it depicts the story of a war-ravaged hotel, where nine young people struggle to keep their lives. It is told through the viewpoint of a fourteen-year-old girl, Alma. Through the play, she "explores what it means to become a woman" in the war-torn society.

'Hotel Sarajevo'
Smith College
Earle Recital Hall
8 p.m.

A small but effective history of the war is in order: the war in Bosnia was a terrible, awful disaster. It lasted from 1991 through the end of 1995. The conflict was over independence; Bosnia declared independence from Yugoslavia, a country it had been part of since the First World War. A little breathing room was needed for the small country. A strong nationalist, Slobodan Milosevic, seized some power in Yugoslavia and got the people pumped for some nationalism. Bosnia would be fine — life would be good, everyone thought. Not the case — the Yugoslavian army was looking for nationalism, and Bosnia was left to fight for some freedom.

The United Nations, who seemingly stood by as millions were slaughtered and thoughts of genocide were right around the bend, admitted to not acting while they should have. America, like most of the rest of the world, stood idly by and watched the death count rise, month after month. We were all trying to forget about a new genocide in Rwanda. After forty-three months of war, the death count reached 250,000, and consumed the lives of far more.

The play is the second play of the New Play Readings Series at Smith College. This open forum was made to bring otherwise unknown female playwrights and plays to light. These women are often the finalists for the International Susan Smith Blackburn Prize, the Five College Denis Johnston Prize, and the Jane Chambers Prize. The series will continue through the 2005-2006 season of theatre.

These playwrights seem to be leaking prestige at the gills. They are absolutely immersed in artistic and theatrical knowledge and know-how. Three cheers for them.

Tickets are free and will be available to the public. And what would be more fitting to commemorate freedom than to give out free tickets?

It is understandable that no one would like to relive the depressing Bosnian battles, especially through the eyes of a dreary fourteen year old. But this is something that America and its citizens can relate to — wars for independence are our thing. The story reeks of familiarity to our ears, or at last, it should.

Food and comfort

HAMPSHIRE from page 6

of options. For cleanup, rather than busing trays, students can place them on tall carts, eliminating the threat of a crowded line and sending diners away smiling rather than grumbling.

One of Hampshire's greatest perks, but perhaps its greatest hindrance, is the staff's habit of serving students. Though it marks Hampshire's generally good service and sparks friendly interaction between students and staff, it also slows down the food line and does nothing to combat the inevitable cafeteria comparisons that afflict many dining halls. When students serve themselves, the situation resembles a buffet rather than a cafeteria, enhancing the atmosphere and helping students leave behind their memories of the high school lunch line.

Hampshire provides a good variety of meals, but its food does not merit great praise. Dryness seems to be the main complaint of students, particularly in chicken dishes. Meat, though held in higher regard than the poultry, seems to suffer from this as well. Students are best served by sticking to the foods that they trust which stand little chance of being sub par. Pasta, for example, is incorruptible. Sushi, though exotic, is hard to screw up, particularly when made to order by a professional chef.

Though it does not stand up to Worcester or runner-up Berkshire, Hampshire finishes a very close third and well ahead of Franklin in terms of overall dining hall quality. Ugly on the outside, charming on the inside, and a suitable choice for any diner who finds themselves in Southwest, Hampshire rises above expectations and satisfies the needs of the students it serves.

The quality of food at Hampshire Dining Commons does not compare to the quality of comfort.

WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Krall emerges with holiday album for the ages

By Ben Wener
The Orange County Register

Chatting with Diana Krall can be a pleasantly sketchy experience, something the increasingly adored Canadian jazz chanteuse readily admits. Right away she's charming, at times candid, courteous to a fault. But her thought process ... well, it's a bit like her piano playing. It can get knotty and trail off unexpectedly, but just as often be lucid and lyrical.

Yet she's eager to discuss her first yuletide collection, the simply wonderful "Christmas Songs," made both lushly melancholy and swiftly swingin' by the venerable Clayton-Hamilton Jazz Orchestra. Recording it, she says, was the most delightful, pressure-free time she's spent in the studio.

"It was like a big party at Capitol Studios. This is the pressure now — talking about it, which is not my greatest strength. This is always that time when I've been focused on (a project) for a while, and then I talk about it and analyze it with people like yourself, and I start freaking out."

She let out an eruption of nervous, infectious laughter.

I had merely told her what I'd tell anyone: "Christmas Songs" is not just the best of this season's heap of holiday albums, it's one for the ages. Cut with more care and soul than most run-of-the-mill sets, it's bound to become a perennial fave like the classics from Nat King Cole and Rosemary Clooney and Ella Fitzgerald it evokes.

"But is it part of a dying breed?" I wondered.

"Oh, I don't think so. There are people making Christmas albums, aren't there?"

"Not like this one."

"Yeah, but obviously I don't think of it that way. I just put on my Garanimals and baseball cap and went down to the studio and had a good time. I wanted everybody to have fun, and I didn't want to put any novelty in it."

She stopped herself. "Well, they're all novelties, anyway." Some are up: "Jingle Bells," "Let It Snow," "Winter Wonderland." Some are wistful: "Have Yourself a Merry Little Christmas," "What Are You Doing New Year's Eve?"

None of them is religious.

"I have such strong faith, but that's a personal thing. I appreciate the carols as well, and the spiritual side of the season is extremely important. Maybe in the future I'll do another one that focuses on that side of it."

That would keep to the Ella model she appears to be following. This set is somewhat tailored on "Ella Wishes You a Swinging Christmas" (1960). Perhaps Krall will someday deliver a holier counterpart inspired by "Ella Fitzgerald's Christmas Album" (1967).

It also would uphold a Krall family tradition of mixing the sacred and the secular, which the 41-year-old says goes back decades. "One of the things I did — I still do — is play my dad's old Firestone records, these collections that have, like, Johnny Mathis, the Swingle Singers, Andy Williams. But then my mother sang Handel's Messiah every year with the choir, so we'd hear that, too.

"But we weren't so much listening as we were playing. My grandmother would have Christmas carol parties, and, of course, a Fats Waller tune would be in there somewhere. And my mother would be like, 'OK, back to Christmas now! You and your nana: It's "Away in a Manger," and then it's off to "Ain't Misbehavin'." I have tapes of when I was a kid, the whole family gathered around the piano. Just a madhouse."

It isn't so much now. Krall married Elvis Costello two Decembers ago, but she lost her mother at Christmastime the year before that. "When you have a major loss like that at Christmastime, it can be especially difficult. It's an intense time for people, anyway, it can be about intense sadness or intense joy or both."

"Someone should make a 'Songs for Only the Lonely at Christmas' album," I offered.

"Oh, God, no!" And there's that laugh again. "I let's not go down that road. It's too true."

As for her sadness: "I didn't want to close the door on it. I think this album has been cathartic for me. I don't do anything lightly, unfortunately."

ATTENTION WOMEN USING THE ORTHO EVRA BIRTH CONTROL PATCH

The FDA recently warned that the Ortho Evra birth control patch releases far more estrogen than the birth control pill. Increased estrogen levels can cause serious injury, including blood clots, deep vein thrombosis, pulmonary embolism, stroke, heart attack, and even death.

Lopez, Hodes, Restaino, Milman & Skikos represents women throughout the country who have been injured due to blood clots caused by the Ortho Evra birth control patch. If you or your loved one suffered any of these injuries after using Ortho Evra, you may have important legal rights that should be protected.

PLEASE CONTACT OUR LAW FIRM FOR A FREE CONSULTATION OR VISIT OUR WEBSITE FOR MORE INFORMATION.

95 Commercial Wharf, Boston, Ma

LAW OFFICES OF LOPEZ, HODES, RESTAINO, MILMAN & SKIKOS · PHONE: (617) 973-9777 X3013 · WWW.LOPEZHODES.COM · EMAIL: INFO@LOPEZ-HODES.COM

The top ten 'nouns' of 2005

Pop Doppler

Jackie Ronan

In honor of the end of the year, here are the top ten most interesting nouns of 2005 — also known as the people, places, things, and events of 2005!

10. iPod Video

Finally, you can bring the ladies of Wisteria Lane anywhere you want. In mid-October, CEO Steve Jobbs announced the next generation of over-priced electronics that will be obsolete in six mouths. The iPod Video has the ability to play your favorite prime-time line up along with your entire music collection. In the past two years, DVDs have proven people will pay to have their favorite shows in their home viewing collection. The iPod Video features a variety of television programs from ABC, and more recently, NBC, available for $2 a download. Programs range from "Desperate Housewives" and "Law & Order" to vintage shows like "Dragnet" and "Knight Rider."

9. Hollywood Break-ups

After months of speculation from the tabloids and people who can't stand seeing other people happy, Jessica Simpson and Nick Lachey officially filed for divorce. The same was true for power-couple Jennifer Aniston and Brad Pitt, who broke off their five-year marriage earlier this year.

8. Tom Cruise went insane

It takes a special kind of crazy to publicly criticize someone for trying to handle a disease that you yourself could never contract. After finding out that Brooke Shields used the anti-depressant Paxil to treat her bout with postpartum depression, Cruise slammed the actress on NBC's "Today" as an example of why psychology is a pseudo-science and Scientology isn't. And he really, really, really loves Katie Holmes. Really. Just ask Oprah's couch.

7. Weathermen

How would we really know for sure if it was rain unless countless meteorologists stood outside live on TV? This year saw scores of weatherpeople risking their own balance and footing in order to cover the abnormal weather of 2005. With 26 tropical storms and a record 14 hurricanes, they have been very busy this year.

6. W. Mark Felt

Before this year, the name W. Mark Felt sounded more like a mortgage broker then the man who brought down the presidency of Richard Nixon. In late May, Vanity Fair revealed the long-speculated and sought-after identity Deep Throat, clearing the names of suspects Alexander Haig, White House counsel John Dean and actress Linda Lovelace.

5. Harry Potter

For someone who doesn't actually exist, he's having a great year! In July, the sixth book in the seven-part series, "Harry Potter and the Half-Blood Prince," busted onto bookstore selves. Within 24 hours the book sold almost 7 million copies (that's 287,500 per hour, 80 per second). Add that to the fact that the fourth movie, "Harry Potter and the Goblet of Fire," has grossed $229 million in the last three weeks, and Harry will have himself a very nice nest egg waiting in Gringotts.

4. The Colbert Report

"The Daily Show" veteran Stephen Colbert takes on the world of politics in a parody pundit talk show "The Colbert Report." In the spirit of "The O'Reilly Factor," Colbert speaks the truth and isn't going to let a few problematic facts get in the way. The show features such segments as "The Threat-Down," a top-five scare tactic countdown of things that could threaten you, and "Better Know a District," a 435-part running series in which Colbert interviews every single member of the House of Representatives. The show has a comedic conservative bias and the host often asks democratic guests questions like "Why are you ruining this country?" or "George W. Bush: Great President or The Greatest President?" in which you have to pick one.

3. The End of Star Wars

After more then 25 years, Star Wars closed its final chapter with "Star Wars: Episode III - Revenge of the Sith." This final film was the only movie in the Star Wars saga to receive a PG-13 rating, and it's easy to see why. Unlike "Return of the Jedi" (the final movie in the first trilogy), which featured the teddy-bear-like Ewoks, "Revenge of the Sith" featured children killing. So long, Star Wars, live long and prosper. That last part might be from something else.

2. Kanye West

Of all the political criticism President Bush received for Hurricane Katrina from seasoned columnists and elected members of federal, state and local government, nothing got as much attention as Kanye's ad-lib on a relief special. Whether you agree with him or not, West has had an incredible year. His latest album "Late Registration" debuted at #1 on the Billboard 100 charts and has spawned two hit singles so far. He should totally hook up with the Dixie Chicks!

1. Penguins!

They're the only bird that possesses the ability to swim but not to fly, and they're pretty bankable, too. This summer's documentary hit "March of the Penguins" grossed over $77 million. It follows a year in the lives of a group of emperor penguins. It's kind of like last summer's documentary hit "Fahrenheit 9/11," only with a lot more penguins.

'The Sea' roars in

By David Master
Collegian Correspondent

"The Sea," written by John Banville and winner of the Man Booker Prize, divulges to the reader the encompassing power of the past. Max Morden, the narrator and main character of the novel, painfully recalls his childhood. Max's mind sporadically jumps from memory to reality — or are they one in the same? Throughout the novel, the two entities of memory and reality battle through Max's recollection of the past and his perception of the present.

Banville creates a well-developed internal conflict without an elaborate plot. Through the dissection of Max's thoughts, Banville reveals two tragic deaths: one during his childhood and one during his adulthood. The former gives Max consolation about the latter.

After recently being widowed in his early 60s, Max finds himself in a state of disarray. He avoids thinking about the present and revisits The Cedars, a seaside retreat that sparks the memory of his first love. He is submerged in a sea of thoughts about his childhood, neglecting his only daughter Claire. Max's nostalgic realizations open his eyes to the truths of his present, enabling him to reconstruct a functioning life after his wife's death.

Max is oblivious to life. He dives into a period of isolation where only his memory keeps him company. A haunting dream of walking alone in the snow propels Max to return to Ballyless, the place where he met and immediately became infatuated with the Grace family, and his "life is changed forever." They were different from his family, who rented a chalet with "no ceilings, only the sloped undersides of a tarpapered roof." People from a proper house don't mingle with people from the chalets. Nevertheless, Max's youthful relations with the family, especially the daughter Chloe, prompt him to continually recollect an incident he will never forget.

Banville's writing is picturesque. He describes images so real that sometimes it seems that they might jump off the page and come to life. His brutal honesty is satisfying but shocking. He creates an alternate world inside the mind of Max. The thoughts of Max are real. Everyone can relate to them but people may be too embarrassed to admit it. Banville isn't afraid or ashamed of his vivid descriptions that, if you aren't ready, could knock you off your seat.

The Sea
By John Banville
Knopf

During his visit to The Cedars as an 11-year-old boy, Max spends time on luxurious seaside picnics with the Grace family. Young Max is obsessed with Mrs. Grace and Chloe, a mother-daughter fantasy. He watches Mrs. Grace take deep drags of her fat cigarette and her "mouth hang open crookedly for a minute, a rich curl of smoke suspended motionless between waxily glistened scarlet lips." His eye is also kept keenly on Chloe, who sits in the shade of a pine tree, eating a sandwich.

The technique of simultaneously discussing the past and the present sometimes can be confusing and disorienting to readers, casting them out to sea without a life preserver. Banville sends his readers into a sea equipped with more than a life preserver — with something like a cruise ship. He achieves clarity and interests his audience with an unconventional approach where chronology is neglected. However, this novel differs from typical stream-of-consciousness writing. The book still has rhythm. It flows from memory to reality without a speed bump.

Banville's writing style is fresh and unique. He writes with elaborate and vivid prose, resulting in a short-fiction read with a plot built off of only two major events. With the juxtaposition of the past and the present, Banville clearly fluctuates between the ambiguity of thought and the certainty of truth.

WRITE FOR ARTS
GIVE US A CALL
545-1361
ask for Ian

LONG RADIO
Quality Sales, Service, and Installation
Audio
Video
Sattelite Radio
NAV
Remote Starter
Alarms
Radar Detectors
Lazer Detectors
Performace Parts
30 Russell Street Hadley, Ma 01035 413-584-3259

INCENSE • SHIRTS & BLOUSES • POSTERS • CHOPSTICKS • BOOKS
SOAPS • CARDS & CALENDARS • JOURNALS & DIARIES
HAIR STICKS
GLOVES
THE MERCANTILE IS FULL OF FUN, AFFORDABLE GIFTS AND CLOTHES FROM AROUND THE WORLD!
INCENSE ACTION FIGURES
EARRINGS
CANDLES
Socks
Leather Sole
KISSI STONE
CARVED FIGURES
The Mercantile
Northampton 150 MAIN St. 584-1205
Amherst Carriage Shops 549-1396
Mon-Fri: 10-9 Sat: 10-6 Sun: 12-5
• INCENSE • SHIRTS & BLOUSES • POSTERS • CHOPSTICKS • BOOKS • SOAPS • CARDS & CALENDARS • JOURNALS & DIARIES • FUN HATS • SILK SCARVES & TIES • ROSE OIL • BASKETS • INCENSE • SHIRTS & BLOUSES • POSTERS • CHOPSTICKS • BOOKS • SOAPS • CARDS & CALENDARS • JOURNALS & DIARIES • FUN HATS • SILK SCARVES & TIES • ROSE OIL • BASKETS • INCENSE • SHIRTS & BLOUSES • POSTERS • CHOPSTICKS • BOOKS • SOAPS • CARDS & CALENDARS • JOURNALS & DIARIES • FUN HATS • SILK SCARVES & TIES • ROSE OIL • BASKETS
• PEWTER GODDESSES • SILVER RING • TAPESTRIES • RUGS • PILLOWS

FRYE
ZANNA
Women's clothing, shoes and accessories.
downtown Amherst www.zanna.com

Come on baby...
Light my fire...
Live Music at the HANUKKAH BASH!
3 amazing UMass student groups
KOLOT, a cappella group
TRACK 5, a rockin' 5 piece band
BEN TAP SOUL, rap, hip, and Soulful Blend
Thurs. Dec. 8, 7:00 pm
Campus Ctr. Reading Rm
Across from Blue Wall
Tons of free food (you know you love latkes!)
music, dancing, arts & crafts!
All are welcome and its all free!
Sponsor UMass Hillel 549-1710 x203

GREAT Reasons to use UHS Eye Care Services
1 Savings on routine eye exams for students at UMass
2 A great place to get contact lenses
3 FREE sample start-up contact lens solutions
4 Same day replacement of disposable contact lenses, in many cases
5 Contact lenses mailed directly to your home or office
6 FREE eyeglass adjustments and one year warranty on frames
SPECIAL OFFER: 10 PERCENT STUDENT DISCOUNT ON ALL FRAMES AND EYEGLASS LENSES!*
"I invite you to use the Eye Care Services"
Frederick H. Bloom, O.D.
Director, UHS Eye Care Services
* Cannot be combined with other insurance discounts.
For appointments or questions, call 577-5383
UHS EYE CARE SERVICES

If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!
Insurance Replacement Rates
FREE PICK-UP
POTTERS
AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL
• Direct Billing to Insurance Company
• Locally Owned & Operated
• 7 & 15 Passenger Vans
• UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates
North Amherst Motors
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
(413) 549-RENT (7368)
www.northamherstmotors.com
(One mile North of UMass - on bus route)
Collision Repairs & Glass Replacement

Bring this ad in for 1/2 off one panini!

Minutemen face rival

MEN'S HOOP from page 12

is going to be a really big key, because our offense will come as long as the defense is there."

One defensive tool that UMass will use against UConn is junior Stephane Lasme. Second in the nation in shots blocked per game at 5.8, Lasme is one of the players that will look to thwart UConn's ability and open up the scoring.

Junior Rashaun Freeman, who is averaging a team-high 16.3 points per game and scored the game-winning layup against UConn last year, has proven to be the key on offense in the early stages of the 2005-06 season. Thomas provides the UMass team with the versatile ability to shoot and play defense. The swingman is second on the team in scoring, averaging 12.8 points per game.

Things will get physical for Freeman and the rest of the Minutemen, especially when facing against the sizable Huskies.

"They're definitely a physical team, and they've got a lot of size on the inside," Thomas said. "Their guards are really talented; they're very skilled."

Hilton Anderson, who stands at 6-foot-11, and 6-foot-10 Josh Boone bring a massive look to the UConn lineup. Boone is a nominee for National Player of the Year on the Wooden, Rupp and Naismith award lists, and plays at the power forward position.

The Minutemen clash with UConn at the Civic Center after an extensive period in which they have gone 10 days without playing a single game, with their last contest being a 93-57 clobbering of Savannah State on Nov. 28. That victory came after UMass dropped its first two road games, losing to Davidson on 66-63 on Nov. 22 and to UAB 86-77 on Nov. 25.

Although the Minutemen will have to get their minds back in game mode, the players are not concerned, and were able to use the extra time to rest and prepare for one of the top teams in the nation.

"It's tough not playing, but I think it is a good time [for a break] because when you have a big game coming up, you need a lot of time to prepare," Thomas said. "We've had the time we needed. We're very well-prepared now."

UM looks to build off of upset

UPSET from page 12

While most of the returning UMass players have only seen highlights of last year's game, James Life, a junior transfer in his first season with the Minutemen, remembers watching last year's game, but only came away with one lasting memory.

"I watched Rashaun [Freeman] at the end act [like] a fool," Life said.

While Freeman's antics from last year — he ran over and celebrated with teammates on the bench after making a layup with 4.3 seconds left while UConn raced up court to attempt game-winning shot — have been laughed at and even derided on SportsCenter, UMass's leading scorer has put the momentary lapse behind him.

"When it happened I was overwhelmed with the win," Freeman said. "I got a little overexcited, but a week or two after we played them I didn't worry about it until people kept coming up to me [about it]. I've put it in the past."

While last year's memories are nice, this could be the last chance for any of these players to beat the Huskies, as rumors are circulating that UConn coach Jim Calhoun will end this interstate matchup, and the team is focused on ending the rivalry on top.

"They're not going to take us as lightly as they did last year," sophomore Lawrence Carrier said. "Last year, I think they were expecting — and basically everyone else in the country was expecting us to lose, but we came out and basically shocked the world by beating them. We're looking to go 2-0 and do it again."

Sophomore Lawrence Carrier and UMass are looking to upset UConn for the second year in a row.

Red Sox looking to make moves

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

DALLAS — The Boston Red Sox have a surplus of pitching and just enough people in the front office to deal it away.

"One advantage we have here is we've got the Four Horsemen, so we can do four meetings at once," said Craig Shipley, one of four Red Sox executives talking trade in the absence of a full-time general manager.

The Boston braintrust spent much of Tuesday trying to find a taker for left-hander David Wells. The 15-game winner has asked to be traded to a West Coast team, and the Red Sox promised to try to accommodate him.

Also on the agenda was trying to sign Johnny Damon. But the Red Sox would not confirm that they have met with the outfielder or superagent Scott Boras, who has asked for a seven-year deal worth $84 million.

"We are making an effort to re-sign Johnny," team president Larry Lucchino said. "This is the time of year when free agents have a chance to look around and have a chance to make decisions at their own pace. We don't really have much control in the process."

Lucchino said the Red Sox are making contingency plans in case Damon signs elsewhere.

"It's sort of a three-dimensional chess game that has to be played," Lucchino said, "and we're playing it."

Replacing him in the outfield might be easier than finding another leadoff hitter; the team conceded that it didn't have a ready replacement on the roster.

"There's an effort to sign him, and there's a parallel effort to replace him," said Ben Cherington, the director of player development. "There's more than one way to skin a cat."

One advantage for the Red Sox is that they have at least six pitchers who could go in the rotation, making them one of the few teams with pitching to deal.

A.J. Burnett, who has a lifetime 49-50 record, was the top starter on the free agent market, and he signed a five-year, $55 million deal with the Toronto Blue Jays.

"That's why we've been holding our pitching, just to see where that level of pitchers would fall," senior adviser Bill Lajoie said.

Trading unhappy slugger Manny Ramirez remained an option but not a necessity, Lucchino said.

"We are in the process of doing what we said to Manny and his representatives that we would do," Lucchino said, "which

UMass must execute to win

KEYS from page 12

the Minutemen to take care of the ball better than they have thus far in the season (19.3 turnovers per game).

CONTAIN RUDY GAY

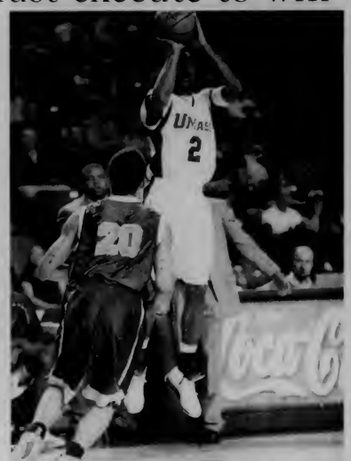
Defense will be a focus for UMass, as the Huskies have a slew of scoring threats, but Gay has separated himself from the pack this year. The sophomore forward leads the team with 16.3 points per game, and he could be the top pick in this year's NBA Draft.

The explosive Gay has been reined in during UConn's two toughest contests of the season, as he was held to a combined 15 points in close wins over Arizona and Gonzaga in the Maui Invitational.

Last year, UMass held Gay to 13 points on 4-of-13 shooting, and will need to turn in a similar defensive performance if it plans on slowing the UConn attack.

GET THE BALL INSIDE

The key to last year's win was the play of UMass's frontline. Freeman scored a game-high 18 points with eight rebounds, while Stephane Lasme contributed nine points and six boards.



While UConn clearly has one of the top teams in the nation, the duo of Freeman and Lasme may hold an advantage in this game. Josh Boone returns up front for UConn, but UMass will not have to deal with forward Charlie Villanueva, who has taken his game to the NBA's Toronto Raptors.

Freeman leads UMass with 16.3 points and 9.3 rebounds per game, while Lasme's 6.6 blocks per game is second in the country. Both will need to have big games for the Minutemen to have a chance.

MAKE OPEN SHOTS

As was the case last year, UMass will need to find a way to score from the perimeter. Count on UConn coach Jim Calhoun making someone besides Freeman beat him this year.

All of the attention focused on Freeman should result in plenty of open looks for the rest of the Minutemen, and someone will need to get hot from the outside. UMass has the shooters capable of putting the ball in the basket, but the team has been inconsistent so far this season, making just 33 percent of its three-point shots.

Junior Brandon Thomas could be a key for UMass tonight against UConn. Thomas has averaged 16.3 points over the last three games.

This could be the game for junior college transfer James Life to make his presence felt for the Maroon and White. Life has struggled early on this season, but the sharpshooter showed some signs of breaking out of his slump with 18 points in last Monday's win over Savannah State. Life could see plenty of open shots if Freeman gets double teamed as expected. It would provide a huge lift if Life is able to knock down a few deep balls.

SOMEONE NEEDS TO STEP UP

In every upset, the underdog needs at least one player to perform above and beyond his typical output. Last year, it was Jeff Viggiano who filled the bill and scored 12 points on 5-of-6 shooting, including a clutch three-pointer with less than a minute remaining.

While it's never easy to predict, this year's leading candidate would seem to be swingman Brandon Thomas. The junior transfer has shown a flair for scoring (12.8 points per game), and if he is aggressive on the offensive end he could be a huge factor for the Minutemen.

Don't sleep on Viggiano, though. The Connecticut native has had a knack of stepping up against his home-state school. Two years ago, Viggiano registered 22 points in a 91-67 loss. Viggiano, the lone senior on the team, has the most experience against the Huskies of any UMass player, and it would be fitting for him to have a big game in his final matchup with Connecticut.

THE BOTTOM LINE

Ford has had 10 days to put together a game plan for tonight, but it's all going to come down to the Minutemen's ability to execute in a high-pressure situation and hostile environment.

If the program plans on returning to the big-time, there'd be no better start than toppling the No. 3 team in the country on national television.

— Dan Duggan is a Collegian columnist.

Dance Stuff
Dance into the holiday season!
Go to Dance Stuff for all your dancing needs.
220 N.Pleasant St.
253 - 5201

FOUR Seasons
WINE • LIQUOR • CIGARS
333 Russell St., Rt. 9
Hadley, MA 01035
584-8174
Sale date: 12/08/05 - 12/15/05
Beer
Becks 24 pk btl $19.99*
Red Stripe 12 pk btl $10.99*
Pabst Blue Ribbon 24 pk btl $12.99*
Molson 12 pk btl $8.99*
Rolling Rock 24 pk btl $15.99*
Sierra Nevada Pale Ale 12 pk btl $11.99*
Bass Ale 12 pk btl $10.99*
Rhengold Lager 12 pk btl $6.99*
Busch & Busch Light 24 pk btl $11.49*
Stella Artois 12 pk btl $10.99*
Natural Light & Ice 30 pk can $11.99*
Milwaukee's Best 30 pk can $11.99*
Liquor
Grand Marnier 750 ml $29.99
Navan Vanilla Cognac 750 ml $26.99
10 Cane Rum from Trinidad 750 ml $21.99
Cuvee Vodka 750 ml $24.99
Jim Beam 1.75 liter $26.99
Jose Cuervo Tradicional Tequila 750 ml $22.99
Boru Irish Vodka 1.75 lt $19.99
Godiva Liqueurs 750 ml $16.99
Seagram's 7 Whiskey 1.75 liter $19.99
Gilbey's Gin 1.75 liter $19.99
UV Flavored Vodka 1 liter $17.99
Pinnacle Vodka 750 ml $11.99
Wine
Chandon California Sparkling Wines 750 ml $24.99
Solaris Wines 750 ml $10.99
Clos du Bois Chardonnay 750 ml $9.99
J. Lohr Chardonnays 750 ml $9.99
Guenoc 750 ml $9.99
Villabella White Chardonnay
Pellegrino Pinot Grigio 1.5 lt $8.99
Cafe Rosé 4.0 liter $8.99
B.V. Carneros Cellars 1.5 lt $18.99
Archipelago Merlot Cabernet
Barefoot Vineyards 750 ml 2 for $10.00
Barefoot Sunset 750 ml 2 for $10.00
Charbonnay, Merlot, Cabernet Shiraz
Barton & Guestier 750 ml 2 for $11.99
Chardonnay, Merlot, Cabernet
Hours: Monday - Saturday 9am - 11pm, Sunday 12pm - 11pm

Back Forward Stop Refresh Home AutoFill Print Mail
Address: @www.sunraiseinc.com
Put a PHOTO on a TEE SHIRT PUZZLE or MOUSE PAD for a gift!
Apparel Unlimited
SCREEN PRINTERS
Route 9, Russell Street • Hadley
586-7133

UMass travels to BC

MINUTEWOMEN from page 12

While the Minutewomen know tonight's game is an important one Dacko has some extra motivation heading into Conte Forum.

"I respect Cathy a lot," Dacko said. "She was a two-guard, and she got me the ball as a college player. She has done a tremendous job [at Boston College] building a team. She's had her hits early on like I'm having now, and so we talk about that. We've gone head-to-head with a couple of recruits that they beat us for, so I want to beat her."

The Minutewomen are 0-3 on the road this season, and they will have to shoot better if they want to end their losing skid.

UMass is in the basement of the Atlantic 10 statistics when it comes to field goal percentage, as it ranks 11th in the conference. The Minutewomen have only shot 37 percent from the field this season, and will need to start hitting more outside shots if they want to defeat the Eagles on their home court.

Sophomore forward Kate Mills has the highest field goal percentage on the team at 47 percent, as she has been at the top of her game since starting to come off the bench three games ago.

The Minutewomen will also be led by sophomore Pam Rosanio and junior Tamara Tatham. Rosanio leads the team in scoring and is 10th in the A-10 with 13.9 points per game, while Tatham leads the team in rebounding and is tied for third in the A-10 with 9.0 boards per game.

Moulds could be suspended

By John Wawrow
Associated Press

ORCHARD PARK, N.Y. — Buffalo Bills receiver Eric Moulds could be suspended by coach Mike Mularkey for undisclosed reasons.

Mularkey told Moulds of his plan to suspend him during a meeting Monday, a person who has been directly informed of the discussion told The Associated Press on Wednesday.

The person spoke on the condition of anonymity because the team had not yet announced plans to suspend Moulds. The person said Moulds, a three-time Pro Bowl selection, was shocked and confused following the meeting with Mularkey.

The Buffalo News, citing an unidentified NFL source, disclosed Mularkey's intention on Wednesday. The final decision, however, will be up to team owner Ralph Wilson, the newspaper reported.

Bills spokesman Scott Berchtold said he expected Mularkey to address Moulds' status during his weekly news conference later Wednesday.

Moulds and agent Harold Harrison could not be reached for comment. In his 10th season with Buffalo, Moulds is the team's senior player and second to Andre Reed in most of the Bills's career receiving categories.

The Bills (4-8), on the verge of missing the playoffs for the sixth straight season, play the New England Patriots on Sunday.

The dispute comes after Moulds carefully expressed his frustrations and questioned the team's play-calling after he was benched for most of the final three quarters of Buffalo's 24-23 loss at Miami on Sunday.

Buffalo Bills wide receiver Eric Moulds may be suspended by the team for the remainder of the season for undisclosed reasons.

It was a game in which Moulds failed to make a catch, ending his streak for receptions at a franchise-record 121 consecutive games. It was the fourth-longest streak in the league, a list led by Indianapolis's Marvin Harrison, who has a catch in 151 straight games.

After the game, Mularkey said Moulds had taken himself out of the game. The coach, on Monday, would only say that he met with Moulds privately.

"That's internal and personal," Mularkey said. "Eric and I have had a good talk and we'll keep it at that."

Moulds didn't make himself available to reporters Monday. After the game Sunday, in which the Bills squandered a 23-3 fourth-quarter lead, Moulds tried to stay composed about the loss and his lack of playing time.

"I don't really want to comment on it. I don't want it to be a situation like T.O.," Moulds said, referring to troubled Philadelphia Eagles receiver Terrell Owens, who was suspended for four games and will finish out the year on the team's inactive list.

Moulds did question the Bills's play-calling in the second half, wondering why they didn't run the ball more to run down the clock. The game's momentum turned when Bills quarterback J.P. Losman threw an interception on a first-and-goal from the 3 late in the third quarter.

Moulds's production is down this season, although he still leads the team with 54 catches for 511 yards. He also has three touchdowns, second to Lee Evans' six.

Burnett, Little are biggest names on the move in busy offseason

BURNETT from page 12

Minaya also called New York pitcher Kris Benson to discuss trade rumors.

"I'm getting calls on him," Minaya said. "His name is out there. It's a hot name right now."

Houston Astros officials said they wouldn't decide until Wednesday whether to offer salary arbitration to 43-year-old Roger Clemens, who hasn't decided whether to retire or pitch next year. If the seven-time Cy Young Award winner isn't offered arbitration by the 11 p.m. deadline, he couldn't re-sign with his hometown team until May 1.

"It's a gut-wrenching, agonizing decision," Astros general manager Tim Purpura said. "From a talent point of view, I don't want to lose him. I also realize we need to improve our clubs. It's very difficult for me to move forward in doing that if I have such uncertainty."

Also, the Red Sox said 37-year-old first baseman John Olerud, who became a free agent after the season, has decided to retire.

Toronto hasn't finished first in the AL East since winning the 1993 World Series. General manager J.P. Ricciardi, given a three-year contract extension through 2010 on Tuesday, has been aggressive in his pursuit of pitching.

Baseball officials believe the deals for Burnett and Ryan were the first five-year contracts given to pitchers since Chan Ho Park's $65 million deal with Texas in December 2001.

"One thing about the free-agent game is if you're going to get in it, you can't get in it halfway," Ricciardi said. "Either you're going to be a player or you're not."

Burnett followed Josh Beckett, Mike Lowell, Carlos Delgado, Luis Castillo and Paul Lo Duca out of Florida, where the Marlins are cutting payroll because they haven't gotten funding for a new ballpark.

Pitcher A.J. Burnett signed a $55 million, five-year contract with the Toronto Blue Jays on Tuesday. Burnett went 12-12 last season.

Marlins president David Samson visited San Antonio on Tuesday as part of a preliminary search for a possible new home for the team. Samson said the city was the first stop on a tour that will last three to five months.

"We're not a free-agent pitcher. We're a team looking for a right fit," Samson said.

A 28-year-old right-hander with a 98 mph fastball, Burnett also was pursued by St. Louis; however, the Cardinals offered only four years.

He had a 49-50 career record with the Marlins, missing almost all of the 2003 season. He returned following reconstructive elbow surgery and was 12-12 with a 3.44 ERA last season. Florida banished him during the final week after he criticized manager Jack McKeon and coaches.

"Sometimes there are personality conflicts," Toronto manager John Gibbons said. "He was frustrated. Things were said he probably regrets."

Young a true leader for Texas

By Jim Vertuno
Associated Press

AUSTIN, Texas — Seventh-grader Vince Young toiled away in his yard, raking leaves and piling them in bags. Each time he finished, his mother would dump them out and tell him to do it again.

It was his punishment for participating in a gang fight, and it was torture.

Felicia Young wanted him to hate it. Having struggled with drugs and alcohol for years, and with Vince's father in jail for most of her son's life, she was trying to scare the kid straight.

"She told me I'd end up dead or in jail," Young said, recalling his childhood in Houston, "walking with the wrong crowd and getting gunshots shot at you, trying to avoid a bullet."

"When I was raking those leaves, I thought about that," he said. "I started really working on football and school more, and that was that."

"That" became the unleashing of an elusive, strong-armed quarterback who became a local legend in a city as big as Houston and has become an even bigger star at the University of Texas.

Young has led the No. 2 Longhorns to 19 straight wins and a Rose Bowl showdown with No. 1 Southern California for the national championship. He's done it in such a spectacular way that on Saturday he'll likely be in New York as a finalist for the Heisman Trophy, trying to join Earl Campbell and Ricky Williams as the only Longhorns to win the award.

His top competition comes from the guys Texas will have to stop Jan. 4 — Trojans running back Reggie Bush and quarterback Matt Leinart, who won the award last season.

Young's supporters see him as the best of both. As a quarterback, he's the team's leader, like Leinart, yet as a phenomenal athlete capable of making eye-popping plays, he's every defensive coordinator's nightmare, like Bush.

"At this level you see a few guys with capes and S's on their chest and Vince Young is one of them," Colorado coach Gary Barnett said — before Young passed for three touchdowns and ran for another against the Buffaloes in a 70-3 victory in the Big 12 title game last Saturday.

Young's won 29 of 31 starts, passing Bobby Layne — a college and pro Hall of Famer who set the standard for Texas quarterbacks back in the 1950s — for the most victories.

He's accounted for 78 touchdowns in his career, breaking the school record of 76 set by Williams, the 1998 Heisman winner. His 8,705 yards of total offense is also a school record.

Funny thing is, midway through last season, critics wanted him to play another position.

Following a shutout loss to rival Oklahoma, Young was derided as a great runner whose awkward sidearm motion was too inconsistent.

"He had to move to receiver," Texas coach Mack Brown recalled recently.

Instead of benching him or moving him to a new position, Brown left the team in the hands of a 6-foot-5, 230-pound project, flaunting his size and speed as Texas bullied teams with a punishing rushing attack.

The Longhorns haven't lost since. Young's breakout game was the last Rose Bowl when he ran for 20, 60, 10 and 23 touchdowns and threw for another in Texas's 38-37 win over Michigan.

"Vince Young is the finest athlete I've ever been on the field with," Wolverines coach Lloyd Carr said afterward.

As a passer, Young silenced his critics with 2,769 yards and 26 touchdowns this season. He's also run for a team-high 850 yards and nine TDs in an offense that scored 50 or more points seven times. His pass efficiency rating is 168.6, the best in the nation.

"We take for granted now what he does," Brown said. "He does whatever he needs to do to win."

Young's arm got Texas its biggest win of the season, a 25-22 victory at Ohio State, with a late-game touchdown pass to Limas Sweed.

Then the season really started rolling.

Texas ended five years of frustration against Oklahoma. Young was the center of the post-game celebration, leading thousands of fans in singing the "Eyes of Texas."

Three weeks later, he saved Texas's season with 506 total yards — 267 on the ground, 239 through the air — in a 47-28 win at Oklahoma State. Texas trailed 28-9 in the second quarter and Young's 80-yard touchdown run at the start of the third turned the game.

"When the chips are down, he can pull something from nowhere," offensive tackle Justin Blalock said.

Young is just as important a leader off the field as on it.

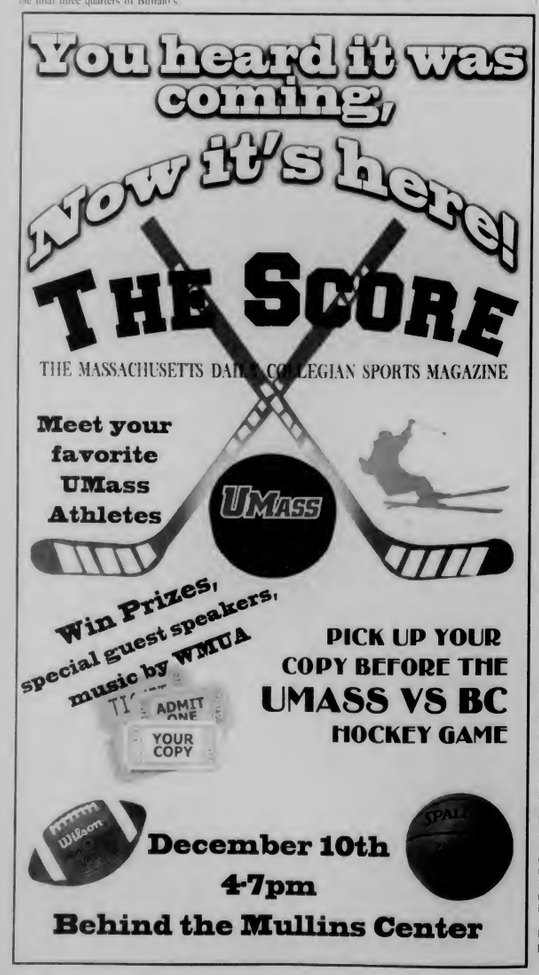
He leads the pre-game, behind-the-scenes "flow sessions" of music and dancing that keep the players and coaches loose. To get in better touch with his players, Brown downloaded hours of hip-hop music into his iPod.

"I was telling him [Brown] sometimes what 50 Cent is saying, it's similar to some of our guys' lives," Young said. "We talk to each other like we're best friends. I knew our relationship would be good, but not like it is now. We've been together a long time. It's let me grow into a man."

Since midseason, Young has maintained that he plans to return for a senior season, even if his family could use the riches of an NFL contract.

"It's my decision, and right now my decision is to come back to school," he said before Texas beat Colorado for the Big 12 title.

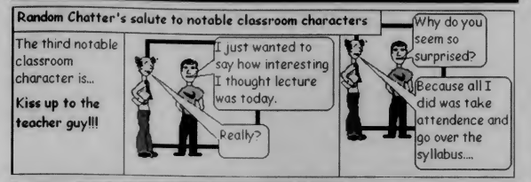
For now, he's having too much fun to think about much of anything other than playing USC for the national title.



After the Big 12 championship, Young and the players danced in a spontaneous "flow session" on the field.

A red rose tucked behind his ear, he lifted the Big 12 trophy over his head and gave a shout to the tens of thousands of Texas fans whooping it up in the stands. Before leaving, he went to the stands to sign autographs.

"Knowing where I could be at," Young said, "[I'm] very thankful for the position God has blessed me to be in."



Texas quarterback Vince Young will lead the Longhorns into a showdown with USC for the national championship on Jan. 4.

Pulp By Richard Martelly

Random Chatter By Chris Sala

Paul By Billy O'Keefe

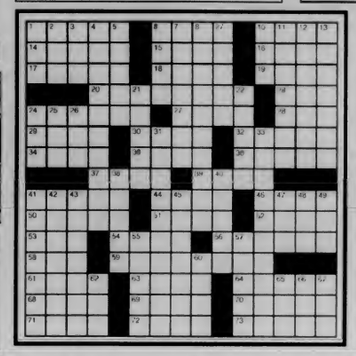
The Family Monster By Josh Shalek

A College Girl Named Joe By Aaron Warner

Quote of the Day

"Opportunity does not knock, then knock again, then leave a note saying 'sorry I missed you.'"

—That '70s Show



Random Chatter's salute to notable classroom characters

ACROSS
1 Chicks' calls
6 Cracker spread
10 Always
14 Stand for art
15 Currier and
16 Run easily
17 Purple shade
18 Heavy weights
19 Tent entrance
20 Kept
23 Junkyard dog
24 Hyde Park, e.g.
27 Bandleader Arnaz
28 MacGraw of "Love Story"
29 Make muddy
30 Slapstick ammo
32 Shades of color
34 Cain's victim
35 Conclusions
36 Twenty fins?
37 Italian treat
38 Identical
41 Absolute
44 Skier's aid
46 Fossil fuel
50 Wikipedia
51 Clair or Coty
52 Horn or God
53 Actress Arthur
54 Framework post
56 ___ Island, NY
58 Back of the bus
59 Plato's teacher
61 Okinawa port
63 Pack compactly
64 Defamation in writing
68 Conks out
69 Lose heat
70 British truck
71 Open-handed blow
72 Appendages
73 Marching drum

DOWN
1 Game counter
2 Dumbo's wing
3 NASA partner
4 Pre-game gatherings
5 Frozen raindrops
6 Sandwich pocket
7 Slayed away from
8 Man from Memphis
9 Curvy letters
10 North Pole toier
11 Pelee or Pinatubo
12 Military drill
13 Musical repeat
21 Conical home
22 Roadside burrow
24 Period
25 Cry noisily
26 Deadlock
31 Teacher
33 From time to time
38 Pungent greens
40 Wave top
41 Ramoses shackles
42 Tip of a little piggy
43 Windpipe
45 Sleeping chamber
47 Manger morsel
48 "The Naked
49 Writer Deighton
55 Puccini opera
57 Breaks the news
60 Cobbler's punches
62 Cain's snake
65 Bikini part
66 Misdo
67 Caustic solution

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

The Moan and Dove
open everyday during the holidays
8pm-1am
Christmas Eve to New Years
themoananddove.com
460 West St. • Rte. 116
Amherst, MA • 256-1710
3pm 'til 1am every day

Submit your comic!
e-mail collegiancomics@yahoo.com

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You should consider a career in the animal technician field.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Whatever you do, don't cut the green wire.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
It is not okay for you to wear a scrunchie.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Your mother's favorite color is teal. You will need this information very soon.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
It is a lot colder than you think outside today.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Bob Barker is a pimp and you are jealous.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Don't bet a lot of money at that poker game tonight. You will lose it all.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You will make a boatload of money over winter break.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Don't worry, you only have to walk around campus for another two weeks.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You will slip and fall on a patch of ice today.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Turn off the lights before you leave. Don't waste electricity.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You will sleep through multiple classes if you close your blinds.

New in town!
Amherst Hairstylists
Caren's Place
You can trust us with your hair.
• Haircuts & Styling
• Hair Coloring (Free Highlighting Consultations)
• Multi-Color Highlighting
• Body & Facial Waxing
• For Both Men & Women
• Walk-ins Welcome
www.carensplace.com
Get it done right the first time!
Fall Semester Coupon Specials!
10$ Clipper Cut
Free blow dry with haircut (straightening extra) or 10% off a regularly priced cut.
10 % Discount on Body & Facial Waxing
* only with this coupon *
debit - visa - mc - $
40 Main St.
Downtown Amherst
(Next to Newbury Comics)
Monday - Friday 10-6
Saturday 10-4
(413) 253-1200

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Announcements

Attention RSOs, Fraternities, Sororities, & Club Sports: Hosting an event? Big match coming up? Running a charity drive? Advertise it here! It's the inexpensive and effective way to get the word out. Call 545-3500 to place your ad today!

Apartment for Rent

Spring Semester Sublet – Master bedroom in Puffton Village, $461/month plus cable/internet and electricity. Looking for a subletter Jan-May. Share apartment with two other roommates, partially furnished. Call 203-915-7679.

Apartment for Rent

$380/month plus utilities. In Sunderland. Rebecca 302-359-1455

1, 2, 3 & 4 Bedroom spacious apartments, Great location, Bus Route, All utilities included No Fee Call 413-253-3000

Employment

PART-TIME POSITIONS Ideal for students or 2nd job $8.00 Hr. 20+ hrs/wk; Conduct surveys over the phone Hadley location – NO SALES! Night & wknd shifts; PVTA accessible. RSW Recruiting Office 1-888-423-5381 or email: dhayes@retail-solutions.us

Employment

Carpenter's helper. Part-time. Pay equal to experience. Must be able to lift 50 lbs. 253-5351.

Rent us your ears! Listening experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu Voicemail: 545-6837.

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience nees. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

Happy Birthday

Happy Birthday, Eric!

Wish your friends Happy Birthday in the Collegian! Call 545-3500 today!

House for Rent

For January, 2-3 Bedroom house. Walking distance to Northampton Center, close to bus. 1,000 + utilities, no pets. Skibiski Realtor 586-1827

Services

Pregnant? Consider adoption. Free confidential counseling to help you make fully informed decisions for your baby and you. Choose your baby's parents, meet and stay in touch. Stable, loving two parent families waiting to adopt. Call 24/7 Brightside 1-877-777-7774 License # 1465107

Computer Diagnostic Desktop $9.95 Laptop $39.95 413-584-8857

Services

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance. 549-1906

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

Travel

Bahamas Spring Break Cruise! 5 Days From $299! Includes Meals, MTV Celebrity Parties! Cancun, Acapulco, Jamaica From $499! Campus Reps Needed!

Travel

Promo Code:31 www.springbreaktravel.com 1-800-678-6386

SPRING BREAK FROM $569 BAHAMAS, CANCUN, ACAPULCO, JAMAICA! FREE PARTIES, FREE DRINKS. Sign up early and save. Organize a small group and you travel FREE. Or become a CAMPUS REP and GET PAID COMMISSION on each trip sold. Call today and get started 1-800-GET-SUN-1

Collegian Advertising: Reach over 14,000 readers daily! (413) 545-3500

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS THURSDAY

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 8, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The Rematch

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

The lights will be shut off at the Mullins Center tonight. There will not be 9,037 screaming fans packed in the seats, nor will there be melodies blaring from the brass trombones of the band. Most importantly, there will not be a Massachusetts basketball player to be found on the hardwood.

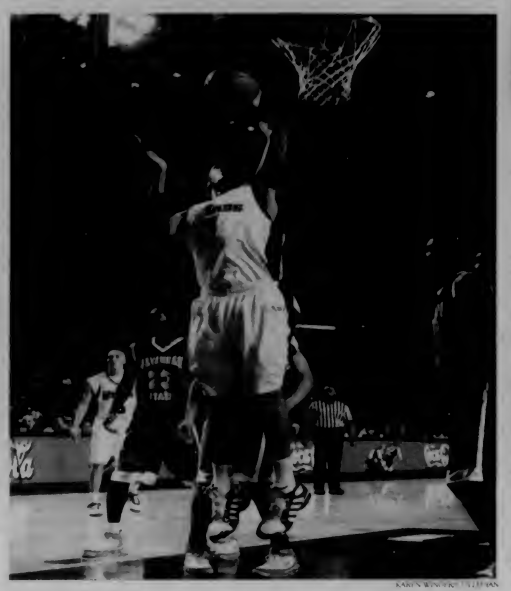
Travel about 52 miles south and enter the Civic Center in Hartford, Conn. at 9 p.m., and suddenly memories of Dec. 9, 2004 when UMass upset the Connecticut Huskies 61-59 will almost seem irrelevant.

A new episode of this heated rivalry will be born again tonight as the Minutemen (2-2) will attempt to shock No. 3 UConn (6-0). And while UMass pulled off the victory in 2004, the Minutemen, who are a 22.5 point underdog according to Yahoo!Sports.com, will again have their hands full against UConn and coach Jim Calhoun. The team is coming off a 113-49 whipping of Texas Southern on Friday.

"I think Connecticut, from what I've seen, is the best team in the country," UMass coach Travis Ford said. "Their top six players right now are NBA basketball players."

The Minutemen will have to slow down the fast-paced Huskies that sport a roster that provides a deadly combination of size, speed and shooting ability. The team's leading scorer, 2004-05 Big East Rookie of the Year Rudy Gay, has broken out during the team's six-game winning streak.

The 6-foot-9-small forward is averaging 16.3 points per game, including a career day against Arkansas on Nov. 21 when the sophomore recorded career-highs in points (28) and field goals made (11-of-19).



The Huskies are stacked on offense, with senior Denham Brown and Rashad Anderson also putting up points for the Huskies. Brown, a forward, has 1,004 career points for UConn and is averaging 13.3 this season, while Anderson is deadly on the perimeter, hitting a team-high of 12-of-24.

"They have so many go-to guys and you look at their team and there aren't too many weaknesses," Ford said. "They're big, they can rebound and they're obviously shooting the basketball right now. They're getting solid play from their point guard position."

Since UMass last knocked off a No. 3 ranked team in 1996, the Minutemen will have to keep up on defense in order to prevent the Huskies from taking off with the game altogether.

"They like to run a lot and if we can get back in defensive transition then I think we'll have a pretty good chance of stopping them, because I do know that they break out a lot and try to find easy baskets," UMass junior Brandon Thomas said. "I think our defense

See MEN'S HOOP on page 9

KAREN WINKLER / COLLEGIAN

Junior Rashaun Freeman had 18 points and eight rebounds in UMass' 61-59 upset win over UConn last year. Freeman's layup with 4.3 seconds remaining gave the Minutemen the victory.

Five keys to the game for UM

Dan Duggan

In this paper a year ago, Mike Marzelli spelled out five keys necessary for the Massachusetts men's basketball team to knock off the defending NCAA National Champion Connecticut Huskies. That night, the Minutemen went out and executed their game plan to perfection and pulled off a shocking 61-59 upset at the Mullins Center.

A year later, not much has changed. UConn (6-0) is back atop the national rankings, and UMass (2-2) will once again play the role of underdog when the teams take the court tonight at the Hartford Civic Center at 9 p.m. in a game televised nationally on ESPN2.

The Minutemen will need to focus on doing a lot of the same things they did last year — as well as executing a few new wrinkles unique to this year's matchup — if they plan on pulling off their second consecutive upset of the Huskies.

Without further ado, here are the keys to tonight's game:

CONTROL THE TEMPO

Last year, former UMass coach Steve Lappas realized that his squad would not be able to run with the more athletic Huskies, so he slowed the pace of the game. The result was a low-scoring affair that UMass was able to pull out in the final seconds on a Rashaun Freeman layup.

This year, UMass coach Travis Ford will need to find a way for his squad to control the tempo of the game. With only eight scholarship players, UMass must avoid getting into a shootout with a deep Huskies team.

The biggest difference from last year is that UMass no longer has the services of four-year starter Anthony Anderson (just one turnover in last season's game) at point guard. With converted swingman Maurice Maxwell and true freshman Chris Lowe running the offense, it will be especially important for

See KEYS on page 9

A look back at last year's win

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

Jeff Viggiano can't get enough tickets for tonight's matchup between the Massachusetts men's basketball team and the Connecticut Huskies.

Viggiano, a senior forward for the Minutemen and a Suffield, Conn. native, has been besieged by ticket requests from friends and relatives for the 9 p.m. game at the Hartford Civic Center.

While it works out for Viggiano's fans that the game will be in his home state, they also must be aware that the opponent is the No. 3 Huskies. Viggiano has been a UConn-killer in his UMass career, scoring 22 points two years ago in a losing effort, and scoring 12 clutch points in last year's UMass upset win at the Mullins Center.

Viggiano counts last year's performance as the top moment of his career.

"That game was great," Viggiano said. "It was unlike anything since I've been here; it was on national TV, and when the students rushed the court, it was unreal. Hopefully we'll be able to repeat that this year."

While the Minutemen have been able to look back on last year's game as a source of confidence heading into tonight's showdown, they are careful not to get carried away with memories from their big win.

Junior Maurice Maxwell feels that last year UMass did not respond well following the win against UConn.

"When we beat them, we were feeling really high, but I don't think we carried that win the right way," Maxwell said. "We let the win blow our heads up a little bit. We were still talking about that game a month after it happened."

Three days after the UConn game, UMass went out and got waxed 80-53 by Miami, ending any chance of building momentum off of the win.

"[Former] Coach [Steve] Lappas told us we had to try and build off of that win and not let that win define our whole season," Maxwell said. "But we had a lot of sophomores and that was our first real big win, so I don't think we knew how to handle it."

One thing that has helped the Minutemen put last year's game behind them is that they haven't been able to watch any film of the game because the game tapes have mysteriously gone missing.

See UPSET on page 9

Do you know The Score?

To all of our Collegian readers,

We in the Daily Collegian sports department would like to invite you to come celebrate the release of The Score, the third edition of the Collegian's annual sports magazine, this Saturday, Dec. 10, from 4-7 p.m. behind the Mullins Center.

The event will run all the way up until the faceoff between your UMass Minutemen and the Boston College Eagles in a highly anticipated matchup between two Hockey East rivals.

Come meet your favorite UMass student athletes, such as freshman quarterback Liam Coen of the 7-4 football team and Brandon Thomas, who has led the men's basketball team to a 2-2 record so far. Both athletes are the cover stars of this year's magazine, which will also tell you who at UMass has National Football League potential, which UMass swimmer has braved through heart surgery and which skier is a direct descendant of a Civil War general.

Also, Minuteman hockey coach Don Cahoon will be on hand to fire up the crowd around 5 p.m., and new men's basketball coach Travis Ford, who is also featured in The Score, will make an appearance at the same time.

So come be part of something special down at the heated tent behind the Mullins Center, where you can pick up a fresh copy of The Score, meet your favorite athletes, collect some autographs and eat all of the food your heart desires — and it's all on our tab.

Before you head to the rink to cheer for your Mass Attack to take down the defending Hockey East champion Eagles, head to our big celebration and find out what The Score is before everyone else does.

Jeff Howe
Sports Editor

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

UMass fans stormed the Mullins Center court following last year's win over UConn. While this scene is unlikely to be repeated with this year's game taking place in Hartford, UMass is hoping for a similar result.

YOU ARE INVITED

What: THE SCORE promotional party and UMass hockey pep rally / tailgate party

Where: A heated tent behind the Mullins Center
When: This Saturday, December 10, 4-7 p.m.

Why: Pick up a copy of THE SCORE, meet coaches and athletes, get autographs and tailgate for the UMass-BC hockey game.

How Much: Free!

THE SCORE

Minutewomen to face Eagles

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team will play its second game of a five-game road trip as it takes on Boston College (6-2) at 7 p.m. tonight at Conte Forum.

The Minutewomen (2-5) are coming off of a 59-43 loss to New Hampshire on Sunday, and will look to win their first road game of the season against a strong Boston College squad.

"Rebounding is going to be key," said head coach Marnie Dacko. "They are averaging 11 more rebounds over their opponents. We have to limit the touches that Kindyll Dorsey gets, and limit the shots on the perimeter. They are very strong inside, so we have to rebound, play transition defense and gain some confidence in our perimeter shooting. We have got to get the kids to gain more confidence with their outside shooting and being able to knock down some shots."

The Eagles are coming off of a loss of their own, as they nearly upset No. 4 Ohio State on Saturday, but ended up losing in overtime by a score of 66-61. It was Boston College's first loss at home this season, bringing their record at Conte Forum to 4-1.

The Minutewomen will have to watch out for senior forward Brooke Queenan if they want to get back on the winning track. Queenan can dominate the post and has proven it this season, as she is third in the Atlantic Coast Conference in rebounding with 8.6 boards per game. She leads the Eagles in scoring with 11.6 points per game and is one of the team's tri-captains.

Along with Queenan, the Minutewomen will also have to try to shut down sophomore guard Kindyll Dorsey. Dorsey averages 10.9 points per game and shoots 41.5 percent from behind the arc. She is fifth in the ACC in three-point field goals made with 2.13 per game.

The Eagles are no strangers to three-pointers, as they have hit a shot from behind the arc in 63 consecutive games.

Tonight's game will also serve as a reunion for Dacko and Boston College head coach Cathy Inglese. Inglese was Dacko's teammate at Southern Connecticut State for two seasons.

See MINUTEWOMEN on page 10

Blue Jays stacking up pitching

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

DALLAS — Trying to compete in the American League East, the Toronto Blue Jays pushed their pitching investment past the $100 million mark by giving A.J. Burnett a $55 million, five-year contract.

One week after giving reliever B.J. Ryan a $47 million, five-year deal, the splurging Blue Jays landed the top starting pitcher on the free-agent market, one they hope will help them overtake the New York Yankees and Boston Red Sox.

"Sooner, rather than later, we're going to see a new team on top there," Burnett said.

On the second day of the winter meetings, the Los Angeles Dodgers filled the last open manager's job in the major leagues, hiring former Boston manager Grady Little. He's still blamed by Red Sox fans for leaving Pedro Martinez in too long in Game 7 of the 2003 AL championship series.

"That's New England and it's Boston," Little said. "All they want to do is win, and that's all we were trying to do."

On the trade front, the San Francisco Giants sent right-hander LaTroy Hawkins to the Baltimore Orioles.

The Cincinnati Reds reached a preliminary agreement to send first baseman Sean Casey to the Pittsburgh Pirates for left-hander Dave Williams, a deal that could be finalized Wednesday after physicals.

On Wednesday, the San Diego Padres dealt third baseman Sean Burroughs to the Tampa Bay Devil Rays for right-hander Dewon Brazelton, and the Chicago Cubs acquired center fielder Juan Pierre from the Florida Marlins.

Among free agents, Cleveland was negotiating with closer Trevor Hoffman and the Seattle Mariners were said to be talking with Kevin Millwood. San Diego improved its proposal to retain Hoffman, offering a deal with a 2008 option that could become guaranteed under certain conditions.

Designated hitter Mike Piazza appears to be attracting interest from the Los Angeles Angels, Seattle, Minnesota and Toronto.

Officials of the New York Mets had a meeting with the Red Sox on Monday and discussed Manny Ramirez. The Mets are waiting for the Red Sox to get back to them with what it would take to put together a deal for the 2004 World Series MVP, who wants out of Boston.

Mets general manager Omar

See BURNETT on page 10

WINTER BREAK WORK

1-5 Week Work Program!
Locations Near You

$16.00 – $20.00
base-appt.

All Ages 17+, Conditions Apply
No Experience Necessary
Customer Sales / Customer Service
Great for Resume

Call Now, Begin After Finals

Connecticut
Fairfield, Greenwich, Hamden, Westport
Hartford County, Storrs, Enfield, Norwalk
New Haven County & Lyme, Middletown

Massachusetts
Chelmsford, Lowell, Eastham

North Shore, Andover, Reading
Waltham, Oakland, Framingham

Maine
Portland, Auburn, Lewiston, Sanford

New Hampshire
Manchester, Nashua, Concord

New Jersey
Bergen Co.
Monmouth, Ocean Co.
Essex Co.
Morris Co.
Somerset, Hunterdon Co.

New York
Nassau, Suffolk Co.
Queens, NYC

Pennsylvania
Bucks, Montgomery Co.
Lancaster, Lebanon Co.
Montgomery, Berks Co.

New England's Largest College Daily · Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Monday, December 12, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXVI Issue 64

Parking Services director defends his department

By Katie Huston
Collegian Staff

Exorbitant ticket prices, unpaved lots, and a lack of communication are only a few of the complaints students have directed this year at the University of Massachusetts's Parking Services.

"I feel that they don't tell us anything about where the money goes. They're charging us so much money, and nothing's happening," said Jennifer Lane, a sophomore theater major who parks her car in a purple lot near Orchard Hill Residential Area.

But Parking Services Director Michael Brennan said his organization is doing its best to serve students while working within a system that's far from ideal.

With 6,992 students with parking permits, there simply aren't enough spaces for all students to park near their dorms, and it's difficult to find space for new lots, said Brennan.

Efforts to encourage freshmen to leave their cars at home have had some success; in 1999, 1,300 freshmen had cars on campus, while this year only 900 freshmen purchased parking permits, Brennan said.

Parking Services also runs a ride share program, which has about 300 participants among students, faculty and staff who commute to campus, said Sandra Anderson, Director of Campus Services.

To create more spaces, Parking Services constructed purple lot 49 next to Dickinson dorm in Orchard Hill in the summer of 2003.

They are also planning to build a new purple lot for

See PARKING on page 2

Students organize Operation Secret Santa

By Emily Moses
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts students are helping children affected by Hurricane Katrina this holiday season.

Graduate student Rebecca Breitenkamp and UMass Journalism undergraduate and Daily Collegian writer Hannah Drake are organizing Operation Secret Santa, a charity to make Christmas brighter for many victims.

Breitenkamp, whose family hails from Louisiana and Mississippi, toured the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast in October. She realized that some parts of the coast are being ignored by large hurricane relief groups, and she wants to supply those forgotten areas. During her mission, Breitenkamp drove from Texas to Louisiana and back through Alabama to get supplies for people who needed food, water, generators and gas.

Drake, the co-organizer of Operation Secret Santa, said "I just thought, 'We have to find some way to help.' Since I have local contacts [on the Gulf Coast], I knew I could get specific information on what they need."

"A lot of [evacuees in rural areas] are foreigners who were displaced and didn't know where to go. Most of the time people think it's poor people who need the help, but [volunteers] were feeding doctors and lawyers who had lost family and had nowhere else to go," said Breitenkamp.

After her firsthand experience helping victims in the Gulf Coast, Breitenkamp had an idea to send emails to her church, groups on the UMass campus, and Girl Scout troops. Her idea to help children this season flourished from networking groups together in the western Massachusetts area.

Rebecca Breitenkamp/Collegian

Damage from Hurricane Katrina litters Mississippi. Many victims of the disaster are still in need of supplies, especially as the holidays grow near.

She also found a trucking company from Fitchburg to help the charity bring large amounts of supplies to Gulfport, Miss.

Katrina victims are in need of basic things such as hygiene items, school supplies and small furniture. According to Breitenkamp, other needed items include cleaning supplies, baby items, bags and backpacks. Breitenkamp's organized efforts are bringing these items to individual families in the Gulf Coast region. She says anybody can help by creating a care package of hygiene items, or school items for children.

Breitenkamp's mother-in-law is a second grade teacher at Cherokee Elementary School in Pascagoula, Miss. The students at her school lost everything in the hurricane and require charitable help from others.

Breitenkamp says that they have very little, and what they do have is going towards buying material to rebuild homes. Most families do not know how they will buy gifts for their children for Christmas.

"This isn't something that's going to be taken care of in a few weeks or months," Breitenkamp said in an interview with the Daily Collegian in October. "...Especially at the holidays, the need seems even greater. Keep [evacuees] in mind; parents won't have gifts to give their kids. It also puts things in perspective. No matter how bad your day is going, you know that people are going through worse."

Operation Secret Santa is collecting Wal-Mart and Visa/Mastercard gift cards to send to Cherokee Elementary School. The cards, which can be purchased at any Wal-Mart, will be distributed to the parents of children depending on how much each family needs. According to Breitenkamp, these cards will let parents buy toys, clothes and other gifts to bring Christmas to their children.

Breitenkamp has a Web site set up so donors can see the children of the families these cards will be donated to. To find out more information, go to operationsecretsanta.blogspot.com or search for the Operation Secret Santa group on thefacebook.com. She is also accepting donations of care packages at her office, Conte A627.

Northampton bar suspended for one week

NORTHAMPTON — A city bar has been placed under suspension for seven days after the License Commission ruled that a bartender served alcohol to underage customers.

Tully O'Reilly's and the Elevens, located on the corner of Pleasant St. and Pearl St., has until Wednesday to appeal the ruling to the state Alcoholic Beverages and Control Commission.

Northampton Police Capt. Michael Wall told the Commission that two officers were called to the bar in the early morning hours of Sept. 26. on a call of an incapacitated woman. When officers arrived, they found a Smith College student at a table with three other women, police said.

Published reports indicate that the three women had flown in from California to visit Stephanie Jarvi, 20, a Smith student. Jarvi reportedly ordered five or six drinks at Tully O'Reilly's.

According to testimony, Jarvi appeared intoxicated when police arrived. Officers asked Jarvi for her identification when they arrived. She reportedly gave them her California driver's license, which indicated that she was 20 years old. She apparently gave police her license with her real age by accident.

One officer said Jarvi was so intoxicated that an ambulance had to be called. However, they determined she was in no medical danger and she did not have to go to the hospital.

Bartender Louis Roscher testified that the women appeared sober when they arrived at the bar and he did not give them more than an ounce of alcohol with any given drink.

The Commission ruled that the bar should have subjected the women to greater scrutiny when checking for identification. Tully O'Reilly's and the Elevens cannot serve liquor between Jan. 2 and 8 because of the incident.

—Dan O'Brien

Dan O'Brien/Collegian

Tully O'Reilly's Pub, pictured above, has been placed under suspension for seven days after a bartender served customers under the legal drinking age.

Assault suspect pleads innocent at arraignment

NORTHAMPTON — A New Jersey man who was charged with trying to kill a Five College student pleaded innocent in Superior Court Friday to charges that stemmed from the incident.

Salvador Perez, 23, of Dumont, N.J. was arraigned on charges of home invasion, kidnapping causing serious bodily injury, and three counts of aggravated assault and assault and battery with a dangerous weapon. A previous charge of assault with intent to murder was dropped.

Amherst police say Perez had just ended a dating relationship with Diego Angarita-Horwitz prior to the Oct. 6 incident that landed him in jail. The relationship had become abusive, police said.

On the night of Oct. 6, Perez, who is not a student, allegedly entered Angarita-Horwitz's Greenwich dormitory room, struck him on the head with a flashlight and strangled him with a yellow cord until he lost consciousness. Perez tied up the victim with the cord and cut his arms with a utility knife, police said.

Police said they found Perez unconscious after he consumed a bottle of sleeping pills shortly after the incident.

Both Perez and Angarita-Horwitz were treated and released at Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

Perez's bail was set at $50,000 of $500,000 surety by Judge Mary-Lou Rup. He was ordered to have no contact with the victim or witnesses if released on bail. There was no word on whether Perez made bail as of press time.

Perez's case was continued to March 16.

—Dan O'Brien

Courtesy Laura Cuda

Let it snow
Students gather at Central's hill on Friday, during the snow day that closed down the university, to sled and ski on their day off.

Amherst celebrates Dickinson's birthday

By Jamie Mason
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Emily Dickinson's 175th birthday was celebrated Saturday at the Emily Dickinson Museum. Her birthday also marked the 10th annual Open House held at the Main Street museum.

The free open house consisted of self-guided tours, live music and poetry readings, as well as cakes from the Dickinson family's recipes. Yellow, pink, and red roses were given out to the first 175 people who arrived at the museum.

The Homestead, the house where Emily Dickinson spent the majority of her life, and the Evergreens, the house where Dickinson's brother and sister-in-law lived, were both open for public viewing.

Cindy Dickinson, the Director of Interpretation and Programming at the museum, said, "[This event] has been great, very successful. We do this every year; it's the last event before we close for the season. This year the event is especially exciting because it is the 175th anniversary and the 10th open house we have had."

This year the museum added some new features to the open house. "We added the guitar music and the poetry readings," said Dickinson.

Katie-Rose DeCandia played classical guitar music in the Evergreens parlor and there were poetry readings by museum staff in both the Homestead and the Evergreens.

Deborah Levenson, a Hadley resident, said that it was her first visit to the museum and that it was very moving. "One thing I am noticing the most are the small signs where people have wrote about how Emily Dickinson has moved them. She is so alive to many people today."

Karen Stallone, a University of Massachusetts senior English major, said she attended the event because she had been studying Dickinson in an American Romanticism class. "I felt that it was

See DICKINSON on page 2

ARTS & LIVING
ALL ABOUT THE MUSIC
"Rent" is disappointing, but the music is excellent, just as it is in the Broadway version.
Page 5

EDITORIAL/OPINION
COMM IS CRITICIZED BY STUDENTS
Find out why we need communication majors.
Page 4

WEATHER
TODAY Partly Cloudy, H33°
TONIGHT Partly Cloudy, L12°
TOMORROW Sunny, H24°, L6°

SPORTS
TERRIER TIME
UMass men's basketball will have to deal with Boston University tonight at the Mullins Center.
Page 8

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Michael Busack
Managing Editor Cameron J. Woods
Business Manager Hirak Shah
Production Manager Nicholas Belanger
Night Supervisor Sheryl Wolnik
Advertising Manager Kerry O'Grady
Advertising Production Lauren Egwian
Editorial Production Amanda Allen
Arts & Living Editor Matthew O'Rourke
Comics Editor Amanda Allen
Editorial Editor Allison Edles
News Editor Dan O'Brien
Photo Editor Kate Sachsenmaier
Sports Editor Jeff Howe
Circulation Manager Thomas Hecht
Distribution Manager Nick Gleason
Finance Manager Daniel Conti
Human Resource Phil Smoller
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Caren Tortorici
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Asst. Arts & Living Mackenzie Isler
Asst. Arts & Living Ian Jones
Assistant News Megan Daley
Assistant News Matt Bellveau
Assistant Photo Elizabeth Caristi
Assistant Sports Eric Athas
Assistant Sports Dan Duggan
Assistant Editorial Kristen LeCasse

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1956. Published daily since 1967, The Collegian has been broadsheet since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call weekdays between 8:30 a.m. and 3:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Katie Huston
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Kate Sachsenmaier
COPY EDITOR
Dan O'Brien
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Tiffany Van Langen
PRODUCTION STAFF
Jacqueline Ronan

Dickinson Museum holds open house

KATE SACHSENMAIER/COLLEGIAN

Photos of the Dickinson family line one of the walls of the Homestead house, Emily Dickinson's home for most of her life.

DICKINSON from page 1

actually rather limited. More than half of the [Homestead] house was closed off and people were only allowed in two rooms," said Stallone. However, she said she enjoyed the pieces selected for the poetry reading.

Another UMass student, junior psychology major Caroline Holcomb, felt that the historical information about where Emily Dickinson lived was interesting and informative. "The spirit of Emily Dickinson lives on," said Holcomb.

At the Homestead a replica of a housedress that Emily Dickinson used to wear was displayed in a glass case outside of her bedroom. It was the same size that Dickinson was so that visitors could get an understanding of her size. People in the crowd remarked that she was short and tiny. But a museum tour guide, David Garnes, said, "She was average in size. Her contemporaries would not have seen her as short."

The bedroom was where Dickinson slept for the last 31 years of her life, said Garnes. She died in 1886. The bed was her authentic sleigh style bed. The room also contained a bureau similar to the one where her poems were found.

The first edition of Dickinson's poetry was published in 1890 and it was immediately successful, and by the turn of the century she was fairly well known, said Garnes.

This was the last event of the season for the Emily Dickinson museum. It will close for the season and reopen March 1.

Parking Services focuses on ways to improve conditions

PARKING from page 1

Sylvan and North Residential Areas on Eastman Lane across from the Cashin dormitory. The new lot would have close to 300 spots, which would make up for the large portion of purple lot 44 that was lost during the construction of North this year. The lot will have one space for every 2.78 beds in North, Brennan said.

By building these new lots, Brennan and Anderson hope to eliminate the need for yellow lot 13 behind the UMass Admissions building.

"Why put money into a place we don't want to be in the first place?" Anderson said.

However, Lane was unsure how the new North lot would help eliminate need for yellow lot 13. "Where would students park who have yellow lot for Orchard Hill?" she said.

Lot 13 has been a main focus of student complaints. The lot is unpaved and lacks lines, and many students are uncomfortable walking back to Orchard Hill in the dark because of poor lighting.

Lane parked in lot 13 her freshman year. "I wouldn't walk alone if I parked too late at night," she said. "If we're paying upward of $150 for a parking permit, it should be in a safe area."

Students have also complained that yellow lot 12 behind the Mullins Center is unpaved and unlined.

Paving lot 12 is not an option because an underground stream that runs from the campus pond to a stream east of the Mullins Center lot would require extensive, costly draining systems, said Brennan.

"We would love to pave this lot," he said. "A lot of our headaches would go away, a lot of our complaints." However, three years ago, the estimate to repave the lot was $3 million a figure that far exceeds Parking Services' $550,000 yearly repair and renovation budget, he said.

Parking Services did repave yellow lot 11 near Southwest in 2004. "We completely reconstructed it. Lighting, curbs, drains, paving," Anderson said. The project cost roughly $900,000 and included all new lighting and the infrastructure to support cameras to increase security.

"The last two projects that parking spent big bucks on were student-focused," Anderson said of the repaving and the construction of the Orchard Hill purple lot in 2003.

However, students have said they feel exploited by high ticket prices and towing costs, largely because they don't know where the money is going.

"I don't feel like any of the students who are paying their tickets have any idea where the money is going because we just aren't informed about it," said Lane. "We don't physically see it in the fact that the yellow lots aren't paved. It just doesn't seem fair."

On the UMass campus, all ticket revenue goes to a parking scholarship fund. Legislated by Massachusetts general law in 1962, the fund is given out in the form of grants to students who encounter unexpected financial hardships, like accidents or family deaths, about 95 percent of the time, said Ken Burnham, Director of Financial Aid Services.

This redirection of ticket revenues, which totals $400,000 to $700,000 each year, is not typical. "At 99.9 percent of institutions, that money goes back into parking to fund repair and renovation," Brennan said.

Although Lane said that if students knew their ticket money was helping students in need, "it might be a little easier for students to grasp the idea that their tickets are $25," she said the prices should still be lowered.

"If you get a parking ticket in Amherst, they're $8, which is a huge difference when you're a college student," she said.

Brennan said that the instances of ticketing and towing have decreased in recent years. Parking Services used to issue 40-45,000 tickets per year. Today, "it's probably down around 30,000," Brennan said.

